forest. There is, besides, abundant evidence that lumber of this description is an ordinary article of trade in the West India Islands; and as to the fire-bricks and iron, independently of the evidence as to the iron having been procured for the purpose of ballasting boats, it cannot surely be supposed that 10000 fire-bricks could have been purchased for the purpose of constructing a stove. We may add as to the resps.' case upon the cargo, that Spurrell, one of their witnesses, enumerates the articles of which the cargoes of vessels employed in the slave trade are generally composed, and that in his enumeration there are contained a variety of articles none of which were found in the cargo of this vessel. A further point on which the resps. rested was the appliances for water contained in the vessel, and the quantity of water which was found in her; but as to the tanks, the principal part of these appliances, it is not even suggested that they were introduced into the vessel after the app. purchased her, and as the vessel does not appear to have been employed in the slave trade before she was purchased by the app., the fact of these tanks being found in her can afford no evidence that she was intended to be employed in that trade; and as to the quantity of water found in the vessel, the evidence, although it shows that the quantity was large, does not in our opinion justly lead to the conclusion that the vessel was destined for the coast of Africa rather than for any other lengthened voyage, to which the difficulty of selling the cargo at the island of St. Bartholomew might lead. The resps. also rested much upon this, that there were found on board this vessel a variety of charts, and amongst others, several charts of the island of Cuba, and one of the coast of Africa, with tracks delineated upon it. This was certainly a matter requiring explanation, and the evidence, as we think, affords a reasonable explanation of it. Charts would of course be required for navigating the vessel, and there is no trace of there having been any on board the vessel when she was purchased by the app. The circumstances under which these charts were procured are stated by the app. to have been, that he could not procure on shore at Havanna charts by which the vessel could be worked, and he therefore desired the mate to procure them from the shipping in the port, and the mate O'Sullivan confirms this statement, and adds, that he procured the charts from the shipping, mentioning the persons from whom he procured them. There is no contradiction to this evidence. The app., indeed, does not appear to have been asked a question on the subject, and the cross-examination of the mate upon it tends to confirm his evidence in chief. If the charts could have been procured on shore at Havanna, the resps. could have proved that fact. They have given no such proof. There was evidently no concealment of these charts. They were lying in the cabin in rolls during the time the vessel was under seizure. There is, besides, abundant evidence to show that vessels commonly carry charts of seas in which they have never been, and to which they have no intention of going. Spurrell, the resps.' witness, states that he has charts of the coast of Africa on board his ship, and several other masters of ships state also that they have such charts on board their ships. Looking, then, to the special grounds on which the resps.' case is rested, we have come to the conclusion that the evidence adduced by them is insufficient to support those grounds; but, then, it was strongly urged on their part that their evidence was, at least, sufficient to wholly discredit the case set up by the app., and, possibly, if the app.'s case had rested on his own testimony only we might have adopted this view, but the app.'s case is so strongly confirmed, at least as to many of the material points, by other and independent testimony which the resps. have failed to displace, that we cannot see our way to yield to this argument on their part. We observe that the learned judge, from whose decree this appeal is brought has in his very able and elaborate judgment (for, although we differ from the learned judge in his conclusions, his judgment is fully entitled to be characterised as both able and elaborate) adverted to there being some difficulty in decreeing restitution of this vessel to the app., on the ground that he has stated by his claim that he is not and never was a British subject, and that he can therefore have no title to a British ship; but, as the learned judge has himself observed, the record does not properly raise this point, and, besides, this vessel, although undoubtedly she was to be considered as a British ship when she was captured, and therefore liable to condemnation if a sufficient case was proved against her, could not, as we apprehend, be considered to be a British ship after the expiration of the provisional certificate of registration, which had expired before this decree was pronounced. Any difficulty, therefore, which there might have been in decreeing restitution would seem to have been at an end, and certainly this is not an objection to which we should be inclined to give effect, having regard to the circumstances under which the certificate of registration of this vessel was granted. There is one other point on which, before parting with this case, we feel bound to observe. Attempts appear to have been made to induce some of the crew of this vessel to make statements favourable to the case of the resps. We refer particularly to the evidence of Rowley. Such attempts, if they were in fact made, were, in our opinion, unjustifiable; and if they were not in fact made, it is much to be regretted that no contradiction has been given to the testimony of this witness. Upon the whole, the true state of this case has appeared to us to be that the British consul at Havanna, in the first instance, took up suspicions against this vessel, which, so far as appears upon the evidence before us, he had no sufficient grounds for entertaining, and that the vast mass of evidence which we have before us has resulted from an attempt to find grounds for supporting those suspicions, an attempt which has failed; and we feel ourselves bound, therefore, humbly to recommend Her Majesty to reverse this decree and to order restitution of this vessel, with damages and costs both in the court below and of this appeal. Any costs already paid by the app. to be refunded.

Decree reversed with costs.

Ship—Charter-party—Freight—Deductions—Jettison—Non-assortment of cargo—Waiver of tender—Address commission.

A charter-party guaranteed that the vessel should carry 3000 tons dead-weight of cargo on a draught of twenty-six feet of water:

Heckl, water meant fresh as well as salt water.

*A charter-party stipulated that 11,250*l.* lump sum would be paid for freight on both the outward and homeward voyages, part payment to be by bills, the rest on true and final delivery of cargo at the port of discharge.*

not of skill in the pilot, and part of goods which were damaged being sold at an intermediate port:

“(1) there ought to be no deduction from the lump sum because part of the goods were not delivered; (2) the master having demanded a larger sum than he is entitled to, and in such a manner as to announce to tender of a smaller sum would be useless, this was waiver of tender; (3) address commission might be deducted from freight; (4) no claim of damages for co-employment could be sustained, because the master bills of the goods was not bound to incur a pecuniary liability for the advantage of the goods; (5) proportion of freight forfeited for breach of warranty as to capacity and draught of vessel might be deducted from freight.

this was an appeal from a decree of the Court of Admiralty in a suit by the pils. Ashburner and Co., pils. of the bill of lading and owners of a cargo on shipped on board the Norway at Rangoon, against the owners of the vessel, for damage by jettison, detention, and other breaches of contract.

the charter-party was executed in London on 2nd Nov. 1861, between Capt. Major, master of Norway, and De Mattos. It was as follows:—

In this day mutually agreed between Capt. H. R. Major, of good ship or vessel called the Norway, A. 1. of the burden 70 tons per register, or thereabouts, now lying in the port of Rangoon, wharfed to be at present master, of the one part, W. M. De Mattos, Esq., of London, merchant and broker, of the other part. That the said ship being tight, strong, and every way fitted for the voyage, shall, at convenient speed, and consideration whereof, and everything before mentioned, said merchant does hereby promise and agree to load, stow, or cause to be laden and received, in the manner within the time herein mentioned for their purposes, and for or cause to be paid, as freight, for the use and hire of said vessel, eleven thousand two hundred and fifty pounds, viz., if ordered to the United Kingdom, Havre, or Bordeaux, the master guaranteeing to carry 3000 tons dead weight, upon a draught of twenty-six feet of water, or to forfeit his proportion to deficiency, the vessel to be loaded at port calling in such a draught of water as the freighter or his agent, in connection with the pilot commissioners, can safely proceed to sea, higher or lower, if any, to fill up the ship to the beam, to be at freighter's expense, payment whereof to be made, and to be paid as follows, viz., 1000*l.* to be paid on the vessel's clearing at Liverpool, subject to once only, say 1000*l.* by freighter's acceptance at four days, and 1000*l.* at six months, meantime cash for ship's provisions, not exceeding 1000*l.* to be advanced at Calcutta, and the necessary disbursements, if ordered to the river, subject to interest and insurance only, all at current of exchange for six months bills on London against captain's receipts, each advance to be made on account of chartered freight, and the balance, as follows, (one-third in cash, on arrival at port of delivery, and remainder on two and final delivery of the cargo at the port of discharge, by good and approved bills, payable on demand, or cash equal to three months date from the day, if discharged in the United Kingdom, or in cash, at the rate of exchange, if discharged on the continent, less a month's interest, and also to pay for each and every time the vessel is detained beyond the time hereinbefore stated demurrage at the rate of thirty pounds sterling per day to be paid day by day, or as the owner or his agent may agree for it otherwise. The master shall sign of lading as required, without prejudice to this charter-party. The vessel, if ordered from Calcutta to load at the port, to proceed within six hours, wind and weather permitting, after receiving her dispatches to sail, the customary charges and tonnage at the river ports to be borne by the charter, as well as the actual costs of ballasting required for ship at Calcutta, the cargo to be taken on and taken from guide at merchant's risk and expense, the vessel to be engaged at all ports to freighter's agent, paying one commission only on this charter, not exceeding five per cent, and the true performance hereof the said parties hereto undertake themselves, their respective heirs, executors, assigns, the vessel, her freight and appurtenances, and the said ship the cargo to be laden on board the said vessel, each the other, in the penal sum of twelve thousand pounds, all and lawful money of Great Britain, it being agreed for the payment of all freight, dead freight, demurrage, her charges, the said master or owners shall have an lien and charge on the said cargo or goods laden on it. The brokerage on this charter-party, five per cent, to be paid to the ship, on perfecting this agreement, to Pittington and Co. in witness whereof the said parties have hereunto signed their names.

gone to Rangoon to load rice. At that time it became necessary to decide as to the draught of water to which the vessel could be safely loaded. She was first loaded at Rangoon to a draught of eighteen feet and then taken down the Irrawaddy river, where she was loaded till she drew twenty-five feet, at which time she had on board 32,600 bags of rice, weighing 2696 tons. The rice was in four parcels, for each of which the master signed a bill of lading describing the bags of rice “to be delivered, &c., at the port of discharge, &c., unto order or to assigns; freight for the said goods payable as per charter-party, with prime and average accustomed.” At the place on the Irrawaddy where the vessel was fully loaded she could not carry 3000 tons upon a draught of twenty-six feet.

The lump freight on the cargo was 11,250*l.*

On 19th March 1863 the Norway left Hastings, seven miles below Rangoon, drawing twenty-five feet of water, in charge of a pilot, provided at the master's instance and in company with a small steamer. On the 23rd March she took the sands without any misconduct of the pilot. After a few hours she was got off the sands and got clear out to sea; but a few days afterwards she began to leak, in consequence of the injuries received on the sands. About 500 bags of rice were thrown over board before the vessel reached the Mauritius. The ship was then surveyed, and the certificate recommended cargo to be discharged, but during discharge 1360 bags of rice were damaged and sold. The ship was then repaired, and the cargo reloaded, when the master set sail for England.

On the ship arriving at Liverpool there was a dispute as to the amount of freight due. The pils., the owner and assignee of the bills of lading, offered to pay the undisputed portion at once, and to deposit the disputed portion with a bank to abide a reference. The master, on the other hand, enforced his lien for the whole of the sum claimed, for without going the length of refusing to deliver any part of the cargo until the whole of the sum claimed had been paid, he insisted on retaining in his possession sufficient of the pils.' goods to cover his full demand, and he never relaxed his lien for 7740*l.* 2*s.* 2*d.* The master refused to entertain the idea of a reduction, and withheld from the pils. the papers necessary to show what was the amount of freight and general average due.

Ultimately the whole cargo, amounting to 2377 tons (7309 sound, and 165 damaged) was sold, subject to all faults, and realized the net sum of 20,020*l.* 16*s.* 3*d.*

Dr. Lushington thus concluded his judgment:—

On the other hand, I shall hold that the master had a lien upon the cargo for freight and general average, if any. That the freight will be the sum contracted for by the charter-party, 11,251*l.* less the following deductions. 1. The advances. 2. Commissions (if any), interest, and insurance. 3. The proportion of freight forfeited for breach of the guarantee in the charter-party as to the capacity and draught of the vessel. 4. The proportion of freight that would have been payable in respect of the goods jettisoned, and the goods sold at Mauritius, if these goods had been brought to their destination. I shall refer it to the registrar and merchants to take an account thereof, and to ascertain the net freight due on the principles stated in my judgment, taking into consideration the amount which has been paid on account of freight by the pils. during the progress of the cause, and the period at which it was paid. I shall also refer it to the registrar and merchants to ascertain the amount (if any) due from the owners of the cargo in respect of general average. On the other hand I shall hold that the pils., under the provisions of the Admiralty Court Act 1861, is entitled to damages in respect of—1. The goods jettisoned. 2. The goods sold at the Mauritius. 3. The non-assortment of the cargo at Liverpool. 4. The loss of interest occasioned by the wrongful withholding of the cargo. I shall direct the registrar, with the assistance of the merchants, to assess these damages, and having done so, to take an account between the parties, and to ascertain the balance due, and to which of them. They will also report to the court, whether any, and if so, what interest is properly due on this balance, and for what period.

The present appeal was brought against that judgment to Her Majesty in Council.

Brett, Q. C. and Cohen, for the app., contended that the stipulation as to tonnage amounted to an undertaking that the vessel should carry 3000 tons in salt water only: (Past v. Dowie, 33 L. J. 172, Q. B.) The jettison was the result, not of the pilot's negligence, but of the perils of the seas. There can be no deduction from the freight, for it was an entire sum for the whole voyage outward and home, and cannot be apportioned:

Dakin v. Orley, 10 L. T. Rep. N. S. 268.

The plt. made no tender, and nothing was done by the deft. to waive tender.

Curr. adv. vult.

Sir E. V. WILLIAMS.—This is an appeal from a judgment of the High Court of Admiralty in a suit instituted under the 6th section of the Admiralty Court Act 1861 (24 Viet. c. 10), by which it is enacted that "the High Court of Admiralty shall have jurisdiction over any claim of the owner or consignee or assignee of any bill of lading of any goods carried into any port in England or Wales in any ship, for damage done to the goods, or any part thereof, by the negligence or misconduct of, or for any breach of duty or breach of contract on the part of, the owner, master, or crew of the ship, unless it be shown to the satisfaction of the court that at the time of the institution of the cause any owner or part owner of the ship is domiciled in England or Wales." The plt. sued, under this section, as the assignee of bills of lading. The defts. are the owners of the Norway, an American vessel; and plt.'s petition complained (inter alia) that the master of the Norway wrongfully threw overboard part of the rice comprised in the bills of lading, and wrongfully sold a further part of the rice at the Mauritius. And further, that on the arrival of the ship at Liverpool the master wrongfully demanded to be paid 6500*l.* as freight, and an additional sum of 1000*l.* by way of general average contribution as a condition precedent to the delivery of any part of the cargo, and refused to deliver the cargo on any other terms. The petition contains other complaints as to the master of the Norway refusing to discharge at the docks at which he was directed to discharge, and also as to improperly dealing with the cargo in other respects after arrival in Liverpool. But it is unnecessary to do more than state that the petition contained such complaints, because the judge of the Admiralty Court decided that they were ill-founded, and the plt. has not appealed from that decision. The defts.

answer denies many of the allegations of the petition, and justifies the jettison and sale of portions of the rice on the ground that it became, by reason of the perils of the seas, necessary and proper for the preservation of the ship and cargo to throw part of the rice overboard, and to sell another part which had been greatly damaged by salt water. To this part of the answer the plt. replies merely by denying the averments contained in it. The answer concludes by praying that the judge will dismiss the petition with costs, and will decree that the plt. should pay to the defts. the balance of freight and general average due to the defts., and interest thereon. The learned judge below, in a most elaborate, lucid, and able judgment, has gone through all the points arising in the cause which ought to decide the claims of the parties. And we think we cannot do better than to follow his judgment, and state in what respects we agree with him and in what respects we differ from him. The first question is, what is the meaning of a guarantee in the charter-party that the vessel shall carry 3000 tons dead weight upon a draught of twenty-six feet water? And the materiality of this question arises from this, that she could carry the specified quantity on the specified draught in salt water, and could not in fresh. Does the guarantee then apply to salt water only, or to water fresh as well as salt? We think it applies to water fresh as well as salt. We think the learned judge below was right in inferring from the charter that in settling the stipulations as to the capacity and draught of the ship, both parties contemplated that the cargo might be loaded in a river, and that the guarantee meant that the vessel should be capable of carrying 3000 tons on a draught of twenty-six feet during the whole time of taking in, and until and after she reached the open sea. The next question is, whether the jettison of a portion of the cargo, and the sale of the damaged portion of it, have been sufficiently shown to have been the consequence, legally speaking, of negligence or want of skill on the part of the pilot, for which the shipowner is responsible. It was objected on the part of the defts., that even supposing that the grounding of the Norway was properly attributable to the misconduct of the pilot, yet that the injury thereby sustained by the vessel was not either the causa proxima or causa causans of the jettison or sale, inasmuch as it appears that the leak thereby occasioned would not, in fact, have rendered the ship unseaworthy but for the tempestuous weather which occurred some time after the Norway had proceeded on her voyage, and, moreover, that the damage to the rice sold, which necessitated the sale of it, would not have happened but for an accident to the steam-engine, which rendered it useless in working the pumps. It is, however, unnecessary, in the view we take of the case, to express any opinion as to this contention, because we have come to the conclusion that there was not sufficient evidence that the grounding of the vessel was occasioned by any misconduct on the part of the pilot. The evidence on which the learned judge in the Court of Admiralty relied as leading to the conclusion that the grounding was caused by negligence or want of skill in the pilot is merely, or mainly, the expression of the opinions of Capt. Ward, Capt. Dicey, and Mr. Duncan, that a pilot of ordinary skill and ordinary prudence might have safely navigated such a vessel to the sea. This testimony does not go further, in our opinion, than to show a reasonable possibility that the grounding may have been caused by want of skill or want of prudence on the part of the pilot. But there is no evidence given, and no suggestion made of any conduct of the pilot which amounted to such want of skill or of care. The ship was of large size and loaded as heavily as she could bear. It was necessary, under the circumstances, to let her drop down the river stern foremost, and a steamer of sixty-horse power, which was not powerful enough to tow her down, was made fast to her alongside for the purpose of sheering or canting her so as to keep her in the stream, and the grounding took place while the steamer was thus employed. The master and the mate were not asked whether there was any impropriety in thus navigating her. The witnesses on both sides agree that the tide ran very strong (although there is a conflict of testimony as to the amount of its velocity). No suggestion is made on the cross-examination of the master or the mate of anything done or omitted by the pilot which he ought not to have done or omitted, and the master swears that the steamer could not hold the ship against such a current, and that the navigation appeared to him very difficult in that current with so large a ship. And it seems to us impossible to affirm with reasonable certainty that such a vessel so navigated might not have grounded from some cause which reasonable skill and prudence on the part of the pilot could not prevent. The plt. was bound to prove affirmatively, and not merely by way of conjecture, that the vessel grounded by reason of the pilot's want of skill or want of care, and we can find no such proof in the evidence he has adduced. It may be added that the silence of the petition as to any imputed negligence affords some ground for the deft.'s complaint, that this imputation took them by surprise, so that they were not prepared with the evidence of the pilot. The next question is, whether, in respect of the rice jettisoned and that which was sold, there ought to be a deduction from the lump freight because they were not delivered. We think that there ought to be no deduction. It is obvious that this question stands on a somewhat different footing from that on which it stood when it was decided by the learned judge below, because it was then taken for granted that the jettison and sale, and consequent failure to bring home the goods, were owing to the misconduct of the master. But in the view we take of this part of the case it must be understood that they were owing to the perils of the sea, and that the master was free from blame in the matter. Although the lump sum is called "freight" in the charter and bills of lading, yet we think it is not properly so called, but that it is more properly a sum, in the nature of a rent, to be paid for the use and hire of the ship on the agreed voyages. The charter-party expresses that a sum of 11,250*l.* is to be paid as freight for the "use and hire of the ship," and this lump sum is to cover both the outward and homeward voyages, without any distinction as to how much of it is to be attributed to the outward and how much to the homeward voyage. If this be so, the shipper has had the full consideration for the money agreed to be paid. The ship took out the salt, and received the rice on board, and performed her homeward voyage according to her engagement, and the event that by the act of God it became impossible to carry to the port of destination the rice jettisoned and the rice sold ought not to affect the shipowner's right to receive the full amount of the stipulated payment. It was objected on behalf of the resp., that by the charter-party, the remainder of the lump sum is made payable only "on true and final delivery of the cargo at the said port of discharge." But this does not necessarily mean that the whole cargo originally shipped must be delivered. It may well have been intended merely to fix the time for payment to be the time of the delivery of such cargo as the ship brings with her to the port of discharge. And it should be observed that the "one-third in cash" is made payable "on arrival at the port of delivery," without any reference to the cargo the ship shall bring with her. It is right to add that we do not mean to express an opinion, that even if the jettison and sale had been attributable to the negligence of the master there ought to have been a deduction. Perhaps in this case the proper remedy of the shipper would have been by a cross-action. But it is not necessary now to decide this point, which does not now arise. The next question is whether the plt. has a well-founded claim for damages against the defts. for the non-delivery of the cargo; and this depends on the question whether the plt. was excused by the conduct of the master from making a tender of the freight for which the cargo was liable. We have felt considerable difficulty on this part of the case. It is clear that the master claimed more than was due to him. But it was conceded that this alone would not dispense with the tender. If, however, the demand of the larger sum was so made that it amounted to an announcement by the master that it was useless to tender any smaller sum, for that if tendered it would be refused, that would amount to a dispensation with any tender, generally speaking. And in the present case the Judge of the Court of Admiralty having come to the conclusion of fact, that the demand was made under such circumstances that it did amount to such an announcement, we see no reason for dissenting from the conclusion he has so drawn. But our difficulty is, that in this case there is positive evidence, in our opinion, that the plt. had resolved not to tender the amount unquestionably due; for his proposal was to pay a certain amount of the freight claimed, and to deposit the residue with a banker, as being a disputed portion. Now this residue was an amount to cover the whole of the alleged short delivery of 300 tons at Rangoon, where 2700 tons had been shipped instead of 3000; whereas, the learned judge below was of opinion that the plt. had no claim for deduction in respect of even so much as 100 tons, and against this part of the judgment there is no appeal. Consequently, it appears that the plt. meant that his tender of money to the master should not cover a portion of the claim which has turned out to be due. However, we are not prepared to hold that this varies the ordinary rule which we have stated as to dispensing with the tender altogether by announcing that it will be useless to tender anything less than the wrongfully large amount insisted upon. That the sum insisted upon in this case was wrongfully large, we think is plain; for without entering into the question whether the plt. was wrong in claiming the full lump sum, the claim of 1000*l.* for general average was altogether unfounded, as will appear when the estimate on which this claim is based is narrowly examined. The amounts which according to the master's estimate formed the subject of general average were: for expenses incurred by him at the Mauritius, 1530*l.*; for loss on the cargo jettisoned and sold, 1200*l.*; making a total loss, as the subject of general average, of 2730*l.* This amount had consequently to be apportioned between the ship, freight, and cargo. Then the master values the ship at 10,000*l.*, and the freight he takes at 7000*l.* then due. The cargo he estimates at 10,000*l.*, which seems reasonable, for although the cargo sold for 20,000*l.*, yet deducting the freight and the landing charges, and assorting charges, &c., the balance would probably not be much more than 10,000*l.* Assuming, therefore, the values to be correct, there is a total of 27,000*l.*, on which has to be apportioned the total of the losses, forming the subject of general average, viz., 2730*l.* By the rule of three this will give the proportions payable to the ship, freight, and cargo as follows: ship, 1011*l.*; freight, 708*l.*; cargo, 1011*l.*;

PRIV. CO.]

HOOPER v. GUNN AND OTHERS—McLELLAN v. GUNN AND OTHERS.

[V.C. W.]

total, 2730*l*. In other words, the owner of the ship, who is also the owner of the freight, has to pay as his proportion towards general average: for the ship, 1011*l*.; for the freight, 708*l*.; total, 1719*l*. But his losses, which form the subject of general average, are only 1530*l*., so that the amount payable by the owner of the ship and freight as his contribution to general average, is the difference between these two sums, or 189*l*. On the other hand, the owner of the cargo has to pay as his proportion 1011*l*., but his losses have been 1200*l*., so that he has to receive 189*l*. to make up the losses on account of general average sustained by him. The general average account would then be balanced by the owner of the ship paying to the owner of the cargo the sum of 189*l*. If this be so, then upon the master's own estimate of general average there was nothing due to him by the owner of the cargo on account of general average, but, on the contrary, he owed the owner of the cargo a sum of 189*l*. on this account. Being then of opinion that the peremptory claim for general average brings the case within the rule as to dispensation with the tender, it is unnecessary to consider the other ground on which the judge below came to the conclusion that the conduct of the master had exempted the plt. from the obligation of making a tender. It remains to be considered whether the plt. has a right to deduct "address commission" from the freight. The contest in the court below appears to have been confined to the question whether, by custom, the holder of a bill of lading comprising the whole of the cargo has a right to deduct the address commission from the freight, and the learned judge referred this question to the registrar and merchants. But in the argument before us the contention was that, assuming the custom to be so, the address commission was never earned, inasmuch as Bushby and Co., to whom the ship was addressed as the agents of the shipper, refused to accept the ship as agents, and never acted for the ship at all; but that Taylor and Co. acted as agents of the ship for the debts, who will have to pay them for so doing. Under these circumstances, we think the reference to the registrar and merchants ought to be enlarged by leaving it to them to inquire whether the plt., by his agents, so acted on the ship's behalf as to entitle him to the address commission. The last question to be considered is, whether the claim for damages for non-assortment can be supported? An objection to this claim was taken on behalf of the app., that there is no mention of it in the petition. The answer made to this objection is, that this cause of complaint did not arise till after the petition was filed—an answer by no means satisfactory. But upon the merits of this question we think the plt. fails. We do not understand why he did not avail himself of the power conferred by the statute 25 & 26 Vict. c. 63, s. 67, to enter and land the goods himself. If he does not, but allows the master to do so, is the master bound to take steps to have the goods assorted, if the owner of the goods requires him so to do? If the master were to give orders for it, he would, we apprehend, render himself liable for the expenses of the assortment. No doubt the law is that such a bailee is bound to take as good care of the cargo as a prudent owner would have taken; but we have never heard of any case where the bailee was held to be bound to incur a pecuniary liability to procure an advantage for the subject of the bailment. His duty, we think, does not go beyond safe custody and protection from injury or damage. We therefore think that this claim cannot be sustained. According to our opinion on the various points arising in this case, the freight due to the owners of the Norway is the sum contracted for by the charter, less the following deductions:—first, the advances; secondly, address commission (if found in favor of the plt. by the registrar and merchants); thirdly, the proportion of freight forfeited for breach of the guarantee in the charter-party as to the capacity and draught of the vessel. It should then be referred to the registrar and merchants to take an account and ascertain the net payment due on the principles we have stated, taking into account the amount which has been paid on account of freight by the plt. during the progress of the cause. On the other hand, in our opinion, the plt. under the provisions of the Admiralty Court Act 1861, is entitled to be indemnified for the loss of interest in respect of the wrongful withholding of the cargo, and to the claim for insurance and interest, but to nothing more. Therefore the registrar, with the assistance of the merchants, will have to ascertain the balance due, and to report to the court whether any interest, and if so what, is properly due on such balance; and we shall humbly recommend Her Majesty that judgment shall be given for the balance and interest thus ascertained. And that there shall be no costs on either side, either in the Court of Admiralty or here.

HOOPER v. GUNN AND OTHERS.

McLELLAN v. GUNN AND OTHERS.

Mortgage—Priorities—Ship—Notice—American law—Registration.

A., a British merchant, purchased of an American in London, an American ship under a regular power of attorney, for sale from the owners in America. He was not made acquainted with any charges or insurances affecting the ship at the time of his purchase, nor did the certificate of registration, or any of its ship's papers, bear upon them any intimation of any mortgage which had been effected in America upon the ship. It was alleged that such was the almost universal practice in America, although not absolutely required by American law.

B., a citizen of America, had a mortgage for 6000*l*. on the ship, and which was duly registered and recorded in the proper offices at Boston and Charleston.

The captain of the ship, who navigated her to England, had also a mortgage for a lesser sum on the ship, duly registered. He had formerly held a power of attorney for sale of the ship in London, which not having been taken place, this power was revoked by the one under which the sale to A. was completed:

Held, upon the correspondence and evidence, that A. holds the first charge for the 6000*l*. on the ship, the purchaser having constructive notice of the mortgage:

Held also, that that which furnishes the title to a ship in America will furnish the title to the ship in this country.

These were two causes which came on for hearing together, the one instituted by Robert Campbell Hooper, an American citizen, as first mortgagee on an American ship the Edward Everett, against Mr. Charles Gunn and others interested in the ship; the other by Mr. McLellan, claiming to have a second mortgagee on the said ship, against the said Mr.

HOOPER v. GUMM AND OTHERS—McLELLAN v. GUMM AND OTHERS.

[V.C. W.]

Gumm, and the other parties interested. The first bill prayed that, the plt. might be declared entitled under a mortgage-deed of the 9th May 1860, to a first charge on said ship for the principal sum of 1000L sterling and interest secured thereby; for a sale of the ship (if necessary) and payment of his demand; and for an injunction to restrain the deft. Charles Gumm from dispatching her out of the docks at London, in which it was then alleged she was; from transferring or mortgaging same; from causing her to be registered as a British ship; and for the necessary accounts.

The general circumstances attending both cases were as follows. It appeared that on the 9th May 1860 Chas. F. Gardiner, a citizen of the United States, of Boston in Massachusetts, being the owner of the then newly-built ship, the Edward Everett, mortgaged it to the first plt. Hooper as a security for the loan of 25,000 dollars. On the 31st May 1860 Gardiner executed a second mortgage of the ship to McLellan, to secure a sum of 10,000 dollars; both of the mortgages being recorded in the office of the collector of customs at Boston, pursuant to the forms prescribed by American law. The ship arrived in England in June 1860; McLellan, who brought her over as master, holding a power of attorney from Gardiner to sell the ship and hold the proceeds for the mortgagees. No sale, however, was then effected, and the Edward Everett returned to America. In Jan. 1861 Charles F. Gardiner revoked the power of attorney given to McLellan, and executed another power of attorney, authorising his brother Henry D. Gardiner to sell the ship. On the 30th May 1861 the deft. Gumm, who carried on business at London as a merchant in the American shipping trade, and had been engaged in several business transactions with the Gardiners and McLellan, purchased the ship for 10,000L, without, as he alleged, any notice of the mortgages thereon. The Gardiners having become insolvent, the mortgage-debts of Hooper and of McLellan remained unsatisfied, and the main question in the causes was, whether the deft. Gumm, as a purchaser for valuable consideration without notice, was entitled, notwithstanding the existence of the respective plts.' mortgages, to sell the ship; the contention of the respective plts. being, that the deft. Gumm was put upon inquiry, and could only, according to American law (which, it was contended, must govern the case), purchase subject to the mortgages, and that no title could be given to the ship until those mortgages were discharged.

The principal deft., Gumm, alleged that he paid the purchase-money for the ship to Henry D. Gardiner, and possession was given; that no mention was made in the certificate, or any other of the papers of the ship, of her being subject to any mortgage or encumbrance, and that he had no notice whatever thereof; that the ship had been registered and enrolled at Boston and Charleston in the sole name of Henry D. Gardiner; that the ship was sold and transferred to him by a clean bill of sale, under a power of attorney from Charles F. Gardiner to the said H. D. Gardiner, and submitted that he had complete title to the ship; that on the 29th Aug. 1861 he had registered her as a British ship in the books of London, under the name of Forest Rights, concluding that she was now a British ship, and subject to British law; that by the law of America the rights of purchasers and other persons interested in American ships were not affected by anything appearing on the registry.

A considerable body of evidence was entered into, oral and documentary, and particularly the opinions of eminent American lawyers taken upon the effect of the law of America as regarded charges on shipping.

The effect of this evidence and the arguments of counsel are fully set forth and alluded in the V. C.'s judgment.

June. 14.—The VICE-CHANCELLOR took time to consider his judgment, and on this day said:—In these two causes the bills are respectively filed by two mortgagees of an American vessel called the Edward Everett, each of them being duly registered; Mr. Hooper, as the first mortgagee, for a considerable sum, and Mr. McLellan for a smaller amount; the owners of the ship being Charles and Henry Gardiner, the ship itself being registered in America in the name of Charles Gardiner, on behalf of himself and his copartner. The question that arises in this case is this: how far Mr. Gumm, who appears to have purchased this ship from Henry Gardiner, under a power of attorney, with which Mr. Henry Gardiner was furnished, can now hold the ship discharged of either or both those respective mortgages. There are some points in the case which I may clear away at once, the real difficulty arising upon the facts, as given in evidence, which has occasioned most anxious consideration on the part of the court. The law of the case has not been much disputed on the part of the plt. Hooper. Regard being had to the American law with reference to vessels of this description, it was impossible for Mr. Gumm to say that Mr. Hooper is not, to the extent of his mortgage, the owner of the vessel, or that Mr. McLellan is not to the extent of his mortgage the owner of the vessel, if there were no other circumstances which entitled Mr. Gumm to say, as against Hooper and McLellan, that the right which they so had they had deprived themselves of by their conduct. That clears the case at once of a point which has from time to time occasioned considerable discussion; but it is now so far recognised, that that which is property in a ship, or any other description of property that is to be dealt with according to foreign law—that which is property in a ship, and that which furnishes the title to the ship in America, will furnish the title to the ship in this country. Mr. Hooper will, therefore, be entitled to sue at law in trover for this vessel, and become the master of it; at all events, to the extent of his mortgage, and would have the power of dealing with this vessel. In the course of the argument for the deft. this question was raised, that Mr. Gumm was a purchaser without notice, and that although it must be admitted that his right was only an equitable right, still his right was to be protected in this court. I apprehend with reference to the question of mortgage, that is disposed of by the case of Collier v. Finch, where the question was a good deal considered, how far the right of a purchaser without notice, having only an equitable title, could be set up in the case of a person having a complete legal title, and who therefore had it in his power to make himself owner of the property, is only at law owner in the sense that he can only have the ship or the value of it in trover; how far he can come into equity to prevail against another having an equal equity when he comes merely to have the accounts taken and adjusted, and instead of bringing his action of trover for the entire ship, merely to have the accounts settled. That was the view which the M. R. took in Collier v. Finch, which was confirmed by Lord Cranworth in the H. of L., as reported in 5 H. of L. Cas. It appears to me that part of the case is out of my consideration, and that it would be unnecessary for me in this respect to consider whether Mr. Gumm had, or had not, notice of these several charges. I come now to what is really the substance of the case. The ship has been sold under a power of attorney vested in Henry Gardiner by Charles Gardiner, as his copartner, in whose name the ship was registered in America, and under that power of attorney, the ship having been sold, of course it would not be in the power of the mortgagor to maintain a title, unless his mortgagees have in some way or other adopted the agency of Henry Gardiner. I think the case cannot be put as high as the plt. sought to put it in his argument. He contended that, whether Hooper and McLellan had or had not notice of the power of attorney with which Henry Gardiner was furnished; whether they have or have not concurred in his being sent to this country armed with that power, still it would be the duty of those who purchased the ship to ascertain by reference to American law that the title was clear, or at all events to make themselves owners of the mortgage by taking proceedings that the money should be so placed as not to be in the control of Mr. Henry Gardiner, but to be placed in medio for the purpose of answering the mortgage-debts, inasmuch as it is said they could not acquire, were they in America, a complete title to the ship without displacing the mortgage, and without clearing that off the register, and that could not be cleared without the concurrence of the two mortgagees. But it appears to me that upon the whole of the transaction, as the plt. Hooper was aware of the power being conferred on Mr. Henry Gardiner, and had allowed him to come to this country armed with the power for the purposes of the sale, regard being had to the whole of the conduct of Mr. Hooper in the case of sales of ships which were built by the Gardiners, it would be impossible for him to say that he had not authorised Gardiner to deal with it, and so dealing with it, receive the money. It becomes therefore necessary to ascertain how far he was or was not aware of Henry Gardiner having been armed with this authority. The reason I should have held him to have been bound, if he were proved to have known that Henry Gardiner was so armed, is this: he had on previous occasions undoubtedly—he does not dispute it—authorised Henry Gardiner to sell, and to give what is called “a clean” bill of sale, and he had done it in a very marked manner. There had been a ship called the Leaping Water, built for the purposes of sale by the Gardiners, in the same way as the Edward Everett, and with regard to that ship, Mr. Hooper thought it right to take the precaution of indorsing on the certificate of register the certificate of his mortgage, a precaution not otherwise necessary, according to American law, but one which would of course facilitate his object of having complete security, and preventing any misdealings with the ship at any further epoch. That had been found inconvenient with reference to the sale, and he seems undoubtedly to have been engaged with the Gardiners in the ship, advancing them money for the purpose, and looking to the sale of the ship as the mode of securing his money; and he had on a second occasion been remonstrated with by Mr. Henry Gardiner in consequence of the difficulties he had with the mortgage not having been entered upon the ship; he had agreed to let him have two ships which were to be sold in connection with Mr. Henry Gardiner, treating Mr. H. Gardiner as authorised to sell the ship, and as his agent throughout. In this particular case I have an exact analogy as regards the power first vested in Mr. McLellan. Hooper sends out McLellan with a power not executed by Mr. Gardiner, but executed by the mortgagor, and furnished with the declaration by which McLellan authorised the Gardiners to dispose of the ship, and instructed them to dispose of the money in favour of the mortgagee. He sends him out with the power executed solely by the mortgagees, and Mr. Hooper admits, as far as McLellan is concerned, that he intends McLellan to sell absolutely freed and discharged from his mortgage, and intends McLellan to receive the money. I think, therefore, it having been proved that Henry Gardiner had with the knowledge of Hooper been furnished with this power, the case would have been one in which Mr. Gumm's right must have prevailed against the mortgagee. Now, unfortunately, this part of the case is involved in considerable contradiction of evidence. On the whole, upon that part of the case, I do not think that Mr. Gumm was fixed with positive notice of Hooper's mortgage. This notice is not of importance with reference to the claim of the purchase without notice, but it is important to show whether Mr. Gumm had or not such direct notice as would entitle Mr. Hooper to say, “Whatever authority I may be supposed to have given to Mr. Gumm, you must have known he had no authority for this purpose, because he knows of my mortgage.” That I think cannot be said. How would it stand assuming that Mr. Hooper had no knowledge of Mr. Gardiner's authority? It would stand thus: in the year preceding the sale McLellan is furnished with authority as attorney to sell, which is signed by the mortgagor. At the same time Charles Gardiner, on behalf of himself and his partner, signs an authority to McLellan to pay 6000*l.* to Messrs. Barings to the account of Mr. Hooper, the present plt.; therefore, Hooper had this security—he had a man in whom he had confidence, McLellan. McLellan had a mortgage of his own, which might give him additional confidence in the matter that McLellan would do what was right; then McLellan, although furnished with a power by the mortgagor alone, went out with the sanction of the mortgagee Hooper, but coupled with this, that the mortgagors had parted with all authority over the money to this extent, that McLellan would receive it and not they, and that McLellan was positively instructed to pay off the plt.'s mortgage. That would give security for Hooper, provided McLellan acted honestly, and he had a right to trust McLellan obeying those instructions which were so sent out. Then what took place afterwards is this:—I pass over the attempts to sell in the year 1860, which failed. Then McLellan comes back to America in 1861, Henry Gardiner being absent. The reason of McLellan being trusted, as in a great measure he says he was, was because of Gardiner's absence. Henry Gardiner might have been trusted had he been on the spot; he was absent in Australia. McLellan therefore came over and remained in England. After Henry Gardiner had arrived in England, and he being then superseded in 1860, there is no attempt to supersede McLellan, no attempt to revoke those instructions which McLellan had, and he alone, but only when the matter came to be dealt with afterwards, it was thought right to send him on to England furnished with the same powers as he had before without their being revoked. He sails about the middle of Jan. 1861, and then this remarkable correspondence takes place, just before the starting of McLellan. He seems to have had some misgivings as to his own security, and whatever confidence Hooper had in the Gardiners, McLellan does not seem to have participated to the same extent. He writes thus to New York to Hooper:—“I have learned since being here that the ship could only be sold by accepting, say 50,000 dols. It is now decided that I take her to London as before. The ship is nearly loaded now, and I expect will be ready for sea next Thursday. I will be much obliged to you." This part of the letter shows a little distrust. "I will be much obliged to you if you will see that all my papers are as they should be, including insurance, &c., and interest on the note which is with you inclosed in mortgage." This is remarkable, that that letter did not authorise McLellan. He seems to have been a man of simple mind. A good sailor, I dare say, but not so much a man of business, because he seems puzzled with this observation, and says, "You have a letter advising you to pay the money to Baring's. I have no letter authorising me to take so much of the proceeds as you have, and my power of attorney most likely will be void this time . . . I shall be pleased to hear from you before leaving here." That letter is answered by Mr. Hooper from Boston, thus, in a letter of the 9th Jan. 1861: "Dear Sir,—I have just received your favour of the 7th inst., and am pleased to receive it. I shall keep its contents, and your having written me entirely private. If the ship is sold in England, you will execute the sale, as you have the power of attorney to sell, but when you do so you must receive 8000*l.*, and the same must be placed, or rather 6000*l.* of the amount, to my credit, and I will write to you at London, whether to place it at Messrs. Geo. Peabody and Co., or Messrs. Baring Brothers and Co. Your 2000*l.* you can also have placed to my credit, if you wish, and I will draw for it, and hold the proceeds subject to your order, but do as you please entirely. I sincerely hope the ship will be sold in London." Now, of course, a man cannot make evidence for himself. This is in one sense not evidence for the plt., but as part of the res gestæ. I think it may fairly be taken into consideration, and that I may fairly read this as showing the views of the parties at the time of the transaction taking place before Henry Gardiner had the power of attorney. It appears clearly that McLellan had some little misgivings about the mortgages; that he was anxious about his 2000*l.*, as he has no authority for dealing with that money as he supposes, and Mr. Hooper, who was a man of business, and does not seem to care about it, says: "They cannot get on without you; you are the man to sell; you must take all the money; and when you take the 6000*l.*, take it as I direct you, pay it all to Barings, and then your own 2000*l.* you may either pay to my account or pay it to your own; look after yourself." That of course was a very natural and reasonable mode of dealing with it. There is another letter of the 11th Jan. which comes in answer to that just read, in which McLellan says: "Dear Sir,—Your favour of the 9th is received. You say that I have a power of attorney to sell, &c., which is true: but I have been under the impression that Capt. H. D. Gardiner, who goes out to England, might have possibly a like power of later date than mine. Address to the care of Charles Gumm, Change-alley, London. I hope, as you do, that the ship will be sold this time in London, and I think she will, as Capt. Gardiner says we will sell her sure this time. The register has not been changed at all since first made in Boston." In this state of things there is this strongly pressed upon me, as evidence of the plt.'s having knowledge of the subsequent power of attorney given to Henry Gardiner revoking the power to McLellan. [The V. C. here went into a comparison of the personal evidence given by several of the witnesses, and the amount of interest which they had in the result of the suit, and continued:] Let us look, however, to the documents, for they are safer things to trust to than anything else. The letter of McLellan's of the 11th Jan. was not answered by Hooper till the 12th Feb. It is written in Boston and sent to McLellan in London: "Dear Sir,—Your favour of the 11th Jan. was duly received, and I have nothing to add to what I wrote you on the 9th ult., to which please refer. . . . If the ship is sold in London, you will have 6000*l.* to place to my credit with Messrs. Geo. Peabody and Co., or Messrs. Baring Brothers and Co., as may be preferred by Capt. Gardiner." I pause here for a moment, because it is pressed upon me by the deft., that the words "as may be preferred by Capt. Gardiner" indicated a notion that Capt. Gardiner was the person to deal with it and to sell. On the contrary, it appears to me to be exactly consonant with what actually takes place. Mr. McLellan had the power of sale, and Mr. McLellan was to pay, by order of Mr. Gardiner, to Barings, the 6000*l.* Mr. Hooper seems to prefer Messrs. Peabody, and therefore writes as he did. The Gardiners had a right to say it must go to Barings, and their instructions are to pay it to the account of Mr. Hooper, at Barings. It is perfectly consistent with the general power and instructions that Mr. Hooper should write this letter on the 12th Feb. and say, "Pay the 6000*l.* either to Peabody or Barings, as Capt. Gardiner may prefer." [The V. C., having gone through other parts of the documentary evidence, said:] I think therefore that, regard being had to all the documents, it is impossible to think that Mr. Hooper was aware for one moment that the authority had been revoked, and that Mr. Henry Gardiner had been substituted, and if so the claim must prevail, subject to one single word upon the deft. Mr. Gumm's position, in which he says, "If you had only written me in time when you did know that something was going on wrong, I should have ceased to make advances, and should have ceased to have put myself in the position I am now placed in;" but upon the whole I think, as regards Mr. Hooper's case, he is entitled to the relief which he asked." As regards Mr. McLellan, his case rests upon different grounds; but after a full consideration of the whole of the evidence in his case [which the V. C. referred to at length], I am compelled with great reluctance to dismiss his bill without costs. As to Mr. Hooper's bill, the decree will be, a declaration that (according to the first part of the prayer of his bill) he is entitled to a charge on the ship Edward Everett, as against the defts. for the principal money and interest secured by the deed of the 9th May 1860; and take an account of what is due for principal and interest on such charge; and then, in default of payment within a month from the date of the chief clerk's certificate, a sale of the ship; and in the meantime the deft. Gumm, his servants and agents, to be restrained from dealing with the said ship, or from transferring or mortgaging her. The mortgagee's costs to be added to the amount of the security. There will be separate decrees in the two causes.

Decrees accordingly.

Possession—Repairs—Sale.

The necessity which gives the master an implied authority to sell his vessel abroad must be created by, and depend upon, the particular circumstances of each case.

*The vessel was at the Cape of Good Hope, and in need of extensive repairs. The master had no credit, and the ship's agents there had a claim of 300*l.* against her, and threatened arrest. The master was unable to repair the ship, even temporarily, so as to bring her to* England, and the necessary delay of three months to enable the master to communicate with the owner in England would have been prejudicial to the vessel. The master therefore sold her at the Cape:

Held, that, under the circumstances, an adequate necessity existed for the sale, and that therefore the transfer was valid.

In 1862 the schooner Victor, belonging to her master, Jarvis, was lying in Table Bay in need of repairs, and the master, having no means of repairing her, left her there and came to England, where he sold the vessel for 150*l.* to his brother, the plt. William Jarvis, a wine-merchant in the Minorics, who immediately caused himself to be registered as sole owner, appointed his brother as master, and sent him back to the Cape with instructions to employ the vessel in the coasting trade there. On arrival at the Cape the master sold the vessel for 135*l.* at public auction, to the deft. Capt. Hawksley, who brought her to this country, and the present suit was then instituted by the plt. William Jarvis, to obtain possession of the vessel notwithstanding the sale at the Cape.

Deane, Q. C. and V. Lushington for plt.

Brett, Q. C. and A. Cohen for deft.

DR. LUSHINGTON.—In this case Mr. W. Jarvis, of the Minorics, seeks to recover possession of the vessel Victor from Mr. Hawksley, of Peckham, who was actually in possession of the vessel when she was arrested by process from the court. Mr. W. Jarvis claims to be owner by a purchase from his brother, Thomas R. Jarvis, whom I shall hereafter call Capt. Jarvis, and that purchase took place on the 5th Feb. 1863 for 150*l.*, whilst the vessel was at the Cape. Mr. Jarvis alleges that he sent his brother (Capt. Jarvis) to the Cape to take possession and navigate her as master according to his directions, and that Capt. Jarvis, without necessity, sold the vessel to the deft. Of course this last statement, that the ship was sold without necessity, is denied by the deft., but he also raises what I may call a preliminary defence in the following terms: "The purchase of the schooner Victor, alleged to have been made by the plt., was not such an absolute and bonâ fide purchase by the plt. as to give him a good title to the schooner as against the deft." It is clear, then, that there are two questions: first, the title of the plt. to maintain the action; second, the validity of the sale to the deft. at the Cape of Good Hope. I must consider the right of the plt. to sue as the first question to be disposed of, for if I decide it against the plt., there is an end of the case. There is, I think, some obscurity as to the terms in which the deft. states the defect of the plt.'s title. I perfectly understand that the title of the plt. may be denied altogether; but I do not understand how this can be; if I dare use the expression, a mitigated title, not absolute, not bonâ fide, not altogether bad, but only bad as relates to the present deft. I consider that I have no means of deciding this point, but by proceeding straightforward to the question—Did Mr. W. Jarvis really and bonâ fide purchase this vessel, or is the alleged sale from his brother to him an empty form, or only a security for the debt Capt. Jarvis owed to W. Jarvis, or was it collusive? Capt. Jarvis is dead; we must not look, then, for other testimony. What was the probability of the case, looking to all the facts, the undisputed facts? I am of opinion that it was probable that Capt. Jarvis should wish to sell the vessel. The vessel had lain at the Cape from Oct. 1862, unemployed, in a state of great disrepair, producing no return, but entailing great expense. She was lying in Table Bay, without any protection, if not in danger, respecting which there is a conflict of evidence, and a certain degree of deterioration must have taken place. The owner (Capt. Jarvis) was considerably in debt to Searight and Co., merchants, at the Cape. Whether or no there was a lien on the vessel is another consideration. Capt. Jarvis, it is clear from the evidence, had no means to repair her, no credit with Searight and Co., who were his agents. I have no evidence why he did not proceed to sell at the Cape, and to liquidate Searight's demand, and I must not act upon conjecture. I have also no direct evidence why he came from the Cape to England; but I think that all the correspondence, and all the res gestæ, show that he was in difficulty and embarrassment. It seems to me, then, quite consistent with probability that Capt. Jarvis should be willing to sell the ship, nor do I see any improbability in the plt. Mr. W. Jarvis being the purchaser. Who, except a brother, would purchase a ship in the condition this was, which had been lying at Table Bay from Oct. 1862? Capt. Jarvis was in embarrassment—indeed, without such a sale his prospects were absolutely desperate; and, moreover, his embarrassment, as his brother believed, had been brought about by his own extravagance and improvidence. Then, were the terms of the purchase so extortionate as would justify the court in holding the sale void on that account? It might be difficult to say what was the value of a ship in this predicament. The price was 150*l.* Five months later she sold at auction for 135*l.* This fact alone, I think, would rebut any supposition that the price was so much below the value as to savour of extortion. Moreover, it must have been rather a bold experiment to purchase a ship known to be out of repair, lying exposed at Table Bay. In truth, if by the law of the Cape Messrs. Searight could have arrested and sold her for their debt, the ship was of no value at all. I certainly cannot hold that this transfer from Capt. Jarvis to his brother was void on account of the small amount of the price. Then, as to the payment of the consideration. It is said that no money was paid down, which I believe to be the truth. The consideration on behalf of the plt. is alleged to have been, first, a certain quantity of ale sent to the Cape, the proceeds of which were to become the property of Capt. Jarvis, the value being estimated at 85*l.* 2*s.* 6*d.*; secondly, the cancelling of a debt of 50*l.* due to W. Jarvis for moneys advanced to Capt. Jarvis and his wife; and thirdly, a sum of 15*l.* paid for Capt. Jarvis's passage to the Cape. These sums make up altogether about 150*l.* Upon the whole, I am of opinion that this was a sale by necessity, and that neither by law nor by justice am I bound to deprive the deft. of the property of which he was the bonâ fide purchaser. My decree must be in favour of the deft., and necessarily with costs.

Damage—Sailing regulations—Her Majesty's vessels. Though Her Majesty's vessels are exempt from compliance with the new sailing regulations (issued in pursuance of the Merchant Shipping Act Amendment Act 1862), yet, by order of the Board of Admiralty, instructions precisely in accordance with such regulations are issued to persons in charge of Her Majesty's vessels.

This suit on behalf of the master, owners and crew of the late schooner Bruckenholme, of the port of Gool, and on behalf of Messrs. Peto, Brassey and Betts, the owners of her cargo, was instituted in respect of a collision which took place between the schooner and Her Majesty's ship Supply, about 3 o'clock a.m. of the 31st April last, both vessels being in the English Channel off the Isle of Wight. The case on behalf of the schooner was, that she was close-hauled on the port tack (heading E.S.E. with the wind from the N.E.), and all three lights of the steamer were observed about three miles off, a little on the port bow. Shortly afterwards the red light was shut out, but soon again became visible, and when the steamer got broad on the schooner's port bow, the steamer's helm was suddenly starboarded, and thereby the vessels were brought into collision, the stem of the steamer striking the schooner on the port bow just before the fore rigging. The schooner sank shortly afterwards.

On behalf of the deft. it was contended that the schooner was first seen from the steamer when distant about a quarter of a mile, and from one and a half to two points on the steamer's starboard bow. The schooner had no lights visible. The helm of the steamer was put hard a-starboard, the engines were stopped and reversed, but the schooner suddenly opened her masts, and the collision took place.

Brett, Q. C. and Prichard appeared for the pta.

The Queen's Advocates and the Admiralty Advocate for the deft.

Dr. LUSHINGTON, addressing the Trinity Masters, said:—Gentlemen, there are two questions for our consideration in this case: first, whether the steam-vessel was in any respect to blame; and secondly, whether the schooner to any extent contributed to the collision. As to the first question there can, I think, be little doubt. Notwithstanding the evidence for the defence, it is clear that the schooner had her proper lights duly fixed and burning; and therefore, if due vigilance had been used on board the Queen's ship, the lights would have been seen. Again it appears that the steamer, though manned by a crew of fifty-six men, had only one man forward on the look-out, and he was on the bridge, no one being stationed on the fore-castle. The schooner was, I think, seen only at the last moment, when the orders that were given to put the helm hard a-starboard and stop and reverse the engines were too late to avert the collision. As to the second question, whether the schooner also contributed to the accident, it becomes important to consider what were the rules of navigation that should have been observed by both parties. Though it is quite clear that the ordinary sailing rules issued in pursuance of the Act of Parliament are by the terms of the Act not applicable to Her Majesty's vessels, still it is the duty of those who navigate such vessels to take proper precautions for avoiding a collision, and where, as in this case, Her Majesty's vessel—a steamer—is approaching a sailing vessel in such a manner as to involve risk of collision, it is the duty of the steam-vessel to keep clear. But I am of opinion that the schooner was at all events bound by the sailing regulations, and accordingly it was her duty in compliance with those rules to keep her course, and not by any manœuvre on her part to neutralise the operation of the steamer. Is it then the fact that she kept her course? It is stated by all the witnesses for the pta. that she did, and it is not denied by the witnesses for the defence, but it is contended that from the mode in which the collision took place (the blow leading forward), and from the circumstances sworn to by the pta.' witnesses as to the shifting of the lights, it is impossible but that the schooner must have ported. Are then these facts, which are admitted by the pta.' witnesses, such as necessarily contradict their direct testimony to the contrary, and does the direction of the blow tend to convince you that the schooner's course must have been altered?

The COURT, after deliberation with the Trinity Masters, was of opinion that the Supply was solely to blame and decreed accordingly.

The Queen's Advocates.—Perhaps it may be useful for me to state that, though those in charge of Her Majesty's vessels are not bound by the ordinary sailing regulations, instructions are issued to them which are precisely in accordance with those regulations.

The COURT.—It appears then that, when a sailing vessel is approaching a steamer within risk of collision, those on board the sailing vessel may expect, though for different reasons, the same course to be adopted by the steamer whether belonging to Her Majesty or otherwise.

Wages—Accounts—Master part owner—Merchant Shipping Act 1854, sect. 191—Admiralty Court Act 1861—24 Vict. c. 10, sect. 10.

In a suit for wages between an owner and the master, who is also a part owner, the court can take no cognisance of a claim by the master to an equitable share in the vessel.

This case raised the question whether, in taking the accounts in a suit for wages between a master and his owner, the court can take cognisance of an equitable claim by the master to a share in the vessel. The suit was originally for wages, and the owners having set up a counter-claim, the accounts were referred in the usual manner to the registrar and merchants, and, pending this reference, the court was, on the 18th inst., moved on behalf of the pta., the master, for leave to amend his claim in respect of an equitable share and interest in the vessel, and so increase the amount of the action. The following are the sections referred to in the title.

Every master of a ship shall, so far as the case permits, have the same rights, liens, and remedies for the recovery of his wages which by this Act, or by any law or custom, any seaman, not being a master, has for the recovery of his wages, and if, in any proceeding in any Court of Admiralty, or Vice-Admiralty touching the claim of a master to wages, any right of set-off or counter-claim is set up, it shall be lawful for such court to enter into and adjudicate upon all questions, and to settle all accounts then arising or outstanding and unsettled between the parties to the proceeding, and to direct payment of any balance which is found to be due. (Merchant Shipping Act 1854, sect. 191.)

The High Court of Admiralty shall have jurisdiction over any claim by a seaman of any ship for wages earned by him on board the ship, whether the same be due under a special contract or otherwise, and also over any claim by the master of any ship for wages earned by him on board the ship, and for disbursements made by him on account of the ship, provided always, that if in any such case the pta. do not recover fifty pounds, he shall not be entitled to any costs, charges, or expenses incurred by him therein unless the judge shall certify that the case was a fit one to be tried in the said court: (Admiralty Court Act 1861, 24 Vict. c. 10.)

V. Lushington for the pta.

Dunn, Q. C. for the deft.

Dr. LUSHINGTON.—This was originally a cause of wages, and there was a reference to the registrar and merchants to take accounts. A motion is now made to the court by the pta. for leave to amend his claim by adding a claim in respect of his equitable share and interest in the vessel D. Jex, and furthermore, to increase the amount of the action in a decree warrant, and arrest the vessel. This vessel was originally built in New York, in the year 1858. She was owned to the extent of seven-eighths by Joseph Jex, who lived in New York, the remainder eighth belonging to Manuel Guide. Guide sailed as master with this vessel, and in the year 1861 it was deemed convenient by Josiah Jex that this vessel should assume a British character, and accordingly he conveyed to his brother John Jex, of Honduras, his seven-eighth share, and, according to the affidavit of Guide, sworn on May 4, Josiah Jex also conveyed the remaining eighth share without Guide having received any consideration therefrom. Such is the statement of the 5th paragraph. The vessel was accordingly registered as a British vessel, and as such came to this country in Nov. 1864. Mr. Josiah Jex caused the master to be deprived of his command. The master then instituted this suit for his wages, and the question is for the court to decide whether it can permit him to sue for the value of his one-eighth share mentioned in his affidavit. On behalf of the plt. reference is made to the 191st section of the Merchant Shipping Act. [His Honour then read the section.] Now what is the meaning of the words "to settle all accounts then arising or outstanding and unsettled between the parties to the proceeding?" It will be observed that it was only in case of a set-off or counter-claim that this power was conferred upon the court. It is true that in this case there has been a counter-claim, but it appears to me that the intention of the Legislature was not to refer to this court the decision of all questions which might exist between the parties on matters entirely foreign either to wages or disbursements. The object of this section was to enable the court to do justice where the owners set up a counter-claim with reference to the ship or her disbursements. All these are matters properly cognisable by the Court of Admiralty; but the wide exposition set up by the plt. might include matters wholly foreign to its jurisdiction and to the decision of which it is unaccustomed. I am of opinion, therefore, that this motion cannot be supported under the 191st section of the Merchant Shipping Act. The 10th section of the Admiralty Court Act 1861 (24 Vict. c. 10) has reference only to disbursements, under which head this cannot be classed. The motion therefore must be rejected, but without costs.

ZACHARIAH R. JAMES AND OTHERS v. THE SCHOONER SARAH A. BOICE.

Salvage—Embezzlement—Work and labour.

Where a vessel, having been captured by a privateer and plundered, was suffered to go adrift without a crew, and, drifting near the shore, was surrounded by the libellants in small boats and plundered of everything they could, till she grounded on a bar and remained there for some days, the libellants then taking possession of her, and, after she came off the bar and had grounded in the inlet, her owners came, and, with the libellants' assistance, got her off:

Held, that the libellants could not maintain an action of salvage for what they had done;

But, as the owners had offered to pay the libellants for what they had done, the Court allowed them to recover in this action a quantum meruit for work and labour, but without costs.

This was an action for salvage. The libel alleged that, on Aug. 17, 1864, the libellant James discovered the schooner, dismasted and apparently deserted, lying on the bar at the mouth of the inlet at Jones'

Beach, on the south shore of Long Island, whereupon he boarded her, and found her to be the Sarah A. Boice, of Great Egg Harbour, N. J., with her hold filled with water, dismasted and abandoned by her master and crew, stripped and dismantled; that accordingly he took possession, and, with the aid of the other libellants, succeeded at great risk and peril in getting her over the bar and into the inlet, and that he kept possession of her till Sept. 12, when she was removed by the owners. It alleged that the vessel was worth about 5000 dollars, and claimed to be allowed salvage as in a case of a derelict.

The answer alleged that about the 11th Aug. the schooner was captured by the privateer Tallahassee, about thirty miles south-east from Fire Island; that her officers and crew were taken from her by force, and the schooner was, after being robbed of furniture and stores by the privateer, left afloat, with her masts and rigging standing, and that she was carried by the wind and waves to the mouth of the inlet at Jones' Beach, where she grounded on the bar on Aug. 17; that she remained there till the 23rd Aug., when she worked off on a full tide, and floated into the inlet, where she grounded and remained till she was got off by the claimants; that on Aug. 27 the claimants heard that the libellant, James, who was wreckmaster under the statute of the State, was claiming to hold the schooner with the other libellants; that they went there and found she had been greatly plundered by the persons claiming to hold her; that they thereupon took possession of her and got her off themselves. The answer also denied that the vessel was derelict, and averred that the libellants had been exposed to no peril, nor was the vessel in peril while the libellants committed these depredations upon her, and that the conduct of the libellants was not with a fair and honest intent to save the vessel for her owners, but with the design to embezzle the entire property, and appropriate it to themselves.

The evidence showed, that when the libellants fell in with the vessel she was adrift, and partially despoiled of her equipment and lading. It was notorious in the vicinity at the time that the vessel had been brought to that condition by capture by the Tallahassee, which subsequently landed her master and crew on the south side of Long Island.

As soon as the vessel was discovered thus abandoned, she was surrounded by numerous boats and small craft (many of them managed by some of the libellants), which eagerly purloined every article that could be torn away from her stealthily or by violence, which was openly appropriated to the use of the plunderers. Within a day or two after her abandonment, most if not all of the libellants fell in with her, and without proffering her any relief by salvage, became engaged in thus plundering her. They not only plundered her, but cut away and detached valuable parts of her fixtures and equipment, and embezzled everything that they could remove. The weather remained calm for several days, while the vessel drifted, till on Aug. 16th or 17th she drifted on the bar, and was there boarded by the libellants, or some of them, with the purpose of holding her as a wreck under the State law.

The captain of the vessel, as soon as he was released, gave information to her owners of her seizure and position, and they took immediate means, by employing a steam-tug, and in other ways, to reclaim her. On the 27th Aug. they appeared on the scene and demanded the restoration of the vessel. They, however, expressed themselves as willing to pay the libellants, as for work and labour, for what they had done in getting the vessel off the bar and into the inlet, up to the time when the surrender was demanded, and even continued the services of James and some others during the getting the vessel off the beach.

PASSMORE v. THE CALCUTTA DOCKING COMPANY (LIMITED).

CALCUTTA.

COURT.—The libel is only for salvage, and in it as such, it must be supported by the motives and proceedings of the parties were in all respects lawful, in good conduct and meritorious. The maritime code in relation to the allowance of compensation for services is based upon principles of universal justice and integrity. The law takes under its own protection property rescued from the aid of strangers, and compels it to reward them by a reasonable reward for an honest effort to save it from peril; but it shows no favour or favour to plunderers. A seizure of property for culpable plunder cannot be lawful salvage. When the libellants were in with the schooner in a helpless and apparently abandoned and derelict, instead of reaching her with the manifestation of an effort to afford her relief, the whole purpose was to embezzle, confiscate, and appropriate the ruins of the vessel and her effects, and evidence is furnished that one individual multitude which flocked around the wreck for the slightest purpose to save her for the late proprietors. The presumption is most that all the libellants, who engaged in that depredation and plunder, were well aware that was not then a derelict, but that her owners were across the bay, in an adjacent state, and out of eyesight, and had been the victims of a predatory seizure of their property. It is in no sense with the semblance of an honest and fair purpose to save and restore to its owners a vessel discovered as this one was by the libellants, to have thereafter followed its course from day to day, as it floated on a smooth sea in calm weather, making prey of anything that could be picked from it, till the vessel grounded. It is suspiciously late for them then to assume the position of rightful salvors in possession of the wreck, and claim to be entitled to invoke the law to authorise and confirm to them such a privilege. Under the strict rules of pleading, therefore, the action is dismissible, because there is no proof of a libel under the libel which sustains the only defence offered and claimed by the libellants; but as the court is on demanding that the vessel should be given up to them by the libellants averred a right to compensate them for the value of the services rendered by them, as work and labour, and when the surrender was demanded and refused, the court sees no objection to considering the case as so opened in its legal aspect that assent as to permit an account to be taken with a reference as to a quantum meruit allowance to the libellants for such work and labour. The respondents elected to put the cause to trial on the single issue of the pleadings upon the decree of the court would logically and have been in their favour. But having refused, on their part, that James and some of the libellants had rendered services to the vessel and after the respondents claimed her surrender for themselves as owners, and having called for the charges of these services, with an offer to discharge in that respect, which were just, and the respondents acquiesced in making a reasonable compensation to them; and being persuaded that it is just to the court to regard the proceedings of the libellants, after the vessel grounded on the coast in aid of her reaching that point, to have rendered work and labour for the benefit of the owners, the court considered it equitable to allow such an allowance as may be reported by a commissioner as just and therefore, but without costs, except that of the reference shall be taxed half and each party.

Order accordingly.

MARITIME LAW REPORTS.

CALCUTTA APPELLATE COURT.

Tuesday, April 25, 1865.

(Before Sir BARNES PEACOCK, C. J. and MACPHERSON, J.)

PASSMORE v. THE CALCUTTA DOCKING COMPANY (LIMITED).

In the case of a ship requiring repairs abroad, where the captain received a letter of credit from his owners for an amount more than sufficient to cover the necessary repairs, obtained the execution of the repairs on the faith of such letter, and subsequently expended the proceeds of the letter of credit in such a manner as to leave insufficient to satisfy the claim for repairs executed on the faith of the letter of credit:

Held (confirming the judgment of the court below), that the captain was personally responsible to the shipwright for the deficiency, and must stand committed to prison in default.

Sir BARNES PEACOCK, C. J., in delivering the judgment of the court in this case, said:—This was an appeal from an order made in the suit of the Calcutta Docking Company v. Passmore, on the 7th April, by Mr. Justice Norman, committing Capt. Passmore to prison in execution of a decree pronounced on the 30th March. The ground of appeal was, that the debt, having been arrested in execution of the decree, which was a decree for money, did, on being brought before the court and on application by the plaintiffs for his committal to prison, make an application in writing, verified under the provisions of Act viii. 1856, s. 273, and Act xxiii. 1861, s. 8; and that the judge did thereupon, without further inquiry, refuse to make an order for his discharge, and committed him to prison. In the original case the question was, whether the appellant, Capt. Passmore—having received a letter of credit from England for the repairs of his ship, and afterwards shown it to Capt. Millard, the superintendent of the docking company, on the faith of which letter of credit the ship had been repaired by the company—was justified in expending the proceeds in other ways. The action was against Capt. Passmore for the amount due for the ship's repairs, and the debt, as before stated, had been committed to prison in execution. The Court saw no ground for interfering with the judge's decision. No doubt the debt was placed in great difficulties; and if he had acted in good faith, and given up all his property, it would have been different; but it appears that, unfortunately, the debt has not acted with good faith, and has thrown obstacles in the way of the company's recovering for the repairs done. It appears that after the cyclone, the debt, having some difficulty in getting the repairs done, advertised for tenders for the repairs; Capt. Millard having previously been on board the ship, and made a rough estimate of the repairs for the debt's information. The repairs were not then undertaken, and very probably the debt could not get them done for want of means of payment. Be that as it may, Capt. Millard did not undertake the repairs till the letter of credit was shown him. There was an interview, at which the letter of credit was shown to Capt. Millard. Afterwards he sent in an estimate for the repairs at 10,000rs., which was approved of; and if the debt had then, through misfortune, been obliged to expend some portion of the proceeds of the letter of credit, and had left a fair sum for repairs, the case would have been different. But, having pointedly shown to Capt. Millard the letter of credit, and having assured him, and led him to expect payment when the repairs were done, by the means afforded by the letter of credit, it appears, when they were completed, instead of 10,000rs. estimated for the repairs, only 2490rs., according to the account made out by Mr. Stewart, and signed by the deft., are available for the payment. It was an act of bad faith on the deft. thus lending himself to Mr. Stewart. On the 28th March an action was brought, and an attachment against Mr. Stewart granted for the proceeds of the letter of credit in his hands, on which occasion Mr. Stewart and the deft. were examined in court. The clear proceeds of the credit were 22,000rs. Let us see what are the charges which reduce it to 2490rs. The deft. in the cross-examination says he cannot swear whether he signed the account made up by Mr. Stewart before or after he went into court, on the day the attachment was granted; but it is clear it must have been made during the progress of that investigation, and after he had been examined in court. He says, "I believe it to be correct." Let us see what he allowed. First, a sum paid to Mr. Stewart's brother, Mr. W. C. Stewart, for some charges against the ship. If it was an honest and straightforward transaction, why was not this entered paid to W. C. Stewart, instead of entered as paid to deft. himself? Again, 60rs. as per receipt; this also was paid to Mr. Stewart's brother. Then there is 3000rs. paid to the deft., and I do not know that there is any objection to that item. Again, though the funds were received for the purpose of repairs, there are certain sums charged for other purposes. These funds were, as between the captain and Stewart, the captain's money, but they were held for the purpose of repairs, and not applicable to other accounts. This money, therefore, in the hands of Stewart was liable for the captain's debt; and the question is, did the deft. put any difficulty in the way of the company when they demanded payment, or did he lend himself to Stewart so as to give him a preference? It appears to me there is no doubt that this is a got-up account by the captain, under the influence of Stewart, and for the purposes of Capt. Millard, who did the repairs trusting to the letter of credit. Then there was a payment to Capt. Millard for copper. This was a separate matter of his own, and it was said that Capt. Millard was doing an injustice to his employers in receiving payment of this amount. I do not see that it was anything of the kind. It was a fair charge, and he had no knowledge or reason to suppose that in taking payment there would not be sufficient to pay the company. There is no foundation for such a charge or imputation against Capt. Millard as was made. Then, as to further charges: some of them are fair, but the butcher's bill is not chargeable. However, if that had stood alone, I should not have thought it sufficient to induce us to detain the deft. Then there is 1646rs. for general average, payable by the ship. How that is made out is not very intelligible on the evidence given. It might easily have been explained by Mr. Stewart, however, who was seen in court to-day; but I pass over that. We now come to one item for the probable amount of Mr. Stewart's commission. What right had the deft. to charge for his commission after showing the letter of credit to the docking company as a means of payment? He had no right at all. Then there is 3100rs. for Walter and Co., for stores which they certainly had not supplied on faith of the letter of credit, for I observe that a portion was supplied between the 10th and 20th Dec., before the letter of credit arrived. Therefore Walter and Co. were satisfied to supply goods without the security of the letter of credit. Besides, they did not give credit to the defts., but to Stewart. Why should this claim then be set up in reduction of the amount forthcoming to the docking company, if Stewart's, and not the deft.'s credit was pledged? The same may be said of the claim of Atkinson and Co. Mr. Stewart got the money into his hands, but he never brought an action or claim against the deft. for the payments made; but as soon as he found the money going towards payment of the docking company's claim, he got the deft. to sign the account. That was throwing a considerable difficulty in the way of the company, and in effect giving Stewart a preference. It may be that the company should make out hereafter that the settlement of accounts was fraudulent, and for the purpose of giving preference to Stewart; but I express no opinion on that point now. The deft. has, unfortunately, not acted in good faith, but thrown difficulties in the way of a just claim; and though I regret it very much, I must say the decision below was a right decision, and the appeal must be dismissed. As the objection on which this appeal was founded, if brought to the notice of the judge at the time, was certainly not urged upon him as of any importance, the appeal must be dismissed with costs.

ROLLS COURT.

Reported by H. R. YOUNG, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Nov. 7, 8, 10, and 14, 1865.

BURKE v. ROGERSON.

Vessels—Suretyship—Release of sureties—Delivery of vessel.

R. (trading under the name of R. and Co.) contracted with the A. D. S. Company for the sale and delivery to them of two vessels to be sent by him to the Danube; and he undertook to advance a sum not exceeding 1000l. to furnish them for the voyage. The purchase-money was paid in part, and the remainder was to be secured by a mortgage of the vessels. The plts. were two of the directors of the A. D. S. Company. In order to further the objects of that company, they, in its behalf, and at the request of R., accepted, indorsed, and handed to him certain bills of exchange. R., on his part, gave them a guarantee that they should not be respectively called upon to pay more than a portion of the amount for which they had so become sureties; and not that until a time that was named in the guarantee. No transfer of the vessels from R. to the A. D. S. Company was ever completed, and no mortgage of them was executed to R. R. treated himself as the agent of his own firm of R. and Co. and of the A. D. S. Company in the matter; but instead of sending the vessels from Newcastle-on-Tyne, where they were registered, to the Danube direct, as agreed upon, dealt with them as if he had been the complete owner of them, speculated with them, mortgaged one of them, indorsed over some of the bills of exchange, sent one of the vessels to a port which was far away from the Danube, after having freighted it with contraband of war for the use of the Cossacks, and did all those acts without the knowledge of the plts. Upon a suit instituted by the plts. to be relieved from the liabilities incurred by them on behalf of the A. D. S. Company, in respect of the two vessels, it was Held, that the plts. were entitled to be discharged from their suretyship:

Held, also, that the delivery of a vessel by a vendor to a purchaser means, that the purchaser is to have the control of the vessel, and not necessarily that he is to be put into the manual possession of it. To complete the delivery he must be able to direct where the vessel shall go, what it shall do, what performances it shall be required to undertake; in fact, to have exactly the same power over it as exists with respect to any other chattel which is sold and delivered to a purchaser.

[ROLLA.]

BURNS v. ROGERSON.

[ROLLA.]

The pleadings in this suit were of a most voluminous character; the bill alone covering 44 pages, and extending to 139 paragraphs; and the answer of the deft. Rogerson occupying 62 pages, and containing 186 paragraphs.

For the purpose, however, of this report, it will be necessary to state only the following facts:

The pita, Edmund Burke and John Kearue, were two of the directors of the Anglo-Danubian Steam Navigation and Colliery Company (Limited). The defts., John Rogerson and William Scott, were shipowners, carrying on business in the city of London as also at Newcastle-upon-Tyne, under the style of John Rogerson and Co. The deft. John William Lambton was also a director of the Anglo-Danubian Company, and that company were themselves debtors to the suit.

In 1863, Rogerson made a tender to the company for the supply to them of ships for the execution of their undertakings. After much negotiation between the parties, it was, on the 2nd June 1863, agreed between Rogerson and the company that the latter should purchase, and that Rogerson, trading as John Rogerson and Co., should build two steamers, called the Louise Cranchley and the Champsault, free from incumbrances, upon the following conditions, viz.:

The company will be justified in purchasing two boats and equipping a boat of 3000t on the following terms, namely, to purchase (subject to inspection) the boat called the Louise Cranchley for 5000t, and the Champsault for 7000t, making together 12000t, to be paid for as follows—5000t to be paid by Mr. Rogerson on his taking 300t shares in the company, which was to be deemed as fully paid-up shares, and by the company: acceptances for 1000t and 3000t and 700t—in all 4000t—payable at four months after date, and also the company's acceptances for 3000t and 3500t and 410t, making in all 6810t at six months after date, but the payment of all such acceptances to be deemed satisfied, if the board shall so order, by half the amount of such acceptances being paid in full when due, and the other half by further acceptances of the company, payable at four and six months, as the case may be, according to the tenor of the original acceptances; and the payment of those acceptances to be satisfactorily secured by a mortgage of the two boats above mentioned, the power of sale not to be exercisable until after default, 14 after fourteen days written notice to the company; and no lien to be secured by a mortgage of the said already made and unpaid, and hereafter to be made on the shareholders whose names are entered in a list to be furnished to Mr. Rogerson or his solicitors, with liberty however, for the directors to apply a sum not exceeding 1000t out of such arrears or sums towards the debts and liabilities of the company; Mr. Rogerson also to provide funds as and when required, to the limit of 1000t, for the purpose of despatching and working the two boats above mentioned and also for working two other boats, called the Apia and the Arctur, and for working certain coal-docks at a place called Dubna, under arrangements to be made in the mutual satisfaction of Mr. Rogerson and the directors. The directors do not the consideration of the purchase of the boat called the Mary Harper. That the steamers of the two boats called the Champsault and the Louise Cranchley be carried out, and the payment for the same effected in the manner and upon the terms above mentioned, but subject to legal approval.

That simultaneously with the above arrangements being agreed to by the satisfaction of the legal officers of the company and of Mr. Rogerson, the latter should be empowered, subject to the limit of expense after mentioned, to get ready of iron, and dispatch to the Danube for and on behalf of the company, the two boats called the Louise Cranchley and the Champsault, and also to provide and send out by those boats upon materials for working the colliery, and that he also be empowered to send out for the company, and maintain seven men for working the collieries, he also for the company to go there wages.

That the company may reimburse Mr. Rogerson for any money expenses that he may incur to the satisfaction of the directors for the above purpose to the extent of 1000t, Mr. Rogerson on his part undertaking to provide the necessary aid to that extent, as and when required, it being understood that such reimbursements may be made, if the directors shall desire, by acceptances of the company, to be given from time to time according to the outlay actually made, and paid, and to be paid respectively at four months after date.

A Mr. Lambton was appointed manager of the boats and collieries mentioned in the agreement. Rogerson accepted 3000 shares in the company, for which he paid them 3000t, and the company paid him a sum on account of the two ships, the Louise Cranchley and the Champsault. Neither Rogerson nor his firm advanced the 3500t. The transfers of the steamers were not completed.

On the 5th June 1863 Rogerson tendered to the company for acceptance seven bills of exchange, drawn by him, in his own name, on the company, of different amounts, but making together the sum of 5500t. Those bills he urgently requested the directors of the company to indorse; and the pita, in reliance upon his assertion that without such acceptance and indorsement the ships could not be sent to the Danube, and confiding in his promise to perform the agreement on his part, accepted, indorsed and handed over the bills to him.

The deft. Rogerson then also wrote to the pita, as follows:

June 4, last.

Gentlemen.—In consideration of your agreeing to guarantee the payment of the acceptances of the Anglo-Danubian Steam Navigation Company drawn for the purpose of paying for the boats, to the extent of two-thirds of the amount, that is 3667t, I engage that you shall not be called upon to pay under that guarantee except upon the following dates, viz.

15 months from the date of the bills, 1837 10s. 0d.

18 months from the date of the bills, 1837 10s. 0d.

You agreeing to indorse new bills to take up those first drawn until you will come to the dates named, that is, twelve and eighteen months respectively, at which date you become owners of two-thirds of the property mortgaged to John Rogerson and Co.

It is further understood that you will accept bills to take up the funds to work the boats and colliery—you being liable in the event of the company not paying to the extent of two-thirds of the amount which is not to exceed 1000t.—Yours truly,

John Rogerson.

No mortgage of the ships or either of them was ever executed by or on behalf of the company. It was alleged that the two vessels had never been sent by Rogerson to the Danube, that he had made use of them for his own purposes, that, in fact, he had mortgaged them unknown to the pita, and had also indorsed some of the bills of exchange to Messrs. Lambton and Co., who had commenced proceedings at law thereon.

The bill in the suit contained the following charge.

That the deft. Rogerson, without the authority or privity of the company and the pita, or either of them, after the date of the said contract of the 2nd June, 1863, agreed the Champsault or Louise Cranchley, or one of them, to be laden with arms, munitions of war, and other freight, for conveyance to some port or ports in the Black Sea or elsewhere, that each freight was taken on board at Newcastle-upon-Tyne, or Falmouth, or some other port in this country, and conveyed by the said steamers or one of them to some port or ports in the Black Sea or elsewhere, other than the Danube. Since the arrival of the Champsault and the Louise Cranchley at the port of Constantinople, the said steamers have in this manner, without the authority or privity of the company and the pita, or either of them, been used and employed by the said John Rogerson to the conveyance of passengers and goods to and from the port of Constantinople and Trebizond, or elsewhere in the Black Sea other than the Danube, and, instead of despatching the said steamers to the Danube, as the said John Rogerson had undertaken to do, the said John Rogerson has, in fact, used and employed the said steamers for his own purposes. The pita charge that a considerable quantity of the arms and munitions of war and other freight was sent by the said John Rogerson as aforesaid, as an adventure or speculation on his own account, and that the residue of the said freight was taken by the said John Rogerson for his own private purposes. The pita charge that the whole of such freight was contraband of war, and was shipped by the said John Rogerson with the full knowledge that the same was contraband, and that it was intended for, and that it was in fact supplied to, the Circassians, who were then at war with the Emperor of Russia, and that the said John Rogerson wilfully placed the Champsault in peril of being seized and confiscated to the use of His Imperial Majesty. The said John Rogerson conveyed from the pita and the company that the Champsault was laden with such or any freight. The said John Rogerson pretends that he was entitled to take such freight under a stipulation in a charter made by him on the 25th May 1862, but the pita charge the contrary; and that such stipulation formed no part of the said contract.

The bill then prayed a declaration that the pita were respectively altogether discharged from liability on the said bills of exchange so indorsed by them as aforesaid; and that the defts., John Rogerson and William Scott, were severally bound, each ought to indemnify the plts. against the said actions at law brought by the Messrs. Lambton and Co. against the plts.; and that the said defts. might be decreed to do so, or that they might be decreed specifically to perform the said agreements of the 2nd and 5th June 1863, the plts. being ready and willing, and thereby offering specifically to perform such agreements on their part; for an account of what was due to the plts. from the defts. under the said agreements: for the proper application and payment of the amount found due; and for an injunction to restrain the negotiation of the said bills of exchange, and the further prosecution of the said actions.

The further details of the case will sufficiently appear from the judgment of the M. R. (infra).

Southgate, Q. C. and Locock Webb appeared for the plts., and contended that, under all the circumstances of the case, from the non-delivery of the ships to the company, from their not having been duly sent to the Danube as they might and ought to have been, and from the peculiar dealings with them by the deft. Rogerson, unknown to the plts., they were discharged from their liability under the agreements of the 2nd and 5th June 1863, and entitled to the relief they sought by their bill.

Schwyn, Q. C. and A. Marten, for the deft. Rogerson, contended that he had acted as the agent of the plts. and the A. D. S. Company in the transaction. The company was not unaware of his proceedings, and the knowledge of the company must therefore bind the plts. Further, they insisted that when once the ships were dispatched as they were by him from Newcastle, they were duly delivered to the plts. and their company, subject to his showing that he had expended the 1000*l.* agreed upon. No time was fixed within which the vessels were to be delivered. The real question in the case was, what was the construction of the agreement? They insisted that Rogerson had not forfeited his right under it, by transmitting the cargo of arms, &c., or by his other acts. What he did he did at his peril, but that did not affect his position as regarded the plts. Their remedy was at law, for a breach (if any) of the agreements.

Fooks appeared for the defts., the Anglo-Danubian Company and Couchman.

Southgate, Q. C. was not called on to reply.

Nov. 14.—The MASTER of the ROLLS.—I have read the evidence in this case, and I think that the plts. are entitled to a decree. The first question to be considered is, what is the contract between the parties? There was a great deal of preliminary discussion with respect to the Anglo-Danubian Company purchasing the steamers from Mr. Rogerson; but I am of opinion that that did not form the contract. I think the contract is to be found in the resolutions of the 2nd June 1863, which were entered in the books of the company when Mr. Rogerson was present. It is necessary for me to refer to those resolutions in order to explain what I have to say on the subject. [The M. R. then read the whole of the contract as above set forth, and continued:] Now, the first thing to be observed upon that contract is, the nature of the proposed mortgage, and that is a material question in the case. The mortgage was to be a mortgage on the ships of the company; but the mortgage was not to be enforced, and no sale was to take place until after default. By that was meant default in the payment of the acceptances, and therefore the mortgage could not have been exercised strictly until the four months had expired, when the first acceptance became due, and then there would have to be paid one half at least, and fresh acceptances given for the remaining half, if the Anglo-Danubian Company so thought fit. Besides, it was not to be exercisable until after default, and after fourteen days' written notice to the company. Those were the conditions upon which alone the mortgage was to be enforced. There was also to be a mortgage of the unpaid calls of the shareholders, of which a list was to be furnished, subject to the company being entitled, in the first instance, to take out 1500*l.* for the payment of any sums of money which they might consider it desirable should be applied towards the affairs of the company. There was a subsequent resolution that a Mr. Lankaski, who it appears was a partner in the firm of Rogerson and Co., in Servia (at least so I infer from the fact of their calling him "our Mr. Lankaski"), was to be manager of the business at Dobra, near Belgrade, at the weekly salary of 3*l.*, in addition to his reasonable and necessary expenses. Mr. Lankaski was to act in accordance with written instructions, to be furnished to him by the secretary of the company. Now, that was the original contract. The only variation that was made in it was this, that the 1000*l.* to be laid out was not to be "to the satisfaction of the directors," but at the mere absolute control of Mr. Rogerson—that he was to employ it as he thought fit. That was ultimately, and in fact, the contract which was entered into. Now, in the first place, it is quite clear, in my opinion, that that was a contract with the Anglo-Danubian Steam Navigation Company; and that it was not a contract with any individuals whatever. It is true that Mr. Burke and Mr. Kearns were, so to say, substantially that company, and could make it do as they pleased. But the contract was made with the company, and not with those gentlemen individually. It is observable also with respect to the 1000*l.* which was to be laid out, that it was not like a trust which Mr. Rogerson was obliged to perform; it was optional on his part, and he was not to lay it out unless he thought fit. The next thing to consider is, the transaction which has given rise to this suit; in fact, by which the plts., Mr. Burke and Mr. Kearns, became liable for the due performance of the contract by the company; that is to say, that to the extent of two-thirds, the acceptances of the company should be duly honoured. That took place upon the 11th June 1863. It took place nine days after the resolutions were come to, and on the same day (which is very material) a letter of instructions was given to Mr. Rogerson, directing him to send the steamers to the Danube at once. It is important to observe that Mr. Rogerson told the plts. that he could not send out the ships unless they would give their guarantee that the bills should be paid, at all events to the extent of the two-thirds. I think that was reasonable enough on the part of the deft. He thought that the company had no very large amount of funds. It was a limited company, and it was perfectly intelligible that he did not like to send the ships out without some reasonable certainty that the bills of the company would be duly honoured; and accordingly the guarantee which he required, and they consented to give, was as follows: [The M. R. read the guarantee as above stated, and continued thus:] That sum of 1000*l.* was the money to be expended in sending the ships out. I am not sure that this is a very remarkable circumstance, although it was a great deal relied upon in the course of the arguments, viz., that no note was made at the time on the register of the ships, of the ownership of them. I am clearly of opinion that the plts. expected it to be made; I am also quite satisfied that a bill of sale, executed by a Mr. Wraith, was produced to the office at the time, and that they believed it to be effectual to enable them to get a transfer duly made. In point of fact, however, Mr.

ROLLS.]

BURKE v. ROGERSON.

[ROLLS.]

Wraith at that time had no ownership in the ships at all. It is quite true that Mr. Rogerson was the real owner, though they were not registered in his name. They were registered in the name of the Tyne Ferry Company, and though Mr. Rogerson probably was the principal manager of the Tyne Ferry Company, and could have got the ships transferred whenever he pleased, he did not think fit to do so. I do not ground my judgment upon this, that the plts. were induced, either by misrepresentation on the part of Mr. Rogerson, or any expectation on their own part, that the transfer of the ships would take place immediately, to indorse the bills of exchange. It is, however, important to observe, that what then took place was this: upon the plain construction of the contract, the vessels were, in my opinion, to be delivered immediately to the Anglo-Danubian Steam Navigation Company; and the mortgage was to be enforced, only provided the bills were not paid. Accordingly the first and really important question is this, whether the ships were in fact delivered to the company at all? I omit for the present all consideration of the question, whether the ships were to be delivered in the Danube or in the Tyne. I am of opinion, upon the evidence, that they were never delivered to the company anywhere; that no delivery of any sort took place at any place whatever; but that they remained constantly in the possession of Mr. Rogerson, the vendor. The way in which it was put by Mr. Rogerson, or by his counsel in their arguments, was this: He contended that he represents two characters. He says, it is true that he was the vendor, but he was also the agent of the company, and after the contract was entered into no transfer took place on the registry; for that his position was only that of an agent of the company, and he was thereupon entitled to consider the ships duly delivered to him as such agent. It was urged very strongly before me, that if A. B., a stranger, had been the agent of the company, and Mr. Rogerson had transferred the ships to him, that would have been a delivery of them to the company, because it was a delivery to the agent of the company. It was also strongly urged, and with great truth, that those two characters might be filled by the same person. But the question whether there was such a delivery, is the question to be determined by the evidence in the case. In the first place, it is to be considered what is meant by delivering a vessel to the purchaser? It means that he must have the control over the vessel, and not necessarily that he is to be put into the manual possession of it. To complete the delivery, he must be able to direct where the vessel shall go, what it shall do, what performances it shall be required to undertake; in fact, to have exactly the same control over it as exists with respect to any other chattel which is sold and delivered to a purchaser. If, for instance, I buy a carriage, the delivery of that takes place when it is sent to my stables, or to the care of any other person whom I may authorise to take it, and who may use it as he pleases. But the important thing to consider in this case is this. Undoubtedly these vessels might have been so delivered to Mr. Rogerson, and if Mr. Rogerson had treated himself as the mere agent of the company from that time, and had in fact treated the company solely as the owners, then I think it might have been justly said that there was a delivery to the company at that time. I am of opinion, however, upon the evidence, that Mr. Rogerson had the sole and unquestionable control of the vessels. He did exactly what he pleased with them, and not as the agent of the company, from the time when the resolutions were entered into down to the time when the vessels were ultimately sold at Constantinople. But what is the duty of an agent? The duty of an agent is take the instructions of his principal, and the instructions of the principal in this case were to send the ships to the Danube. Consider first the case of the Chesapeake, and see what took place as to that vessel. The voyage to the Danube would have been one of less expense and of less duration than vessels usually incur in performing it. The vessels were sent to Trebizond. The distance from the Bosphorus to Trebizond is nearly double that from the Bosphorus to the mouth of the Danube. I do not know whether it is proved in the case or not, but that is a geographical fact which the court is bound to know, and one as to which anybody may satisfy himself by inspecting an ordinary map of the Black Sea. The fact is, Trebizond is at least 400 miles (and therefore 800 there and back) out of the way of the direct passage to the Bosphorus from the mouth of the Danube. How is his conduct in this respect explained, and how does Mr. Rogerson justify it? He alleges that he told the plts. that he intended to send out certain goods in their vessel upon freight at 4l. per ton for his own profit, as a speculation, and that this was assented to by them. I will assume for the present that that was so, and then consider the result of it. It is proper to observe that, with respect to sending out any goods, the plts. ought to have had the express assent of the owners of the vessels for such an use of them, and to have had explained to them exactly what it was that was intended to be done. Assuming, however, that that was so, according to the evidence part of the goods was actually shipped on board the Chesapeake before the contract was entered into. The papers in the suit are very voluminous, but I think from my perusal of them that this is plain: that the only communication or conversation which refers to the taking of the goods mentions it with respect to the discharge of those goods in their way to the Danube, and that they were not to go out of their way. That it would have been justifiable, under the contract, to have discharged goods at Vigo, Gibraltar, or Malta, or possibly at Athens, where the vessels might touch, or at Constantinople; but it would not have been right to have gone to Trebizond to deliver any goods there. That, in short, it would not have been justifiable to have gone out of the regular course to deliver the goods at another place; and, as I have observed, Trebizond is 400 miles out of the way, and to make that deviation would have required the express assent and sanction of the company. But that sanction is nowhere alleged to have been given; which is the more striking because it is wholly inconsistent with that which is the great object of the Anglo-Danubian Company; that object was, that the vessels should arrive at the Danube at the very earliest time at which they could get there. It was a very serious injury to them that there was any delay in the arrival of the vessels. Besides that, there is another consideration in this case, which is a matter of very considerable importance—the character of the goods which were sent out was of a very dangerous description; amongst them was a ton of gunpowder, and all the rest were munitions of war. They were intended for the purpose of being supplied to the Circassians in their struggle against the Russian empire. That, in my opinion, is clearly established. They were, in fact, contraband of war. The whole of the goods that were sent out were—it does not matter whether they were six or eight tons, or what the amount of the tonnage was; but it is quite clear that they were a cargo of great value to the Circassians, and that there was considerable difficulty in getting them in Circassia. This, too, is quite clear, that the vessel incurred very serious risks; because, if any Russian vessel of war had found it, it would have been taken, without a doubt, and condemned. I am of opinion, upon the evidence, that not only was this known to all the persons, but that it was known at Constantinople. When they got to Trebizond they could not get any fuel, and it was only by some of the boats of the country (which they call caïques) coming out, that the ship was unloaded into one of them. Thereupon, being discharged of her cargo, she goes back to Trebizond by means of the interposition of the English consul. It was only upon the master of the ship giving his positive undertaking that the fuel would merely be used to take him back to Constantinople, that he was able to move from Trebizond at all. It is true he did not strictly perform his contract with the English consul, because, no sooner was he supplied with coal, which he purchased, than he went out to sea, taking the caïque in tow, and, after towing her for nine or ten hours, he left her in the middle of the night, as near the coast of Circassia as he could, where, it is to be inferred, the goods arrived. The vessel itself arrived safely; that is to say, though it incurred risk, it met with no accident. But I am of opinion that this part of the transaction alone is sufficient to discharge the sureties, and that it is not necessary to go a step beyond this for the purpose of releasing them. They wanted the vessel to be sent out immediately to the Danube. The Chesapeake arrived at Constantinople on the 23rd Aug. 1863. She spent a month, all but four days, in her excursion to Trebizond, and she returned on the 18th Sept. to Constantinople; and in much less time she might easily have gone to the mouth of the Danube. As to this transaction, independently of the risk incurred by the vessel being likely to be seized, the mere delay in going out of her route and employing herself for a totally different purpose is, in my opinion, sufficient to discharge the sureties from their contract. But the case does not rest there. This is to be seen throughout: that Mr. Rogerson disregarded the directions and instructions of the company, whose agent he professed himself to have been, and says that he now is. He says now that he would have taken the Chesapeake to the Danube if the plts. or the Anglo-Danubian Company had provided him with the necessary funds for that purpose. But there is this manifest observation which occurs upon that, that a much smaller sum would have taken this vessel to the Danube than was spent in taking her to Trebizond, and much less than was spent in taking her there and back again. As I understand from his account, what he seeks to be entitled to have paid to him is that which he contends the company must pay, namely, all the extra expense that was occasioned by the voyage from Constantinople to Trebizond and back again, solely occasioned on account of his own speculation, which was not communicated to them. He alleges it was merely because this was not paid and further funds supplied, that the Chesapeake did not go to the Danube at all. The evidence shows me clearly not only that Mr. Rogerson did not act as the agent of the company, but that he did not consider himself such agent, and that he never intended it to be thought that he was the agent of the company, or to relinquish his own control over the vessels until the bills which he received had been duly proved. No doubt he treated the company as the purchasers of the vessels, and he treated himself as the mortgagee of them; but he determined not to quit possession of the vessels until he was fully paid, although the delivery of the vessels to the company so as to put them under the control of the company was, in my opinion, an essential part of the contract, and was so considered on both sides. I have already stated that I am not at all clear that the transfer in the registry was necessary for the purpose of completing the contract. It was stated with some truth that this could have been done at any time, and that the contract was sufficient; but assuming this to be so, exactly the same thing might be said of the mortgagee of the vessels, viz., that Rogerson was just as much a mortgagee of the vessels under the contract as the company were owners of the vessels under it. His mortgage, however, was to be this, that he was not to exercise the power of sale until after default in payment of the bills. How then does he act? He acts as the owner of the vessels, and whether as mortgagee in possession, or as any other owner, is not material, if he never acted as agent of the Anglo-Danubian Company, or as if they had anything to do with the vessels except to give him money for the purpose of working them. The truth of this is shown from various letters which have been proved in the suit, and which were written to Mr. Lankaski. I will refer to one or two of them. First, there is a letter written from Newcastle, and subscribed, "Yours faithfully, John Rogerson and Company, signed F. Cann" (who is, I assume, a confidential person entitled to use the name of Rogerson and Co.) The letter is dated the 27th June 1863, therefore it was twenty-five days after the contract was entered into; and very little more than a fortnight (sixteen days) after the arrangement with the plts. as to their giving the guarantee. It is written to Lankaski, or Messrs. Heald, Mathurn and Co., Constantinople (they being the correspondents there of Rogerson and Co.) This is the letter: "We are in receipt of your letters of the 4th, 10th, and 16th June. That to Mr. Holmes we did not send to him, as it was not encouraging." I omit reading the whole of the considerations mentioned in the letter, because it would be interminable for me to go through the detail of all the circumstances of the case. I do not think Mr. Rogerson's withholding the letter of Mr. Holmes respecting the prospects of the company in Servia can have anything at all to do with the question I am now considering. I think he ought to have communicated it to them; but, whether he did so or not, I do not think that can affect the question, which is, whether, in point of fact, there was any delivery of the vessels at all. Then the letter goes on thus: "And indeed you could satisfactorily judge of the undertaking from a mere stay of forty-two hours on the spot. The Chesapeake left Falmouth in order. Mr. Crawshay says the Circassians are wanting such a boat. If so, you can sell at 1500l.; but you must get the cash. Mr. Rogerson has gone to London, and will write you from there as to any other business." Here is, by an authorised agent (after the delivery according to his own statement of the vessel to himself as agent), an express direction by him to sell the vessel. Now, it is to be observed that he was the vendor; the vessel was standing in his own name at the time of the registry on the customs. He, according to his own statement, was mortgagee of the vessel. His mortgage only entitled him to sell after default in payment of the acceptances, and the acceptances were not due for three months, and yet he directs the vessels to be sold, and authorises them to be sold, providing they can get 1500l. for them. It is to be observed that the price that was paid to him for the vessel was 2000l. I was told that he said he should have asked 2500l.; but I confess I do not look upon the 2500l. paid in paid-up shares of the company as very much. I consider the 5500l. as the price of the ships; so that, in fact, it might well be said that if the 2000l. was the price of one ship, 3500l. was the price of the other; or it might have been divided in any way that might have been thought fit. It is also to be observed that the word is "Circassians," which I read as meaning Circassians. I think no one can doubt, considering what took place with the ship, that that is the real meaning of the term. But I think all that is wholly inconsistent with any delivery of the ships to the Anglo-Danubian Company, or to the plts.; for here is an express authority to sell the ships without any reference to the plts. at all. Again, you have a similar thing on the 6th Aug. 1863, when a letter was written from London to Mr. Lankaski, addressed to the care of Messrs. Heald, Mathurn, and Co., at Constantinople, signed "Pro John Rogerson and Co.: W. R. Shakell," who was also authorised to write for them. The letter states this: "The present is to advise you of the Chesapeake having touched at Malta on the 28th ult.; and we trust, if she has not already arrived at Constantinople, she will very shortly do so, and you will get her safely discharged, and her cargo sent to its destination. You will then make arrangements to get the steamer to the Danube; but if you find the water too low to get to Belgrade, you will then make the best arrangements you can for working the vessel profitably lower down the river. The vessel must not be sold under 1500*l.*, and in the event of your obtaining a purchaser you must be careful either to obtain cash or good bills on London. The Louise Crawshaw, left Newcastle last week, and was at Southampton on the 3rd inst. You are also at liberty to sell this boat for 4000*l.*, same payment as for the Chesapeake; and should you sell either or both, you must not mention the sale to the Danubian people, but telegraph to us immediately, and we shall then replace them, by sending the Harry Clasper and Wansbeck." Now, that letter is distinct. Mr. Rogerson had not only not delivered them, but he considers himself entitled to substitute two other vessels for them. It is not pretended that the company ever agreed to buy two other vessels. Those were the only two they had bought; but he considered himself, at all events, entitled to do as he did, and on the 8th Oct. he writes to a similar effect. In my opinion the probability was, that Mr. Rogerson thought his security was very bad, and he was proposing to sell the ships before the bills had become due, or any default had been made, in order to pay himself; that he claimed to be, and acted as, mortgagee in possession and not as owner of the ships; and that it was not in that character that he intended to do what he did. But after reading the evidence it is impossible to say that he ever gave the plts. or the company the slightest control over these vessels, at any place whatever, either in the Tyne or at Constantinople, or on their way to it. But assuming the debt. Rogerson to be in the right (I will take his own case as he states it), I will then see what the result would be. Here is a contract entered into with the debt. Rogerson and Co. and the Anglo-Danubian Company. The Anglo-Danubian Company wanted boats for the Danube; they buy two boats, and they desire the vendor, who professes his willingness to act as their agent, to take the two boats to the Danube for them. The vendor still professes to act as their agent, and saying he takes possession of them as their agent, withholds from his principal all control over the vessels, and keeps them entirely to himself at Constantinople. What he would have, if I simply dismiss the bill, and give him what he claims he is entitled to, is this: He has received 1000*l.* in one action; he would receive 3000*l.* from the plts., which is due upon three bills, and which has been paid into court with interest, and he would receive the 1500*l.* for the sale of the ship at Constantinople, being a sum of upwards of 6000*l.* The whole of that would not meet the amount which he claims to be due to him, because what he claims to be due to him is not merely the amount of the acceptances, but also the money he has laid out on the vessels, which he says amounts to 3000*l.* He would receive upwards of 6000*l.*, and the Anglo-Danubian Company would literally get nothing at all. The only thing would be this, that they would not have even the appearance of the vessels in the Danube for their benefit; they would merely have this, that in consideration of their being the equitable owners of the vessels, without having any control or any power over them, they would have an opportunity, of which they might avail themselves, of declaring to their shareholders that they had bought these two vessels, and that they were the owners of the vessels. But, in the meantime, Mr. Rogerson would have received the sum of 6000*l.* and upwards from either the Anglo-Danubian Company or the plts., as their guarantors, in order to enable the plts. simply to do and the debt. to carry on a speculative voyage, for the delivery of munitions of war upon the coast of Circassia. It is thought that I can, upon that, hold this case to be one in which the plts. are bound by their suretyship to allow that to be done; although it is plain, in my opinion, that upon the contract the vessels were to be delivered to the company, and they were to have the benefit of the contract being duly performed. I am of opinion, with respect to that, that they are distinctly discharged from the suretyship for the company. Accordingly, I make a declaration to that effect, and order the amount to be repaid to them, with costs.

[ROLLS.]

BURKE F. ROGERSON.

[ROLLS.]

KEMP v. HALLIDAY.

KEMP v. HALLIDAY.

Marine policy of insurance—Total loss, what amounts to.

*The ship Chebucto was insured in the ordinary form for 1500*l.; she sailed with a general cargo on board, and on her voyage sustained damage such as to require repairs. Part of the damage was such as to be the subject of general average. The ship put into Falmouth for repairs, and was moored with part of her cargo on board, the residue being on shore, and the repairs were commenced, but not completed, when, on the 2nd Dec., she was sunk by the perils of the sea, and lay submerged with the portion of the cargo on board. Whilst she lay so submerged, the agent of the assured (Mr. Amos) came to the conclusion that to raise and repair the ship would cost more than she was worth; the ship's agents (Messrs. Broad and Sons) were of a different opinion, and acting on their own responsibility, and not as agents of the assured, they did in fact raise the ship, with the portion of the cargo on board. On the 9th Dec., after they had commenced raising the ship, but before the operation was completed, the assured gave notice of abandonment. The plt. claimed as for a total loss; the underwriters paid money into court as for a partial loss, and it was agreed that the payment was sufficient unless the loss was total. The Judge at the trial left the following questions to the jury: Whether there was a constructive total loss of the vessel, first, at the time when Mr. Amos gave notice that the plt. abandoned her; or, secondly, at the time she lay moored after being raised? both of which questions were answered in the affirmative. Upon the facts being turned into a special case, with leave to the court to be at liberty to draw inferences of fact in the same way as a jury would be entitled to do:

Held, per Shaw, J., that he was entitled to recover as for a total loss.

This was an action upon a marine policy of insurance, bearing date the 6th Oct. 1863, upon the Chibucta, from Liverpool to Rio Janeiro, valued at 1500*l.*, but underwritten by the deft. for 25*l.* The deft. had paid 18*l.* 15*s.* into court, and at the trial a verdict was found for the plt., subject to the following case, which stated:

1. The Chibucta, the vessel insured, belonging to the plt., sailed on the 21st Oct. 1863 from Liverpool to Rio Janeiro, on the voyage insured, laden with a general cargo. 2. In the due prosecution of her voyage the ship met with heavy gales, and worked, strained, and leaked very much, so that it became necessary, by reason of the perils of the sea, for the safety and preservation of the cargo, ship, and crew, to cut away all forward, and to bear up for, and to put into Falmouth harbour as a port of refuge, where the vessel, with her cargo on board, came to anchor on the 12th Nov. 1863. 3. By reason of the premises, a certain average loss was sustained. 4. On the arrival of the ship at Falmouth, the master of the ship applied to Messrs. Broad and Sons, who are ship agents at Falmouth, requesting them to act as agents for the ship, and Messrs. Broad and Sons agreed to do so. 5. On the recommendation of surveyors employed by the master, the ship was passed inside the break-water, and was moored to the pier for the purpose of being repaired, and a portion of her cargo was discharged, the heavier portion of her cargo, however, being left in the ship. The repairs were then proceeded with, but were not completed by the 2nd Dec. 1863. 6. On the 2nd Dec., whilst the ship was lying moored to the pier, there blew a hurricane which caused the ship with that part of the cargo which had not been discharged, to sink at her moorings at a place where at low water there was a depth of twenty-two feet and at high water a depth of forty feet. 7. On the same day, namely, the 2nd Dec. 1863, the plt. was informed by a telegram sent to him by the master of the ship, that she had sunk in Falmouth harbour; and on the following day a Mr. Amos, a person experienced in the surveying and repairing of ships, arrived at Falmouth with full authority from the plt. to investigate the whole matter, and to act for him in all matters concerning the ship as according to the best of his judgment would be best for all concerned. Mr. Amos having examined the position of the ship, and having informed himself of her prior condition and taking into consideration the probable injuries the ship had sustained, and having formed a judgment of the cost of raising her and of her further repairs, came to the conclusion that it would cost more to raise and repair her than she would be worth when repaired. Accordingly on the 4th Dec. he, on the part of the plt., gave notice to Broad and Sons that the plt. abandoned the ship and would not be responsible for, and would have nothing to do with, raising or repairing her. 8. On the 7th Dec. a surveyor, Mr. Thomas, by orders of Messrs. Broad and Sons (which were given on their own responsibility, and not as agents for the plt.), commenced raising the ship, and on the 20th of that month he succeeded in raising her with all those goods on board which had not been discharged before the aforesaid 2nd Dec. She was subsequently moved into dock by orders and under the superintendence of the master, who had remained at Falmouth since the arrival of the ship in that harbour, notwithstanding that Mr. Amos, on his visit to Falmouth, had expressly ordered the captain to have nothing to do with the ship, and at the commencement of this action she was lying at Falmouth safely moored. 9. On the 4th Dec. the captain, by the instructions of Amos, signed and sent by post a notice of abandonment to Davies and Co., of Liverpool, the brokers who had effected the policy of insurance, and who then held the same; and on the 9th Dec. Davies and Co. gave due notice of abandonment to the deft. as follows:

Liverpool 9th Dec. 1863.

Messrs. Burn and Atley,

Gentlemen.—On behalf of the owners of the Chibucta, we beg to give you notice that the vessel is abandoned to you in Falmouth harbour.—Yours very truly,

D. W. Davies and Co.

10. The value of the cargo which sank in the ship and which was raised in her was when raised 1730*l.* The value of that previously taken out was 7000*l.* The amount of the whole freight by the charter-party was 475*l.*, and upon the portion of goods sunk 237*l.* 10*s.* The whole net freight was 73*l.* The questions that were left to the jury were, whether there was a constructive total loss of the vessel first at the time when Mr. Amos gave notice to Broad and Sons that the plt. abandoned her; or secondly, at the time she lay moored after being raised? both of which questions were answered in the affirmative. In putting these questions to the jury, no account was taken of any liability on the part of the cargo or freight to contribute in a general average towards the expenses of raising the vessel or towards the general average loss of sea; and it is to be taken as a fact that if such liability for either loss ought to have been taken into calculation and the estimate of the cost of raising and repairing ought to have been reduced by the amount of the general average to be so constituted, then there was not a constructive total loss. 11. The court or courts of appeal was to be at liberty to draw inferences of fact in the same way as a jury would be entitled to do.

The questions for the opinion of the court were: First, whether the plt. is under the above circumstances entitled to recover on the policy against the deft. as for an absolute total loss as distinguished from a constructive total loss? And if the court should answer the above question in the negative, then, secondly, whether it was material, in determining the question of constructive total loss, to take into account the liability, if any such existed, of the cargo and freight to make a general average contribution towards the expenses of raising the ship, or towards the general average loss of sea? Thirdly, whether the notice of abandonment was given too late?

If the court should be of opinion that the plt. was entitled to retain the verdict, then judgment was to be entered for the plt. for the amount of the verdict with costs of suit. If otherwise, there was to be judgment for the deft. with costs of suit.

Q. B.]

KEMP v. HALLIDAY.

[Q. B.]

June 13.—SHEE, J.—I will proceed to read my judgment in the case of Kemp v. Halliday. Having had the advantage of reading the judgment of my brother Blackburn, I refer generally for the facts upon which our opinion is asked to his statement of them, and to the statement in the case. On the law laid down by him, as the result of a great number of differently worded and variously illustrated decisions (Irving v. Manning, H. of L. Cas.; and Parry v. Aberdeen, 9 B. & Cr., 417; Benyon v. Chapman, 2 H. of L. Cas. 720; Moss v. Smith, 9 C. B. 103; Gardiner v. Salvadore, 1 Moo. & Rob. 117; and Rosetto v. Gurney, 11 C. B. 176) on the questions of abandonment and constructive total loss, I do entirely concur with him, and I think it better to adopt the language which he has used than attempt any further elucidation of the principles which it establishes. If my judgment should prevail, the plt. would retain his verdict. I differ with my learned brother rather upon the inferences to be drawn from the facts submitted to us, and upon the application to them of the law, than upon the law itself. On the first question, namely, whether the plt. is entitled to recover as an absolute total loss, as distinguished from a constructive total loss, my answer is, No. It was not impossible to raise, or, when raised, to repair, the ship. There was a chance of raising her in a condition which would enable her, after repairs had been done to her, to be used as a ship. Subsisting as she did in specie under the control of the assured, and not being in danger of immediate destruction, it would have been inexcusable to have sold her, and to have allowed her to be removed in fragments as a wreck, or to have sold her as a wreck when raised, without giving to the underwriters, by notice of abandonment, the opportunity of electing whether they would incur the expense of raising and repairing her. We can, as it seems to me, consistently with the decisions within the range of which the facts before us lie, give but one answer to this question, namely, that the ship as she lay submerged at Falmouth, and when moored in dock after she had been raised, was not an absolute total loss. To the second question proposed to us, namely, whether it was material, in determining the question of constructive total loss, to take into account the liability, if any such existed, of the cargo and freight to make a general average towards the expense of raising the ship, or towards the general average loss at sea, my answer is also in the negative. It is admitted that, regard being had to the cost of raising the ship, the cost of repairing her when raised, and her probable value when repaired, she was constructively a total loss on the 4th Dec. when the plt. informed the Messrs. Broad that he abandoned her, and also when moored in dock after she had been raised, unless the liability of the freight and cargo to contribute to the general average loss at sea, and of the freight and cargo to contribute in a general average to the cost of raising her, or either of them, were, in determining the question whether she was constructively a total loss, proper items of deduction from the outlay necessary to raise and repair her. First, as to the general average loss at sea; a voluntary sacrifice of part of the ship and of her apparel having been made for the aversion of the common danger to which ship, freight, and cargo were exposed, the assured on the ship had a claim against his insurers for the share of the loss chargeable to ship, and also for the share, should it not have been paid to him, chargeable to the cargo; though on payment of this latter share being subrogated to the assured on ship as respects his claim for it upon his co-contributories to the general average (see Pothier Contract de Assurance, No. 52, 164), such portion of the money value of the assured's share of the general average contribution as had not been expended on the repairs before the final disaster would, as a claim upon his insurers, merge and be absorbed in the subsequent loss, if total, occasioned by that disaster (see Marshall, 5th edit. 435; Cheminant v. Pearson, 4 Taunt. 367; Stewart v. Steele, 5 Scott N. R. 927; and Live v. Janson, 12 East, 648); such portion of it as had been expended on repairs which had become valueless by reason of fresh damage done by the final disaster to the parts repaired would have to be expended again, if a resolution to repair had been taken, such portion as had been actually expended on repairs, which enured to the benefit of the ship after the final disaster, must be taken, on these findings, to have been considered in the estimate of the repairs which would be required for her restoration, so that no portion of the indemnity recoverable by the shipowner from his insurers in respect of his ship's share of the general average loss at sea could come in aid of his liability on contracts for raising or repairing the ship. The same observations apply to such portions of the share of the general average contribution chargeable to the cargo, as before the final disaster had been expended on repairs which had become valueless by reason of fresh damage done to the parts repaired, or which still coming to the ship's benefit after the final disaster must be taken to have been considered in the estimate of the required repairs on which the resolution to abandon was based. Whether the cost of raising the ship, if she had been raised by the plt., would have been the subject of a general average or not, is a question which it is impossible, as I read the statement before us, to answer affirmatively, uninformed as we are of the state of things as respects ship, freight, and cargo in which, and the said intention with which, the cost would have been incurred. Extraordinary expenses submitted to by the master of a ship under the urgent pressure of a well-founded fear or moral certainty, should they not be submitted to, of total loss of ship, freight, and cargo (see Emerigon, c. 12, s. 39; Benecke 191 and 192; and Bailey on General Average, 15), all of them being in equal peril of perishing, may, so far as such expenses serve to avert a danger threatening the whole concern, and are not incurred to repair or diminish an already existing loss, as will found a claim for general average contribution, as the jettison of goods, or the cutting away of masts and cables (see Benecke, 214 and 215); but the right to contribution by way of general average has no place where there has not been a voluntary sacrifice of property or money for the common safety in a danger imminent and common to the ship and the property in her. The mere circumstance that an outlay absolutely indispensable to the continued existence of a ship as a ship, and to the earning of her stipulated freight, may incidentally be conducive also to the rescue of cargo remaining in the ship, but not in danger of perishing with the ship, would not impart to it the character of such a sacrifice. Expenses incurred by a shipowner with cargo on board in keeping his ship afloat, or in restoring her to a condition of navigability, if they be the necessary consequence of an accomplished misfortune, and not occasioned by, or the necessary consequence of, a voluntary bestowal of this property or of part of it for the common safety, are incurred for his own benefit to enable him, by fulfilling his contract, to earn his freight, and can no more found a claim for a general average contribution, than the expense of hiring another ship to carry the cargo to its destination. The distinction between extraordinary expenses incurred to repair or diminish a particular average loss, and extraordinary expenses incurred or occasioned by a sacrifice for the common safety, at a time when without them it would be impossible to avert a total loss of all the interests at risk—as in the case put by Benecke and on his authority, and partly in his words, and with the intention probably of adopting and condensing the qualifications which restrict their meaning by Mr. Mr. Arnould of a stranded ship which, having sustained a particular average loss, “is in most cases in danger of being totally lost, unless speedy measures are taken for its preservation,” is neatly precised in the words by which the positive enactment of art. 6, the French Ordinance des Arranes, tit. 7, is rectified and made conformable to principle in the corresponding art. 400 of the Code de Commerce des Arranes, tit. 11. In the former “the cost of floating a ship,” in the latter “the cost of floating a ship stranded, with the intention of averting a total loss,” is declared to be general average. The case before us, though combining a particular average loss to ship with probably a particular average loss to cargo, does not, unless we import into it intentions on the part of the shipowner which appear not to have influenced him, and danger to the cargo which does not appear to have been apprehended, differ much in the principle of its decision from the case cited in the insurance books from the Digest, of the freighted ship which, having sustained a heavy average loss in her voyage to Ostia, was compelled to put into Hippo and there incur expenses which were necessary for her own safety to enable her to reach her destination and deliver her cargo in good condition. It was argued in that case that the owners of the cargo ought to contribute to make good the damage which the ship had sustained; but the decision was against the shipowner, because the expenses had been incurred rather for the benefit of the ship than the preservation of the cargo: “Hic eorum, sumptus instruendo magis maris quam conservanderum mercium gratia factus est.” The shipowner must raise his ship or hire another, or lose his freight. It is his affair, and his only. The charges in such a misfortune of unloading, housing, drying, and reloading the cargo, fall in like manner upon the owner of it: (see Benecke, 191, 194.) Were it otherwise, every mishap of this kind in part would be converted into a general average. The shipper who has a right under his contract to have a sea-borne carriage provided for the conveyance of his goods from the place of their shipment to the place of their destination would, in addition to the agreed freight, have to bear part of the expense to which, by the very nature of the service and of the instrument by which it is rendered, the shipowner is engaged, and his goods contribute to a general average, not according to their weight, but according to their value (a provision perfectly just where all are in equal danger of total loss). Merchandise of bulk and weight so small as to offer no impediment to the raising of a ship, or none that would not yield to a small increase of mechanical power, should be burdened with a principal share of the cost of raising her, although, regard being had to her age, class, previous condition, and present employment, it would be madness on the part of her owners not to incur the expense of raising her so as to enable her to arrive at her destination, earn her freight, and be afterwards useful as a ship. In the case before us, the ship having escaped the danger which necessitated the sacrifice of part of her apparel at sea, and while moored in safety to the pier at Falmouth, was assailed by a hurricane, during the raging of which she foundered. The damage caused by this disaster to ship and cargo was damage by a peril insured against, and chargeable separately to the owners of each by them. No case for contribution between them could arise unless some new sacrifice was made to obviate and avert what, but for such sacrifice, would be the great probability of further disaster to ship and cargo involving the total loss of both of them. Whether the cargo was irreparably damaged by its submersion or not damaged at all, averaged only to the extent of the cost of raising it alone, or of the cost above the value of the ship when raised of raising the cargo with, and in the ship, in danger of absolute total loss, or certain to be recovered in the early and necessary operation of removing the submerged ship from the pier side, is not stated, nor to what extent the freight to be earned by the shipowner was imperilled by the loss, should it prove one, of his ship. With the exception of the fact that the ship had gone down during the sway of exceptional violent winds over waters usually tranquil—in itself a strong prima facie objection to a claim for general average contribution—we are informed of no circumstance which might lead us to the conclusion that such motives for incurring the expense of raising the ship could have existed as might convert what in its nature was a particular average into a general average outlay. Benecke says, in the context of the passage interwoven by Mr. Arnould with his statement of the law on this point, that “if the charges of floating a ship exceed the value which is saved by it to the shipowner, and the measure be deliberately adopted to avoid the losses and expenses to which stranded goods are frequently exposed, the surplus of the charges of floating the ship above the value saved to the shipowner ought to be borne by the cargo;” but that “the charge of floating can in no case be the subject of general average.” The latter part of this passage is more roundly worded than on reference to other passages already cited from his chapter on average it seems probable that he could have intended. I read it as the expression of a general rule, subject to the exceptions which he had before indicated. The rule applies to the facts before us, and there is nothing in them which could, in my judgment, have brought the cost of raising the ship in question within any admissible exception to it. The statement on which we are asked to answer the second question put to us presents, in truth, though the disaster occurred in a place protected from all but extraordinary sea risks, and where appliances for ship’s rescue may be supposed to have been obtained, a case of shipwreck in the event of which, according to Casa Regia, the highest authority on such questions, and according to other authorities whom he cites (Van Leewen and De Vicq, ad tractulum quinti Weyster de Arranes, pl. 45), his and their opinions having been adopted by later writers of nearly equal weight, there is no room for general average contribution. If we were to come to a different conclusion our judgment might be cited in support of the position that the cost of raising a ship submerged in part with cargo of whatever kind on board is always to be made good to the shipowner by a general average, no matter how certain the rescue of the cargo by other means may be, how little damage it will sustain from a short delay, and as respects the ship’s freight how practicable and inexpensive to hire another ship in which to carry that cargo to its destination, that the mere fact, in fine, that the property saved benefits by an act out of the ordinary course of a ship’s service, is alone sufficient to justify the allowance in general average of the loss caused by the act, or by the expense attending it: (see Bailey, p. 10.) Nor does the theory on which such a contention must rest better recommend itself as the story of the disaster proceeds. The ship was raised with the cargo in her, not by the shipowner or the master acting for the common safety of the ship and cargo, but by persons officiously rescuing as salvors, and possessing themselves of the rescued property in the hope of reward from those whom it might eventually concern. The expenses incurred by them were, surely, not general average apportionable between ship, freight, and cargo, of none of which had a sacrifice been made in time of danger for the common safety, and surely were the subject of distinct and separate claims, secured by separate liens on the ship and on the cargo respectively. If the master, in the discharge of his duty to keep the ship and cargo water-borne, had raised the ship, he would have been entitled to no reward for doing so, and could have charged the cargo for no portion of the expense of which it was not the special and particular cause. The ship and cargo having been raised by strangers, they would be entitled to a reward, and would have a lien for it on each of the subjects saved, redeemable by a payment to be assessed on a fair consideration of the skill, money, time, and labour expended upon, and of the value of, each of those subjects. The ingredients of a salvage service, not contracted for or rendered in time of danger, are not the same as if a general average act. The former cannot, after the service done, be converted into the latter by agreement between the salvors and the owners of one of the subjects saved; nor are the charges which attach to the subjects saved apportionable between them on the principle of a general average. If I could feel sure, after reading the judgment of my brother Blackburn, that this view of the second question, as respects the point of general average, was correct, and that we are not bound to assume a general average intention, if such intention might, though we are not informed of it, have existed, it would be unnecessary to consider whether, supposing the cost of raising the ship were the subject of a general average contribution, the share of it chargeable to the cargo ought to be taken into account as an item of deduction in determining whether a constructive total loss had taken place. In my opinion, however, it would not be a proper item of deduction. The subject of insurance had sustained a particular average loss by perils of the sea, the measure of which loss, as between the assured on the ship and his insurers, was the cost, although the cargo may have inadvertently benefited by it (see Watson v. The Marine Insurance Company, 7 Johns. Rep. 57), of raising the ship, and of repairing the ship damage which the accident had occasioned; and that loss, whether partial only or constructively total, fell at once upon the underwriters on the ship. In the latter case nothing that occurred afterwards, the ship being in fact unworthy of the cost of raising and repairing her, and abandonment being totally made, could, as respects them, alter its character, or vary their liability for it. Supposing, however, that the intention with which the outlay, necessitated by the submersion of the ship, was incurred, could transform what was a particular average loss into a general average loss from its inception, or that we were at liberty, regardless of what had already happened (the ship and cargo, as they lie submerged, being in imminent danger of destruction), to consider the resolution to raise the ship as the starting point, and the outlay required for that purpose as a sacrifice by the shipowner for the common safety, in determining whether, as between the assured and the ship, not being also owner of the cargo, and his insurers, a loss constructively total had taken place, the liability of the cargo to contribute to the general average would not be an allowable item in diminution of the estimate of expenses on the amount of which the question of partial only or of constructive total loss would depend. The assured, having sustained a loss of the subject of insurance by the perils insured against, would have a right to look for his indemnity from the person who had engaged to indemnify him, without troubling himself with any remedies over against third parties. He was not bound, on the occurrence of a misfortune involving a loss of the subject insured, so probably total as this must have been considered by Mr. Amos, and appears from the statement before us to have been, to expend his money on the chance of being reimbursed a part of it by a satisfactory adjustment of general average at Rio de Janeiro, should the cargo be safely delivered there out of the crippled ship. He had paid his premium for the option, under such circumstances, of calling upon his insurers to bear that risk of disentangling his capital from the disaster and surrendering to them his ship, they paying him as for a total loss, and all the rights and liabilities attaching to the ownership of it. This seems to me clear on principle and on authority. It has been so decided repeatedly by judges of the highest eminence, and amongst them by Kent and Story in the courts of the United States. There would be no really useful indemnity were it otherwise. If a total loss of the subject of insurance has actually taken place, its insurers must pay its real or agreed value; if a total loss of the subject of insurance has constructively taken place, they must pay its real or agreed value, and make the most of the salvage ceded to them and of the rights against third parties which attach to it. Apart from the question of general average, I cannot think that any share of the cost of raising the ship which the Messrs. Broad or the plt., after the adoption by him of their act, might consider chargeable to the cargo raised in the ship, would be an admissible item of deduction in considering whether a constructive total loss of ship had taken place. The fact that the ship, though a wreck, and the cargo might together be worth the cost of raising them and of repairing the ship, could not, in my judgment, as between her owners and their insurers, operate to make the loss on ship less than total, if the ship separately was not worth the cost of raising and repairing her. The engagement of the underwriter is, that the thing which he insures shall with reasonable repairs and expense, for which he undertakes, should they be rendered necessary by the perils insured against, reach its destination capable of being used as the thing which it was when the risk commenced, or that he will bear the loss of it. His contract is to indemnify the assured against the loss which the subject of insurance shall sustain by the perils insured against; it does not extend to, and is not limited by the loss which the assured shall sustain in consequence of his being the owner of the subject of insurance: (see Reimer v. Ringrose, 6 Ex. 263, and Bailey on Perils of the Sea, 33, 34.) I see nothing in the case of Moss v. Smith inconsistent with this view, but much, by implication, in support of it. A loss on freight was there claimed from the underwriter on freight because the ship had sustained damage, the repair of which, though it would have cost very much less than the value of the ship when repaired, would have cost more than the freight she was in course of earning; to which it was properly answered that the loss contended for was a loss of freight as incident to the ship, and that, the ship being practically repairable, its incident the freight could not be lost. It has none but a remote and distinguishable bearing on a case in which the ship itself by the perils insured against had become unworthy of the cost of raising and repairing her. Apply what Maule, J. and Lord Truro said to ship and cargo instead of ship and freight, and Moss v. Smith will be found to fail at every point as an authority governing this case. No doubt, as Lord Mansfield said in Hamilton v. Mendez, "it is repugnant to a contract of insurance to recover as for a total loss when the final event has determined that the damnification is in truth an average loss;" but Lord Mansfield was there dealing with the case of a single subject, a ship recaptured and safe before action brought; his words are not applicable to the case of two distinct subjects the property of different owners damaged by the same disaster, as to one of which the question is, whether, not being at the time of its abandonment reasonably worth the cost of raising and repairing it, it was then constructively a total loss. On the third question, whether the notice of abandonment was given too late, my opinion under all the circumstances of this case is, that the abandonment on the 9th Dec., the date of the notice given by Messrs. Davies to the deft. was in time. It is enough, if notice of abandonment be given within a reasonable delay; unreasonable or not is a question for a jury, and upon this case for us. My judgment, therefore, upon the whole matter would be for the plt.; but as it does not agree with the judgment of my brother Blackburn, I withdraw it, and judgment will be entered for the deft.

KEMP v. HALLIDAY.

BLACKBURN, J.—It appears from the statement in the case that the ship Chebucto was insured in a valued policy in the ordinary form for 1500*l.*; she sailed with a general cargo on board, and on her voyage sustained damage such as to require repairs. Part of the damage thus incurred was such as to be the subject of general average. The ship put into Falmouth for repairs, and was moored, with part of her cargo on board, the residue being on shore, and the repairs were commenced but not completed. When in this state she was, on the 2nd. Dec., sunk by a peril of the sea, and lay submerged with the portion of the cargo on board. While she lay so submerged, the agent of the assured, Mr. Amos, came to the conclusion, as is stated in paragraph 7 of the case, that to raise and repair the ship would cost more than she was worth. The ship's agents, Messrs. Broad and Sons, were of a different opinion, and acting on their own responsibility, and not as agents of the assured, they did in fact raise the ship with the portion of cargo on board. On the 9th Dec., after Broad and Sons had commenced raising the ship, but before the operation was completed, the assured gave notice of abandonment. The plt. claimed as for a total loss, the underwriters paid money into court as for a partial loss, and it appears to have been agreed between the parties that the payment was sufficient unless the loss was total. It appears also to have been agreed between them that if the fact that there would be a claim for contribution against the cargo on board the submerged vessel, which cargo would be raised by the same operation as raised the hull, and which would be saved along with the hull, was to be taken into account, there was no total loss. And it seems also to have been agreed between the parties, that if the fact that part of the sea damage which necessitated the repairs was the subject of general average was to be taken into account, there was no total loss. But it seems to have been contended by the underwriters, that even if both these facts were to be discarded as immaterial, the circumstances were not such as to constitute what is called a constructive total loss. The arrangement made at the trial appears to have been, that the opinion of the jury should be taken on this disputed question of fact, and that, subject to their finding, the case should be reserved for the court. The case is by no means clearly stated; but I think that what I have stated above is the effect of the statement in paragraph 10, that the learned judge left to the jury the question whether there was a constructive total loss at the time when the vessel was submerged, and the assured's agent determined not to raise her, or after she was raised, and the jury found both these questions in favour of the plt.; but, in putting these questions to the jury, no account was taken of any liability on the part of the cargo or freight to contribute in general average towards the expenses of raising the vessel, or towards the general average loss at sea, and it is to be taken as a fact, that if such liability for either loss ought to have been taken into calculation, and the estimate of the cost of raising and repairing ought to have been reduced by the amount of general average to be so contributed, then that there was not a constructive total loss. Some questions are raised as to the effect of the lateness of the notice of abandonment, on which it is unnecessary to come to any determination, as I conclude that on this statement there never was such a state of things as could amount to a total loss, whatever notice of abandonment was given. In coming to this conclusion I do not regard the general average incurred at sea, but proceed entirely on the ground that, as I understand the statement in the case, the cost of raising the submerged ship and cargo, though it would have been excessive, having regard to the value of the unrepaired ship alone, was reasonable, having regard to the value of the ship and cargo and freight, which were jointly saved by this expenditure from a common jeopardy. The case contains a statement of the value of the submerged cargo, which in fact was raised by the same operation as raised the hull; but as it states neither the value of the hull itself, nor the cost of raising it, this statement is valueless. I will suppose a state of figures to illustrate what I understand to be meant by the statement in the case. Let us suppose the expense of raising the ship with the portion of her cargo on board to have been 600*l.*; that the further repairs necessary would be 700*l.*; that the value of the ship when repaired would be 1200*l.*, and that the value of the portion of the cargo raised and saved along with the ship is 1500*l.* I leave out the freight, which would only complicate the statement without altering the principle. Now, inasmuch as the value of the portion of cargo saved is on these figures three times the value of the unrepaired hull, and the two were saved by the expenditure of 600*l.*; if that 600*l.* is to be charged as general average against the ship and the portion of cargo saved, 150*l.* would be chargeable to the ship, and 450*l.* against the portion of cargo saved by this expenditure. Now, it is plain that on this state of figures, if the fact that cargo was on board is disregarded, there was a total loss, for in that view a ship worth 1200*l.* would cost 600*l.* to raise her and 700*l.* to repair her, together 1300*l.*, which is more than she is worth; but if the fact that cargo is there which would be saved and contribute to the expense of raising is taken into account, there is no total loss, for it would then stand that a ship worth 1200*l.*, and a cargo worth 1500*l.*, together 2700*l.*, would be saved by the expenditure of 1300*l.*, of which 450*l.* would be separately chargeable to the cargo, and 850*l.* separately chargeable to the ship. Whether, therefore, the ship and cargo were considered together or separately, they would be well worth the expenditure required to rescue them from loss. It is on construing the statement in the case, as submitting one similar in principle to that which would arise on the figures I have given, that I come to the conclusion that the deft. is entitled to judgment; and after having carefully considered my brother Shee's reasons for the opposite opinion, I still think so, for the following reasons: It is first necessary to consider whether, if the shipowner had in this case raised the ship and cargo as Messrs. Broad and Sons did, they would have been entitled to charge that expense as general average against the portion of the cargo raised by its expenditure as well as against the hull. In order to give rise to a charge as general average, it is essential that there should be a voluntary sacrifice to preserve more subjects than one exposed to a common jeopardy; but an extra expenditure incurred for that purpose is as much a sacrifice as if, instead of money being expended for the purpose, money's worth were thrown away. It is immaterial whether the shipowner sacrifices a cable or an anchor to get the ship off a shoal, or pays the worth of it to hire those extra services which get her off. It is quite true that, so long as the expenditure by the shipowner is merely such as he should incur in the fulfilment of his ordinary duty as shipowner, it cannot be general average; but the expenditure in raising a submerged vessel and cargo on board is extraordinary expenditure, and if incurred to save the cargo as well as the ship (which prima facie is the object of such an expenditure) is chargeable against all the subjects in jeopardy saved by this expenditure. In the last edition of Arnould on Insurance, vol. 2, p. 932, sect. 340, it is said: "A stranded vessel is in most cases in danger of being lost, unless speedy steps are taken for her preservation, either by unloading the cargo to lighten her, or by endeavouring to float her by means of buoys, &c., with the cargo in her. The remuneration which the shipowner is obliged to pay for the service thus rendered gives a claim to general average contribution, provided such service shall appear to have been incurred for the joint benefit of ship and cargo, which will be the case if ship and cargo are both exposed to a common danger, and both saved from it by the exertions employed for their rescue. This, I apprehend, is a perfectly accurate statement of the law. In the present case, the greater part of the cargo was on shore and safe before the ship was submerged; but the extraordinary expenditure necessary to save the ship and the portion of the cargo on board would have been chargeable as general average against them, though not against the part that was safe: (Morgan v. Jones, 7 Ell. & Bl. 523.) I do not mean to say that in every case where a ship with cargo aboard is submerged, and the two are in fact raised together by one operation, the expenditure incurred would necessarily be for the common preservation of both. I think it is in every case a question of fact whether it was so, and if the cargo could be easily and cheaply taken out of the ship and saved by itself, it would not be proper to charge it with any portion of the joint operation which in that case would not be incurred for the preservation of the cargo. But it must be rather an exceptional case in which, where a vessel lies under twenty feet of water at low tide, the cargo can be easily, or indeed at all, taken out of her hold without either raising the ship with the cargo or destroying the hull for the purpose of getting the cargo out. If the contention of the assured at the trial had been that such an exceptional course was in this case practicable and the proper one, the question would have been left to the jury or the facts agreed upon, so that we might draw the proper inference of fact from them. Instead of doing so, the only fact bearing on the question is, that Messrs. Broad and Sons did in fact raise the ship with the cargo on board. As they could have no interest except to save the imperilled subjects in the proper way, so that they might be entitled to charge their outlay against them as salvage, I think the inference to be drawn from this fact is, that the mode adopted was the proper one, and I should, if necessary, draw that inference. But I think, from the way the case is stated, that it appears to have been agreed between the parties that the expense of raising the ship and cargo was in fact general average, and as such chargeable in fact on the cargo if in law it could be so. I shall now proceed to consider the question whether the circumstances that the expense of raising the ship and cargo would be partly borne by the cargo, ought to have been taken into consideration in determining whether there was what is commonly called a constructive total loss. A contract of marine insurance is a contract to indemnify against loss by certain perils, and if the subject-matter of the insurance is totally lost in consequence of those perils, the assured is entitled to recover as for a total loss; if it is only partially lost, the assured is only entitled to recover for a partial loss. It frequently happens that by the perils insured against the subject-matter of the insurance is so far damaged that it cannot be preserved without outlay on repairs or other ways, but may be preserved by such outlay, or that it is, by perils insured against, taken out of the possession of the assured, but that they can recover the possession by exertions and expenditure; or it may be, as in the present case, that both facts exist—the subject-matter is taken out of the possession of the assured and sunk in a damaged state, but can by expenditure be raised, and then can by further expenditure be repaired. In all such cases the assured may, if he pleases, elect to incur the expenditure, and save the subject-matter, and in that case it will be a partial loss only, or he may offer to abandon the whole to the underwriters, and if they accept the abandonment it will be a total loss, the underwriters being subrogated for the assured, and entitled to all salvage and every other right of the assured. Or lastly, the circumstances may be such that, though the underwriters refuse to accept the abandonment, the assured may elect to treat it as a total loss, and force them to indemnify them for it as such, in which case, on principles of equity, not confined to marine insurance, they are subrogated for him whom they have indemnified, and have all his rights: (see Randall v. Cochrane, 1 Ves. 98; and Yeates v. Whyte, 4 N. C. 275.) If it were possible to work out the insurance so as to make it in practice a perfect indemnity, it would be the same thing in the pecuniary result whether the assured repaired or was taken to have abandoned the subject-matter; but it is not possible so to work it out, and in general it is for the benefit of the assured to treat a loss as total, and this is peculiarly the case where the policy is a valued one. It, therefore, becomes a very important subject of inquiry, under what circumstances the assured has a right against the will of the insurers to treat the loss as total. Up to the present point I believe there is no difference in the principles on which the law of insurance is administered in this and in foreign countries, and the decisions of foreign jurists are entitled to great weight. Many of those authorities cited by my brother Stice are authorities in support of the position I have laid down; I do not think it necessary to examine or cite them at length, as those principles are not now in controversy between us. But, on the part of the case which I am proceeding to argue, there is a fundamental difference between the law of insurance as administered in America and as administered in England. In America, if the subject-matter of insurance sustained damage to an extent beyond 50 per cent., the assured may abandon and recover as for a total loss. This is an implied part of the American contract, and, unless there be something express which excludes this implication, the assured has this right, and that right depends on the state of things when the abandonment was given, and is not altered by any subsequent change in the state of things. But this is not the English law. In 2 Phillips on Insurance, sect. 1536, it is said: "This rule of abandonment on account of loss over 50 per cent. of the value of the subject makes the most material difference between the American and the

KEMP v. HALLIDAY.

KEMP v. HALLIDAY.

[Q. B.]

English jurisprudence relative to total loss and abandonment, and is to be kept in mind in examining the decisions of the tribunals of the two countries. It extends equally to ship, cargo, and freight. This rule and the rule in the United States, whereby the validity of the abandonment is tested by the circumstances existing at the time of making it, instead of the time of bringing the suit, as in England, give a wider range to constructive total loss and abandonment in the United States, and consequently an increased liability of underwriters for loss by the agents who have charge of the insured subject." I do not think that any American case based on principles so different from ours are authorities in an English case. I shall, therefore, with great deference to my brother Shee, who relies upon several cases in the United States, refrain from examining them, and rely only on the English decisions. It is now finally settled in England by the decision of the H. of L., in Irving v. Manning, "that the question of loss, whether total or not, is to be determined just as if there were no policy at all." If the subject-matter is by the underwriter's perils in such a situation that, supposing there was no policy, it would be totally lost to its owner, then, as between the assured and the underwriter, there is a total loss, not otherwise. And the question whether the thing is lost to the owner is to be treated in a practical business-like spirit, and if the owners cannot by any means which they or their representative the captain can reasonably use be saved, then it is totally lost; but if by any reasonable means which were reasonably within their reach they might redeem the subject-matter and do not do so, the total loss is not attributable to the perils which cast the subject-matter of insurance into that position, but to the neglect of the owner to take those reasonable means. If they do not take those means they cannot make the loss total by their own neglect: (see Thorley v. Hobson, as explained by Lord Tenterden in Perry v. Aberdeen, 9 B. & C. 417.) "The duty of the master, in case of damage to the ship, is to do all that can be done towards bringing the adventure to a successful termination to repair the ship if there be reasonable prospect of doing so, at an expense not ruinous, and to bring him the cargo, and earn the freight if possible:" (see Benson v. Chapman, 2 H. of L. Cas. 720.) The underwriters do not, by their contract, engage to indemnify against the consequences of his neglect to perform that duty. The question, however, whether it is possible must be understood in the sense in which it is explained by Maule, J., in Moss v. Smith: "In matters of business a thing is said to be impossible when it is not practicable, and a thing is not practicable when it can only be done at an excessive or unreasonable cost. A man may be said to have lost a shilling when he has dropped it into deep water, though it may be possible by some very expensive contrivance to recover it." I may add, to complete the illustration, that a diamond of great value would not be totally lost if dropped into water from whence it would cost 10*l.* to recover it, though a shilling in the same position would be totally lost. When a ship, or other subject-matter of insurance, is in such a condition that it can be saved, but only by an excessive expenditure, the assured may undoubtedly, at least if they give notice of abandonment in due time, treat it as a total loss, and recover for it as such. In Knight v. Forth, Lord Campbell expressed a strong opinion that it was essential that there should be such a notice, and that the owner of the shilling at the bottom of the well could not, without what would in his case be an idle ceremony, recover as for a total loss. If it were necessary for the decision of this case to determine the point, my doubt would be, whether

I was not bound in a court below to follow that as the latest decision, and to reserve for a court of error the question whether he was right in that opinion; but it is unnecessary to come to any determination on this point, for all the English authorities agree that unless the circumstances are such as to make that loss total within the principle expounded by Maule, J., in Moss v. Smith, no notice of abandonment can make it so, and also that even if the circumstances were such that at the time the notice of abandonment was given it was justified, yet if by subsequent events before action brought the plt. might by reasonable means obtain the thing, he can only recover for a partial loss. As was said by Holroyd, J., in Brotherton v. Barbe, 5 M. & Sel. 426: "Abandonment has its origin from the contract of indemnity. But it is apparent that if the assured might abandon at his pleasure he might be a gainer to a much greater extent than the value of the loss, which is inconsistent with a contract of indemnity. . . . as events have made it at the time when the action was brought it is but a partial loss." As also Naylor v. Taylor, 9 B. & C. 724. The question whether it is practicable to save the subject-matter within the meaning of the phrase, as explained by Maule, J. in Moss v. Smith, has been differently left to the jury. In Gardiner v. Salvador, 1 Moo. & Rob., Bailey, J. left it to the jury to say whether, "by means within the reach of the captain, which he could reasonably use," the ship could be saved. The mode of putting the question generally adopted has been to ask, "whether a prudent, uninsured owner would have done it." In Rosetto v. Gurney, 11 C. B. Rep., the Court, approving what had been said by Maule, J., in Moss v. Smith, states the rule thus: "If the damage is repairable, the loss is total or partial according to circumstances. If the damage cannot be repaired without laying out more money than the thing is worth, the reparation is impracticable, and therefore, as between the underwriters and the assured, impossible." The three modes of expression all seem to me to convey the same idea. No means which would cost more than the object is worth can be considered reasonable, and a prudent uninsured owner would not adopt them. But if the means within his reach would cost less than the object is worth, a prudent uninsured owner would adopt them rather than suffer the thing to perish, though a prudent insured owner, especially if insured in a valued policy, would probably act otherwise, if the law permitted him, by doing so, to recover from the underwriters for a total loss. I should observe that I think, in the present case, the questions whether there was a total loss at the time when the ship lay submerged, and that whether there was a total loss when she lay moored at Falmouth in the custody of Messrs. Broad and Sons, are identically the same. Whilst the ship lay submerged it was a question of calculation what the cost of raising her would be, but for the trial Messrs. Broad and Sons had by experiment ascertained what it was, and the assured could have got their ship by adopting their act, and then the assured would have been exactly in the same position as if they had themselves originally raised her. In considering whether it was reasonable to raise the ship and cargo in the present case, I think that every circumstance tending to increase or diminish the necessary outlay, and every circumstance tending to increase or diminish the benefit to be derived from that outlay, ought to be taken into account, and amongst those the fact that the cargo would be saved by the operation, and would contribute to the expense, seems to me a very important element. The shipowner is not asked to advance money for the benefit of strangers on the security of their property; he is the authorised agent of the owners of the cargo, having the custody of it, and bound to save it if he can. It was contended, on the argument, that in considering whether the subject-matter of insurance was totally lost, we were bound to look to it, and to it alone, so that in the conceivable case of a ship worth say 1500*l.* being in peril with cargo on board also worth 1500*l.*, which could be saved together by the expenditure of 2000*l.* in one operation, the assured was entitled to consider both as totally lost, because neither singly was worth that sum which would save the two. If a long series of decisions had established this we could not help it, but in truth from the time of Lord Mansfield it has been an established rule in insurance law that if the thing in fact was safe, no artificial reasoning shall be allowed to set up a total loss (see Hamilton v. Mander); and the only case in which a point like this was ever attempted to be set up was Moss v. Smith. In that case the attempt totally failed. Maule, J. explained the law in a manner, to me, perfectly satisfactory, and what I have written is in truth but an attempt to adapt his reasoning to the present case. Lord Truro, in the same case, said: "We are asked, would any man in his senses spend 1000*l.* on the repair of a ship for the mere purpose of earning 500*l.* freight? To this I answer, certainly not. But this is not the true question. If by expending 1000*l.* on repairs he gets not only 500*l.*, but also a ship worth 3000*l.*, who will for a moment question the prudence of the outlay?" This is an authority, as it seems to me, precisely in point, and agreeing with it as I do in principle, I think our judgment should be for the debt. I need hardly say that I should not adhere to this opinion against that of my brother Stree, unless upon consideration I entertained it decidedly: but I should regret much if my decision were to be final; but that, however, is fortunately not so. This court being equally divided, there would be no judgment unless one of the judges withdrew his opinion in order that the case might go into error. It is the practice for the junior judge in such a case to withdraw his judgment, and owing to the accident of my brother Stree being junior to myself, the judgment will be entered for the debt, leaving the plt. to appeal.

Judgment for debt.

COURT OF COMMON PLEAS.

Reported by W. MAYN and W. GRHAM, Esqrs.
Barristers-at-Law.

WILSON AND OTHERS v. THE LONDON, ITALIAN, AND ADRIATIC STEAM NAVIGATION COMPANY.Merchant Shipping Amendment Act (26 Vict. c. 63), s. 7
—Delivery on wharf instead of to consignee.

By sect. 67 of the Merchant Shipping Amendment Act, where the owner of imported goods fails to make entry, or having made entry, to take delivery, by the times therein mentioned, the shipowner may make entry and land the goods at the times, and in the manner, and subject to the conditions therein expressed:

- (1.) "If a time for the delivery of the goods is expressed in the charter-party, bill of lading, or agreement, then at any time after the time so expressed."
- (2.) "If at any time before the goods are landed or unshipped the owner of the goods is ready and offers to land or take delivery of the same, he shall be allowed to so do, and his entry shall, in such case, be preferred to any entry which may have been made by the shipowner."

In a bill of lading it was provided that simultaneously with the ship being ready to unload the goods, or any part thereof, the consignee was to be ready to receive them from the ship's side, either at the wharf where the ship was discharging, or into lighters, and in default thereof, the master might land the goods at the risk and expense of the consignee. The vessel having arrived in London, the shipowner, the consignee not being ready with his lighters, began to land and had landed at the wharf fifteen casks of lemon-juice out of sixty-five, when the consignee applied for the delivery of the remainder into his lighters, but the shipowner refused to comply with his request, alleging that he had a right to land the whole number on the wharf:

Held, that, as the shipowner would incur no loss by delivering the fifty casks into the lighters, consignee, both under the Act and the bill of lading, was entitled to recover from him the warehouse charges which he had to pay for the delivery of the goods at the wharf.

Declaration:

That the plt. were owners of sixty-five pipes of lemon-juice within the meaning of the Merchant Shipping Act 1852, and entitled to the possession thereof, that the said goods were imported in the defts.' ship Adria; that before they were unshipped the plt. made entry of them at Wilson's wharf, which was not the wharf at which the ship was unloading, and were entitled and ready and offered to take delivery, of all which the defts. had notice, and that all conditions precedent were fulfilled to entitle the plt. to such delivery.

Breach, that the defts. would not allow them so to do, but landed the goods at Fresh Wharf, by reason whereof, &c.

Count in trover and money counts for demurrage of lighters, &c.

The fourth and fifth pleas set out a clause in a bill of lading and justified the landing of the goods under it, on the ground that the plt. were not ready to take delivery at the time expressed therein.

The facts of the case were as follows:—The plt. were wharfingers carrying on business at Wilson's wharf, Southwark, and were indorsees of two bills of lading for sixty-five pipes of lemon-juice shipped at Messina on board the defts.' ship Adria for London. The Adria was one of the swift steamers running between certain ports in the Mediterranean and London, with cargoes of fruit and other perishable goods; and as speed and dispatch are of so great importance to these vessels, it is the custom, when they once begin discharging in the port of London, to go on with it continuously, night and day, till it is finished.

The Adria reached London with the lemon-juice in question, about 12.30 p.m., on the 23rd March, and having passed her entry at the Custom-house, and also made her entry outwards, proceeded to a fresh wharf to discharge her cargo. In the afternoon of the same day, between four and five o'clock, the plt. passed the entry of their pipes of lemon-juice, at the Custom-house, for Wilson's wharf, and got a Custom-house order for their delivery and the freight release. Up to this time the plt. had done all that was necessary to entitle them on application to have the goods delivered into their lighters. In the afternoon of the same day the Adria began to discharge her cargo, and continued doing so all night. At about eight o'clock the next morning, the lighterman who had been employed by the plt. to receive the pipes of lemon-juice, came to the Adria and inquired of the ship's worker when they would be ready to deliver the plt.'s goods, and was then informed that seven or eight of the pipes had already been landed at the wharf, and that he should not wait for craft, but keep on discharging the remainder. The lighterman, who had not got his lighters with him, went away and returned with them and his men about nine o'clock, at which time fifteen pipes of the lemon-juice had been discharged. The lighterman, upon coming alongside, tendered the warehouse charges on the fifteen, which had been landed, and at the same time claimed to have the remaining fifty pipes delivered on to his lighters; this the ship's worker refused, and declared that he would not knock off the men and stop the ship. The whole of the sixty-five pipes were therefore landed at the wharf, and consequently the pits. had to pay the warehouse charges before they could obtain possession of them, and the present action was brought to recover the charges on the last fifty pipes, the defts. contending that after they had once discharged any of the pipes at the wharf, they had a right to go on discharging until they had landed the whole.

The material clause in the bill of lading was as follows.

Simultaneously with the ship being ready to unload the above-mentioned goods, or any part thereof, the consignee of the said goods is hereby bound to be ready to receive the same from the ship's side either on the wharf or quay at which the ship may lie for discharge or into lighters provided with a sufficient number of men to receive and stow the said goods thereon, and in default thereof the master or agent of the ship is hereby authorised to enter the said goods at the Custom-house, and land, warehouse, or place them in lighters, at the risk and expense of the said consignee of the goods after they leave the deck of the ship.

Although the pipes were under two bills of lading, and bore different marks accordingly, none of both marks were included in the fifteen that were first landed, and accordingly the whole sixty-five pipes were taken at the trial to constitute only one lot. The 25 & 26 Vict. c. 63 (the Merchant Shipping Amendment Act), s. 67, provides that

Where the owner of any goods imported in any ship from foreign parts into the United Kingdom fails to make entry thereof, or having made entry thereof to land the same or take delivery thereof, and to proceed therein with all convenient speed, by the times severally hereinafter mentioned, the shipowner may make entry of and land or unship the said goods at the times in the manner, and subject to the conditions following (that is to say)

1. If a time for the delivery of the goods is expressed in the charter-party, bill of lading, or agreement, then at any time after the time so expressed.

2. If no time for the delivery of the goods is expressed in the charter-party, bill of lading, or agreement, then at any time after the expiration of seventy-two hours, exclusive of a Sunday or holiday after the report of the ship.

3. If at any time before the goods are landed or unshipped the owner of the goods is ready and offers to land or take delivery of the same, he shall be allowed so to do, and his entry shall in such case be preferred to any entry which may have been made by the shipowner.

4. If at any time before the goods are landed or unshipped the owner thereof has made entry for the landing and warehousing thereof at any particular wharf or warehouse other than that at which the ship is discharging, and has offered and been ready to take delivery thereof, and the shipowner has failed to make such delivery, and has also failed at the time of such offer to give the owner of the goods correct information of the time at which such goods can be delivered, then the shipowner shall, before landing or unshipping such goods with the power hereby given to him, give to the owner of the goods or of such wharf or warehouse as last aforesaid, twenty-four hours' notice in writing of his readiness to deliver the goods, and shall, if he land or unships the same without such notice, do so at his own risk and expense.

A verdict was found for the pits. for 12*l.* odd.

Watkin Williams having obtained a rule to set it aside and enter it for the defts. or for a nonsuit, pursuant to leave reserved, on the ground that as the pits were not ready to take delivery of the goods at the commencement of the discharge, the defts. were entitled to deliver all the goods at the wharf, Hewson, Q.C. and F. M. White now showed cause, and contended that, as the bill of lading did not mention any express time for delivery, the proper time was that at which the consignee was ready to receive. That even if any time had been expressed the consignees were protected by the 6th condition, the true meaning of which is, that if the owner was ready to take delivery before the whole was discharged, he had a right to do so; and that, independently of the Merchant Shipping Act, the consignee were entitled to have the goods delivered into the lighters. They referred to Berresford v. Montgomery, 17 C. D., N. S., 373.

Watkin Williams in support of the rule.—The fixing the time for the delivery of the goods is for the protection of the shipowner, but there is no corresponding protection for the consignee, neither does he want it. The delivery of the goods means the delivery of the whole lot; and if the consignee is not ready with his lighters at the time the captain is ready to discharge the cargo, it is his own fault. Here the consignee was not ready with his lighters, and the fact of his getting his lighters alongside after part of the goods had been landed was not being ready; and the question which the parties really wish to be decided is as to whether the shipowner is bound under the circumstances to cease landing at the wharf, and to put the goods on board the lighters.

ERLE, C. J.—I am of opinion that this rule should be discharged. The question turns upon the construction of a contract under the following clause in a bill of lading: "Simultaneously with the ship being ready to unload the above-mentioned goods or any part thereof, the consignee of the said goods is hereby bound to be ready to receive the same from the ship's side, either on the wharf or quay at which the ship may lie for discharge or into lighters provided with a sufficient number of men to receive them; and in default thereof the master or agent of the ship is hereby authorised to enter the said goods at the Custom-house, and land, warehouse, or place them in lighters at the risk and expense of the consignee of the goods after they leave the deck of the ship." Under this bill of lading sixty-five pipes of lemon juice were shipped, and in due course arrived in London. The ship was ready to deliver them on the 24th March, before the lighters of the consignee had arrived alongside the ship, and she had landed fifteen pipes before they came. At that time there remained fifty pipes to be landed. The consignee then demanded the delivery of the remainder of the pipes into their lighters upon such terms as would not have put the shipowner to any additional expense. This, however, he refused on the ground that, if he were ready to unload any part of the goods before the consignees were ready to receive, he had a right to unload the whole and make the consignees pay the cost of warehousing. I consider that was not the intention of the parties; what they did intend was, that if no damage would accrue to the shipowner the contract should be divisible. The same question arises under the Merchant Shipping Act, sect. 67, condition No. 5, which says, that if at any time before the goods are landed or unshipped the owner of the goods is ready and offers to land or take delivery of the same, he shall be allowed so to do. Now, so far as I can see, with the qualification I have mentioned, the consignee is entitled to receive the goods which had not been landed, as he could do so without any more damage to the shipowner than if he had been ready at the first to receive the whole.

WILLER, J.—I am of the same opinion. I will content myself by putting two illustrations of the alternative which would follow if the Act were construed otherwise. In this case the pipes of lemon-juice all belonged to the same person, but suppose that the first fifteen had belonged to A. and the remaining fifty to B., and that A. was not ready, and consequently the fifteen pipes were landed, but none of B.'s. Has the shipowner a right to land B.'s, and is he to suffer because of A.'s default, with which he had nothing to do? Again, suppose that fourteen out of the fifteen only belonged to A., so that one belonging to B. was put on shore with them, and B. comes and demands the forty-nine, is he not to have them delivered to him? Surely an Act of Parliament dealing with a matter of business would not bring about such an absurdity. As to the construction of the bill of lading, the authority given by it to the master is, as pointed out by my brother Keating, intended to be divisible, as it speaks of the above-mentioned goods or any part thereof. I further agree with my Lord Chief Justice that, if the shipowner had acted in such a way as to incur expense or loss of time, it might be said that this case fell within the principle, that authority once given and acted upon to the damage of the person acting is irrevocable. The case of Blasco v. Fletcher, 14 C. B. 147, illustrates this. There a ship was chartered from Liverpool to the Havannah, but on her voyage was wrecked on the coast of Ireland. The charterer went to the place to represent the shippers, and was told by the master to do what he thought best for the interest of the owners of the ship. He took as much of the cargo as could be restored to a merchantable condition to Liverpool, and there sold it. The shipowners afterwards revoked the authority of the charterer, but, he having acted on the authority, and thereby incurred expense, before it was countermanded, it was held that the authority could not be revoked.

KEATING, J.—I am of the same opinion, both with respect to the construction of the contract and of the Merchant Shipping Act. In truth, to come to a contrary opinion would be absurd, and would work great injustice. The shipowner says, "Because I have landed fifteen pipes, I claim a right to land the remainder, not because I have sustained any loss, but it being as easy to do one as the other, I can do which I please."

Rule discharged.

COURT OF EXCHEQUER.

Reported by H. LEIGH and E. LUMLEY, Esqrs, Barristers-at-Law.

Wednesday, May 31, 1865.

PRIESTLEY v. FERNIE AND OTHERS.

Shipping—Principal and agent—Right to maintain separate actions for the same cause against master of a vessel, and owner.

The master of a vessel who as such had signed a bill of lading, was sued upon it to judgment; he was afterwards arrested thereon under a ca. sa., and subsequently obtained his discharge as a bankrupt. The owner of the vessel was then sued in respect of the same cause of action:

Held, that the second action was not maintainable; the liability of the master of a ship acting for his owners, and their liability where he acts for them, is not different from the liabilities in ordinary cases of principal and agent.

Where an agent having made a contract in his own name has been sued on it to judgment, no second action is maintainable against the principal.

This was an action brought by the plt. as secretary of the Melbourne Gas Company, against defts., the shipowners, on a bill of lading, for not delivering certain goods. The plt. had sued the master in Melbourne and recovered judgment against him, but obtained no satisfaction of the debt., as the master, who had been arrested upon the plt.'s judgment, received his discharge through the Court of Bankruptcy. The plt. now sought to make the owners of the vessel liable.

The declaration alleged that Daniel Kavanagh, master of the vessel called the Queen of Commerce, for a voyage of the vessel from the port of Liverpool to Hudson's Bay, Port Phillip, signed the following bill of lading:

Shipped in good order and condition, except chips and sand-cracks, by Edmund Thompson, &c., agents for Harper and Moore, in and upon the good ship or vessel called the Queen of Commerce, whereof Kavanagh is master for this present voyage, and now lying in the port of Liverpool and bound to Hudson's Bay, Port Phillip, 264 retorts, being marked and numbered, and enumerated as per margin, and are to be delivered in the like order and condition, except chips and sand-cracks, or breakage arising from any cause, save improper stowage, and subject to the undermentioned clauses, from the ship's tackle, at the aforesaid Hudson's Bay or railway pier (all and every the dangers and accidents of the seas, fire, and navigation of whatsoever nature or kind excepted), unto the Melbourne Gas Company, or to their assigns, freight for the said goods being payable in Melbourne as per margin, with primage and average accustomed. In witness whereof the master of the said ship or vessel hath affirmed to three bills of lading, all of this tenor and date, one of which bills being accomplished the rest to stand void.

Weight, contents, and value unknown, and not answerable for breakage arising from any cause except the improper stowage, nor for loss by fire, vermin, or collision. Goods for the bay or railway pier, if not taken from alongside within three days after ship's arrival, may be landed by ship's agents, and all expenses to be paid before delivery; all risk of river craft and lighterage to be borne by the shippers.

Entries to be passed by consignees within twenty-four hours after arrival of ship, or ship's agent to do so at consignee's expense.—Dated in Liverpool, 24th Nov. 1860.

DANIEL KAVANAGH.

Printed across the bill of lading was, "Freight, if payable in Liverpool, to be paid in cash on signing bills of lading. Freight, if payable abroad, to be paid in cash before delivery of goods to charterer's agents, Messrs. Swire Brothers."

In the margin of the bill of lading the goods and freight and the primage are thus described:

264 retorts, weighing 86 tons 12 cwt., at
55s. per ton.....	£238 3 0
Primage, 10 per cent	23 16 3
	£261 19 3

And the company by their agents in that behalf shipped and delivered such goods as are specified in the said bill of lading to the defts., and they accepted and received of and from the said company the same on board the said vessel in such order and condition as are mentioned in the said bill of lading, to be by defts. conveyed in the said vessel to such place and for such purpose and subject to such terms and conditions as are in the said bill stated and contained; and the vessel completed the voyage, and everything has been done and happened, and all times elapsed requisite to enable the said company to have all the said terms observed and performed, and the goods delivered to the company at the place in the said bill of lading specified, and in the order and condition contracted for, and to entitle the plt. suing as aforesaid to recover in this action in respect of the matters in this count stated; yet defts., although not prevented by the said excepted dangers, accidents, causes, matters, or things, or any of them, failed to deliver the said goods to the said company in the order and condition contracted for, and wholly failed to deliver part of the said goods to the said company, and have delivered part of the said goods not in the order and condition contracted for, but in bad order and condition and damaged otherwise than in any of the said excepted particulars, and otherwise than by or through the said excepted dangers or accidents, causes, matters, and things, or any of them, and thereby the said company have lost the said goods not so delivered, and the said goods so delivered have become of less value to the said company.

Fifth plea:

That the plt., as such secretary as in the declaration alleged, and on behalf of the said company heretofore in the Supreme Court of Melbourne, in the colony of Victoria, then having jurisdiction in that behalf, impleaded the said Daniel Kavanagh, in the declaration mentioned as and being the master of the said ship, and signing the said bill of lading in the same identical causes of action as in the declaration alleged, and such proceedings were thereupon had in the said court; that the plt., as such secretary, recovered against the said Daniel Kavanagh 140*l.* 3*s.* for the said cause of action, and his costs of suit in that behalf, and afterwards the plt., as such secretary as aforesaid, and on behalf of the said company, in the Court of Ex. of Pleas at Westminster impounded the said Daniel Kavanagh (or and in respect of and upon the said judgment so recovered as aforesaid, and such proceedings were thereupon had in that action that the plt. afterwards, by the judgment of the said last-mentioned court, recovered against the said Daniel Kavanagh 20*l.* 10*s.* 10*d.*, and his costs of suit in that behalf, and after the recovery of the said last-mentioned judgment, the plt. for having satisfaction thereof caused to be duly issued out of the said Court of Ex. of Pleas, a writ of ca. sa. upon the said judgment, and by virtue of which the said D. Kavanagh was before this suit daily taken in execution as the suit of the plt. and was kept and detained in custody to satisfy the plt. in the said action, and that they are being used in this action in respect of the said D. Kavanagh having signed the said bill of lading as master of the said ship on behalf of the defts. as owners thereof, and that they are not otherwise liable in this action.

[Ex.]

Demurrer to the fifth plea and joinder in demurrer.

Second replication to the fifth plea:

That the said D. K. being a prisoner under the said writ became bankrupt within the meaning of the statute in force concerning bankrupts, and thereupon was discharged from custody under the said writ of ca. sa. without the consent of the plt. by act of law, under and by virtue of the statute then in force relating to bankrupts, and that such proceedings were had in the matter of the said bankruptcy that the said D. K. afterwards and before this suit duly obtained an order of discharge under the said statute, and was thereby discharged of and from the said judgments and each of them, and the said judgments are and each of them is wholly unsatisfied, and the plt. had not at any time before the recovery of the said judgment in the said Court of Ex. or before the said D. K. obtained his order of discharge as aforesaid, notice or knowledge that the said bill of lading and contract were made by the defts. or any of them.

Demurrer thereto, and rejoinder:

That after the said D. K. became and was bankrupt, so in the said second replication mentioned, and before the commencement of this suit, the plt. was admitted to prove and proved in respect of the said judgment so recovered in the said Court of Ex. as aforesaid, against the estate of the said D. K. under the said bankruptcy, for the amount due upon the said judgment.

The plt.'s points for argument were:—1. That the circumstance that an unproductive judgment had been recovered against an agent, was no legal reason why the plt. should not recover against the principal. 2. It was not shown that the defts. were in any way affected or prejudiced by the judgment.

Defts.' points for argument were:—1. That plt., by suing Kavanagh, the master, in the Supreme Court of Melbourne, and afterwards suing him in this court, upon the judgment obtained at Melbourne, had precluded himself from suing defts. in respect of the same matter. 2. That the taking of Kavanagh in execution upon the judgment obtained here was a satisfaction of the claim. 3. That it made no matter that Kavanagh was discharged from custody under the proceedings in bankruptcy. 4. That the plt., having elected to take the benefit of the bankruptcy proceedings, had lost all remedy both as against Kavanagh and the defts. 5. That if the plt. was entitled to sue the defts., defts. would have their remedy over against Kavanagh, who might thus have been twice sued in respect of the same cause of action. 6. That the plt., having elected to proceed against Kavanagh, could not also recover against the defts.

Quia, for the plt., in support of the demurrer to the plea, said that the action had been brought against the master as agent, the plt. at that time not knowing who was the principal. There was no doubt that it was the defts.' contract. There had been no release, nor payment, nor satisfaction, nothing in fact to discharge the defts. from their liability. The case was wholly different from that of a partnership where a man proceeding against one partner absolved the other from liability. Here the agent had been sued, and no satisfaction obtained for the claim, and the fact of the agent having been sued did not prevent the plt. from proceeding against the principal. He referred to Story on Agency, s. 295, as an express authority against the plea:

Thompson v. Donaghy, 9 B. & C. 78;
3 Kent's Com. 161, were also cited.

R. G. Williams (Appointed with him), for the defts., contended that as the plt. had made his election and recovered judgment, he was bound by what he had done, and the plea was an answer to the present action.

Abbott on Shipping, p. 124, 8th edit., was referred to.

Quia in reply.

Cur. adv. vult.

June 23.—BRAEWELL, B. delivered judgment.—This is the opinion of my Lord Chief Baron, my brother Channell, and myself; my brothers Martin and Pigott did not hear the case. We are of opinion that our judgment should be for the defts. If this were an ordinary case of principal and agent, where the agent, having made a contract in his own name, has been sued on it to judgment, there can be no doubt that no second action would be maintainable against the principal. The very expression that, where a contract is so made the contractee has an election to sue agent or principal, supposes he can only sue one of them; that is to say, sue to judgment. For it may be that an action brought against one might be discontinued, and fresh proceedings be well taken against the other. Further, there is abundance of authority to show that where the situation of the principal is altered by dealing with the agent as principal, the former is no longer subject to an action. But this is not the case here. The defts. may or may not be liable to indemnify the master in respect of his costs or his imprisonment, but they are clearly liable to him or his estate in respect of the damages recovered against him, and proceedings might have been taken against them as soon as judgment was recovered against the master, and before any payment by or execution against him. They are now, therefore, under a liability to the master or his estate to the extent of the whole claim, and yet it is sought to bring them under a fresh liability for that to the plt. If this, then, were the ordinary case we have mentioned, there could be no doubt on the subject. But it is said that the liability of the master of a vessel acting for his owners, and their liability where he acts for them, is different from the liabilities in ordinary cases of principal and agent, and that first one and then the other may be sued. The plt.'s argument then is, that the present case is anomalous and exceptional. Where that is contended for, strong reasons ought to be given for it. What is given here? It is certain that the master's liability is founded on the same considerations as that of an ordinary agent, namely, he makes the contract in his own name: (Art v. Coe, 2 Cowp. 689; Story on Agency, sect. 296.) It is said that for purposes of commerce it is convenient that both master and owner should be suable. So it is, but why to the extent contended for, more than in any other case of principal and agent? It might be hard to make a person who deals with the master run after the owner to sue him; yet why, if he sues the master, should he afterwards sue the owner, more because it is very right he should be able to sue the master or owner? In reality no reason can be given for the distinction attempted between this and other cases of principal and agent. We do not say none could be given why, in all cases of principal and agent, both should be suable; but that there is no particular reason applicable to the masters and owners of

LLOYD v. GUIBERT AND ANOTHER.

[EX. CH.]

The case, then, must rest not on principle authority, and that authority is limited to a in Story on Agency. It is remarkable is of opinion that there was by the law an option to sue either, but not if so, what he lays down is peculiar to our doubly anomalous. He gives no reason for cites 2nd Livermore on Agency, p. 167, 169, 18. He (Story) says the second action may be sustained unless "in the first action he has had a complete satisfaction of the claim." On the other, however, to Livermore (we say it with respect), he really says nothing in support of the proposition. What he says is, "Masters of merchant vessels are personally answerable upon the contracts made by them in relation to the employment of the ship, to repairs, or to supplies furnished for the ship's use. For the law gives to the merchant who contracts with the master a twofold remedy, against the owners and against the masters." He cites Rich v. Coe, 2 Cowp. 639, which, a very questionable decision, justifies Livermore's proposition, but not Story's. It only decides that the owners are liable upon an order by the court for necessaries, though without their authority. It is true Lord Mansfield says, the master, the owner, and the ship are trusted, but he says nothing to the effect that what is contended for. It is remarkable that Story does not cite this authority so far as Livermore. Melius est petere fontes quam rivulos. Then really there is no authority in support of the contention, while there is much the other way. The silence of all other writers on the subject is not suggested in Abbot on Shipping, nor in Kent's Commentaries (see 2 Kent, Kent, p. 217), nor in Maude and Pollock, p. 100, nor in Machlachlan, p. 128, nor in 1 Parsons on the Law, p. 37. There is one powerful contention on the other way—namely, if the master contracts under seal, no action lies on the contract against the owners. Why? If the master makes the contract, one for himself and one for his owners, why should his contract, being under seal, be enforceable against the owners being sued on that which he, the master, has made for them? Nothing. But if there is one contract only, as in ordinary cases the agent contracts in his own name, which contract may say binds him because made in his own name, or binds his owner because made for him, then the decisions are intelligible, and the law is correct; the owners are not liable, except on the ground of a technical rule that a contract under seal does not bind a person not executing, without authority under seal for its making. See Abbot on Shipping, ed. of 1856, p. 169. Leslie v. White, 3 Bro. & B. 171, is not opposed to this. Therefore we give judgment for the defendants.

LLOYD v. GUIBERT AND ANOTHER.

Bottomry bond—Liability of owner of foreign ship—Money paid by freighter to release cargo.

Charter-party of a French ship undertook by charter-party to carry cargo belonging to the plt. from the West Indies to Liverpool. The vessel put into Fayal in distress, where the master hypothecated the vessel for repairs. On her arrival in this country proceedings were had in the Admiralty Court on the bottomry bond, and the plt. was obliged to pay money to release the cargo. To an action on an implied promise to indemnify the plt., the defts. pleaded that the ship was a French ship, and the defts. French subjects domiciled in France, and that by the laws of France the owners of any French ship may in all cases free themselves from the acts and engagements of the master by the abandonment of the ship and freight, and that they had done so. The plt. demurred to this plea, and also replied, secondly, that he had elected that his goods should be carried to England, and that the law of the country where the charter-party was made and where the bottomry bond was given, was similar to the law of England, and not to that of France. To this replication the defts. demurred:

Held (affirming the judgment of the court below), that the defts. were entitled to judgment, for the authority of the master to bind the owner of a ship is governed by its flag, and therefore in this case by the law of France, which must be taken on demurrer to be as stated in the plea:

Held, also, that a party who relies upon a right or an exemption by foreign law, is bound to bring such law properly before the court, and to establish it by proof, otherwise the court, not being entitled to notice such law without judicial proof, must proceed according to the law of England.

This was a writ of error upon a judgment for the defendant in the Q. B. The case was argued at the sittings after last Trinity Term, C. Hutton appearing for the appellant, and Hodgson for the respondent.

The pleadings, facts, and arguments are fully set out in the report of the case in the court below: (see 10 L. T. Rep. N. S. 570.)

Cur. adv. vult.

Nov. 27.—WILLES, J.—The facts disclosed by the record are as follows:—The plaintiff below, a British subject at St. Thomas, a Danish West-Indian island, chartered the ship Olivier, belonging to the defendants, who are Frenchmen, for the voyage from St. Marc, in Hayti, to Havre, London, or Liverpool, at the charterer's option. The plaintiff must have known that the ship was French. The charter-party was entered into by the master, in pursuance of his general authority as such, and not under any special authority from the owner. The plaintiff shipped a cargo at St. Marc, for Liverpool, with which the vessel sailed. On her voyage she sustained damage from a storm, which compelled her to put into Fayal, a Portuguese port, for repair. There the master properly borrowed money upon bottomry of the ship, freight, and cargo, and repaired the ship, which proceeded with the cargo, and arrived in safety at Liverpool. The bondholder proceeded in the Court of Admiralty against the ship, freight, and cargo. The ship and freight were insufficient to satisfy the bond. The deficiency and costs fell upon the plaintiff as owner of the cargo, and in respect thereof he seeks to be indemnified by the defendants, as shipowners. The defendants abandoned the ship and freight, and it must be taken as a fact—because it is alleged, and not denied—that, by the law of France, they abandoned in time, and in such manner and under such circumstances as are required by the French law; and that, according to such law, abandonment (by which we understand a giving up of the ship and freight to the shippers) absolved him from liability. This law, if applicable, is one which furnishes an absolute bar to the plaintiff's claim, by way of satisfaction or discharge, and affected the validity of the claim and not merely the mode of proceeding to enforce it. Whether the French law permits abandonment under such exceptional circumstances is a question of fact not before us, and which, for the present purpose, we must assume to be answered in the affirmative: (see, however, "Deylleneuve et Masse Dictionnaire du Contentieux Commercial," tit. Armateur, sects. 23 & 25.) By the English law a shipowner, under such circumstances, is liable personally, and not merely to the value of the ship and freight; and it is alleged, and not denied, that the Danish and Portuguese laws agree, in this respect, with our own. As to the law of the port of loading at Haiti we are not informed. Upon these facts it was insisted for the plt. that the decision ought to proceed upon either what was called the general maritime law, as regulating all maritime transactions between persons of different nationalities at sea; the Danish law, as that of the place where the contract was made (lex loci contractus); the Portuguese law, because the bottomry bond which in one sense caused the question to arise was given in a Portuguese port, and the rule that the place governs the act (locus regit actum) was supposed therefore to furnish a solution, or the English law as being that of the place of the final act of performance by the delivery of the cargo (quasi lex loci solutionis); in either of which alternatives the liability of the deft. was established, and it was argued that the charter-party having been entered into bona fide in the ordinary course of business by the master within the scope of his ostensible authority to contract for the employment of the vessel which the owner, by appointing a master and sending him abroad in command, allows him to assume, the right of the charterer could no more be narrowed by a provision of foreign law unknown to him, than by secret instructions from the owners, which would clearly be inoperative—a proposition which needs no authority in our law, and for which French authorities will be found in Paillet's edition of the Code de Commerce, Act 216 in the note. For the defts. it was answered that by the French law they are absolved, and that that law, as being that of the ship, governs the case, either because of the character of the transaction itself showing that the plt. impliedly submitted his goods to the operation of the law of the ship, or because the master who entered into the contract, though his doing so was within the scope of the authority which he was allowed by the owner to assume, was disabled by the French law from binding his owners otherwise than with the exception expressed or implied by exemption from liability by abandonment, and that of such disability or lack of authority his flag was sufficient notice. Upon this latter ground the Court of Q. B. gave judgment for the defts., not expressing any opinion upon the former; whereupon the plt. brought error, and the case was well argued at the sittings after Trinity Term last, before Erle, C. J., Pollock, C. B., Martin, B., Keating, J., Pigott, B., and myself, when we took time to consider. In determining a question between contracting parties, recourse must first be had to the language of the contract itself, and (force, fraud, and mistake apart) the true construction of the language of the contract (lex contractus) is the touchstone of legal right and wrong. It often happens, however, that disputes arise not as to the terms of the contract, but as to their application to unforeseen questions which arise incidentally or accidentally in the course of performance, and which the contract does not answer in terms, yet which are within the sphere of the relation established thereby, and cannot be decided as between strangers. In such cases it is necessary to consider by what general law the parties intended that the transaction should be governed, or rather, to what general law it is just to presume that they have submitted themselves in the matter. A familiar illustration of this will be found in the rule that the lawful usages of a market are as much part of a contract entered into there which does not expressly exclude them, as if they were set down at large. The binding force of such usages does not depend so much upon the knowledge of the parties as upon implied acquiescence, for "Whoso goes to Rome, must do as those at Rome do." So, in the absence of express provision or special usage, the general law itself, in many points of view only a more extended usage, supplies the gaps which the parties have left, and in doing so, it sometimes modifies the construction of general words in the contract. For instance, a common carrier, while on the one hand he is bound by stringent rules for the protection of his customers, on the other he is allowed certain exemptions from liability, even upon an express contract which does not exclude such exemptions. Thus, by the common law of England, a person who expressly contracts absolutely to do a thing not naturally impossible, is not excused for nonperformance because of being prevented by the act of God or the king's enemies: (Paradine v. Jane, Aleyn, 27.) And yet, in consideration of the risks to which common carriers are exposed, such prevention is in their case an implied exemption; and, in the case of ordinary bailees entrusted with the custody of goods, whether by express contract or not, the exceptions of overwhelming force (vis major), and accident without negligence (casus fortuitus) are implied. In the case of carriers by sea these latter expressions, vis major and casus fortuitus, are now as to British subjects always stipulated for by the common exception in the charter-party or bill of lading; whilst in foreign contracts of affreightment, even when made in British ports, such express stipulation is sometimes omitted, as for instance in the Spanish charter in Blasco v. Fletcher, 14 C. B., N. S., because by the law of many countries such an exception is implied: (see Casa Regia, Dix, 23; Codigo de Comercio, art. 935, Allgemeines Deutsches Handels Gesetzbuch, art. 703.) So that, in the case just referred to, if the lex loci contractus were to prevail, the owner of a Spanish vessel chartered at Liverpool for the Havana, might lose the protection which the owner of an English vessel would, of course, have stipulated for. And this diversity, or conflict, if you will, upon a point so important shows that the present and like questions affect not only contracts entered into by masters of ships, the law of whose country distinguishes between the obligation of a contract by the master as such, and that of the owner himself, or of the master acting with a plenary authority, but touch all contracts of affreightment entered into in respect of any vessel in a port foreign as to her, whether the master happens to be an owner or not. Hitherto we have viewed the question generally, but in order to its satisfactory solution as applied to the present case, we must deal with the operative facts that the contract of affreightment was made by persons of different nationalities in a place where both of them were foreigners, to be performed partly there by breaking ground in order to start for the port of loading, a place which may or may not have been governed by a different law from that of the place of the contract, and where both parties would also have been foreigners, partly at the latter port by taking the cargo on board, and partly on board a ship at sea, subject there to the laws of their own country, and never out of its jurisdiction as to acts done by those on board, and partly by final delivery in the port of discharge, that the principal subject-matter of the contract was the employment of a foreign ship for a voyage across the high seas, and that the question in dispute arose in consequence of sea damage to the ship and its ordinary result. The diversity or conflict of which ought not to prevail is a question that has called forth an amazing amount of ingenuity, and many differences of opinion; it is, however, generally agreed, that the law of the place where the contract is made is prima facie that which the parties intended, or ought to be presumed to have adopted as the footing upon which they dealt, and that such law ought, therefore, to prevail in the absence of circumstances indicating a different intention; as, for instance, that the contract is to be entirely performed elsewhere, or, that the subject-matter is immovable property, situated in another country and so forth, which latter, though sometimes treated as distinct rules, appear more properly to be classed as exceptions to the more general, and by reason of the circumstances indicating an intention to be bound by a law different from that of the place where the contract is made, which intention is inferred from the subject-matter, and from the surrounding circumstances, so far as they are relevant, to construe and determine the character of the contract. The present question does not appear to have ever been decided in this country, and in America it has received opposite decisions equally entitled to respect. We must, therefore, deal with it as a new question, and endeavour to be guided in its solution by a steady application of the general principle already stated, namely, that the rights of the parties to a contract are to be judged of by that law by which they intended to bind, or rather by which they may justly be presumed to have bound themselves. We must apply this test successively to the various laws which have been suggested as applicable; and first, to the alleged general maritime law. We can understand this term in the sense of the general maritime law as administered in the English courts, that being in truth nothing more than English law, though dealt out in a somewhat different measure in the Common Law and Chancery Courts, and in the peculiar jurisdiction of the Admiralty. But as to any other general maritime law by which we ought to adjudicate upon the rights of the subjects of a country which by the hypothesis does not recognise its alleged rule, we were not informed what may be its limits or its sanction. Passing over the origin of ethics and the elementary ideas of natural law (jus gentium), such as the rights of prior occupancy, and self-preservation, privilege, and the exemption of necessity, the common duties of humanity, of more or less perfect obligation, the idea of property including the obligation of contracts, and those universally recognised rights and duties upon which is based the modern system of international law (jus inter gentes), and which furnish no precise rule for the matter in hand, it could be difficult to maintain that there is, as to such questions as the present, depending in a great measure upon national policy and economy, any general, in the sense of universal, law binding at sea any more than upon land, nations which either have not assented or have withdrawn their assent thereto. Moreover we are not satisfied that there is any such general concurrence of mankind that shipowners should be absolutely answerable personally for the acts of the master. Pothier (sur le Charte-partie, art 1, sect. 84) was cited in the affirmative, and Emerigon (Contract à la grosse, chap. 4, sect. 11) upon the negative side. Pothier, forming his interpretation upon the civil law, thought that the clause of the celebrated Ordonnance de la Marine of 1681 (livre 2, tit. 8, art. 2), from which Art 216 of the Code de Commerce was taken, applied only to licit acts of the master, and that upon his contracts the owner was liable, and could not get rid of liability by abandonment. Emerigon, on the other hand, founding his opinion upon the general rule of maritime law, as he understood it, thought that from liability for all acts of the master, whether licit or illicit, including contracts, the owner could free himself by abandonment. The jurisprudence of the Court of Cassation leaned towards the opinion of Pothier, and that led, in 1841, to the modification of article 216 to its present shape, by which, according to the statement of the learned annotator in Lirey's Gilbert's Code de Commerce, annoté upon article 216, the opinion of Emerigon is now established in France. To this may be added that similar, though not identical, provisions for the protection of the owner are to be found in other codes; for instance, that of Spain (Codigo de Comercio, articles 621, 622), and Prussia (Allgemeines Deutsches Handels Gesetzbuch, articles 451, 52, 53, and the following). This is sufficient to show that there is no general uniform rule in maritime law upon the subject; indeed, looking at home, there seems little, if any, difference in principle between the French law under consideration and our own statutory provisions for limited liability in respect of obligations by reason of collision, which latter have now by express enactment been extended to collision between British and foreign vessels: (25 & 26 Vict. c. 63, s. 54; The Amelia, 1 Moo. P. C., N. S., 471; 32 L. J. 191, P. C.) In truth, any general, much more any universal, maritime law, binding upon all nations using the highway of the sea in time of peace, except when limited as administered in some court, is easier longed for than found. Accordingly, we observe that both the very learned judge of the Court of Admiralty and the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council, in deciding in the case of the Hamburg (Duranty v. Hart, 2 Moo. P. C., N. S., 289) that the validity of a bottomry bond given in a foreign port was to be determined by the general maritime law, and not by the law of the ship or the port where the bond was given, added to the expression "the general maritime law," this qualification, namely, "as administered in England." That case was cited as an authority, and at first sight it appeared to be one for applying the English law to the present case, but upon consideration it appears altogether distinguishable. The alleged agency of the master in that case was founded upon necessity alone, and it was incumbent upon the bondholder to establish such necessity by evidence, and in order to do that he was bound (according to the rule prevailing since the case of the Buonaparte) to show a communication with the owner of the cargo, that being, as the court held, reasonably practicable. So that the lex fori was undoubtedly supreme upon the question which then arose, it being one of evidence and procedure. Had the decision been intended to go further, the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council would probably have considered and compared the case of Cammell v. Sewell, 5 H. & N. 728, and pointed out the distinction in this respect between an hypothecation in case of necessity, and a sale in case of necessity, which, according to the decision of the majority of the court in Cammell v. Sewell (against the opinion of Byles, J.), depends for its validity upon the law of the place where the sale was made, and not the general maritime law as administered in England, upon which however we offer no opinion. In one other point of view, the general maritime law as administered in England, or (to avoid periphrasis) the law of England, namely, as to the law of the contemplated place of final performance or port of discharge, remains to be considered. It is manifest, however, that what was to be done at Liverpool, besides that it might, at the charterer's option, have been done at Havre, was but a small portion of the entire service to be rendered, and that the character of the contract cannot be determined thereby. It is true that, as to the mode of delivery, the usages of Liverpool would govern, as those of Algiers did in Robertson v. Jackson, 2 C. B. 412, and as in the mode of taking on board the cargo, the usage of the port of lading would be regarded (see Hudson v. Clementson, 18 C. B. 213); and the custom set out in the pleadings in Gattorno v. Adams, 12 C. B., N. S., which custom was proved at the trial at the Guildhall sittings after Michaelmas Term 1862, and made an end of the case; and in this point of view it seems impossible to exclude the law of England, or even that of Haiti, from relevancy in respect of the manner of performing that portion of the service contracted for, which was to be rendered in their respective territories, because the ship must needs for the time being conform to the usages of the port where she is. And, for a like reason, the adjustment of a general average at the port of discharge, according to the law prevailing there, is binding upon the shipowners and the merchants, who must be taken to have assented to adjustment being made at the usual and proper place, and, as a consequence, according to the law of that place: (Simmons v. White, 2 B. & C. 895.) It is unnecessary, however, to discuss this point further, because we have been anticipated and the question set at rest in an instructive judgment of the Judicial Committee delivered by Turner, L. J. since the argument of the present case in that of the Peninsular and Oriental Company v. Shand, P. C., 20th July 1865, Jurist, Oct. 7, where a passenger in an English vessel from Southampton to the Mauritius, where French law prevails, sued the shipowners for the loss of his baggage upon an alleged liability by French law from which liability the shipowner was exempt by the English law, and the passenger obtained judgment in his favour in the Mauritius court, which judgment was reversed upon appeal by the Judicial Committee, their Lordships holding that the law of England governed the case. Next, as to the law of Portugal, the only semblance of authority for resorting to that law, as being the law of the place where the bottomry bond was given, is the case already referred to of Cammell v. Sewell; and we consider that the judgment in that case, if applicable at all, as to which we say nothing, could affect the validity of the bottomry, and not the duties imposed upon the shipowner towards the merchant by the fact of the bottomry, which duties must be traced to the contract of affreightment and the bailment founded thereupon. The law of Haiti is not stated or relied upon by either party, and there remains only to be considered the laws of Denmark and France, between which we must choose. In favour of the law of Denmark there is the cardinal fact that the contract was made within Danish territory; and further, that the first act done towards performance was weighing anchor in a Danish port. For the law of France, on the other hand, many practical considerations may be suggested; and first, the subject-matter of the contract, the employment of a sea-going vessel for a service, the greater and more onerous part of which was to be rendered on the high seas, where she was for all purposes of jurisdiction, criminal or civil, with respect to all persons, things, and transactions on board, a floating island, over which France had as absolute and for all purposes of peace as exclusive a sovereignty as on her dominions by land, and which, even whilst in a foreign port (according to notions of jurisdiction adopted by this country, 18 & 19 Vict. 91, s. 11; 24 & 25 Vict. c. 94, s. 9, and carried to a greater length abroad, Ortolan "Diplomatie de la Mer," chap. 13, the work of a French naval officer, but of which a jurist might be proud), was never completely removed from French jurisdiction. Next, it must be remembered, that although bills of lading are ordinarily given at the port of lading, charter-parties are often made elsewhere, and it seems strange and unlikely to have been within the contemplation of the parties that these rights or liabilities in respect of the identical voyage should vary, first, according as the vessel was taken up at the port of lading or not; and secondly, if she were taken up elsewhere, according to the law of the place where the charter-party was made, or even ratified. If a Frenchman had chartered the Olivier on the same terms as the plts. did, it should seem strange if he could appeal to Danish law against his own countrymen, because of the charter-party being made or ratified in a Danish port, though for a service to be rendered thereat by a transient visitor, for the most part within French jurisdiction. Moreover, there are many ports which have few or no sea-going vessels of their own, and no fixed maritime jurisprudence, and which yet supply valuable cargoes to the ships of other countries. Take Alexandria, for instance, with her mixed population and her maritime commerce almost in the hands of strangers. Is every vessel that leaves Alexandria with grain, under a charter-party or bill of lading made there, and every passenger vessel leaving Alexandria or Suez, be she English, Austrian, or French, subject to an Egyptian law? As to not a few semi-savage places in Africa with neither sea-going ships nor maritime laws, the same question arises. What is the law in such cases, or is there none except that of the court within whose jurisdiction the litigation commences? Again, it may be asked, does a ship which visits many ports in one voyage, whilst she undoubtedly retains the criminal law of her own country, put on a new sort of civil liability at each new country she visits in respect of cargo there taken on board? A steamer, for instance, starts from Southampton for Gibraltar, calling at Vigo, Lisbon, and Cadiz. A Portuguese going from Southampton to Vigo would naturally expect to sail subject in all respects to English law, that being the law of the place and the ship. But if the locality of the contract is to govern throughout, an Englishman going from Vigo to Lisbon on the same voyage would be under English law as to crimes and all obligations not connected with the contract of carriage, but under Spanish law as to the contract of carriage; and a Spaniard going from Lisbon to Cadiz during the same voyage would enjoy Portuguese law as to his carriage, and be subject to English law in other respects. The cases which we have thus put are not extreme nor exceptional; on the contrary, they are such as would ordinarily give rise to the question which law is to prevail. The inconvenience and even absurdities which would follow from adopting the law of the place of contract in preference to that of the vessel, are strong to prove that the latter ought to be resorted to. No inconvenience comparable to that which would attend an opposite decision has been suggested. The ignorance of French law on the part of the charterer is no more than many Englishmen, contracting in England with respect to English matters, might plead as to their own law in case of an unforeseen accident. Nor can we allow any weight to the argument that this is an impolitic law as tending to interfere with commerce, especially in making merchants cautious how they engage foreign vessels. That is matter for the consideration of foreigners themselves, and nothing short of a violation of natural justice or of our own laws or policy could justify us in holding a foreign law void because it is impolitic. No doubt the French law was intended to encourage shipping by limiting the liability of shipowners, and in this respect it goes somewhat further than our own, but whether wisely or not is within the competence and for the consideration of the French Legislature, and upon which, sitting here, we ought to pronounce no opinion. Exceptional cases, should they arise, must be dealt with upon their own merits. In laying down a rule of law, regard ought rather to be had to the majority of cases upon which doubt and litigation are more likely to arise; and the general rule that where the contract of affreightment does not provide otherwise, there, as between the parties to such contract, in respect of sea damage and its incidents, the law of the ship should govern, seems to be not only in accordance with the probable intention of the parties, but also most consistent and intelligible, and therefore most convenient to those engaged in commerce. In order to preclude all misapprehension, it may be well to add that a party who relies upon a right, or an exemption by foreign law, is bound to bring such law properly before the court, and to establish it in proof. Otherwise the court, not being entitled to notice such law without judicial proof, must proceed according to the law of England: (see Brown v. Gray, note to Lacon v. Figgins, Q. B., M. 1821.) For these reasons we have arrived at the same conclusion as the Court of Q. B., and without examining the ground upon which the court proceeded, we are of opinion that the judgment was right and ought to be affirmed.

LLOYD v. GUIDERT AND ANOTHER.

LLOYD v. GUBERT AND ANOTHER.

[Ex. Ch.]

WILSON v. RANKIN.

[Ex. Ch.]

Judgment for the deft.

ERROR FROM THE QUEEN'S BENCH.

Monday, Nov. 27, 1865.

Before ERLE, C. J., POLLOCK, C. B., WILLES and BYLES, JJ., CHANNELL, B., KEATING, J., and PIGOTT, B.)

WILSON v. RANKIN.

A policy on freight is not rendered void by the master's act, without the owner's authority or knowledge, in loading part of the cargo on deck contrary to the Customs Consolidation Act (16 & 17 Vict. c. 107), s. 170 et seq.:

So held by the Ex. Ch., affirming the decision of the Court of Q. B.

This was a writ of error, and an appeal upon a judgment of the Court of Q. B.

The pleading and facts are set out in the report of the case in the Q. B. (12 L. T. Rep. N. S. 20.)

Cohen (Mellish, Q. C. with him) for the deft.—The declaration is upon a policy of insurance on freight, and the question is, whether the fourth plea is good. That in substance alleges that the cargo insured in respect of which the freight was claimed was timber shipped on board a vessel, after the coming into operation of the Customs Consolidation Act 1853 (16 & 17 Vict. c. 107), and that the whole of the cargo was not below deck, but part of it was loaded on deck contrary to the statute, and that the plt. was the owner of the ship. It is submitted that the plt. is not entitled to recover, as the loading of the cargo on deck was illegal, and the master's act was the owner's in this case. The effect of the loading was to render the ship in a certain sense unseaworthy; that is, the ship was not seaworthy within the meaning of the statute. In all policies there is an implied warranty that those provisions have been complied with which are essential to the legality of the voyage. The nature of the loading not having been communicated to the underwriters, they are absolved from any liability on the policy:

Cunard v. Hyde, E. B. & E. 670; Ib., 2 E. & E. 1;

Hobbs v. Harman, 3 Camp. 93;
Burges v. Wickham, 33 L. J. 17, 26, Q. B.;
Marshall on Ins. by Shee, 136;
Duar on Ins. (Amer.) 318, 377, 410.

Brett, Q. C. (Milward, Q. C. with him) contra, was not called upon to argue.

ERLE, C. J.—In this case it appeared in the plea in an action on a policy on freight that, contrary to the statute, the master had taken out a cargo in November or December, and part of the cargo he was taking out was loaded contrary to the provision of the 16 & 17 Vict. Now it is clear that if Wilson the shipowner had done that or had been cognisant of it, according to the case of Cunard v. Hyde it might have been an illegal voyage, and the policy thereon might have been rendered void; but the owner is not shown to have known anything of it or to have been party to it in any way. And the judgment of the court below was that, by reason of knowledge and authority from him to the master not being shown, the rule laid down in Cunard v. Hyde did not apply to the present case. The court was of opinion upon that decision that though the master had authority to load a cargo, it was not an authority to violate the statute in loading the cargo, nor was it an act of the master that the owner must be presumed to have assented to. In that judgment we concur. We are also of opinion that the second ground taken in the court below was a valid ground. Even if it had been shown, in fact, that the master had rendered this an illegal voyage without the knowledge or authority of the owner, it would have been a barratrous act on the part of the master, and the insurers would have been liable by reason of the barratry, and on that ground the insurers on freight ought to be liable. There was a further contention in the present case that there was a statutory unseaworthiness shown, because the ship had taken on board timber on the deck, and had sailed from Canada without having a certificate of clearance, and it was attempted to say that the insurer was discharged on the principle on which it has been held that, if a ship sails without being provided with proper documents, the risk of the insurers is increased, and the liability for loss greater than would be if the ship had the documents; that, therefore, the ship sailing without the certificate of clearance required by the statute in Canada at the time of sailing, there was no cargo on board, and the absence of that document created a statutory unseaworthiness within the principle of the case I have adverted to. It appears that the principle by no means applies. The document in question here is a document merely relating to the compliance with the requisitions of the statute at the port of loading, to secure a compliance with the provision of the statute there, and it does not at all bear upon the risk of the voyage after the ship is out of the port of discharge, and does not at all bear upon the ship in the port of discharge. We think that, though the argument was scarcely pressed by the learned counsel with any idea that it would succeed, there is nothing in the argument, and that the judgment should be affirmed. This was the only question brought before us, and we carefully limit the judgment to the exact question that is to be decided.

The rest of the Court concurred.

Judgment affirmed.

THE PYRUS v. THE SNALES.

[ADM.]

COURT OF ADMIRALTY.

Thursday, May 11, 1865.

THE PYRUS v. THE SNALES. (a) Collision.

The Admiralty regulations directing "that where two vessels are crossing, the one on the starboard tack close-hauled and the other on the port tack, the vessel on the port tack shall give way to the vessel on the starboard tack, and that the starboard tack vessel shall keep her course:"

Itch, under the above regulations, that the vessel on the starboard tack having put her helm about, instead of simply holding on her course, was solely liable for the consequences of a collision between the two vessels.

Deane, Q.C. and Putter appeared for the Pyrus.Brett, Q.C. and E. C. Clarkson for the Snales.

Dr. LUSHINGTON gave judgment in this case, which was an action brought by the barque Pyrus, 315 tons, from Dublin, laden with hay for Shikie, against the brig Snales, 213 tons, from Hamburg, in ballast for Hartlepool, to obtain compensation for damage sustained from a collision between them off Hartley, near Tynemouth, shortly after twelve o'clock, a.m., of the 11th Dec. last. It was agreed on both sides that the wind was S.W., the barque stating the weather as full moon or thereabouts, very light, blowing hard: the brig representing it as rather hazy, with strong breezes and a high sea. The tide was about half-flood. The case for the Pyrus was, that while standing off to the S.E. close-hauled on the starboard tack, under whole sails, making between four and five knots, without lights, the green light of the brig was seen nearly ahead, distant about one mile, that the Pyrus kept her course, and the green light advanced across her hawse, and got quite clear on her weather or starboard bow, when it disappeared, and the red light of the brig came into view, and the brig, then under a port helm, bore down upon and ran right stem on into the barque's starboard bow, in the way of the fore-rigging, doing a great deal of damage; that, when the collision was apparently inevitable, the helm of the barque was put hard a-starboard, and her main and mizen sheets eased off, in order to lighten the blow; that the barque's crew, when the brig was approaching her weather side, hailed her to go under the barque's stern, but without effect. The defence of the Snales, on whose part a cross-action was brought, was, that she was proceeding under two single-reefed topsails, foresail, double-reefed trysail, and foretopmast staysail, closehauled on the port tack, heading west, going from three to four knots, carrying the proper Admiralty regulation lights, when the Pyrus was made out with no lights visible at the distance of about half-a-mile, bearing about N.W. by N., and that as soon as it was ascertained that the Pyrus was on the starboard tack, the helm of the Snales was put hard a-port: that the Pyrus starboarded her helm and the collision ensued, which was attributed by the Snales to the improper navigation of the Pyrus, and to her not exhibiting any lights. Now the rule of law was, that every vessel is compellable, under the circumstances, to carry lights from sunset to sunrise, and that unless she does carry these lights, if a collision occurs in consequence of the absence of the lights, whether she was morally justified or not in having no lights, she must bear the consequences. The true and only question to consider upon the lights is, whether the absence of the lights on board the Pyrus was in any degree contributory to the collision.

As to the starboarding, the question is, whether there was any necessity for the starboarding of the helm of the Pyrus, and that such was the urgency of the case, that the master was justified in so doing to avoid imminent danger; if so, then it is not to be imputed to him that he took a measure which was not necessary. But if it was an erroneous act done, and there was no just ground to stimulate him to do that act, but that it had no effect upon the collision, then we need not look to it further. It must be held that these two vessels were crossing each other, and that they fell within the 12th rule issued by parliamentary authority, and also the 16th, which directs that where one vessel is to give way, the other shall keep her course. It was the duty of the Snales, being on the port tack, to give way to the Pyrus. The master of the Pyrus says: "As we were proceeding under the circumstances I have mentioned, one of the men from forward reported a 'ship ahead.' I went forward immediately, and I saw a vessel a little on our port bow," it being admitted he was sailing in a south-easterly direction, "about half a point distant, from a mile to a mile and a half. I saw the vessel's green light, and also the vessel itself, quite plain. I could see she was a brig standing in to the westward, on the port tack, and apparently closehauled. I did not make any alteration in my vessel. She was then close to the wind, and it was therefore unnecessary for me to give any orders. I stood watching the strange vessel, first from her port bows, and then as she crossed our bows. I went into our starboard bow and still watched her. She crossed our bows and got full five or six points on our starboard bow. She was then, I should say, 300 or 400 yards distant from us, and I then saw her alter her course." Then he misses the green light, and the red light comes in, and that occurs from her porting. It is to be questioned whether it would be possible for this vessel to have crossed the bows, having got on the starboard side of the vessel, to have gone some hundred yards, and to have borne round and run straight into the Pyrus in the manner stated. It is difficult to comprehend, if this was the state of the case, how it was possible that the helm of this vessel, if it had been ever so much starboarded, could by possibility have aided and assisted in this collision; for, if the Pyrus was with her head to the S.E., and if she starboarded, her head would go more to the E., and if the other vessel was coming in from the westward upon her, it would not tend to bring about a collision, but she would be running away from the other vessel. Then there is the case on the other side, and the master of the Snales says, "Whilst I was on the quarter-deck, just moving about on the starboard side, I saw a vessel without any light, about three points on our starboard bow, and distant about half-a-mile. I could not then make her out very plainly; I could just see her sails; she bore from us about N.W. by W. I did not look at the compass, but I judge that to be pretty nigh correct. In about two minutes after I had so seen the said vessel one of the hands forward reported 'a vessel on the lee bow'; it was the same that I had seen. I was still watching her. In about five minutes after my first seeing the said vessel, I was able to make her out sufficiently well to see how she was standing. At this time she was about from a quarter to half a mile distant from us, nearer a quarter than half a mile, I should say, from guess; and I then saw she was a closehauled starboard-tacked ship, heading S.E. I immediately ordered my helm to be ported: 'Put the helm to port and go under the ship's lee.' The helm was immediately ported. I saw it done, and my ship instantly paid off, and thereby brought the strange ship about two or three points on our weather (port) bow, and the two vessels were thereby brought into a safe position for passing each other. About five minutes after I had first put my helm a-port, and whilst my vessel was still paying off under her port helm, and when the strange ship was, as I have said, about from two to three points on my weather bow, and was within a quarter of a mile distant of us, I saw she altered her course under a starboard helm, and began paying off, and so following me up. I put hard a-port, and ordered the trysail sheet to be let go." Now, the only way this evidence of the master of the Smales can be reconciled with the probabilities of the case is this, that the Smales never did cross the hawse of the Pyrus at all, but that she was approaching her, and having ported in order to avoid coming into contact with her, the Pyrus so starboarded that she intercepted, as it were, her course, and then the collision took place. Upon the facts of the case, and on a comparison of the evidence on both sides, we are of opinion that the Pyrus was solely to blame for this collision.

THE MONSOON v. THE NEPTUNE.

[ADM.]

THE MONSOON v. THE NEPTUNE.

Steamers and sailing ships—Collision—Admiralty regulations—Construction of articles 15, 18, and 19.

15th regulation.—If two ships, one of which is a sailing ship and the other a steamship, are proceeding in such directions as to involve risk of collision, the steamship shall keep out of the way of the sailing ship.

18th regulation.—Where by the above rule one of two ships is to keep out of the way, the other shall keep her course, subject to the qualifications contained in the following article, viz.:

19th regulation.—In obeying and construing the above rules, due regard must be had to all dangers of navigation, and due regard must also be had to any special circumstances which may exist in any particular case rendering a departure from such rules necessary, in order to avoid immediate danger.

Case 1: Steamer in default.

Brett, Q.C. and E. C. Clarkson for the Monsoon.

Vernon Lushington for the Neptune.

Dr. LUSHINGTON gave judgment in this case, which was an action brought by the barque Monsoon, 296 tons register, from Port Natal, with a general cargo and passengers for London, against the General Steam Navigation Company's steamship Neptune, 364 tons register, from Havre, with passengers and cargo for London, to obtain compensation in damages for injuries sustained by reason of a collision between them in the vicinity of the North Foreland, about ten p.m. on the 25th March last. The barque stated the wind as W. by S., and the weather as fine, clear, and starlight; the steamer represented the former as about W., and the latter as very dark, but clear. The case for the Monsoon was, that she was under double-reefed foretopsail, maintopsail, jib, and mizen, in Margate Roads, proceeding close-hauled on the port tack, heading N.W. by N., the tide being about three-quarters flood, and making about two knots, carrying the Admiralty regulation lights, and in charge of a duly licensed Trinity Cinque Port pilot to take her to Gravesend; that the pilot having determined not to proceed further with the barque on that night, an attempt was made to stay her, in order to bring her to anchor; that she, however, refused stays, and thereupon her mizen was brailed up, her maintopsail was taken in and her helm was put hard a-port, and she was wore round with a view to bringing her head on tide, and letting her anchor go; that whilst the barque was so wearing round, and a part of her crew were engaged in taking in the foretopsail, and when her head was about E.S.E., the look-out from on board her made out the three lights of the Neptune, bearing about one point on her starboard bow, and at the distance of about one mile; that the lights were watched from the barque, and it being seen that the Neptune was approaching the barque, and rendering a collision immediate, the Neptune was loudly hailed to port her helm, and then to stop her engines, but no notice was apparently taken of such hailing, and the Neptune, under a starboard helm, ran into and with her starboard bow struck the barque on her port bow, and did her very considerable damage. The defence on the part of the steamer set forth, that the tide was flood, running about three knots; that the Neptune was steering north by west, going about three knots an hour, and was carrying the regulation lights brightly burning, when the green light of the barque was observed about two points on her port bow, distant about a mile; that the Neptune's helm was thereupon immediately put hard a-starboard; that shortly after, on both her lights coming into view, her engines were eased; that in a few seconds afterwards, on her green light disappearing and her red light only being visible, the Neptune's engines were stopped, but the Monsoon not keeping her course, came on under a port helm, and with her stern struck the Neptune a violent blow on the starboard. The court had to decide two questions on this case: first, whether the Neptune was to blame, and secondly, whether any fault was to be imputed to the Monsoon. The 15th article of the steering and sailing rules appeared to be applicable to this case: "If two ships, one of which is a sailing ship, and the other a steamship, are proceeding in such directions as to involve risk of collision, the steamship shall keep out of the way of the sailing ship." It was clear both these vessels were proceeding up channel, and that at the time when they descried each other, whether the distance was a mile, more or less, if it involved a risk of collision, it was the duty of the steamer to keep out of the way. If the steamer did not keep out of the way, the burden of proof was upon her to show there were sufficient causes and reasons why she did not obey the statute. On the other hand, there was also an obligation imposed on the Monsoon, because the words of the 18th article were these: "That where, by the above rules, one of two ships is to keep out of the way, the other shall keep her course," subject, of course, to certain contingencies. The question was, whether the steamer took proper measures and means to keep out of the way of the Monsoon, and whether the Monsoon did keep her course; or whether, if she did not keep her course, there was any sufficient justification by the facts and circumstances of the case? The case of the Monsoon was, that after the Neptune was seen in the manner stated, the lights were watched from the barque, and it being seen that the Neptune was approaching the barque and rendering a collision imminent, the Neptune was loudly hailed to port her helm, and then to stop her engines; but no notice was apparently taken of such hailing, and the Neptune, under a starboard helm, ran into and with her starboard bow struck the barque on her port bow and did the damage. It did not appear whether it was intended to impute any particular blame to the Neptune for coming under a starboard helm, nor did it appear to be of great importance to consider what was the intention of the pleader here, for the substance of the pleading was, that she did not comply with the 15th article and keep out of the way. On the other side, on behalf of the Neptune, the statement was, in substance, that the Neptune did that which was right under the circumstances; that she did do all that she could do to avoid the collision, that it was right to put her helm hard a-starboard, and right afterwards to ease her engines in the manner they were eased; and the blame was thrown upon the Monsoon in not keeping her course. As to the weather, it seemed to be pretty nearly agreed on that the night was dark but clear, and the wind was about half a gale, certainly not stronger. The questions then to be determined were, whether the Neptune was right in immediately starboarding, and whether her engines were eased in due time; because there was another regulation, that if there is the least danger of collision the engines are to be immediately eased to prevent the consequences of a violent collision. Under all the circumstances of the case, the court felt bound to hold that the Neptune was solely to blame for the collision.

THE JOHN HARLEY v. THE WILLIAM TELL.

Ships' moorings—Burden of proof.

Where two ships come into collision, and the main allegations to be sustained or disproved are, that the collision occurred through one of the ships being improperly moored, or from her having an insufficient or an improper look-out; the burden of proof (or, rather, of disproving such allegations) lies upon the ship so accused.

O'Malley, Q. C. and Dr. Wambey appeared for the John Harley.

Deane, Q. C. and Tristram for the William Tell.

Dr. LUSHINGTON gave judgment in this case, which was an action brought by the brig John Harley, 275 tons, from Cork, in ballast for Newport, against the ship William Tell, 1174 tons, to obtain compensation for damage sustained by reason of the ships coming into collision about 2 a.m. on the 16th Jan. last, in the Upper Dock, Newport, Monmouthshire. The brig stated the wind as N.W., and the weather as very cloudy, with a strong gale of wind. The ship represented the former as N.N.W., and the latter as a violent gale with terrific squalls. The case for the John Harley was, that she was lying in the floating docks, moored securely from her bows to a buoy at the northern part of the dock in question; and that her master, expecting a gale of wind on the night of the 15th, remained on board her; that the William Tell, which was lying a short distance ahead of her, with her stern nearly opposite to her (the brig's) bows, and moored close to the quay-walk of the northern end of the dock by one small chain only run out from her port bow, broke away from her mooring, and drifted stern on against the starboard bow of the John Harley, forcing her from her moorings, and carrying away bulwarks, rails, and stanchions, and doing other serious damage; that the William Tell continued to drift in a southern direction, forcing the John Harley before her, until the port bow of the John Harley came into violent contact with another vessel, whereby the John Harley sustained still further damage. It was further pleaded, that the collision and damage consequent thereon were solely attributable to those on board and in charge of the William Tell, by reason of their not having properly and securely moored the said vessel; and that no blame whatever was imputable in respect thereof to the master or any of the crew of the John Harley. The answer on the part of the William Tell alleged, that she was properly moored in the floating docks at Newport, under the directions of the berth master of the docks; that on the night of the 15th of the month in question, and from thenceforward up to the time of her parting from her moorings on the morning of the 16th of the same month, the William Tell was lying alongside the ship Rochester (which was on her port side), and was moored in the manner following: forward she had a one-inch mooring chain on sheath attached to the mooring ring of the dock, on the port bow, nine parts of a three and three-quarter inch line attached to the foremast of the Rochester, the end of an eight and a half-inch hawser attached to the top-gallant foremast of the Rochester. Amidships she had five parts of a three and three-quarter inch line attached to about the amidships of the Rochester, and two parts of the same line attached to the Rochester's quarter pipe as a spring, and aft she had the end of a seven-inch hawser attached to the buoy, and on the starboard quarter she had two parts of a four and a half inch hawser also attached to the buoy; and that there was a vessel called the Jeane Myers fastened to the William Tell on her starboard side. That for some time before, and at 2.20 a.m. on the 16th, it was blowing a violent gale, accompanied by terrific squalls, the wind being N.N.W., and that at about 2.20 a.m. the William Tell, by reason of the violence of the gale, parted from the Rochester and began drifting down the dock with the Jeane Myers fastened on her starboard side; that an attempt was immediately made to get the William Tell's hawser on board the Rochester, but, as none of the crew of the Rochester were on deck to heave a hauling-line to the William Tell, such attempt failed; that at this time the gale continued blowing with great violence, accompanied by terrific squalls, and that the William Tell in one of the squalls, parted from the mooring ring; that one of the William Tell's anchors was thereupon as soon as possible let go, but that immediately afterwards the stern of the William Tell came into collision amidships with the barque Gauss, which was also in the docks and had broken from her moorings, and was then lying with her broadside facing the north end of the dock; that while the William Tell was drifting down the dock the brig John Harley drifted, quartering across the William Tell's stern, and that when the William Tell was brought to by the aforesaid collision with the Gauss, the Jeane Myers came in collision with the brig John Harley, riding her down on her starboard bow, the port bow of the John Harley being then in contact with the Gauss. It was then denied that the collision was solely, or in any way, attributable to those on board the William Tell. It had been settled ever since the days of Lord Maclesfield, when he was impeached for misconduct, that those facts which could be proved almost exclusively by one party in the case, whether plaintiff or defendant, such person was bound to prove; and upon the question arising in this case, whether the vessel was properly moored or not, the burden of proof lay upon those who represent the interests of that vessel, and not upon those who alleged she was improperly moored; precisely in the same way as if the question had been as to whether there had been a good look-out or not upon a vessel on a dark night. One party in such a case would allege that there was not a good look-out, and certainly the burden of proof would be upon

THE FRUITER v. THE FINGAL.

[ADM.]

the vessel who alleged that there was a good look-out, and not upon those who could not give such evidence as the persons could who were on board the vessel. There was no question but that in such a case as the present the burden of proof was upon those who alleged the vessel was properly moored, and that they were bound to show that she was so moored. There was some difficulty in coming to the conclusion that the piece of chain which was found fastened to the ring by the deputy dock-master was the chain which properly belonged to the William Tell; but there was no doubt that the chain by which she was moored was a one-inch mooring chain, because it was in their own affidavit expressly so stated. The question to be decided was, taking their own statement of the manner in which they were moored with a one-inch mooring chain attached to the wall, and with the other chains which were mentioned with regard to their moorings to the Rochester, whether, upon the whole, she was properly and sufficiently moored on that night; and whether, as this storm was raging at a considerable period before the collision took place, there was not a warning to increase the moorings in case it should appear to be necessary? Supposing the William Tell was improperly moored, or assuming the case either way, the next question to consider was what occurred and what took place during the night? There was no doubt, from all the evidence in the case, that it was a most tempestuous night, the wind varying, but being principally from the N.W. and blowing in violent and sudden squalls. It was said for the William Tell, first, that she never came in contact with the John Harley at all, and that the Gauss and the Regent, which were alongside, or nearly alongside, the John Harley, broke from their moorings before the William Tell came up and ran into the John Harley, or close to her. It did not appear from the evidence that either the George Buxton, or the Alabama, or the Gauss, or the Regent, broke away from their moorings before the John Harley was struck, and before the William Tell came into immediate contact with her. Was the William Tell the vessel that was the cause of the damage to the John Harley? The court was of opinion that she was, and there must be a decree accordingly.

The Court was assisted by Capt. Owen and Capt. Nesbitt, of the Trinity-house.

THE FRUITER v. THE FINGAL.

Steamships meeting end on—Collision—Admiralty regulations as to rules of the road—Construction of.

13th regulation: If two ships under steam are meeting end on, or nearly end on, so as to involve risk of collision, the helm of both shall be put to port, so that each may pass on the port side of the other.

14th regulation: If two ships under steam are crossing so as to involve risk of collision, the ship which has the other on her own starboard side shall keep out of the way of the other.

Brett, Q. C. and E. C. Clarkson for the Fingal.

Butt and Pritchard for the Fruiter.

Dr. LUSHINGTON gave judgment in this case, which came before the court in the form of an action brought by the schooner Fruiter, 105 tons, from London for Plymouth, laden with fruit, against the screw steamship Fingal, 613 tons, 90-horse power, from Dantzic for London, laden with a general cargo and passengers, to obtain compensation for damages sustained by a collision between them off Cuckold's Point, in the river Thames, about eight o'clock in the morning of December last. The wind was stated by the parties as S.W.; and the weather on one side was described as dull but no fog or rain, and on the other as moderate and clear, the tide being about high water. The case for the Fruiter was, that on the morning in question she was in tow of a steam-tug called the Highland Maid, and was in the river Thames off Rotherhithe; that the steam-tug had also another vessel, called the Esperanza, in tow, and the Fruiter was being towed astern of the Esperanza, and by a separate hawser fastened to the tug and not to the Esperanza; that the jib, topsail, topgallant-sail, and mainsail were set, but only occasionally drawing, and the Fruiter was being towed at the rate of about three knots an hour; that the master was at the wheel steering, and the waterman and all the crew were forward on the look-out, and a good look-out was kept on board the vessel; that the Fruiter, in tow of the steam-tug, was proceeding down the river to the southward of mid-channel, and when the tug reached Cuckold's Point, Rotherhithe, those on board the tug, and immediately afterwards those on board the Fruiter, observed the steam-vessel Fingal coming up the river, and distant from 200 to 300 yards, and about two points on the port bow of the tug; that the helm of the tug was put hard a-port, and the helm of the Fruiter was ported as much as possible consistently with passing a brig at anchor on her starboard side, and on the Fruiter's passing the brig the helm of the Fruiter was put hard a-port, and all the three vessels were kept as near as possible to the southern shore; that the Fingal nevertheless continued to approach the Fruiter, apparently under a starboard helm, and the Fruiter's bow-rope was, therefore, cast off from the tug, and the Fingal immediately afterwards, still apparently under a starboard helm, and without stopping her engines, struck with her stern and port bow the port quarter of the Esperanza, and then with her starboard bow struck first the jibboom and then the port bow of the Fruiter; that the Fingal carried away the jibboom, bowsprit, knightheads, and cutwater of the Fruiter, and did other damage; that the Fingal backed astern and away from the Fruiter, and afterwards continued her course up the river. The anchor-chain of the Fruiter was set fast by the collision, but was, after some delay and difficulty, cleared, the anchor let go, and the vessel brought up, and as the Fruiter had received so much damage as to be unable to continue her voyage, she was subsequently towed back again to London. The defence on the part of the Fingal pleaded, that while in charge of a duly licensed Trinity pilot, and being at the upper end of Limehouse Reach, as a matter of precaution, and owing to the great number of craft coming down the river, her engines were stopped, and she was allowed to drift with the tide, with her head angling in towards the south shore; that whilst so drifting the Fruiter, which was the aftermost vessel in tow, was seen distant 500 or 600 yards on her starboard bow coming down the river; that the tug with the two vessels in tow, instead of passing to the northward of the Fingal, as she could and ought to have done, and although warned and hailed from the Fingal so to do, attempted, under a port helm, to pass to the southward of her; and, notwithstanding the engines of the Fingal were turned astern with a view, if possible, of avoiding a collision, the foremost of the vessels in tow with her port quarter struck the stern of the Fingal, and the Fruiter, which had been cast off by the tug, with her jibboom and bowsprit struck the Fingal on the starboard bow, about the cathead. It was then denied that the collision was in any way caused by the Fingal, or those on board her. Now, the article of the Admiralty Steering and Regulation Rules was, that "if two ships under steam are meeting end on, or nearly end on, so as to involve risk of collision, the helm of both shall be put to port, so that each may pass on the port side of the other." Looking at the facts of this case, and the conflicting evidence, could it be said that these two vessels were meeting end on, or nearly end on? Part of the evidence stated that they were within two points of meeting end on, and if they were so they would fall in with the latter part of the statement—nearly end on; and if they did, and there was no nautical impediment, undoubtedly the directions of the 13th article were not complied with, because both these vessels did not put their helms a-port. If the 13th article did not apply, we come to the next, the 14th, viz., "If two ships under steam are crossing so as to involve risk of collision, the ship which has the other on her starboard side shall keep out of the way of the other." Now, it appears to the court, that the Fingal had the other vessel on her starboard side, and therefore it was her duty to keep out of the way. As to the tug with the two vessels in tow, did she or did she not keep to the southward coming round this place called Cuckold's Point, and was she or was she not to the southward of mid-channel before the collision, and at the collision? Upon that there is conflicting evidence beyond all doubt. It has been pointed out that one of the strongest arguments in favour of her being to the southward is that the Fruiter was close to the brig at the time of the collision. Undoubtedly that was a fact, supposing it to be of importance, or that there was any doubt whatever that she was at the time in question considerably to the southward of mid-channel. Take it she had ported in due time, and was to the southward of mid-channel, and saw the screw coming across from the north shore angling to the south, was it her duty or not to port? That she did port there is not a shadow of doubt; but the question raised was, whether she was to the southward of mid-channel at the time? The screw-ship states that, as she was approaching, going to Cuckold's Point, she saw the road was blocked off Cuckold's Point, and she could not proceed to the northward, and she then stopped and reversed her engines, and at the time in question she was going a very little ahead, if at all. On a careful consideration of the evidence on both sides, the court was of opinion that the Fingal was wholly to blame, and must be so held.

The Court was assisted by Capt. Pigott and Capt. Webb of the Trinity-house.

THE WHEATSHEAF v. THE INTREPID.

Overtaking ships—Collision—Admiralty regulations as to rules of the road—Construction of.

The 17th Admiralty regulation, "that every vessel overtaking any other vessel shall keep out of the way of the vessel being overtaken," applies to foreign ships as well as to British.

A French ship, under sail, following a British ship in tow on entering a harbour, came into collision with her whilst crossing the bar:

Held, that the collision so occurring was occasioned by the negligence of the French ship in not attending to the rule of the road as laid down in the 17th Admiralty regulation, and that the French ship was liable for the loss caused by such collision.

Brett, Q. C. and E. C. Clarkson appeared for the Wheatsheaf.

Deane, Q. C. and Vernon Lushington for the Intrepide.

Dr. LUSHINGTON gave judgment in this case, which was an action of damage brought by the British ship Wheatsheaf, 108 tons, from London, in ballast for Sunderland, against the French schooner Intrepide, 105 tons register, to obtain compensation for damage sustained on the 17th Nov. last under the following circumstances. The case of the Wheatsheaf was, that when about two miles off Sunderland harbour, the master of the Wheatsheaf engaged a steam-tug to tow her into the harbour, and such tug accordingly took her in tow, and between eight and nine a.m. of the day in question proceeded with the Wheatsheaf in tow for that harbour, and whilst approaching that harbour, and before entering it, all sail was taken off the Wheatsheaf; that the wind at this time was about S.E. by S., a fresh breeze, the weather was fine, and the tide was about half-ebb; that the Wheatsheaf, in tow of the tug, proceeded into harbour, and as she was entering it the Intrepide, which had previously been seen hove-to outside the harbour, was noticed at the distance of about a cable's length astern of the Wheatsheaf and also coming into Sunderland harbour; that the Intrepide was under sail, and was going very considerably faster than and overtaking the Wheatsheaf; that the Wheatsheaf and her tug kept on up the harbour, in the expectation that the Intrepide would keep clear, as she ought to have done; that the Intrepide passed very close to the Wheatsheaf on her starboard side, ran against the tow-rope with which the tug was towing the Wheatsheaf, and rendered a collision between herself and the tug imminent; whereupon the tug, to save herself, slipped the tow-rope, and although every endeavour was made by those on board the Wheatsheaf to save her from so doing, the Wheatsheaf drove on to the ground and suffered considerable damage, and was compelled to take the assistance of her tug and another tug to get her off; that those on board the Intrepide did not whilst passing the Wheatsheaf and her tug take proper measures to keep clear of the Wheatsheaf and her tug as they ought to have done; that those on board the Intrepide, whilst passing the Wheatsheaf and her tug, improperly starboarded the helm of the Intrepide; that the collision and the damages and losses consequent thereon were occasioned by the negligence and improper navigation of the Intrepide, and no blame with regard thereto was attributable to the Wheatsheaf or her tug. The defence on the part of the Intrepide set forth, that on the morning in question she was lying-to off the harbour of Sunderland, when those on board her observed the Wheatsheaf two miles distant, bearing about S.W.; that the wind was blowing fresh from about S.S.E.; the tide was ebb, running strong, and there was a heavy sea on; that about 9 a.m. the Wheatsheaf, then in tow of a steam-tug, was observed to be making for the entrance of the harbour, and when it appeared, as the fact was, that she had got near enough to the harbour to get in safely before the Intrepide, the Intrepide's sails were filled, and her course made to cross the bar; that as the Intrepide was advancing, being astern but to the northward of the Wheatsheaf, the Wheatsheaf was observed to touch the bar in crossing; that the Wheatsheaf's engine was thereby stopped, and the distance between the two vessels was diminished; that the Intrepide crossed the bar, being then under all sail except the flying jib and foretopsail, and sailing at about the rate of four knots an hour, and between the piers picked up a licensed pilot, who, on boarding, took the wheel; that the Wheatsheaf was then observed to take the ground on the couch or bank near the south pier, and the steam-tug, in order to try to get her off, crossed over to the northward, carrying the tow-line across the Intrepide's course; that the Intrepide, meanwhile, necessarily advanced, and, as there was no room for her to pass between the steam-tug and the north pier, was obliged to continue her course, and she consequently ran against the tow-rope between the tug and the Wheatsheaf, but the Intrepide's helm was not starboarded; that the pilot on board the Wheatsheaf hailed those on board the tug to let go the tow-rope, but it was not let go till just as the Intrepide's stem came against the rope; that the rope was not carried away, and the Intrepide never touched either the Wheatsheaf or the tug. It was then pleaded, that the Intrepide was in no wise instrumental to the Wheatsheaf's getting on shore; that the contact of the Intrepide with the tow-rope between the Wheatsheaf and the tug was not caused by any negligence of those on board the Intrepide, but was, so far as they were concerned, an inevitable accident; and that the contact of the Intrepide with the tow-rope between the Wheatsheaf and the tug was occasioned by the default of those on board the Wheatsheaf or the tug. Now the court could not discover any materials to conclude that it was an inevitable accident which caused this calamity, and therefore one or other of the two vessels must be to blame. There was great difficulty from the extreme contradiction in the evidence in the case, and more especially from a fact that crept out in the course of that evidence, which was, that there was a sort of feud sprung up between the pilots, and they seemed to have adopted their own courses, and, as frequently arises in such a state of things, the evidence was not to be relied on, on the one side or the other, with the same satisfaction as if no such feeling had previously existed. The case appeared to fall within the 17th rule of the statutory regulations, that "Every vessel overtaking any other vessel shall keep out of the way of the said last-mentioned vessel." The fact was undoubted, that the Wheatsheaf was first, and that the Intrepide was following her, and that it was not a matter of necessity that the Intrepide should have kept so close to the Wheatsheaf as she happened to do; and it was her duty, therefore, in accordance with this 17th article, which was equally binding upon French vessels as upon English vessels, to keep out of the way. Therefore, one of the principal questions to determine was this: did the Intrepide adopt those proper measures which would enable her to escape the consequences which subsequently occurred? It had been said, on the part of the French vessel, that it was very improbable she should have starboarded, there being no necessity for such a proceeding, and it being obviously indiscreet for her to do so. It was said for the Intrepide that the Wheatsheaf struck on the bar on getting between the piers, but that was entirely unsupported by the evidence. Upon the whole of the evidence taken together, the court was of opinion that the Intrepide was solely to blame, and there must be a decree accordingly.

THE HELEN.

[ADM.]

The court was assisted by Captain Bax and und Captain Lambert, of the Trinity-house.

Wages—Breach of blockade.

In a suit upon an agreement contemplating a breach of blockade of the ports of the Confederate States of America, and upon a motion to strike out the fourth article of the deft.'s answer which pleaded that such agreement was not binding by reason of a breach of blockade being illegal:

Held, that a breach of blockade by neutrals is not an offence against the municipal law of this country.

Ordinarily, decisions of the H. of L. and the P. C. and the Courts of Common Law are absolutely binding upon the Court of Admiralty.

Brett, Q. C. and E. C. Clarkson for plt.

Milward, Q. C. and Pritchard for deflt.

The facts of this case sufficiently appear in the judgment, in which the following cases were referred to:

Santissima Trinidad, 7 Wheat. Rep. 840;
Richardson v. The Marine Insurance Company, 6 Mass. Rep. 113; Seaton, Maitland, and Co. v. Low, 1 Johns. Rep.; Arnould, 763, 764, 766, 773;
 3 Kent's Com. 367;
 2 Parsons, 95;
 Phillips, c. 8, s. 2, 163;
 Marshall, 87;
 Maud & Pollock, 809;
 2 Twiss, 297.

Dr. LUSHINGTON.—This is a motion by the plt. to reject the fourth article of the defts.' answer. The parties in this cause are John Andrews Wardell, formerly the master of the Helen, plt.; and the Albion Trading Company, the owners of the ship, defts. The master sues for wages, with certain premiums added, alleged to have been earned between July 1864 and March 1865. The answer states that, according to the agreement as set forth by the defts., the plt. has been paid all that was due to him. This part of the answer is not objected to. The fourth and last article is the one objected to. It alleges that the agreement was entered into for the purpose of breaking the blockade of the Southern States of America; that such an agreement is contrary to law, and cannot be enforced by this court. In the course of the argument, the judgment recently delivered by Lord Westbury whilst he was L. C., in Ex parte Chavasse, 6 N. R. 26, was cited as governing the case. The law there laid down is briefly stated, that a contract of partnership in blockade running is not contrary to the municipal law of this country; and by the decree the partnership was declared valid, and the accounts ordered accordingly. It was admitted that this decision is directly applicable to the present case. A decision of the L. C. is to be treated by the court with the greatest respect; but is it absolutely binding? Decisions of the following tribunals are absolutely binding upon the Court of Admiralty, viz., the H. of L., the Privy Council, and when deciding upon the construction of a statute, the courts of common law. All, then, that this court has to do, is to inquire if such decision is applicable to the case before it. If so, then it is the duty of the court to obey whatever may be its own judgment. On the present occasion no decision has been cited from the H. of L., the Privy Council, or the courts of common law. But, as an intimation has been given that this case will be carried to the Judicial Committee, that tribunal might be inclined to consider me remiss in my duty if I had omitted to form an independent judgment on the case, and to state my reasons for so doing. It is, I conceive, admitted on all hands that the court must enforce the agreement with the master unless it is satisfied that such agreement is illegal by the municipal law of Great Britain. In order to prove this proposition, the defts. say that the agreement to break the blockade by a neutral ship is on the part of all parties concerned illegal according to the law of nations which is a part of the municipal law of this country; ergo, this contract is illegal by municipal law. Now, a good deal may depend on the sense in which the word "illegal" is used. I am strongly inclined to think that the defts. attach to it a more extensive

ADM.]

THE MARY ANN.

meaning than it can properly bear, or was intended to bear by those who used it. The true meaning, I think, is that all such contracts are illegal so far, that if carried out they would lead to acts which might under certain circumstances expose the parties concerned to such penal consequences as are sanctioned by international law for breach of blockade or for the carrying of contraband. If so, the illegality is of a limited character. For instance, suppose a vessel, after breaking the blockade, completes her voyage home, and is afterwards seized on another voyage, the original taint of illegality, whatever it may have been, is purged, and the ship cannot be condemned; yet if the voyage was ab initio wholly and absolutely illegal both by the law of nations and the municipal law, why should the successful termination purge the offence? Let me consider the relative situation of the parties. A neutral country has a right to trade with other countries in time of peace. One of these countries becomes a belligerent and is blockaded. Why should the rights of the neutral be affected by the acts of the other belligerent? The answer of the blockading power is, "Mine is a just and necessary war;" a matter which in ordinary cases a neutral cannot question. The belligerent further says, "I must seize contraband. I must enforce blockade to carry on the war." In this state of things there has been a long and admitted usage on the part of all civilised states, a concession by both parties—the belligerent and neutral—an universal usage which constitutes the law of nations. It is only with reference to this usage that the belligerent can interfere with the neutral. Suppose no question of blockade or contraband, no belligerent could claim a right of seizure on the high seas of a neutral vessel going to the port of another belligerent, however essential to his interest it might be so to do. What is the usage as to blockade? There are several conditions to be observed in order to justify the seizure of a ship. Amongst other things the blockade must be effective and, save accidental interruption by weather, constantly enforced. The neutral vessel must be taken in delicto. The blockade must be enforced against all nations alike, including the belligerent one. When all the necessary conditions are satisfied, then by the law of nations the belligerent is allowed to capture and condemn neutral vessels without remonstrance from the neutral state. It never has been a part of admitted common usage that such voyages should be deemed illegal by the neutral state, still less that the neutral state should be bound to prevent them. The belligerent has not a shadow of right to require more than universal usage has given him, amongst which is not included the power to say to the neutral, "You shall help me to enforce my belligerent right by curtailing your own freedom of commerce, and making that illegal by your own law which was not so before." This doctrine is not inconsistent with the maxim that the law of nations is part of the law of this country. The fact is, the law of nations has never declared that a neutral state is bound to impede or diminish its own trade by municipal restriction; for our own Foreign Enlistment Act is itself a proof that, to constitute transactions between British subjects when neutrals and belligerents a municipal offence by the law of Great Britain a statute was necessary. If the acts mentioned in that statute were in themselves a violation of municipal law, why any statute at all? I am now speaking of fitting out ships of war; not of levying soldiers, which stands upon a different footing. I may here say, that in principle there is no essential difference whether the question of breach of municipal law is raised with regard to contraband or breach of blockade. Then how stands the case upon authority? Mr. Duer is the only text-writer who maintains an opinion contrary to what I have stated to be the law. He maintains it with much ability and acuteness, but he stands alone. He, however, admits that an insurance of a contraband cargo is no offence against the municipal law of a neutral country according to the practice of all the principal states of Continental Europe, and in the American courts the question has been more than once agitated, but with the same result. In the English courts the only case in which the point has been actually decided is the recent case (above cited) before Westbury, L. C. With regard to the cases mentioned in Mr. Duer's book (Naylor v. Naylor, 9 B. & C. 718; Mederas v. Hill, 8 Bing. 231), it is enough to say that, in the view which the court eventually took of the facts, the question of law did not arise. It is in those two cases impossible to say with certainty what was the opinion of the judges at Nisi Prius. I cannot entertain any doubt as to the judgment I ought to pronounce in this case. It appears that principle, authority, and usage unite in calling on me to reject the new doctrine that to carry on trade with a blockaded port is, or ought to be, a municipal offence by the law of nations. I must direct the fourth article of the answer to be struck out. I cannot pass by the fact that the attempt to introduce this novel doctrine comes from an avowed particeps criminis, who seeks to benefit himself by it. As he has failed in every respect, he must pay the costs of his experiment.

THE MARY ANN.

Master's wages—Disbursements—Maritime lien—Mortgagee.

Against the balance of proceeds of sale of a vessel sold in a bottomry suit the master has in respect of his claims, both for wages and disbursements, priority over the rights of the mortgagee.

V. Lushington appeared for the master.

Rutherford for the mortgagee.

The facts of the case will appear in the following judgment:

DR. LUSHINGTON.—This is a question small in amount, but yet of some considerable difficulty when it comes to be examined minutely. The facts of the case are as follows: In Aug. 1863 Arthur James Thorman was the sole owner of the vessel. On the 15th of that month he executed a mortgage of her to the debt. George Tanner for 1100*l.*, and on the 9th June 1864 executed a second mortgage of her to Arthur James Thorman for 500*l.*, and on the 28th Dec. transferred the vessel to G. W. Thomas, and procured the mortgage of June 9 to be given up; so that G. W. Thomas became sole owner subject to the mortgage of 15th Aug. 1863 to George Tanner. On the 22nd Dec. 1864, before the last transfer had been executed, but no doubt after it had been agreed upon between the parties, G. W. Thomas hired the plt. as master, and the vessel shortly afterwards proceeded to sea in the plt.'s charge. Bad weather came on, and plt. put into Flushing, where he gave a bottomry bond. On the return of the vessel to Swansea, in Feb. 1865, it was arrested at the suit of the bottomry bondholders. On the 13th April the master instituted this cause to recover his wages and disbursements [and on the 20th filed a citation in rem]. Considerable delay took place in the conduct of the cause, and it was not until the 15th May that an appearance was entered on behalf of George Tanner, the mortgagee. On the 26th May the bondholders' petition was filed. The debt. allowed the time for putting in an answer to go by, and was obliged to make a special application to the court on the 11th July for leave to put in his answer. The answer, ia, states that the mortgage of the 15th Aug. contained a covenant that the vessel should not be sent to the port of London until the mortgage had been paid off, and that to secure this covenant the mortgage of registry was deposited with the deft., and that this covenant contained in the mortgage was subsequently communicated to G. W. Thomas, nevertheless, acting in collusion with the deft. and behind the back of the deft. Tanner, sent the vessel to sea, the vessel of course without any certificate of registry on board; and that the master is conspiring with G. W. Thomas to defeat the deft.'s rights, and has made fraudulent disbursements for wages and disbursements. Under these circumstances the deft. insists that his right as mortgagee is superior to that of the master. On the 14th July the master moved the court to reject the answer of the deft. The principal question is, what are the rights of a mortgagee as against the master of the ship, first, in respect of his claim for wages, and secondly, in respect of his disbursements? To deal with the question of wages first. Originally the master had no lien on the ship for his wages. (Smith v. Plummer, 1 Barn. & Ald. 381.) By the 10th section of the 7 & 8 Vict. c. 112, he first obtained the same rights and liens for the recovery of wages as a seaman, but only in the case of the property of the owner; but this restriction was taken off by the 191st section of the Merchant Shipping Act 1854, which enacts that "every master of a ship shall, so far as the case permits, have the same rights, liens, and remedies for the recovery of wages which by this Act, or by any law or custom, any seaman not being a master has for the recovery of his wages." But this was not sufficient, for a seaman could not recover wages in the Admiralty Court if there were a special contract providing the same, and as the master's wages are invariably determined by special contract, the position was not greatly improved by the Merchant Shipping Act 1854. Now, however, this restriction has ceased to exist, for by the 10th section of the Admiralty Court Act 1861, it is enacted "the High Court of Admiralty shall have jurisdiction over any claim by a seaman of any ship for wages earned by him on board the ship, whether the same be due under a special contract or otherwise, and also over any claim by the master of any ship for wages earned by him on board the ship, and for disbursements made by him on account of the ship, provided always that if in any such cause the plaintiff do not recover 50*l.* he shall not be entitled to any costs, charges, or expenses incurred by him therein, unless the judge shall certify that the cause was a fit one to be tried in the said court." The question now before the court is, whether under the section the master's claim for his disbursements is to be preferred to the claim of a mortgagee? I think under this Act a seaman should have a maritime lien for his wages, although fixed by special contract, because before the Act he had such a lien for wages earned not under any special contract, and for a similar reason there would be a maritime lien for damage done by any ship. If this be so, then under this Act the master claiming for disbursements is to be preferred to the mortgagee, because before the Act his claim for his disbursements was entitled to a similar preference where the court could take cognisance, namely in the case of a set-off. I wish it to be distinctly understood that this judgment deals only with the 10th section of the Admiralty Court Act 1861, and does not commit the court to any construction of any previous Act. With regard to the allegations of fraud contained in the answer, they cannot be struck out, for if fraud be proved, no claim that is based upon it can be maintained.

FOWLER v. GRAVES.

Policy of insurance—Concealment of name of vessel—Goods shipped by any one of a line of steamers.

The plaintiff while in London received orders to insure goods shipped on board one of a line of steamers between Jamaica and Liverpool. The steamer had then started on her voyage. He insured the goods with the defendant by a valued policy upon every kind of goods and merchandise, "by any steamer" from Liverpool to Jamaica. At the time of effecting the insurance he did not disclose the name of the vessel to the insurers, although he had the bills of lading in his possession. Evidence was given to show that, according to the practice of underwriters, the insurance of goods "by any steamer" would indicate that the voyage had not commenced at the date of the insurance, and that from the non-disclosure of the name of the vessel it would be inferred that the assured did not himself know it:

Held, that it was for the jury to say whether the non-disclosure of the name of the vessel had a material influence upon the underwriters in assessing the premium or in accepting the risk, and that upon their finding this question in the affirmative, the underwriters would be entitled to a verdict.

This was an action upon a policy of insurance valued at 300*l.* upon every kind of goods and merchandises from Liverpool to Jamaica. The defendant pleaded: 1. A denial of the policy. 2. A denial of the shipment of the goods. 3. A denial of the loss. 4. That certain facts material to the risk were concealed.

THE ENERGIE.

Maude (Edward James, Q. C. with him), in opening the case, stated that the goods in question were shipped on board a steamer called the Ascalon, which left Liverpool for Jamaica on the 5th Feb. 1865, and was lost on the 15th. Bills of lading of these goods had been sent to the plt. at London, and on the 16th Feb. he received orders to insure the goods. He went to the insurance office, and effected the insurance on the 18th, but did not state the name of the vessel. The plt. and other witnesses were called, and from their evidence and that of insurance brokers called on behalf of the deft., it appeared that where a vessel was insured like the one in question it was usual to give the name of it to the underwriter. If the name were not given it would be thought that the assured did not know it. One of the witnesses for the defence, who had large experience in insurance, stated that where an insurance was effected upon "any steamer" it would be understood that the hazard had not commenced. There was also some evidence to show that in the interval between the starting of the vessel on her voyage and the effecting of the insurance the weather had been bad, and that it blew a gale from the west. The plt. admitted that, if the underwriter had known the vessel had sailed, there might have been a difficulty in effecting the insurance.

POLLOCK, C. B. left it to the jury to say whether any importance attached to the disclosure of the name of the vessel to the underwriters. If a reasonable man would have been influenced by a knowledge of the name of the vessel in assessing the premium, or in accepting the risk, the concealment was a material one.

The Jury gave their verdict for the deft.

Damage to cargo—Bill of lading—Weight and contents unknown—Presumptions—Explaining receipt—Evidence.

Where a bill of lading for a bale of cloth contained the words "weight and contents unknown:"

Held, that the carrier was not called upon to prove the delivery of any certain number of pieces of cloth in the bale.

But where the bale, when delivered from the ship, was seen to have its outer ropes removed, and its outer covering cut, and on its arrival at the store it was found that its inner covering had been also cut, and a piece of cloth was missing, and no one of the employes of the ship who stowed the bale or broke it out was called as a witness:

Held, that it was incumbent on the carrier to show that the injury was only external.

A receipt signed by the carman who took away the bale, as in good order:

Held to be explained under the circumstances.

Whether the invoice is any evidence of the contents of the bale, quære.

*This was an action upon a bill of lading. The libel alleged that three bales of cloth were shipped in good order on board the Energie at Antwerp,* bound for New York, and that the master gave ordinary bill of lading, undertaking to deliver in like good order at New York, but that when they were delivered one of them was in bad order, the outer ropes had been opened, and a piece of cloth abstracted.

The answer alleged that the bill of lading contained the clause "weight and contents unknown," and that the shipowner was ignorant of the contents of the bales, but that all of them, with contents as shipped, had been delivered.

The bale in question was composed, as is shown by the evidence, of a certain number of pieces of cloth placed upon another, and covered first with a wrapping of paper, and then another of oil-cloth; then bound with ropes, so as to be compact and hard, and bound with ropes; then surrounded with straw, and covered with canvas, two of its sides protected by boards, and the whole bound with ropes. Upon its arrival it was received from the ship by the consignee's (the libellant's) carman and carted to the store, and there at once examined, when it was found to be without its external ropes, and loose instead of compact, while on one side the covering had been cut through all the coverings and the ropes, so that the pieces of cloth could be removed by the hand. Some of the pieces of cloth that were cut were soiled with finger-marks, and there were contained but nine pieces. The invoice, which was allowed in evidence subject to objection, stated that the only evidence given of the number of pieces originally in the bale, called for ten pieces.

For libellant, Goeff.

For resp., Larocque.

BENEDICT, J.—The bill of lading in this case acknowledges the bale in question to have been in good external condition when shipped, and the master testifies that it was then in such condition. Upon the discharge of the cargo, the carman, having one of the bales upon his cart, as the defence shows, called for this one, when the stevedore reported from the hold of the ship, that it had been put out, because it was in bad order and needed sewing. The Custom-house officer passed down the word that the carman was to take it, and would take it as it was. It was accordingly put in the slings and transferred from the ship to the cart. The carman testifies that he took it directly to the store; that he went alone and did not stop or get off his cart by the way. He says that when he received the bale he saw that the exterior ropes were gone, and the outer wrapping cut, and that he delivered it at the store in the condition in which he received it from the ship. None of the crew who stowed the ship in Antwerp are produced in court, nor does the resp. call the stevedores or other employes of the ship who delivered the bale in New York, except the mate, who was stationed upon the pier, and who does not appear ever to have seen the bale until it was placed upon the cart. Upon this evidence it is to be held that the carrier has shown the delivery of the bale and its contents in like order as shipped, although, under the bill of lading, the memorandum "weight and contents unknown," he was not called upon to show the delivery of any certain number of pieces of cloth; yet the fact appears that the bale, as delivered by the carman, was in bad external condition, with its outer ropes gone and its covering cut, it was incumbent upon the carrier to show that the injury was only external. Failing to produce the evidence of any of the persons who stowed the bale in Antwerp or who broke it out and placed it in the ship at New York, he cannot ask the court to presume that this injury was merely external. On the other

THE FLORENCE.

[ADM.]

the presumption is against him, and is that, if any part of the bale was abstracted at any time, it was while in charge of the ship, where the ropes were removed and the covering cut. The evidence which the ship has produced to overcome this presumption fails to meet the requirements of the case. The only witnesses who saw the bale when landed are the carman, the custom-house officer, and the mate. The mate was on the pier, and testifies that both he and the carman examined the bale as it went on the cart, that it was then firm and in shape, and its only injury was that the outer canvas covering had been torn a little. A receipt for the bale as "in good order" is also produced, and the mate says that he read it to the carman before it was signed, and that the carman signed it without objection or remark as to the condition of the bale. I am not, however, satisfied by the evidence of the mate that, after the bale came up from the hold, any examination of it, sufficient to detect the fact that the interior coverings had been cut, was made. The carman says no examination was made. The custom-house officer, who was at the hatch superintending the landing, saw no examination; while the stevedores below, who had kept back the bale because they thought it was not in order to be delivered, were not produced, or their absence accounted for. As to the receipt, it seems to me to be explained by the circumstance that, when the bale was reported in bad order, the custom-house officer announced that the carman would take it as it was rather than wait. The slings would be likely to keep the bale in shape, as but two of the interior ropes were cut. The injury beneath the straw would not be readily seen, as the carman in his hurry was, doubtless, satisfied that the injury was merely external, and so willing to give the receipt. It was, however, extremely careless in the carman, and had the proofs from the ship been more full, they might well have fastened the loss upon him. Upon the whole evidence, as it stands, I am therefore inclined to hold that the bale was opened in the ship, and that if any part of it was abstracted it was there done, and not in a public street in the daytime by a carman who had a few moments before given a receipt for the bale in good order. But it is insisted on the part of the resp. that the invoice is not evidence against him, and that there is, therefore, no evidence of any loss from the bale, and that the libel must for this reason be dismissed. I do not think that the case in its present position calls for a decision of the point thus made. For outside of the invoice there is the evidence that the bale was deprived of its exterior ropes, was cut through, and some of the pieces of cloth soiled, while its looseness at once satisfied a practical eye that a part of its original contents was gone. This evidence is sufficient to prevent a dismissal of the libel for want of proof of any damage, and entitles the libellant to a reference, where the amount of damage may be shown by such legal evidence as the respective parties may produce.

EASTERN DISTRICT OF NEW YORK.

Seaman's wages—Forfeiture by misconduct.

Where a mate of a vessel, having a dispute with the master about the rate of his wages, on leaving the ship took the ship's chronometer with him, and retained it in order to force a settlement of his claim, until compelled to give it up by the police:

Held, that this was an act of misconduct which should cause a forfeiture of wages.

MARL. CAS.—VOL. II.

Forfeiture of wages is not given merely as a compensation to the owner for actual loss suffered by the seaman's misconduct; it is enforced also by way of punishment.

This action was brought by Frederick Munderloch against the barque Florence, to recover wages due to him for services as mate on board the barque. There were some immaterial questions about the rate of wages at which he was employed, as he had not signed articles; but it appeared that, after the dispute arose as to the rate of wages, the libellant was discharged, and, on leaving the ship, he took the vessel's chronometer with him to his boarding-house, and refused to give it up till the amount which he claimed was paid. The master was compelled to apply to the police, and by their aid he recovered the chronometer without any loss to the ship. On this ground a forfeiture of all the wages was claimed.

BENEDICT, J.—This proceeding cannot be deemed other than an act of gross misconduct on the part of the libellant. He was not an ignorant sailor, but an intelligent chief mate. He was at the time in sole charge of the vessel, and in the position of a trustee. He is presumed to know, and must, in fact, have known, that the law gave him a perfect security, for any sum justly due to him, and that the Court of Admiralty stands always open to adjudicate upon such demands with promptness, and in the liberal spirit of the maritime law, and he deliberately undertook to decide for himself the question between him and the master, and to compel payment of his claim as he made it, by removing and unlawfully detaining a portion of the property committed to his charge. Such an act should not be allowed to pass unnoticed in a court where violations of duty far more venial in character, when committed by seamen, are constantly punished by forfeiture of wages. But it is contended here that no wages can be declared forfeited to the owner, for the owner sustained no loss, inasmuch as the chronometer was regained by the police, and returned without expense. This defence cannot prevail according to the view which I entertain of the law applicable to such cases. I am of opinion that it is the law of the sea, as well for the quarter-deck as for the fore-castle, that any unlawful appropriation of any part of the vessel, her tackle, apparel, or furniture, or of the cargo, will, in a court of admiralty, be visited with forfeiture of wages, either partial or total, according to the circumstances of the case, whether actual pecuniary loss to the owner by the act be proved or not. I am aware that expressions can be found in books of high authority which seem to countenance the idea that forfeiture is but a compensation allowed to the owner for his loss to prevent circuitry of action. I am also aware that in most of the reported cases of embezzlement, the amount of the forfeiture has been limited to a sum sufficient to compensate the owner for the loss resulting from the unlawful act. A careful examination of the cases satisfies me, however, that the view here taken is sustained by good authority, and rests upon principles well settled. No such limit as is contended for by the libellant is suggested by Lord Tenterden in his statement of the law of forfeiture. "It seems," he says, "that neglect of duty, disobedience of orders, habitual drunkenness, or any cause which will justify a master in discharging a seaman during a voyage, will also deprive him of his wages:" (Abbott on Shipping, part 4, c. 3, s. 4.) The language used by Chancellor Kent is: "Whatever unjustifiable conduct will warrant the act of the master in discharging a seaman during the voyage, will equally deprive the seaman of his wages:" (3 Kent, p. 198.) In the case of The Blaireau, 2 Cranch, 267, Chief Justice Marshall declares that forfeiture of salvage reward by embezzlement, and forfeiture of wages for embezzlement, rest upon the same ground. But it has never been supposed that the forfeiture of salvage was limited to the amount of loss sustained by the owners of the property; nor do I understand that forfeiture of salvage for this offence has been inflicted as a method of compensating the owners for the damage sustained by them in the loss of their property. The distinction in the law of forfeiture here involved is clearly alluded to by Lord Stowell in the case of The Baltic Merchant, Ed. Ad., p. 98, and was more distinctly announced by Judge Story in Cloutman v. Tawson, 1 Sum. 373. In the latter case, which was a case of absence without leave, the learned judge, while he finds that there was no statutory desertion, nor desertion under the maritime law, inflicts a partial forfeiture, and deems the owner entitled to withhold part of the wages due, "not merely as a compensation for the loss of the services of the second mate during the period, but something more—as a just admonition to officers having such high and responsible duties devolved upon them, and designedly departing from them." This view has been followed by the learned judge of the Southern District of New York, who, in Scott v. Russell, Olcott, p. 261, inflicted a partial forfeiture "by way of correction and amends," and "with a view to operate as a proper check to seamen, rather than to compensate the owner." "The forfeiture authorised by law in cases of this nature," says Judge Story, in a case of insubordination, "is not given to the owner as a mere boon, but is designed to operate primarily as a warning penalty upon seamen for misconduct;" (The ship Mentor, 4 Mason, p. 97.) It is in accordance with this view of the maritime law that forfeitures are inflicted for insolence, for petty plunder of ecculents, &c.; for it cannot be supposed that in such cases the amount of pecuniary damage sustained by the owner is to be computed, and its compensation the object of the decree. Forfeiture is inflicted in these cases "for the good of the service," to adopt an expression of Judge Story in one of the cases cited. The power to withhold part of the wages is given by the maritime law, in order the better to secure faithfulness and efficient service from an ignorant, unreliable, irresponsible class of men, and this power, when exercised in a proper case, with caution, and a due regard for the weaknesses and temptations of this unfortunate class, a court of admiralty will always sustain. If such be the reason of the law of forfeiture, and such its application by the courts, I see no reason for excluding a case like the present from its operation. It comes within the letter of the law as declared by Lord Tenterden, Chancellor Kent, and perhaps within the more restricted language of Dr. Lushington, in the case of The Blake, 1 Lush. R. The act of the libellant was one calculated to put at considerable risk a valuable article. The ship was already cleared, and might well have been detained by his action. The master was put to the trouble of obtaining the assistance of the police, so that the case might well have permitted a deduction from the wages upon the ground of compensation for a "supposed loss," as has been done in some of the adjudged cases. I prefer, however, to place my decision upon the ground that the act was one of gross misconduct in a chief officer, a method of procedure calculated, if encouraged, to put every owner at the mercy of the crews to which he is obliged to intrust his property, an offence to be classed with the offences of insubordination, insolence, theft, and the like, and like them to be visited with the maritime penalty of forfeiture. I do not, however, think it necessary, in this case, to cast upon the libellant all the expenses of this proceeding in addition to the loss of his wages, and shall, therefore, allow him a portion of his demand. His claim is for 75 dol.; I allow him 25 dol., but it must be without costs.

Collision at sea—Loss of life—Passenger—Seamen—Liability of shipowner—Lord Campbell's Act—The Merchant Shipping Act.

*The liability under Lord Campbell's Act (9 & 10 Vic. c. 93) of a shipowner for damages in respect of loss of life occasioned by a collision at sea is, although there be no passengers aboard, by the Merchant Shipping Amendment Act 1862 (25 & 26 Vic. c. 61) modified, and limited to a sum not exceeding 15*l.* for each ton of his vessel's registered tonnage.*

This was an appeal by the p^{ts}. against a decree of the M. R. declaring their liability, as owners of a certain brig, to the representatives of seamen who were drowned, in consequence of a collision at sea between the said brig and the vessel upon which the seamen were employed at the time. The case is reported 12 L. T. Rep. N. S. 370, and no further statement of the facts is at all necessary.

Hobhouse, Q. C. and Drue supported the appeal.

Osborne, Q. C. and Hadden appeared in support of his Lordship's judgment.

Lord Justice TURNER said:—This is an appeal from a decree of the M. R. The bill is filed by the owners of a brig called the Edith Mary, stating that the said brig was, on Saturday the 13th Feb. 1864, on a voyage bound northward in ballast, and that during a severe gale of wind on that day when off Filey, in Yorkshire, she came into collision with a vessel called the Thomas Barker, and that by that collision the said Thomas Barker was sunk and totally lost, and all the crew but two were drowned. The Thomas Barker was the property of the defts. Thomas Barker, and she was laden with coal, but she had no passengers on board, nor were there either passengers or cargo on board the Edith Mary at the time of the collision. It further states that several of the defts. in the suit, who are the personal representatives of several of the seamen who were drowned, have brought actions against the p^{ts}. to recover large sums of money by reason of the loss of the lives of these seamen, and by reason of other matters as to which it appears that their claims have since been settled. There are also other defts. to the bill who had other claims against the p^{ts}, arising collision then mentioned, but it appears claims have also been settled, and the matter remaining to be decided at the trial was the extent of the plaintiffs' liability in respect of the matters arising from the Merchant Shipping Act 1862, and distributed between the defendants, and persons who shall establish claims against the plaintiffs, and that in the meantime the defendants were restrained from prosecuting the action already commenced, and from commencing and prosecuting any other action against the plaintiffs touching the other matters arising from the hearing of the cause, the Master of the M. R. E. declared that the plaintiffs were liable to the extent of 15*l.* per registered ton of the Edith Mary, and the plaintiffs undertaking to pay claims not exceeding that amount, in regard to such payments as they had already made to some of the parties, his Lordship ordered an inquiry to what amount the plaintiffs were entitled, and the proportions thereof to be paid, and an injunction was ordered to be granted in the actions. The appeal is against this decree so far as respects the direction consequent upon the course of the arguments upon the appeal of Parliament were brought under our consideration, namely, Lord Campbell's Act, 9 & 10 Vict. c. 104; the Merchant Shipping Act 1854, s. 504; the Merchant Shipping Repeal Act 1854, s. 18; and the Merchant Shipping Act Amendment Act 1862, 25 & 26 Vict. c. 21, was to be considered. It is upon the provisions of these Acts that I think, for the reasons which I shall hereafter state, upon the provisions of the four first sections of the Merchant Shipping Act 1854, our determination of this case must be based. The remedy in such cases as the present is properly observed at the bar, altogether. In dealing with this case it will be proper to refer to these statutes in their order as they were introduced into this country, a remedy in cases of injury resulting from collisions at sea, with the loss of life, the law up to the passing of that Act having stood thus—whereby death resulting from injury the person died with the person. As to the remedy expressed in the most general and comprehensive terms, and that, looking to the terms of the Act, there can be no reasonable doubt that it was intended, and must be considered to have been intended, to provide a remedy in cases of loss of life resulting from collisions at sea, and from other causes. After the passing of this statute, therefore, the owners of vessels were liable for loss of life in collisions to any amount which might be assessed as the value of the life. The state of the law when the Merchant Shipping Act 1854 was passed. By the 504th section of this Act it was enacted—“No owner of any sea-going ship, in, shall, in cases where all or any of the following events occur without his actual fault or privity, that is to say, . . . 3. Where any loss of life or personal injury is by reason of the improper navigation of such sea-going ship as aforesaid, caused to any person carried in any other ship or boat, or to any goods, merchandise, or other things whatsoever on board any other ship or boat, be answerable in damages to an extent beyond the value of his ship and the freight due, and to grow due, in respect of such ship during the voyage which at the time of the happening of any such events as aforesaid is in prosecution or contracted for, subject to the following proviso; that is to say, that in no case where any liability as aforesaid is incurred in respect of loss of life or personal injury to any passenger, shall the value of any such ship and the freight thereof be taken to be less than 15*l.* per registered ton. 505. For the purposes of the ninth part of this Act, the freight shall be deemed to include the value of the carriage of any goods or merchandise belonging to the owners of the ship, passage-money, and also the hire due, or to grow due, under or by virtue of any contract, except any such hire, in the case of a ship hired for a time, as may not begin to be earned until after the expiration of six months after such loss or damage.” Upon these sections there follows a variety of provisions framed, as it would appear, for working them out. Then follows the Merchant Shipping Repeal Act 1854, by the 4th section of which it is enacted that “there shall be hereby repealed the several Acts and parts of Acts set forth in the 1st schedule hereto, to the extent to which such acts or parts of Acts are therein expressed to be repealed, and all such provisions of any other Acts, or of any charters, and all such laws, customs, and rules as are inconsistent with the provisions of the Merchant Shipping Act 1854,” but amongst the Acts or parts of Acts so repealed, Lord Campbell's Act does not appear. Ultimately we come to the Merchant Shipping Act Amendment Act 1862, which repeals the 504th and 505th sections of the Merchant Shipping Act 1854, and by the 54th section enacts as follows: “The owners of any ship, whether British or foreign, shall not, in cases where all or any of the following events occur without their actual fault or privity, that is to say. . . 3. When any loss of life or personal injury is by reason of the improper navigation of such ship as aforesaid caused to any person carried in any other ship or boat; 4. Where any loss or damage is by reason of the improper navigation of such ship as aforesaid caused to any other ship or boat, or to any goods, merchandise, or other things whatsoever on board any other ship or boat, be answerable in damages in respect of loss of life or personal injury either alone or together with loss or damage to ships, boats, goods, merchandise, or other things whatsoever, to an aggregate amount exceeding 15*l.* for each ton of their ship's tonnage; nor in respect of loss or damage to ships, goods, merchandise, or other things, whether there be in addition loss of life or personal injury, or not, to an aggregate amount exceeding 8*l.* for each ton of their ship's tonnage; such tonnage to be the registered tonnage in the case of sailing ships, and in the case of steamships the gross tonnage, without deduction on account of engine-room.”

That the provisions of these statutes involve cases of this description in some perplexity cannot, I think, be denied; but it does not seem to me that the perplexity is incapable of being unravalled. It was first argued for the appellants, that the provisions of Lord Campbell's Act being, as it was insisted, inconsistent with the provisions of the Merchant Shipping Act 1854, the 4th section of the Merchant Shipping Repeal Act 1854 must be taken to have repealed Lord Campbell's Act, and that no obligation upon the owners of ships was created by the Merchant Shipping Act 1854, the provisions of that Act being in the negative merely that the owners should not be liable beyond the amount specified in the Act; and, on the other hand, it was argued, on the part of the respondents, that the Merchant Shipping Act 1854, of itself and independently of Lord Campbell's Act, created a liability in the owners of ships to the extent referred to in the Act.

[CHAM.] SCHOTSMANN AND ANOTHER v. THE LANCASHIRE, &c. RAILWAY CO. AND OTHERS. [M

Upon this ground, whether the Merchant Shipping Act 1854 ought to be construed as having of itself and independently of Lord Campbell's Act created a liability in the owners of ships to the extent contended for, or otherwise, I do not think it necessary for us to give any opinion; for, looking to the course of legislation to which I have referred, I am quite satisfied that the 4th section of the Merchant Shipping Act Repeal Act 1854 was not intended to repeal, and did not repeal, Lord Campbell's Act, but was intended and operated only to modify the liability which attached upon the owners of ships under the provisions of that Act. The language of this 4th section does not seem to me to be in any degree inconsistent with this view. It first purports to repeal the Acts and parts of Acts mentioned in the schedule to the extent to which they were therein expressed to be repealed, and there is no mention whatever in the schedule of Lord Campbell's Act, although some of the Acts there specified are repealed as to particular subjects, and it would obviously have been perfectly easy to specify the subject as to which Lord Campbell's Act was to be repealed, if it had been the intention to repeal it. The section then further purports to repeal all such provisions of other Acts as are inconsistent with the provisions of the Merchant Shipping Act 1854; but the provisions of Lord Campbell's Act are not inconsistent with the provisions of the Merchant Shipping Act 1854, except in so far as damages might be recoverable under the former Act beyond the limit which is specified in the latter. Besides, it is scarcely possible to suppose that the Legislature, if it intended to repeal Lord Campbell's Act, should have omitted to provide in express terms the more limited security referred to in the Merchant Shipping Act 1854. I am therefore of opinion that the app's argument upon this point cannot be maintained. But then a further argument was raised in their behalf, for which we are indebted to the ingenuity of Mr. Druce. He argued that, assuming Lord Campbell's Act to be modified only by the 504th and 505th sections of the Merchant Shipping Act 1854, and not repealed by the Merchant Shipping Act Repeal Act 1854, the modifications introduced by the above sections ought to be taken to have been incorporated into Lord Campbell's Act, and that, being so incorporated, they must subsist, notwithstanding the repeal of the above sections by the Merchant Shipping Amendment Act 1862. I must confess that, in the complication of these Acts, I felt at the time when this case was argued to some degree embarrassed by this argument; but, in considering it, I am satisfied that it cannot be supported. The modification introduced by these sections is not, in terms, incorporated into Lord Campbell's Act. It must, no doubt, have affected that Act so long as it subsisted; but when it was destroyed, its effect must have ceased; otherwise the consequence would be that, where any provision of an Act of Parliament has been modified by a subsequent Act, the modification could not be altered without at the same time repealing or altering the original Act—a proposition which cannot, I think, be maintained. With respect to the Act 13 & 14 Vict. c. 21, providing that where a statute which has repealed other statutes is itself repealed, the repeal of it shall not, without express enactment, operate to revive the statutes which have been repealed by it—a provision on which some argument was attempted to be raised on the part of the app's, I do not think that it has any bearing upon this case, there not being, in my opinion, as I have already stated, any repeal of Lord Campbell's Act. The argument on the part of the app's upon this point, if pushed to its consequences, would go this length—that Lord Campbell's Act was repealed by the Merchant Shipping Act 1854, sects. 504 & 505, and was not revived by repeal of those sections by the Merchant Shipping Act Amendment Act 1862, and that these Acts, being in the negative only, the repeal have no remedy—a consequence which, in my opinion, goes far, independently of what he already said, to show that it was not intended to repeal Lord Campbell's Act, or that, if it was intended, it was intended also that the subsequent although expressed in the negative, should operate in the affirmative, and either of these views be fatal to this appeal. The app's also place value on the general policy of the law in favour of the shipping interest as evidenced by early limiting the liability of shipowners; but these were prior to the passing of Lord Campbell's Act and were repealed by the Merchant Shipping Act 1854. They furnish, therefore, no evidence of the policy of the law after the passing of Lord Campbell's Act, except that the repeal of it was certainly not favourable to the app's view. I add, too, that we can only judge of the policy of an Act of Parliament from the words in which it is expressed. For the reasons which I have stated, my opinion is, that these appeals are altogether groundless, and ought to be dismissed with costs.

Lord Justice Knight Bruce was of the same opinion.

Appeal dismissed with costs, but the app's varied by inserting in the declaration of damages the words limiting that liability to not exceeding "15l. a ton."

SCHOTSMANN AND ANOTHER v. THE LANCASHIRE & YORKSHIRE RAILWAY COMPANY AND OTHERS.

Vendor and purchaser—Goods—Stoppage in transit—Delivery—Insolvency.

The possession by a purchaser of goods of the title-deeds thereof puts an end to a vendor's right to stop the goods in transitu.

There may be not only actual delivery, but also delivery of goods to a purchaser or owner there such virtual delivery may be equivalent to as one. But the putting of goods on board a general carrier, as to the actual delivery of them, in the way than to place them within the control of the captain of the vessel; and the fact that the title of such a ship is appointed by the owner of the goods does not make him more the agent for the delivery of them than if he had been appointed by any person.

If, therefore, a ship is a general trading vessel and is not sent out for the express purpose of receiving the goods, the delivery of them on board such a general ship amounts only to the putting under the control of the captain of it, and not to the actual delivery of the goods to the owner.

The signature by the master of a vessel of a bill of lading of goods, and the retention by him of the bill, the others being returned to the shipper, held not to amount to a virtual delivery of the goods to the captain, or the agent of the consignee.

an is said to be insolvent, it does not mean a must be evidence of some particular act of y or bankruptcy on his part; but merely that in a position to pay his debts.

It was instituted for the purpose of obtaining a declaration of the court that the plts. were to have certain flour delivered up to them; or, alternatively, to a lien on the purchase-money thereof; for an injunction to restrain the railway company, from parting with the flour for a direction that damages might be paid in respect of so much of the flour as was removed from the control of the defts.

The facts of the case were shortly these: In the month of July 1864, Schotsmann, who was at that time carrying on business at Lille, entered into a contract to sell 1870 sacks of flour to a person named Cunliffe, who carried on business at Goole, in Yorkshire, under the style of "James Fort and Co." Messrs. Delafosse, of Rouen (as Schotsmann's agent), shipped the flour on board the Londos, which was a general trader, one of several steamers regularly employed between Goole and the Continent, and under the management of the firm of Watson, and Co., commission, shipping, and forwarding agents. Cunliffe was also a partner in the firm of Delafosse and Co., but the business of the two firms was conducted separately. As the flour was shipped, the master of the ship issued four bills of lading, all dated the 18th July 1864. One of the bills he kept in his own pocket, and he returned the other three to Messrs.

The bills were for the delivery of the flour to Messrs. Fort and Co., or their assigns, he or they paying the freight.

On the 30th Sept. 1864 the Messrs. Delafosse returned one of the bills to them as delivered to Messrs. J. Fort and Co., but only to Emille Cunliffe, or to his order.

(Signed)

FREDERIC DELAFOSSE.

The bill, so indorsed, was delivered to Schotsmann by him indorsed over to Craig, as his agent. The Messrs. Delafosse subsequently forwarded the other two bills of lading to Craig. The contract was made by the Messrs. Delafosse in ignorance of their having heard that the Messrs. Fort and Co. were in embarrassed circumstances, although no positive act of insolvency on their part was shown to have been then committed. The first act alleged was the dishonour, on the 18th July 1864, of a bill of exchange accepted by them on that day the Londos arrived in the Humberside, as the agent of Schotsmann, stopped the flour in transitu, and gave notice to the master of the ship that he had taken. In spite of that notice (which the defts.' company was also served) the flour was warehoused by them in the name of Messrs. Fort and Co., and they refused to surrender the bills. It was alleged by the defts. that the flour of it had been subsequently sold and delivered to the purchasers by order of James Fort

On the 11th Oct. 1864 the firm of James Fort and Co. and Cunliffe, were adjudicated bankrupts, and left. Banner was in November appointed assignee.

Under those circumstances this suit was instituted by a bill in which prayed a declaration to the effect as above stated.

At the trial, Q. C., Eddis, and C. P. Brett appeared for the defts., and contended as follows:—Actual delivery of goods to the owner put an end to the right of stoppage in transitu as to them; here, however, there was no such delivery, inasmuch as the flour was not handed to Cunliffe or his agent, and therefore the plt. was entitled to stop the flour, as his agent Craig had done, in transitu. They cited

Jessel, Q. C., and Lorence Bird, for the defts., the railway company, directed the attention of the court to the peculiar position in which they were placed in the case, and contended that, as against them, the plt. had no equity to the relief prayed by the bill in the suit. They cited

W. H. Terrell for Cunliffe.

The MASTER of the ROLLS.—I think the principle of these cases is not much in dispute. The difficulties in them generally arise on questions of fact. It will not, I apprehend, be questioned on either side that in every case where there is a contract for the sale of goods, the property in the goods passes to the vendee as soon as they are delivered for his benefit to any common carrier, subject to the right of stoppage in transitu before the actual or virtual delivery and possession of the goods take place. The only real question here is this: whether there was an actual or virtual delivery of the goods when they were put on board the ship at Rouen? Because, if there was not, the stoppage in transitu clearly took place on the morning before they were delivered at Goole. A proposition has been stated on behalf of the defts. which will not, I think, be disputed by anybody—viz., that if a vendee of goods sends his own ship for the goods, and they are delivered on board that ship, that is an actual delivery of the goods to the vendee, and the stoppage in transitu is at an end. That is what I consider the decision in Ogle v. Atkinson practically amounts to. There may also be an actual delivery, although the ship is not the ship of the vendee. For instance, if the purchaser sends over an agent on his behalf to receive the goods for him, and they are delivered to his agent in his character of agent for the purchaser, then there is an actual delivery of the goods, and the stoppage in transitu is at an end. Now, a very material point in this case consists in this: whether there was, in the absence of anything to the contrary, an actual delivery to the owner of the ship, assuming the ship to be a general ship with a general cargo? In the case of Ogle v. Atkinson the purchaser of the goods expressly sent his own ship for the goods, and the captain was sent as the agent of the purchaser to receive them. The court in that case held, that as soon as the goods were put on board the ship they were actually delivered to the captain, as the particular agent of the purchaser. It is true that other goods were afterwards taken on board; but the ship was sent expressly for the purpose of receiving the goods sold, and that case was, consequently, analogous to the one put by Mr. Bird, of a carrier being the purchaser, and sending one of his ordinary carrier waggons to receive the goods. In that case no one could doubt that the delivery would be perfect. If the ship is a general ship the case of Mitchell v. Ede determines that it stands precisely in the situation of a common carrier; and the fact that the ship which is used as a common carrier is the property of the vendee, does not make the mere placing of the goods on board a delivery. I admit that it is a very material part of the debts' case, that there may be a virtual delivery which would be the same thing as an actual delivery. If the bills of lading had been sent to Mr. Cunliffe, then I apprehend that the stoppage in transitu would, so soon as he had got the bills, have been at an end. So also, if the bills had been delivered to an agent of his on board the vessel. The possession of the title-deeds (if I may so say) would have put an end to the stoppage in transitu. I do not think that the evidence here amounts to such a case. What occurred was this: when the goods were put on board the captain signed four bills of lading; he then delivered three of them to Messrs. Delafosse and Co., as the shippers, and retained one himself. If Messrs. Delafosse had delivered all the bills of lading to the captain, that would have been a virtual delivery to Mr. Cunliffe, or his agent. But the mere retention by the captain of one of the bills cannot be treated in the same view, unless it was retained by him under an express arrangement that it should be considered as an actual delivery. There is, I think, an analogy between the present case and that of Mitchell v. Ede, though that case was not one of vendor and purchaser. There the captain had signed the bill of lading and had delivered it to the shipper. But suppose the captain had afterwards made another bill of lading, signed it, and kept it in his own possession, as he might have done; would that have made any difference in the decision of that case? It is clear, according to the opinion of Sir John Campbell, who argued the case, that if the bill of lading had been delivered by the shipper to the captain, the ownership of the goods would have passed; or, in a case like the present, the right of stoppage in transitu would have determined. But it is impossible to say that the captain, who might, if he had chosen, have made a bill of lading the next day without the sanction of the shipper, could by such means have created a transfer of the property contrary to the intention of the shipper. So here, also; the mere making, signing, and retention of a bill of lading would not take away the shipper's right of stoppage in transitu; it not being done with his sanction, and not being done with the intention of constituting thereby a virtual delivery of the goods. It is important to observe, and it should always be borne in mind, that there is a distinction between Mr. Cunliffe or Messrs. James Fort and Co., and Messrs. Watson, Cunliffe, and Co. They are two distinct sets of persons. It is very true that Mr. Cunliffe was (if I may so say) the sole partner in one firm; and that he was partner with another person in the other firm. But they are totally separate and distinct characters, and in courts of law we have constantly to deal with that circumstance. One man frequently unites in his own person different characters. He may be a consignee and an executor, but what he does as executor does not effect what he does as consignee. This vessel was a vessel that was duly advertised as a trading vessel between Goole and Rouen, by Messrs. Watson, Cunliffe, and Co., for the common carriage of goods. Therefore it appears to me that this was not a vessel sent by Cunliffe for the reception of those goods, but that he was a mere common carrier. The expression in Cunliffe's answer having reference to that is as follows: "I admit that Messrs. Delafosse did thereupon, and in fact (but whether or not as the agents of and in behalf of the plt. Emile Schotsmann, I cannot set forth as to my belief or otherwise), on or about the 28th Sept. 1864, ship 1870 sacks of wheat flour on board a screw steamer called the Londos, and that (that is, he admits that) "the said Londos was then bound from Rouen to Goole; that she was loading and advertised to be trading between those ports; that she brought over from Rouen to Goole a general cargo; that Messrs. Watson, Cunliffe, and Co. were the agents and consignees of the said ship; and that Thomas Woodhead was the master thereof." Now I mean to allow this, that if Cunliffe, hearing that the flour had been purchased for him, he sent this ship expressly for the purpose of taking that flour, and had so informed Messrs. Delafosse and Co., though he had taken in other goods and another cargo, then this case would have come within the case of Oyle v. Atkinson. There would then have been an actual delivery the moment the goods were put on board the vessel. But having regard to the description of the vessel, I am of opinion that, unless the goods were intended to be delivered to some express agent of the vendor, there was no delivery by putting them on board the ship. Putting them on board the ship is nothing more than this, that it is necessarily putting them within the control of the captain; and the fact that the captain of the ship is appointed by the owner does not make him more the agent for the receipt of the goods than if any other person had appointed him. The whole question in the case resolves itself into this, whether the ship was a trading ship generally, or was specially sent out for the express purpose of receiving these goods? If not, the delivery of them on board the ship is only delivering them to the captain, who has the control of the ship. He is only the agent for the owner for the general purposes of the ship, and not for the express purpose of receiving the goods, unless he has been expressly deputed for that purpose. I have admitted that if all the bills of lading had been delivered to the master in this case, as the agent of the vendee, for the purpose of transferring the property, there would have been a virtual delivery of the goods, which would have put an end to the stoppage of them in transitu. But I think the evidence in this case does not amount to that. The evidence which is stated is only this: "The master on the 28th Sept. signed four bills of lading of the flour, one of which he retained, and the other three of which he handed back to the said Messrs. Delafosse." I find no other evidence on that subject. But Mr. Jessel, in pointing out the extremely meagre character of the evidence on that point, wanted to bring me to this conclusion, that I must assume everything that was not proved, against the plts. I am not of that opinion. If the debts rely on the virtual delivery of the goods, it is for them to prove it. In the absence of evidence the presumption is the other way. On the other points I am also of opinion for the plts. The fact that three days after the stoppage in transitu Cunliffe dishonoured his acceptance, is evidence of his insolvency at the time at which the stoppage took place. When a man is said to be insolvent, it does not mean that there must be evidence of some particular act of insolvency or bankruptcy, but merely that he is not then in a position to pay his debts. I am of opinion, also, that the court has jurisdiction over the railway company in respect of the goods which they allowed to pass out of their control. An injunction could have been applied for: and their parting with the property after notice given to them not to do so constitutes the very case which Sir Hugh Cairns' Act was passed to meet. I must therefore make a declaration that the plt. Schotsmann is entitled to a sum up the cargo of the flour, or the produce thereof, subject to the freight and charges. There must be inquiries, what is the amount of the unpaid purchase-money, and what is due in respect thereof, and as to what has become of the flour? and if any part has been sold otherwise than by order of the court, what it produced, and by whom the proceeds have been received? The costs of the plt. Schotsmann up to and including the hearing must be added to his security.

JOSEPH GEORGE CHURCHWARD v. THE QUEEN (Petition of Right).

Petition of right—Admiralty contract for postal mail service—Nature of.

*The suppliant contracted with Her Majesty's Commissioners of the Admiralty to convey Her Majesty's mails from C. to D., during the continuance of the contract, and the commissioners for and on behalf of Her Majesty agreed to pay the suppliant from and out of the moneys to be provided by Parliament 18,000*l.* per year; the contract to continue from the date until A.D. 1870:*

Held, that there was no obligation on the part of the commissioners to employ the suppliant under the contract. Parliament not having provided moneys for the payment.

This was a petition of right.

The petition stated that by articles of agreement made the 26th April 1859, between the Admiralty of the first part, and the suppliant J. G. Churchward of the second part, it was, among other things, witnessed that, in consideration of the payments thereafter stipulated to be made to the petitioner, he did, for himself, &c., covenant, &c., with the said commissioners (of the Admiralty), that he would, during the continuance of the said contract, diligently and faithfully, and to the satisfaction of the said commissioners for the time being, convey in the manner in the said agreement specified, Her Majesty's mails, which should at any time or times, and from time to time by the said commissioners, or Her Majesty's Postmaster-General, or any of the officers or agents of the said commissioners, &c., be required to be conveyed from Dover to Calais, and from Calais to Dover, and from Dover to Ostend, and from Ostend to Dover, as thereafter mentioned, and the said commissioners, in consideration of the premises, &c., did, for and on behalf of Her Majesty, agree with him that they, on behalf of Her Majesty, would pay, or cause to be paid to him, by bills, payable by Her Majesty's Postmaster-General, in seven days from and after the respective dates thereof, a sum out of moneys to be provided by Parliament, after the rate of 18,000*l.* per annum, by quarterly payments, &c., and that it was further agreed that the said contract should commence on the day of the date thereof, and should continue in force until the 26th April 1870, and should then determine if either of the parties should have given to the other of them twelve months' previous notice in writing of its being their intention that the same should so determine, &c. The petitioner then averred that he entered upon the performance of the said agreement, and did convey Her Majesty's mails in accordance with the said agreement until the breach of covenant hereinafter mentioned, and that, although he, his officers, servants, and agents, have at all times strictly and punctually performed the covenants, &c., and he has always been ready and willing to perform the said agreement, yet the said commissioners did not nor would allow or permit, and did not nor would observe or perform the said agreement on their part, and have broken the same in this; that they have omitted, neglected, and refused to employ the petitioner to carry the said mails, and did not nor would permit him to continue to perform the said agreement, &c., and have thereby prevented him from earning, and deprived him of the moneys, gains and profits, which he would otherwise have derived and acquired therefrom, and by reason of the premises he has been deprived of the benefits, while he remains subject to the burden, of a certain lease of certain premises situate at Dover, dated the 2nd July 1859, granted to him by the said commissioners, and which were with the knowledge of the commissioners taken by him for the purpose of carrying out the said agreement. The petition stated other losses as consequent upon the nonfulfilment by the commissioners of their agreement, and he therefore humbly prayed that the sum of 126,000*l.* may be paid to him as compensation for the damages and losses he has sustained, and that Her Majesty would be pleased to indorse upon the petition "Let right be done."

To this petition the Attorney-General pleaded on behalf of the Crown.

The second plea (which is the material one) set out the articles of agreement verbatim, the only material portion of which, as far as concerns the present question, was a portion of the ninth paragraph, which ran as follows:

And the said commissioners, in consideration of the premises and of the contractor, his officers, servants, and agents, at all times strictly and punctually performing the covenants and agreements hereby entered into by the contractor, do for and on behalf of Her Majesty, her heirs and successors, agree with the contractor that they, the said commissioners, on behalf of Her Majesty, will pay, or cause to be paid to the contractor, by bills payable by Her Majesty's Postmaster-General in seven days from and after the respective dates thereof, a sum out of moneys to be provided by Parliament, after the rate of 18,000*l.* per annum, by quarterly payments, and with a proportionate part thereof should this contract terminate on any other day than a day of payment, &c.

The third plea stated that the said articles of agreement were in the foregoing words, and that the breaches in the said petition mentioned were committed after the 2nd June 1863, and that the claim made by the suppliant is by virtue of the said articles of the 26th April 1859, and that the suppliant is the same Joseph George Churchward, and the articles of the 26th April 1859 are respectively the same as Joseph George Churchward and the contract bearing date the 26th April 1859 in the statute of the 26 & 27 Vict. c. 99, and the statute 27 & 28 Vict. c. 73, and that no moneys were ever provided by Parliament for the payment of the suppliant for or out of which the suppliant could be paid for the performance of the said contract for any part of the said period subsequent to the 20th June 1863, or for the payment to the suppliant for or in respect of or out of which the suppliant could be paid or compensated for or in respect of any damages sustained by the suppliant by reason of any of the breaches of the said contract committed subsequent to the said 20th June 1863.

There was also a demurrer to the petition as being bad in substance.

The suppliant also demurred to the second and third pleas.

By sect. 15 of the 26 & 27 Vict. c. 99 (the Appropriation Act of 1863), there is this provision :

And any sum or sums of money, not exceeding 950,000*l.*, to defray the charge of the Post-office packet service, which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st March 1864, which sum includes provision for payments to Mr. Joseph George Churchward for the conveyance of mails between Dover and Calais, and Dover and Ostend, from the 1st April 1863 to the 20th June 1863, but no part of which sum is to be applicable or applied in or towards making any payment in respect of the period subsequent to the 20th June 1863 to the said Mr. Joseph George Churchward, or to any person claiming through or under him by virtue of a certain contract, bearing date the 20th April 1859, made between the Lords Commissioners of Her Majesty's Admiralty (for and on behalf of Her Majesty) of the first part, and the said Joseph George Churchward of the second part, or in or towards the satisfaction of any claim whatsoever of the said Joseph George Churchward by virtue of that contract, so far as relates to any period subsequent to the 20th June 1863.

By sect. 17 of the 27 & 28 Vict. c. 73 (the Consolidation Fund Appropriation Act of 1864), there is another grant for the Post-office packet service, with a similar restriction against applying any part thereof to any payment to Mr. Joseph George Churchward in respect of any period subsequent to the 20th June 1863.

Sir Hugh Cairns, Q. C. (Bovill, Q. C. and Hannen with him) now appeared for the suppliant; and

The Attorney-General (the Solicitor-General and Poulden with him) for the Crown.

As the judgments of the learned Judges go very fully into all the disputed points, it is unnecessary to give the arguments of counsel.

COCKBURN, C. J.—The discussion which has taken place, and the elaborate and able arguments which we have had the advantage of hearing, have thrown so much light upon the case, and have tended so completely to dissipate any difficulty or doubt which at one time may have weighed upon my mind, that, however great may be the interests concerned, and whatever may be the importance of the case, we should gain nothing by taking further time to consider it; and we shall probably best consult the general convenience by at once giving our judgment upon it. It is necessary at the outset to look carefully to see what is the true substance of this petition. I take it that the real matter of complaint is the breach by the Lords of the Admiralty of an alleged contract to employ the suppliant, Mr. Churchward, to carry the mails between Dover and the ports of Calais and Ostend, and also to do certain services connected with, and subordinate to, that which was the main and principal contract. When we come to consider the contract, in order to see whether it involves an obligation, on which the petition mainly rests, to employ Mr. Churchward in the manner mentioned, we shall find that the contractor, in consideration of certain sums to be paid to him, in the first place the subsidy of 18,000*l.* a-year, and other minor sums, stipulated for incidental services, bound himself to the commissioners to provide and maintain certain steam-vessels of a certain tonnage and power, and cause them to make certain specific voyages between the ports referred to, and to convey in those vessels the mails which the Commissioners of the Admiralty or the Post-office might require to be carried; and he engaged, also, to do certain other things in connection with, and in subordination to, the main matter of the contracts. In the first place, he is to provide vessels when required for the passage of distinguished persons, and also to provide vessels specially for the transmission of the Bombay and China mails when they happen to be too late for the ordinary mails. He is also to keep in readiness steamers at Calais to land the mails when the state of the tide does not allow of communication with the harbour. All these matters, however, are subordinate to the main subject of the contract. On the other hand, the Commissioners of the Admiralty, in consideration of the services thus to be rendered by Mr. Churchward, the contractor, engaged to pay him a subsidy of 18,000*l.* a-year out of funds to be provided by Parliament. The petitioner alleges in his petition that the Lords Commissioners of the Admiralty have broken their contract in respect of this, that they have not employed him to carry the mails or to perform these other services, whereby he alleges he has been prevented from earning the reward which otherwise would have accrued to him by the performance of the contract on his part. Now, on the part of the Crown, this obligation of the commissioners to employ Mr. Churchward for the purposes of the services in question (on which obligation the petition rests) is denied, and we are to determine whether there is in this contract, either by express provision or by necessary implication, any such obligation on the part of the Commissioners of the Admiralty, who in this purpose must be deemed to be the agent of the Crown. I have stated the substance of the contract, and it appears clearly that there is no such express covenant. But, then, on the part of the petitioner it is alleged it must be necessarily implied. And that is the question—the only question—which we are called upon to determine. Sir H. Cairns has, indeed, in his able argument pressed it upon us that the complaint was not founded only upon the refusal to employ the petitioner in carrying the mails, but also in respect of the other matters. But the larger and more general complaint appears to be only an amplification of the main and more material one—the refusal to allow him to carry the mails. But, taking it in its larger sense and giving it the full construction for which Sir H. Cairns contends, it can amount to no more than this, that, whereas the petitioner, the contractor, has undertaken to perform certain services in respect of which he is to be employed by the Admiralty, and in consequence of which employment he is to claim certain remuneration, the Admiralty have not employed him in respect of every one of these services. Therefore that brings us back to the question whether there is any obligation on the part of the Admiralty to deliver the mails to Mr. Churchward, and to convey them and do all the other services which in the aggregate make up the consideration for the contract on the part of the Crown. Now, that being so, we come to the question whether in this contract, there being no such term expressed, it can be properly and reasonably implied; for, if it cannot, there is no obligation on the commissioners to employ Mr. Churchward in respect of these services which he bound himself by his covenants to perform; and then this petition, which is based entirely upon the contrary

CHURCHWARD v. THE QUEEN.

tion of that obligation, of necessity fails. Now, in considering this question, I entirely concur in the proposition laid down by Sir H. Cairns, that although the contract may appear upon the face of it to be obligatory only on one party—there are occasions on which we must imply, though the contract is silent about it, a corresponding and correlative obligation on the part of the other party in whose favour alone it may appear on the face of it to be drawn. No doubt, where the act to be done by the party binding himself can only be done by something of a corresponding character being done by the opposite party, a corresponding obligation to do the thing necessary for the completion of the contract can be implied. Thus, if a man engages to do work and render service which necessitates a great outlay of money and time and trouble, and he is only to be paid by the measure of the work which he has performed, it necessarily pre-supposes an obligation on the part of the person to whom he engages to do the work or render the service to allow it to be done, for otherwise the other party could not earn his remuneration. But in all such cases we must take care not to make a contract speak where it is intentionally silent, and, above all, not to make it speak contrary to what appears from the whole tenor and terms of the contract to be its real meaning. Taking this as the sound and safe rule of construction, I will proceed to consider how far, upon the contract, we are at liberty to imply that covenant on the part of the Admiralty on which the petition necessarily rests. The case may be looked at in two points of view; either with the addition of the condition that the payments under the contract are to be made out of funds provided by Parliament; or without the addition of that condition. The way in which the case was put, apart from that condition, was this,—The contractor has engaged to prepare and provide vessels at a great expense, and he cannot be paid unless he actually performs his contract by conveying the mails, and that although there is no express stipulation by the commissioners to employ him it must be implied. At first sight there is something very striking in this view, but I think, when we come to consider the terms of the contract, we shall see that it is founded on an hypothesis altogether fallacious, and upon a reading which appears to me to be inadmissible. The way in which Sir H. Cairns invites us to read the contract is, not that the contractor is bound to convey all the mails which he may be required to convey, but all the mails which the Admiralty or the Post-office may require to be conveyed between the ports mentioned. But I think that is altogether a mistake in the reading of the contract. It would involve this extraordinary consequence, that if a war arose in which it was expedient to send no mails except in vessels of war, that would be a breach of the contract. Or that, if it were thought more convenient to send the mails by some other route there would be a violation of the contract. But I cannot think that a true construction of the contract. The true construction of it is this, that the Post-office or the Admiralty are entitled to exact from the contractor that he shall have his vessels in readiness according to the terms of the contract, and shall carry all the mails which they may require him to carry between the ports in question. If that be so, the argument as to the necessity for implying this covenant, and that otherwise the contractor would not be entitled to any remuneration, wholly fails. If, indeed, the contract had been that the contractor should be paid not by way of annual subsidy, but according to the number of mails carried, then we might have implied the covenant which is contended for. But, according to my view, the meaning of the contract is, that so long as Mr. Churchward was prepared to carry out the contract, and had his vessels ready (supposing there was no question as to the funds out of which he was to be paid), he would be entitled to his remuneration, so that it is unnecessary to imply the covenant in question. Then arises the second view of the case, whether it makes any difference that there is that condition that the payments shall be out of funds to be provided by Parliament. Both sides relied upon it. Sir H. Cairns put the case thus:—That the contractor has relied upon the good faith of Parliament, and the high sense of national honour upon which Parliament always acts in making good the engagements which the Ministers of the Crown, or the heads of public departments, may have entered into. And that if this service had been allowed to be rendered Parliament would have found the funds, and that, therefore, an obligation on the part of the Admiralty was to be implied to allow him to render the service. That argument to some extent is met by the construction I feel myself bound to put upon the contract. For, if I am right in supposing that the contractor fulfils all that is required of him when he has his vessels ready to carry the mails, then he would have a good case to submit to Parliament. It may be said, however, that he would have a better and stronger claim when he has done the work. And therefore it may be that, if there were no other answer to the argument on the part of the suppliant, he might be entitled to succeed. But then we must look, on the other hand, to the consequences which would follow from the implication of such an obligation upon the Admiralty. These consequences were pointed out by the Attorney-General in the course of his powerful address, and were well worthy the most serious consideration. We start with this, that there is involved in the contract the possibility of Parliament refusing to find the funds. The Commissioners do not make themselves, or their department, or the Crown, answerable for default in payment of the 18,000*l.* a-year. It is left to Parliament to find the funds, and in that is necessarily involved the possibility of Parliament, in the exercise of its high powers and its wisdom, refusing so to do. And, in point of fact, we cannot shut our eyes to the fact (for it is sufficiently apparent on the face of the record and the Acts of Parliament) that Parliament has refused to find the funds for two successive years. From the Appropriation Acts we find not merely that Parliament has omitted to find the funds, but that Parliament has had the case before it, and has carefully provided for the exclusion of the claim from the funds it provided; and when we come to consider how far there was in this contract an intention on the part of the commissioners—to be implied from the other terms of the contract—to bind the Crown even in the event of Parliament not providing the funds, let us see what would be the position of all parties concerned if after Parliament refusing to find funds, the commissioners should have nevertheless continued to employ the contractor. First, the Government would have put itself in a position of antagonism with Parliament, and have virtually set at naught its authority. Secondly, a great public department would have continued to employ a public contractor in the public service without the means of paying him; for, though we are told that possibly in the course of future years Parliament might find the funds, we can hardly suppose that a Minister would be warranted in assuming such a possibility when, so far as experience has gone, Parliament has refused to find the funds; and it appears to me that to employ a public contractor without the means of payment (even if he were willing so to be employed) would be a course of proceeding altogether derogatory to the dignity of the Crown and the honour of the country. Thirdly, the contract certainly could not be enforced

CHURCHWARD v. THE QUEEN.

[Q. B.]

under those circumstances by the public department; for, supposing that Parliament refused to find the funds to pay the contractor, he would surely be entitled to resist the enforcement of the contract. A court of equity would probably relieve him against it if it were attempted to enforce it under such circumstances, and probably even a court of law might deem the provision of the funds by Parliament a "condition precedent" to the obligation; and at all events, it is impossible to suppose that a jury would give more than nominal damages. Therefore the practical result would be that, upon Parliament refusing to find the funds, the Admiralty would not be in a position to enforce the contract. Could, then, the contractor enforce it? Such a state of things we cannot suppose to have been intended, and we cannot therefore, imply a covenant which should have such consequences. I am far from saying that if, by express terms, the Admiralty had engaged, whether Parliament provided the funds or not, to employ Mr. Churchward to perform these services, a petition of right would not lie if that contract were broken. In this case, however, there is, it is clear, no such express contract, and we are called upon to imply it. I have described the consequences which would follow from such a contract if it were express, and cannot suppose that a public department, representing the Crown, and entering into such a contract, and knowing that they could only pay the contractor out of the funds provided by Parliament, would, nevertheless, bind themselves to employ him, notwithstanding that they had no funds out of which to pay him. Such a course would be clearly inconsistent with the dignity of the Crown or the honour of the country, and it would involve the department in the greatest difficulty with Parliament, if, notwithstanding the refusal of Parliament to find the funds, they should persist in employing the contractor. Looking at these considerations, and also to the fact that another department, the Post-office, had control over the mails, it is unreasonable to suppose that the Admiralty could ever have intended to enter into any such engagement. Let us put the matter to this plain and practical test. Suppose the Admiralty had been required to insert such a stipulation in express terms, that they would continue to employ the contractor notwithstanding that Parliament should refuse to find the funds. Can any reasonable person suppose that the Admiralty, with the startling and anomalous consequences which must ensue thus brought before them, would have assented to such a covenant? And if every one's own good sense must tell him that they would not, how can we imply a covenant on their part which we are morally certain they would never have agreed to? If we were to introduce this term into the contract, we should be violating the sound rule of construction—not to make a contract speak where it is intentionally silent; and still less, to make it say that which it is manifest, from the whole tenour of the contract, the parties never intended to say. I think, therefore, that as the whole case turns upon whether there was this engagement on the part of the Admiralty—that this petition of right fails, and that there must be judgment for the Crown. I agree that if there were no question as to the fund, or if there had been a fund provided applicable to the contract, and if the petitioner, being ready to perform his contract, had been prevented from doing so by the Admiralty, then he would have been entitled to sustain a claim for remuneration. But then it must have been one quite different from the present, and founded on his right to receive the subsidy. But that is not so. Parliament having refused to provide the funds, he is not in a position to claim the subsidy, and is compelled to base his complaint upon a covenant supposed to be implied, and on which he claims damages. For the reason I have stated I am of opinion that no such covenant can be implied, and that, therefore, as that is the basis of the claim, there must be judgment for the Crown.

MELLOR, J. said he was of the same opinion. It was not contended, he said, that the petition, without alleging that Parliament had provided funds, could sustain a claim for nonpayment of the subsidy; but his case was that there was an implied covenant to let him convey the mails, and that he was entitled to damages for its breach. But it could not be conceived that the Admiralty intended whatever might be the change of circumstances, the discoveries or improvements in science to themselves, for ten years to come, to send the mails by the vessels of Mr. Churchward. And in considering a question of implication, it was very material to bear in mind the nature of the contract and the position of the contracting party. It was not reasonable to imply such a covenant on the part of a great public department with reference to a great branch of the public service. In any point of view the petition must rest upon such an implication, and as he was unable to draw that implication, he thought there must be judgment for the Crown.

SHEE, J.—The claim, in substance, is that the Admiralty have broken their covenant by not allowing the contractor to carry the mails. But there is no such covenant in terms, and it cannot be reasonably implied. This case stands upon a different footing from those cited—cases of private contracts; and the Appropriation Act afforded a defence. It was notorious that the Crown could only contract for payment subject to funds being found by Parliament. The condition of Parliamentary sanction was usually imposed upon Government contractors by some such condition contained in this contract, and such was the result upon the justice and honour of Parliament, that the Queen's subjects were not prevented by that condition from entering into such contracts. The inconvenience, such as it was, attached to matters of far more importance than Post-office contracts. Treaties with foreign powers, involving the honour and liability of the Crown, are often dependent upon the acceptance by Parliament of the obligations contracted and the provision of the requisite funds. And a few years ago the fulfilment by the Crown of a treaty between Her Majesty and a co-belligerent—containing a pecuniary guarantee by the Crown—was imperilled by some opposition in the House of Commons and only saved by a majority of three. It was beyond the power of the Admiralty, as the contractor must have known, to contract on behalf of the Crown on any terms but those on which this contract is limited; and I am clearly of opinion that the provision of funds by Parliament would be a condition precedent. The most important department of the public service would be entirely free from the control of Parliament, if this condition were not given effect to. And I am, moreover, of opinion that the direct enactments in these two Appropriation Acts afford a defence to the suit, and that a judgment for the petitioner would be an express violation of those enactments. On these grounds I am of opinion that there must be judgment for the Crown.

LUSH, J. said he also was of the same opinion. The question was whether there was a contract on the part of the Crown, absolute and without any qualification or condition, to employ the contractor for eleven years in the carrying of these mails. It was admitted that there was no express contract to that effect, and the question is whether it can be implied.

ar that it could not, and that therefore be judgment for the Crown.

Judgment for the Crown.

said goods and merchandise to persons not entitled to receive the same, to wit, to persons other than the said persons in the third plea mentioned and other than the plt.; and the plt.
further says, that the said bill of lading was indorsed by the plt., as in the said third plea mentioned in blank and not otherwise, and was delivered to the said indorsees thereof by the said plt. so indorsed in blank, which is the indorsement in the said third plea mentioned; and that after such indorsement, and whilst the said indorsees thereof in the said plea mentioned were the lawful holders thereof, they, with the intent to pass and revest the property in the said goods and merchandise, to and in the plt. thereby, redelivered the said bill of lading so indorsed in blank to the plt. with such intent as aforesaid, and so as to pass and revest the said property, and all rights of action in respect of the said goods to and in the plt.; and the plt. further says, that the said indorsement of the said bill of lading to the said persons in the said plea mentioned, was not made with intent to pass, and did not as between the plt. and the said indorsees pass the absolute property in and an indefeasible right to the said goods and merchandise to the said persons, but with intent and in pursuance of an agreement between them and the plt. to give them a right in the nature of a pledge upon and in respect of the said goods and merchandise, by way of further assurance to secure money advanced and paid by them to the plt.; and the plt. further says, that before and at the time of the said redelivery of the said bill of lading to the plt., the said money had been repaid to the said persons, and all claims of theirs upon or in respect of the said goods had been and were satisfied.

Demurrer to the second replication and rejoinder:

That the said indorsees in the said replication mentioned first redelivered the said bill of lading so indorsed in blank as therein mentioned to the plt. upon the alleged default of the defts. in the said replication mentioned, and not otherwise; and that at the time of the said alleged default the said in-dorsees were the holders of the said bill of lading, and the parties entitled to receive the said goods and merchandise, and to sue for the nondelivery thereof.

Demurrer to the above rejoinder. The following were the plt.'s points for argument: 1. That by force of the statute the plt. as indorsee of the bill of lading is entitled to sue for any breaches of the contract therein contained, even though those breaches happened before the reindorsement to the
plt. of the bill of lading, if in fact the said breaches have not been previously released or satisfied.
2. That its appearing on record that indorsement by the plt. of the bill of lading was by way of pledge only the right to sue remained in the plt., or at all events has been re-vested in him. 3. That there is no departure from the first count in the special replication thereto; that the bill of lading having been reindorsed to the plt. he may declare as if it had never passed from him, as he might have done had the instrument been a bill of exchange.

The defts.' points were:—1. That the third count of the declaration is bad, because it does not show that the bill of lading was reindorsed before the time for delivering the goods had elapsed. 2. That, at all events, it is sufficiently answered by the tenth plea, which shows that the indorsement took place after the alleged default. 3. That the Bills of Lading Act does not operate to transfer rights of action already existing at the time of the transfer. 4. That, after arrival of the ship and default made, the property in the goods did not pass to the plt. by the reindorsement of the bill of lading. 5. The defts. will also contend that the plt.'s second replication to the defts.' third plea is bad, for the following reasons: first, that it does not allege a reindorsement of the bill of lading before default; secondly, that it is a departure from the declaration. They will further contend that, at all events, it is sufficiently answered by the rejoinder thereto, which shows that the reindorsement took place after the alleged default.

Dowdswell for the plt.—The question is, if the indorsement of the bill of lading carried with it the right of action which had accrued at the time of the indorsement; and another point is, if the original consignor who afterwards becomes holder of the bill of lading is not re-mitted back to his original rights. In Thompson v. Darning, 14 M. & W. 403, followed by Howard v. Shepherd, 9 C. B. 207, it was held that the assignee of a bill of lading had no rights on the contract, and the only person, therefore, who could sue for breaches was the original consignor. That was felt to be a great inconvenience, and to remedy it the 18 & 19 Vict. c. 111 was passed, and I submit that it places the holder of a bill of lading in the same position as the holder of a bill of exchange. By sect. 1 of that Act it is enacted that "every consignee of goods named in a bill of lading and every indorsee of a bill of lading to whom the property in the goods therein mentioned shall pass upon or by reason of such consignment or indorsement, shall have transferred to and vested in him all rights of suit, and be subject to the same liabilities in respect of such goods as if the contract contained in the bill of lading had been made with himself." Therefore, as long as the property passed, all rights of suit vested in the holder of the bill of lading. Here, there having been default in delivering the goods while the bank in India was holder of the bill of lading, it is said that the plt. has no right under it. [WILLES, J.—If that were so, the Act would be useless, as, if you repay your money and get back the bill of lading, you are not to have a right of action on it.] Just so; I say we are in the same position as the holder of a bill of exchange, where there is never any question if the right of action had accrued before the indorsement. There would be endless difficulties if the contention of the other side was right, as a bill of lading may have been in fifty different hands, and there may have been several injuries to the goods at different times, and it might be impossible to say when any one of them occurred.

The Court called on

Sir G. Honyman for the deft.—There was a question as to departure, but I shall not trouble the court with that. It is admitted on the record that plt. indorsed the bill, so that the property in the goods passed to another person, and that he took back the bill after the goods were lost, and acted delivered to a third person. I say that it is every indorsement of a bill of lading which transfers the rights of action, and my contention here is that the property did not pass by the indorsement. The mere fact of writing on that which was a waste paper, or merely handing it back to the signor, did not pass the property:

Lickbarrow v. Maass, 1811, L. Q. 710, 713;

Wright v. Campbell, 4 Burr. 2046.

And from all the cases it seems that the bill of lading only operates to pass the property in goods while they are in transitu. There can be hardship in this case, as if the plt. has paid bank, he can sue in the bank's name. If this bill of lading carries with it the rights of action, it would be enabling the parties to assign an action over.

Dowdswell in reply.—There is no ground for saying that the voyage was terminated, and a lawful delivery of my goods does not divest the property in me. If the voyage was at an end, such a bill of lading would not pass the property; that does not appear on this record. All that appears on the declaration is, that they were delivered to the wrong party, and that might have been at the Cape.

Honyman.—If that is so, I should ask to insert the plea an averment of delivery at Bombay.

WILLES, J.—You can insert an averment of delivery on arrival.

Dowdswell.—That would not help the plt.: (de v. Dowle, 9 M. & W. 19, where it was held that plt. was entitled to a verdict on a plea of detinet where it appeared that the deft. had wrongfully delivered the goods to a third party.)

ERLE, C. J.—I am of opinion that our judgment should be for the plt. The bill of lading was indorsed in blank, and money was raised on it, there was no indorsee of the bill of lading, it was outstanding, and it was afterwards delivered to the plt., the original consignor, holder; and without recourse to the bill of lading the plt. had all the rights at common law of original contractor. But, independent of that, the party who took the bill of lading indorsed in blank might be said to take all the rights under it, the deft. by making a wrongful delivery of goods is not to put an end to the rights under bill of lading.

WILLES, J.—I am of the same opinion. The construction of the Act is, that the rights of contract may be transferred by indorsement of the bill of lading, and so long as the indorsement runs in force, so long do the rights of the indorsee continue. I agree that the deft. cannot better his position by pleading a wrongful delivery of goods to a third person.

KEATINGE, J.—I am of the same opinion. Wrongful delivery was no delivery, and the plt. is re-mitted to his original rights.

M. SMITH, J.—The true construction of the statute is, that the rights under the contract pass to one assignee to another, and the plt. is not deprived of his rights by a wrongful delivery to a deft. I see no reason why the bill of lading should not have been assignable, and the rights on contract with it.

THE ANGLO-AFRICAN COMPANY (LIMITED) v. LAMBEU AND OTHERS.

[C. P.]

Friday, Jan. 12, 1886.

THE ANGLO-AFRICAN COMPANY (LIMITED) v.
LAMBEU AND OTHERS.Charter-party—Stowage—Duty of shipowner to load a full cargo.

In an action on a charter-party against a shipowner for not loading a full cargo, the defendants in their plea set out the charter-party, which contained the clause, "Charterers's stowage to be employed by ship," and averred that they were ready and willing to employ the charterers's stowage, but the plaintiffs did not provide any stowage, and by reason of the default of the plaintiffs, the master of the ship was forced to and did load the cargo without the assistance of any stowage, and did load the same to the best of his skill and ability:

Held, on demurrer, that the clause in the charter-party gave the charterers the option of appointing a stowage, and that, if he did not exercise it, the shipowner was bound to load as much as the ship could reasonably carry, and that the plea was therefore no answer to the action.

The declaration was on the charter-party set out in the plea; and after setting out the effect of the charter-party it proceeded as follows:

And the plaintiffs say that the said ship loaded an outward cargo according to the said charter-party and thenceforth proceeded on the outward voyage and delivered the same according to the said charter-party, and that the plaintiffs were always ready and willing to ship a homeward cargo according to the said charter-party, and that before action brought all circumstances had happened, and all things had been done, and all things being necessary to enable the plaintiffs to have the said charter-party performed by the defendants, and to see them for the breach thereof hereinafter mentioned, yet the defendants, although not prevented by any of the escaped perils, made default in stowage of such lawful merchandise as was sent alongside the said ship at the ports mentioned in the charter-party not according to what the said ship could reasonably stow and carry over each above her tackle, apparel, provisions, and furniture, and by reason thereof a great part of the cargo provided for the said ship by the plaintiffs, and which the said ship could and ought to have loaded agreeably to the terms of the said charter-party was left behind, and by reason of the premises the plaintiffs were deprived of the profits they would have gained from the said merchandise being loaded on board the said ship agreeably to the terms of the said charter-party, and have been compelled to provide other means of transport for the same and to have otherwise been put to loss and inconvenience.

Fourth plea:

This plea and charter-party was and is of the tenor and effect following, that is to say:—London, 2nd May 1884. Charter-party. It is this day mutually agreed between Captain W. Kelly, master of the good ship or vessel called the St. George, on the one hand, and Messrs. Lambeu and Hayward, as agents for the Anglo-African Company (Limited), of London, merchants, on the other, that the said ship being tight, staunch, and strong, and every way fitted for the voyage, shall, with the crew, be sent to the West India Dock, and to any other port or ports therein as the cargo may safely get, and to be loaded from the factors of the said merchants with lawful merchandise as they may have to ship, and thenceforth proceed to Sierra Leone and the Island of Shoolie if required, and there deliver the same and unload such lawful merchandise as may be sent alongside at either port, which the said merchants and their agents to ship not according to what the said ship can reasonably stow and carry over and above her tackle, apparel, provisions, and furniture, and being so loaded, all thenceforth proceed to London, Bristol, or Liverpool or other port on signing bills of lading, or to near thereunto she may safely get, and deliver the same on being in freight at the rate of a lump sum of £400 for the cargo out and home, and five guineas grossly to the master, and the charterers's stowage to be employed by ship (the act of God, Queen's enemies, fire, and all and every other the dangers of accidents of the seas, rivers, and navigations of whatever nature, and kind cover during the said voyage, always excepted). The freight to be paid by as much cash as the charterers may require for ship's disbursement abroad, not counting this, to be advanced free of interest or commission, but subject to insurance, and remainder at final bill of discharge on area delivery of the cargo, one half of which and the other half by good and approved bill of exchange at two months date, or by cash at master's order, a fourteen working days are to be allowed the said vessel, and twenty running days for discharging and loading at Sierra Leone, Shoolie, and ten days on demurrage, over and above the said lading days at £4 per day; and the cargo to be discharged from alongside, as customary by the regular traders, and to be brought alongside at charterers's risk and expense, less on the cargo for freight, dead freight, and demurrage, penalty for non-performance of this agreement, estimated freight 1000, advance by charterers, commissions at two months date on signing bills of lading, subject to insurance out only, time consumed in shifting ports not to count as lay days. And the defendants say that, according to the form and effect of the said charter-party, a stowage was to be provided by the plaintiffs to reload and stow the said ship, which stowage was to be employed by the defendants for that purpose, and such stowage being so employed by the defendants as aforesaid, the defendants, according to the usage of merchants, would not be responsible or liable to the plaintiffs for or in respect of any default in such reloading and stowing, and the defendants were ready and willing to perform the said charter-party on their part, and to employ the charterers's stowage as therein agreed, whereas the plaintiffs had notice but the plaintiffs did not, nor would provide any stowage for the purpose of reloading and stowing the said homeward cargo according to the said charter-party, and by reason of the default of the plaintiffs in that behalf the master of the said ship was forced and obliged to, and did reload the said cargo without the assistance of any stowage, and did reload and stow the same to the best of his skill and ability, and that the plaintiffs alleged cause of action is for and in respect of the said ship not having reloaded as much merchandise for the said homeward cargo as she might have reloaded if a competent stowage had been provided and employed in and about the reloading and stowing of the said cargo, and the defendants say that the alleged breach of the said charter-party was caused by such default of the plaintiffs as aforesaid, and not otherwise.

Second replication to the fourth plea:

That before and at the time of making the said charter-party and thence until, and at the time of loading the homeward cargo, there was not any stowage or person carrying on the business of stowage at Sierra Leone or the Island of Shoolie, as the plaintiffs and the defendants, and the said William Kelly, and the said Messrs. Lambeu and Hayward respectively well knew at the time of making the said charter-party, but there was at the said West India Dock before and at the time of making the said charter-party and at the time of loading the outward cargo, a number of stowages, as the plaintiffs and the defendants, and the said William Kelly, and the said Messrs. Lambeu and Hayward well knew at the time of making the said charter-party.

Demurrer to the fourth plea.

The ground of demurrer stated in the margin was that the charter-party gives the charterers an option of appointing a stowage, but imposes on them no obligation to do so.

Demurrer to the second replication.

The ground of demurrer stated in the margin was, that the facts stated could not vary the contract of the parties.

Sir George Hoggan for the plaintiffs.—The question is, if there is anything in the facts stated to relieve the ship-owner from loading the cargo sent alongside by the charterers. The clause "charterers's stowage to be employed by ship" is the only thing that can be relied on, but it is the duty of the ship-owner to load the ship. In Sack v. Ford, 13 C. B., N. 8. 90, the Court held that the charterer has performed his duty when he has brought the cargo alongside, and in the absence of any express stipulation, the shipowner is bound to load it. These words cannot alter that duty, as they do not impose any obligation, but are only inserted for the benefit of the charterer. They merely amount to this, that if the charterer appoints a stowage, he is to load the ship. Even when a stowage is appointed by the charterer, he is under the control of the master, and he is to load as well as he can, and the master is to see that it is done so as not to endanger the ship.

The Court called on

Quinn for the defendants.—The breach is for not putting on board such a cargo as might have been put on board if a stowage had been appointed. [WILLES, J.—The plea alleges that it was loaded in the best manner the captain could do it, but it does not say that it was done in a reasonably skilful manner.] That is rather a special demurrer objection; it would, perhaps, to have alleged that it was done in a reasonably skilful manner as the captain was required to do it. That being so, the plea is an answer to the breach, and I submit that the master is not bound to appoint a stevedore unless there is a stipulation to that effect. Here the stevedore was to be appointed by the charterer, and if he does not name one, he cannot complain that more cargo might have been got into the ship. The plea and the declaration must be read together, and then the breach would be narrowed to that in the plea, that if a competent stevedore had been appointed this would not have happened.

Honyman, in reply, was not called upon.

ERLE, C. J.—The contract of the deft. is to load as much as the ship could reasonably carry. That is the ordinary duty of a shipowner chartering a ship, and I take it that in this case so much as the ship could carry was not loaded. That is a breach of the contract, and the plea is that the charterer's stevedore was to be employed by the ship, and you did not appoint a stevedore. It is clear that that is no defence; if it meant that as much was loaded as the ship could reasonably carry, it ought to have been a denial of the breach. It assumes that it was a condition precedent that the charterer should appoint a stevedore, but the stipulation was only to give the charterer the option of appointing a stevedore, and if he had exercised it the shipowner was bound to employ him; but if he did not, the shipowner was bound to stow as much as the ship could reasonably carry. For these reasons I think that the plea is no answer to the action.

WILLES, KEATING, and M. SMITH, JJ. concurred.

COURT OF EXCHEQUER.

Reported by H. LEIGH and E. LUMLEY, Esqrs., Barristers-at-Law.

Jan. 31 and Feb. 7, 1866.

WILSON v JONES

Marine insurance—Atlantic Telegraph cable—Perils insured against—Total loss.

The plt. by a policy of insurance, the material parts of which were as follows, caused himself to be insured: "Lost or not lost, at and from Ireland to Newfoundland, the risk to commence at and from and including the lading of the cable on board the Great Eastern, and to continue until the said cable be laid in one continuous length between Ireland and Newfoundland, and until 100 words shall have been transmitted from Ireland to Newfoundland, and vice versa, the risk on this policy then to cease and determine, upon any kind of goods and merchandises, and also upon the body, &c., of the good ship or vessel called the Great Eastern." . . . The policy then went on: "The said ship, &c., goods and merchandises, &c., for so much as concerned the assured by agreement between the assured and the assurers in this policy, are and shall be valued at 200l. on the Atlantic cable value, say, on twenty shares valued at 10l. per share; and it is hereby agreed and understood that this policy, in addition to all perils and casualties herein specified, shall cover every risk and contingency attending the conveyance and successful laying of the cable, from and including its lading on board the Great Eastern, until 100 words be transmitted from Ireland to Newfoundland, and vice versa, and it is distinctly declared and agreed that the transmission of the said 100 words from Ireland to Newfoundland, and vice versa, shall be an essential condition of this policy. Touching the adventures and perils which we the assurers are contented to bear, and do take upon ourselves in this voyage, they are of the seas, &c., and of all other perils, losses, and misfortunes that have or shall come to the hurt, &c., of the said goods, &c., and ship, &c., or any part thereof, &c." There was the usual memorandum found in the printed forms of marine policies at the end of the policy, concerning average losses. The Great Eastern had started with about 2200 miles of cable on board, and had laid from 1100 to 1200 miles, when a fault having been discovered, the cable was hauled in, and the strain being too great, it parted, and part went to the bottom. The Great Eastern then returned to port with the remainder:

Held, in an action on the policy, that the risk by which the loss occurred was a risk insured against by the policy, and that notwithstanding the preservation of the remaining part of the cable, the plt. might recover for a total loss.

Paterson v. Harris, 1 B. & S. 336; 5 L. T. Rep. N. S. 53, distinguished.

This was an action by a shareholder in the Atlantic Telegraph Company against an underwriter upon the policy of insurance, which appears below.

The declaration stated:

That the plt., by J. H. Joyce, his agent, by a policy of insurance bearing date the 29th day of July 1865, caused himself to be insured in the words and figures following (that is to say):—J. H. Joyce. In the name of God, Amen; as well in his own name as for and in the name and names of all and every other person to whom the same doth, may, or shall appertain, in part or in all, doth make assurance, and cause himself and them, and every of them, to be insured, lost or not lost, at and from Ireland to Newfoundland, the risk to commence at and from and including the lading on board the Great Eastern steamship, and to continue until the said cable be laid in one continuous length between Ireland and Newfoundland, and until one hundred words shall have been transmitted from Ireland to Newfoundland, and vice versa, the risk on this policy then to cease and determine, upon any kind of goods and merchandises, and also upon the body, tackle, apparel, ordnance, ammunition, artillery, boat, and other furniture of and in the good ship or vessel called the Great Eastern, whereof is master under God for this present voyage, or whoever else shall go for master in the said ship, or by whatsoever name or names the same ship, or the master thereof, is or shall be named or called, beginning the adventure upon the said goods and merchandises from the lading thereof aboard the said ship as above, upon the said ship, &c., including risk of craft, and so shall continue and endure during her abode there, upon the said ship, &c., and further until the said ship, with all her ordnance, tackle, apparel, &c., and goods and merchandises whatsoever shall be arrived at as above, upon the said ship, &c., until she hath moored at anchor twenty-four hours in good safety, and upon the goods and merchandises until the same be there discharged and safely landed, and it shall be lawful for the said ship, &c. in this voyage to proceed and sail to, and touch and stay at any port or places whatever, without prejudice to this insurance. The said ship, &c., goods and merchandises, &c., for so much as concerns the assured, by agreement between the assured and the assurers in this policy, are and shall be valued at 200l. on the Atlantic cable value, say twenty shares valued at 10l. per share (and it is hereby agreed and understood that this policy, in addition to all perils and casualties herein specified shall cover every risk and contingency attending the conveyance and successful laying of the cable from and including its lading on board the Great Eastern steamship until one hundred words be transmitted from Ireland to Newfoundland and vice versa; and it is distinctly agreed and declared that the transmission of the said one hundred words from Ireland to Newfoundland, and vice versa, shall be an essential condition of this policy). Touching the adventures and perils which we the assurers are contented to bear and do take upon ourselves in this voyage, they are of the seas, men-of-war, fire, enemies, pirates, rovers, thieves, jettisons, letters of mart and counter-mart, surprisals, takings at sea, arrests, restraints and detentions of all kings, princes, and people of what nation, condition, or quality soever, barratry of the master and mariners, and of all other perils, losses, and misfortunes that have or shall come to the hurt, detriment, or damage of the said goods and merchandises and ship, &c., or any part thereof; and in case of any loss or misfortune it shall be lawful to the assured, their factors, servants, and assigns, to sue, labour, and travel for in or about the defence, safeguard, and recovery of the said goods and merchandises, and ship, &c., or any part thereof, without prejudice to this insurance; to the charges whereof we, the assurers, will contribute, each one according to the rate and quantity of his sum herein assured. And it is agreed by us the insurers that this writing or policy of assurance shall be of as much force and effect as the surest writing or policy of

1. The deft. did not cause himself to be insured with the plt. 2. The plt. was not interested in the said cable as the said cable was not lost by the perils insured against in the policy. 3. The alleged loss of the said cable was an average loss within the meaning of the said policy, and the said ship during the voyage was not stranded.

The pleas issue was joined.

The policy was inclosed between brackets in the margin of the policy, and the fact, an ordinary printed form of policy with blanks to be filled up opposite to touching the adventures and perils, was tried before Martin, B., at the last Michaelmas assizes. It appeared that the deft. owned twenty shares in the Atlantic Cable Company, and had, through Joyce, a policy of insurance set out above. The cable sailed from Valentia on the 23rd July 1865, and 1100*l*. of cable on board. Between 1100*l*. of cable had been paid out, when, on the 2nd August, it was discovered to exist in the part of the cable which it became necessary to recover the cable to remedy the fault. To effect this, the cable was backed until all strain on the cable was taken off, and it was then hung right up and down, and it was then the bows and slowly hauled in, the cable turned right about, and gently steaming without any strain. The sea at the place where the cable was lost was about two miles in depth, and the cable caused by the suspension of the cable was very great. The result was, the cable and the part already laid went to the bottom, and several attempts were made to recover it, but in vain, as it was lifted a considerable distance, the weight broke the grappling iron by being raised, and it was again lost. The cable was afterwards returned to England with the cable on board.

The deft. in the company's prospectus put the loss occurred, that the part of the cable might be recovered, and that they hoped to recover and utilise both it and the cable.

The broker, Joyce, shortly after the loss of the cable, offered them to the def't.'s brokers, requiring payment for a total loss; they kept them a day or two, and then returned them.

A verdict was directed for the plt. for the full amount claimed, leave being reserved to the deft. to move to enter the verdict for himself, on the ground that the loss was not by the perils insured against, or to reduce the damages on the ground that the loss was an average loss only.

Brett, Q. C. accordingly obtained a rule nisi upon the 12th Jan. to set aside the verdict and enter it for the deft. on the ground that the loss was not any loss by the perils insured against, or if any, only an average loss, and there was no evidence that it was higher than 3 per cent.; and also to reduce the damages on the ground that the loss, if any, was only an average loss.

Jan. 31.—Temple, Q. C. and L. Temple showed cause against the rule.—With reference to the question whether this was a loss by the perils insured against, it is to be observed that the policy provides for every risk and contingency attending the conveyance and successful laying of the cable from and including its lading on board the Great Eastern until one hundred words be transmitted. With respect to the second question, namely, whether there was a total loss or not, the policy was upon the undertaking, not upon the cable. We have tendered them the shares; we do not deny, if we are entitled to recover for a total loss, that they are entitled to them. [POLLOCK, C. B.—Do you contend that nothing is to be allowed for the 1200 miles of cable saved?] Yes; for even if they can make use of it in laying the communication on a future occasion, it will be a new adventure. [MARTIN, B.—This was like a warranty that the cable should be safely laid down on that voyage.] They cited

Paterson v. Harris, 1 B. & S. 336; 5 L. T. Rep. N. S. 53.

Brett, Q. C. and Quain in support of the rule.—This is, no doubt, a case of great difficulty from the fact that an ordinary marine policy has been adopted. This document must, however, be construed according to the plain ordinary meaning of the words; and this court will feel itself bound to follow previous decisions upon the meaning of similar words in similar documents. The insurance is on the Atlantic cable; what follows about shares is only to render the policy a valued policy instead of an open one. If the shares were what was being insured, the language should have been, "that is to say, on twenty shares therein." [POLLOCK, C. B.—I cannot see how the doctrine of abandonment applies to the shares; the shares are still in existence, and of a definite value. If they were of no value, and the whole undertaking had been abandoned on the first failure, it might be different.] If you make it an insurance on shares, you make it an insurance upon an uninsurable matter. How can shares be insured against the peril of the sea? They never are put on board the ship or go on the voyage. The words in the margin are merely inserted to extend the risk until the transmission of the words. Even supposing it to be a policy on shares, then I say it is an insurance against their destruction by reason of the loss of the cable through the perils insured against. Then what are these perils? The words in the margin are relied on; but they must be read as if in the body of the instrument, and then they will be general words following specific words, and, according to the well-known canon of interpretation, must be confined to risks similar in kind to those specifically enumerated. They would not, at any rate, cover an accident arising from something inherent in the thing insured itself, and happening in the ordinary course of an ordinary voyage. [CHANNELL, B.—Here we have general words besides those in the margin; must we not give those in the margin some further meaning?] A marine policy does not include accidents that might happen in a perfectly ordinary voyage. This did not happen through any stress of weather; it may be said to have been caused either by a defective insulation, or by want of strength, so that whether you look to the causa causans, or causa proxima, it is the same thing. Then, as to the question whether the loss was total or partial. If the policy be on the cable it cannot be a total loss. If the assured has any insurable interest in the cable, which he must have to insure, then you have the subject-matter in part brought back. It is not clear even that the part at the bottom of the sea is absolutely lost. [MARTIN, B.—The cable insured is a cable that will reach from a certain point to a certain other point; the insurance is on the entire thing, not on each link of the chain as it were, but the whole thing as existing in a fit state to perform the purpose for which it is made.] It is not an insurance that the cable will do a particular thing, but for its safe carriage. When you insure a chest of tea you do not insure each particular pound, so as on the loss of it to recover the whole sum insured. If this was as suggested, a warranty upon the communication being effected and maintained a certain time, why was the ordinary form of policy used? When you are dealing with the case of an underwriter who would be accustomed to, and most likely would contemplate, the usual marine risks, there should be very clear evidence to show that such an insurance as that contended for by the plt. was intended. They cited

Cur. adv. vult.

Feb. 7.—MARTIN, B. now delivered the judgment of the court (Pollock, C. B., Martin, Channell, and Pigott, BB.) This is a rule to enter a nonsuit in a case tried before me at the last Liverpool assizes. The verdict was entered for the plt. for 200*l.*, being a total loss upon a policy of insurance. The facts are these: the Atlantic Telegraph Company were about to lay down an electric cable between Ireland and Newfoundland; the cable had been put on board the Great Eastern steamship, and it was intended that she should proceed from Ireland to Newfoundland, and convey and lay down the cable as she went along. The Great Eastern left Valentia in Ireland, on the 23rd July, with 2200 miles in length of cable on board, and on the 2nd Aug. had laid down from 1100 to 1200 miles of it. Upon that day, in consequence of the electric current not acting, some of the cable was being drawn back into the ship, and, whilst this was being done, a part of the cable which was on board broke, and the broken end fell into the sea; some fruitless endeavour was made to raise it, but ultimately the Great Eastern returned to Sheerness with the remainder of the cable on board, where it now is, and it is hoped by the directors that the part saved may be available for another attempt. The Atlantic Telegraph Company is a joint-stock company, and the plt. was the owner of twenty shares of 10*l.* each in it. The deft. underwrote the policy on the 29th July for 200*l.*, and the question is, whether the plt. is entitled to recover as for a total loss or any smaller sum. The contract between the parties is contained in a paper which was the common printed form of a marine policy. It states that the plt.'s agent caused himself to be insured "at and from Ireland to Newfoundland, the risk to commence at and from and including, the lading of the cable on board the Great Eastern, and to continue until the cable be laid down in one continuous length between Ireland and Newfoundland and until 100 words shall have been transmitted from Ireland to Newfoundland, and vice versa, the risk on the policy then to cease and determine. The ship was the Great Eastern; the goods, &c. were valued "at 200*l.* on the Atlantic cable, value say, on twenty shares valued at 10*l.* per share; and in the margin opposite the usual clause touching the adventures and perils which the assurers were contented to bear and take upon them, &c., there was as follows: "It is hereby understood and agreed that this policy, in addition to all perils and casualties herein specified, shall cover every risk and contingency attending the conveyance and successful laying of the cable from and including its loading on board the Great Eastern until 100 words be transmitted from Ireland to Newfoundland and vice versa, and it is distinctly declared and agreed that the transmission of the said 100 words from Ireland to Newfoundland, and vice versa, shall be an essential condition of the policy." The premium was 25 guineas per cent., and the deft. underwrote the policy for 200*l.* The case has been argued before us. The contract is partly written and partly printed, and the agreement between the parties is to be ascertained by the words of it. The circumstance that it is upon the printed form which is usually adopted for a common marine policy is wholly immaterial if the language used and adopted by the parties shows that the insurance extends further than marine policies ordinarily do. In the present policy the risk of the insurance is declared to commence from the loading of the cable on board, and to continue until it be laid down in one continuous length between Ireland and Newfoundland, and until 100 words shall have been transmitted to and from, when the risk is to cease and determine. Now, so far as these words go, they express that the subject-matter of insurance was the cable; but in the subsequent part of the policy it was declared to be agreed that, in addition to the ordinary perils and casualties insured against in the common marine policy, the insurance is to cover every risk and contingency attending the conveyance and successful laying down of the cable. It seems to us that words cannot be used more aptly to express that the underwriters contracted to insure against the risk and contingency which has happened; namely, the unsuccessful attempt to convey and lay down the cable. It seems to us that what has occurred is within the very words of the contract; it was a risk and contingency which attended the conveyance of the cable and the unsuccessful attempt to lay it down. In truth the policy is not merely on the cable, but on the adventure. The second question is, whether the loss be total or partial. We think it total. The adventure in respect of which the insurance was effected was the successful laying down of the cable which was loaded on board the Great Eastern, in one continuous length between Ireland and Newfoundland; it has wholly failed, and in our opinion the circumstance that one-half of the cable has been saved is immaterial. The insurance was upon the adventure and even if it had been merely upon the cable, it was upon the entire continuous cable and not a portion of it. There was a case cited of Paterson v. Harris, 1 B. & S. 336, which is supposed to have some bearing upon the point. It really has none whatever. It was an action upon a policy in common form, and the Court held that what occurred there was not a loss by perils of the sea; it might possibly be that the loss in the present case is not a loss by the perils of the sea, but upon this it is unnecessary to give an opinion, as we think the misfortune that has occurred is distinctly and within the words of the policy, and a risk and contingency against which the defts. contracted to insure. The rule will therefore be discharged.

WILSON v. THE NEWPORT DOCK COMPANY.

Head of contract—Accident arising therefrom—Common cause and cause sine qua non—Consequential and direct damages—Remoteness.

The declaration stated that defts. were proprietors of a certain dock for the reception and docking of ships therefor reward, and that plt. was owner of a ship, and was desirous of having the same received and docked by defts. in the said dock for reward to defts. in that behalf, whereof defts. had notice, and thereupon, in consideration that plt. would bring the said ship at a certain time towards and to the said dock, defts. promised there to receive and dock her therein; and that plt. raising, &c., brought her at the time aforesaid towards and to the said dock, yet defts. upon and whilst the said ship was then so being brought towards and to the said dock for the purpose aforesaid, refused to and did not nor would then receive and dock her in the said dock, by reason whereof at the ebbing of the tide she grounded in the river there, and was thereby greatly damaged. It appeared in evidence at the trial that the cause of the dock gate not opening was the accidental breaking of a chain, of which the plt. was informed directly as the ship arrived opposite the dock gates. The pilot was desirous of taking the ship (which was in the charge and in tow of a steam-tug) further down the river to a part where it was alleged, on the part of defts., she could have grounded in safety on the mud; or to have taken her still further down the deep water, where she could have anchored, but the defendants declined to accede to either course, stating that it would ruin the ship to let it take the ground, and that she was not sufficiently ballasted to ride at anchor, especially in the storm that appeared to be gathering and which shortly afterwards arose. The learned judge asked the jury, first, was there a place of safety to which the ship could have been taken? Secondly, whose fault was it that the vessel was not taken to it, the captain's or the pilot's, and did both of them do their best, and was either of them guilty of negligence? To the first question they gave no answer, being unable to agree; and to the second they said that both the captain and the pilot did the best they could, and neither of them was guilty of negligence.

It, by Martin, B., that the damages resulting from the grounding of the ship under the above circumstances, were not too remote to be recovered by the plt. in the present action.

It, by Pollock, C. B., Channell and Pigott, BB., that on the finding of the jury, the court could not come to any conclusion rendering defts. responsible for the damages done to the vessel, within the principle of Hadley v. Baxendale, and that until a verdict had been taken on a larger issue than whether the captain and pilot had done their best, the case was not ripe for the decision of the court, and that therefore the rule for a new trial must be made absolute.

See v. Baxendale and Street v. Ford, discussed and commented on.

The declaration stated:

That defts. were the proprietors of a certain dock on and adjoining with a certain tidal river, to wit, the river Ux, and that the said dock was used by defts. for the reception and docking of ships and vessels therefor reward to the defts. in that behalf, and the plt. was the owner of a ship or vessel and was desirous of having the same received and docked by the defts. in the said dock for reward to defts. in that behalf as aforesaid, whereof defts. had notice, and thereupon, in consideration that the plt. would come the said ship or vessel to be brought at a certain time on a certain day towards and to the said dock for the purpose of being so received and docked therein as aforesaid, the defts. promised them to receive and dock the said ship or vessel therein as aforesaid, and plt. says that he, relying on defts. said promise, did cause the said ship to be brought, at the time and on the day aforesaid, towards and to and the same was being brought towards and to the said dock for the purpose of being so received and docked therein as aforesaid, and all things were done by him and all times elapsed necessary to enable plt. to have had his said ship then so received and docked in the said dock as aforesaid, yet defts. upon and whilst the said ship was then so being brought towards and to the said dock, for the purpose aforesaid, wholly refused to and did not nor would then receive and dock the said ship of plt. in the said dock, and the said ship being by reason thereof, left in the said river, at the ebbing of the tide she grounded and took the ground there, and was thereby greatly damaged and injured, and plt. incurred great expense in and about having such damage and injury repaired.

Plca, payment into court of 15*l*, and averment that the same is enough to satisfy plt.'s claim.

Replication, that the said sum of 15*l* is not enough to satisfy the claim of plt. Issue thereon.

At the trial before Byles J. and a special jury at the last summer assizes at Worcester, the following appeared to be the facts of the case:—The plt., a shipowner residing at Liverpool, was the owner of the vessel in question, the Lord Elph, of 850 tons register, which had been lying for some time in the graving or dry dock at Newport, for the purpose of undergoing repairs. The repairs being completed, it was desired that the vessel should leave the dry dock and be taken into the wet dock belonging to the defts. Consequently an application for that purpose was made to the defts'. dock-master on the 16th Nov., and an answer was sent back by him to the captain of the vessel that on the next morning (the 17th), on the turn of the tide, the vessel might come down from the dry dock to the wet dock, and be there received. Accordingly at about eight o'clock the next morning (the 17th Nov.), being in ballast at the time, she left the dry dock in tow of a steam-tug, and in charge of a pilot (both engaged for the occasion), and proceeded down the river to the wet dock, a distance which it took about half an hour to accomplish. Upon arriving opposite the dock gate about high water, the captain of the vessel was informed by a person at the dock in the employ of the dock company, that, in consequence of an accident having occurred by the breaking of the chains of the gates, or something of that sort, the gates could not be opened, and the vessel could not be taken in. Thereupon the pilot asked the captain what he was to do, to which the captain, who was unacquainted with the navigation of the river, said he did not know, but he told the pilot that if the ship took the ground she would be injured; and that if she were towed out to sea he was afraid she would capsize, having regard to the quantity of ballast (some eighty tons only), and the state of the weather, the barometer low and falling, which indicated an approaching storm; and according to the evidence, it was then blowing a stiff breeze, and within a few hours after a perfect hurricane. Thereupon the pilot gave orders to cast the steam-tug off, to let go the anchor where the vessel then was, both which orders were obeyed, and in about two and a half or three hours after, on the ebbing of the tide, the ship grounded in the river and was what is technically called "hogged up," and sustained injuries in consequence which cost the plt. some 3000*l*. to repair, and to recover which the present action was brought. The pilot stated in his evidence that, on the captain's saying the ship would be injured if she took ground, he asked to be allowed to take her down to Wren Point, a safe place about four miles down the river where there is soft mud, and where, in his, the pilot's, opinion, the ship could have grounded safely, or else to be allowed to tow her into deep water some two miles below West Point, both which propositions the captain declined to accede to. It had been suggested by one of the witnesses that the vessel might have been taken back, up the river, to a place called "Wilmot's Stage," near the dry dock, from which she came in the morning, but the pilot said that it was impossible to have taken her back there from the number of small vessels which then obstructed the river; and in that he was confirmed by the master of the tug. The pilot stated that the captain, knowing his vessel, was better able to judge than he (the pilot) was, as to the safety of taking her down the river to deep water. No application was made to the learned judge at the end of the pit's case to consult the pit, or to enter a verdict for the defts. on the ground of want of evidence, and witnesses were called for the defence. It was contended that the evidence showed that the captain had acted improperly and ought not to have anchored where he did, but to have gone back to Wilmot's Stage, near to the dry dock or down the river to West Point, where it was alleged the ship could have grounded in safety in the mud there, or have gone further on into deep water and there anchored.

Reasons were stated by the captain why neither of these courses could be prudently adopted with regard to the safety of the ship, and it appeared also that she was not, in the captain's judgment, sufficiently ballasted to ride safely at anchor in deep water. The defts. contended that the damage was too remote and unconnected with the cause of action, on which point leave to move was reserved. His Lordship then proposed two questions for the jury: First, was there a place of safety to which the vessel might have been taken? Secondly, whose fault was it that the vessel was not taken to that place of safety, the captain's or the pilot's, and did both of them do the best they could under the circumstances, and was either of them guilty of negligence? To the first question the jury not being able to agree, gave no answer, and to the second question they said, "We consider that both the captain and the pilot did the best they could, and that neither of them was guilty of negligence." Upon that finding a verdict was directed for pit., and the damages were agreed to be referred. Leave was given to defts. to move, and the court was to draw inferences from the facts not inconsistent with the above finding of the jury, which the learned judge reported that he did not disapprove. A rule nisi was accordingly obtained in Michaelmas Term last to enter the verdict for defts., on the ground that the money paid into court was sufficient to cover the damage legally recoverable in the action, the amount claimed for the injury by the hogging of the ship being too remote; the court to draw inferences of fact not inconsistent with the finding of the jury; or for a new trial on the grounds of misdirection in the learned judge's entering the verdict for pit. on the finding of the jury, and of miscarriage on the finding of the jury, and of the verdict's being against the weight of evidence; and against this rule.

Mellish, Q.C., W. H. Cooke, Q.C., and Dunderdall for pit., now showed cause.—No doubt, by the rule laid down in Hadley v. Baxendale, 9 Ex. 341, 23 L. J. 179, Ex., damages recoverable for breach of contract must be more than merely consequential; and it was contended that, in the present case, they were direct. (POLLOCK, C. B.—Was the alleged misconduct of the defts. a causa causans or a causa sine qua non? If the latter only, then the damage would be consequential only, a case of damage upon damage.)

The not opening the dock gates was the causa causans, the direct, immediate, inevitable, and inseparable cause of the accident. It was the gist of the defts.' trade of dockowners to save men from these very accidents and injuries; and the having, as was clearly admitted, contracted absolutely to receive the pit's ship at the time named, were liable for all consequences arising from the breach, from whatever cause, of their contract. The damages in Colles v. Wright, 8 E. & B. 617, 1 L. J. 215, Q. B., were far more remote; and a quid were also in

The finding of the jury that neither the captain nor the pilot was to blame supported the pit's case, and showed that the accident was the natural probable result of the defts.' conduct. They did also

Huddleston, Q.C., Gray, Q.C., and E. Jones contra, for defts., supported their rule.—The damage here came within the rule in Hadley v. Baxendale too remote. The general principle there laid down was, that they must be such as in the contemplation of the parties would naturally flow from a breach of the contract. (CHAMBERLAIN, B. refers to Fisher v. Taylor, 17 C. B. 21; 25 L. J. 65, C. P., as applying that principle.) The parties could not have contemplated as a natural result of the gates not being opened that the vessel would be "hogged" on the hard bank, any more than, if a lodger be locked out that he should lie down in the gutter and be run over by a cab. Could it for a moment be contended that defts. would have been liable if the injury had arisen from collision with another vessel which anchored near the dock gate, or from being caught there by a gale of wind? The clear immediate cause of the accident was the hurricane then blowing, and the insufficient ballasting. The proximate cause was but not being removed further down the river, and that was the captain's doing, and hence he had not ballast enough. It may be it would have been more prudent not to have left the ship dock. If it was to be said the dock manager should have contemplated the accident, then surely the captain should have done so, and so have put more ballast in his vessel. It was a contingency to be contemplated, if by one, then by both parties, and then the fault was the non-ballasting. Though the vessel could not get in, it did not follow that damages ensued; that was the difference between a causa causans and a causa sine qua non. There were three causes here—first, the want of ballast; secondly, the not going further down the river; thirdly, and which was the sine qua non, the not being taken into dock. The breach of contract in not having the gates open was a very remote cause. In every case it could be said, "If you had not done this, that would not have happened;" but that was not enough to entitle a pit. to special damage. The question was fully discussed in Sedgwick on Damages, c. 3, and by Lord Campbell, C. J. in Speed v. Ford, (supra). They referred to and distinguished Gibbs v. The Trustees of the Liverpool Dock, Colles v. Wright, and Randall v. Raper, cited contra. (POLLOCK, C. B. refers to Geo v. The Lancashire and Yorkshire Railway Company, 3 L. T. Rep. N. 8, 38 L. J. 411, N. 211; 30 L. J. Ex. 11.)

Cur. adv. vult.

Feb. 9.—There being a difference of opinion amongst the learned judges, their Lordships now delivered their separate judgments as follows:

WILSON v. THE NEWPORT DOCK COMPANY.

[Ex.]

MARTIN, B.—This is a rule calling on the plt. how cause why a nonsuit should not be entered pursuant of leave reserved, or why there should not be a new trial. The declaration stated that the defts. were the proprietors of a dock for reception of ships on and communicating with the river Usk; that the plt. was the owner of a ship, and in consideration that the plt. required the ship to be brought at a certain time and on a certain day towards and to the said dock for the purpose of being docked for reward to the defts., the defts. promised to receive and dock the said ship. The declaration then averred that the plt. caused the ship to be brought at the time and on the day named on towards and to the said dock, that he was entitled to have the ship docked in accordance with the defts.' promise; but that the defts. did not receive and dock the said ship, and by reason thereof the ship was left in the said river, and at the ebbing of the tide grounded and sustained damage. The defts. pleaded payment of 15*l.* into court, and said it was enough now to satisfy the plt.'s claim. The plt. replied that it was not, and thereupon the case was joined. The case came on to be tried before my brother Byles at the last Monmouth assizes, and the facts proved are very simple and clear. On the 17th Nov. 1868, the ship Lord Elgin was in dry dock at Newport, and upon the evening of that day, by the direction of the dockmaster of the defts.' dock, proceeded towards it for the purpose of entering it. She was in ballast. It was a very short distance from the dry dock to the defts.' dock, and she was towed by a steam-tug stem on, and arrived at defts.' dock gate about half past six, when, in consequence of the chain of the dock gate being broken, or out of order, she could not be admitted. The captain of the Lord Elgin was unacquainted with the river and its navigation, and he directed the ship to be anchored where she was. In about three hours afterwards, at the ebb, she took the ground and sustained damage, and the present question is in respect of this damage. The 15*l.* was paid into court to cover the expense of bringing the ship on to the dock. There does not seem to have been any application made to the learned judge at the conclusion of the plt.'s case to nonsuit or set aside a verdict for the defts. upon the ground that there was no evidence to go to the jury, and witnesses were called for the defts. On the arguments before us, it was contended that upon the evidence the captain of the Lord Elgin acted improperly, that he ought not to have anchored where he did, that he ought to have done one of several things; that he ought to have gone back towards the dry dock, or have gone down to a place called West Point, where it was said the ship could be safely grounded, or gone into deep water and be anchored. The master stated reasons why in his opinion none of these ought to have been done. He also alleged that the ship was not sufficiently loaded. According to the judge's notes, it was contended on behalf of the defts. that the damage was too remote and was unconnected with the cause of action, and upon this point he gave leave to move. He then proposed two questions to the jury: first, whether there was, in fact, any place of safety to which the vessel might have been taken; and this question the jury could not agree. Secondly, whether both the captain and the pilot did the best they could under the circumstances, and was either of them guilty of any negligence; to this the jury agreed that they both did the best they could, and that neither of them was guilty of negligence. At this finding the learned judge directed the verdict to be entered for the plt., the amount of damages having been agreed to be referred, and he said the defts. leave to move, with power to the court to draw any inferences upon the facts consistent with the finding of the jury. The learned judge adds that the facts were entirely for the jury, and that he does not disapprove of their finding. I concur with him, and I think that his direction that the verdict should be entered for the plt. was right in point of law. The question of damages is of constant occurrence. It occurs in almost every action of contract, except contracts for the payment of a certain fixed sum of money, and necessarily in every action for a wrong. The ordinary cases on contracts are actions for the non-delivery or non-acceptance of goods agreed to be sold, on agreements for the sale of land, for breaches of promise to marry, for non-acceptance or non-delivery of stock or shares; and an infinite variety of others might be named. So also, in actions for wrongs, it occurs every day; for instance, in actions for injuries sustained by accidents on railways, and by collision, which now constitute a very considerable number of the causes tried at Nisi Prius; in actions for libel and slander, for assault and false imprisonment, and in numberless other cases. In some instances the measure of damages is fixed and ascertained by long established usage; for instance, for the non-delivery of goods which are the subject of common sale in the market, I apprehend that the judge is bound to tell the jury that the measure of damage is the difference between the contract price and the market price; and that, if he does not, his summing up would be liable to objection. And there are other cases in which the like long usage has fixed the measure of damages. So also, in some cases, the matter of damages has been the subject of decision in the Superior Courts, and I apprehend that when this has been so, the decision is a binding authority upon the same and other courts, in like manner and to the same extent as other decisions. For instance, the case of Hadley v. Baxendale, 9 Ex. 341; 23 L. J. 179, Ex., which was so frequently referred to in the argument, is a decision of this kind. The plts., who were millers, had delivered to the defts., common carriers of goods for hire at Gloucester, a broken iron shaft to be carried by them to Greenwich, and delivered to an engineer there, in order to enable him to use it as a model for making a new shaft. The defts. were told that the mill was stopped in consequence of the shaft being broken, and they promised that, if the shaft was sent before a certain hour, it would be delivered at Greenwich on the following morning. The delivery of the shaft was delayed by some neglect, and the plts. did not receive the new shaft till some days after the time they otherwise would have done, and they claimed damages for the loss of profit which they would have made had the new shaft been delivered earlier. Crompton J. left the case generally to the jury, who found a verdict for the plts. A rule was granted by the Court of Ex. for a new trial for misdirection, because they were of opinion that the learned judge ought to have told the jury to exclude the loss of profit from their estimate of the damages. This case is, therefore, an authority that, in a similar case, such loss of profit cannot be made an element of damages, and must be excluded; but it is an authority no further, and anything said by the court in delivering judgment is to be judged by its being consonant to law and reason. The decision in Hadley v. Baxendale is, therefore, no authority whatever in the present case, for no loss of profits is claimed; nor is it an authority that loss of profits is not a legitimate element of damages in many other cases—for instance, in a railway accident, whereby a tradesman or workman is prevented from attending to his business by the injuries which he has sustained, the loss of profits in such cases is a constant element of damages; and in a case tried the other day at

WILSON v. THE NEWPORT DOCK COMPANY.

[Ex.]

Liverpool, where so large a sum as 7000*l.* was given, in a case under Lord Campbell's Act, the sole element of damage was the loss of profits of the deceased in his profession of a surgeon, and no objection was made on this ground; and I have no doubt whatever that, if the judge had told the jury to exclude it, there would have been misdirection. In regard to the present case, there is no established rule, and no decision, and the general rule is to be applied. This rule is, that the damage to be compensated for ought to be proximate to, and not remote from, the breach of contract or the wrong, and ought fairly and reasonably and naturally to arise from them. I do not adopt the qualifications mentioned by Alderson, B. in the judgment in Hadley v. Baxendale as applicable to every case. They may have been perfectly right there, but they are not of universal application. "Naturally," he says, "means according to the usual course of things." But contracts are infinite in variety; and suppose, as in this case, no such claim for damages had ever been known to have been made, then no "usual course of things" exists; but the damages to be recovered by the plt. would not, in my opinion, therefore be nominal. The learned Baron then proceeds to say, "or such as may reasonably be supposed to have been in the contemplation of both parties, at the time they made the contract, as the probable result of the breach of it." Now, this may properly enough be taken into consideration in the case of carriers and their customers; but in the bulk of broken contracts it has no application whatever. Parties entering into contracts contemplate that they will be performed, and not broken; and in the infinite majority of instances the damages to arise from the breach never enter into their contemplation at all. As to Hadley v. Baxendale, I was a party to it, and have no desire to deprecate it; but in Boyd and others v. Fitt, 14 Ir. Com. Law Rep. 43, the Court of Ex. in Ireland dissented from it, and approved of the views of Crompton, J. in Smeed v. Ford, 1 El. & El. 602; 28 L. J. 178, Q. B.; and of Wilde, B. in Gee v. The Lancashire and Yorkshire Railway, 3 L. T. Rep. N. S. 328; 6 H. & N. 211; 30 L. J. 11, Ex., as being sounder expositions of the law as to remoteness of damages. The general rule is, therefore, to be applied to the present case and ought, as all other general rules, to be fairly, candidly, and impartially applied. It has been said that the damage sustained here has been very great. Now, I am clearly of opinion that this ought to be no element whatever in the application of the rule, and whether the damages be 10*l.* or 10,000*l.* is immaterial. The circumstances are these. In pursuance of the defts.' contract to admit the ship into the dock at a certain time upon a certain day, the ship was brought to the entrance of the dock; the defts. could not admit her in consequence of a defect in a chain of the dock gate, and their contract is admitted to have been broken. No blame attaches to them; it was their misfortune that the chain had been broken. The ship was then left in the river, which is one emptying itself into the Bristol Channel, where the tide ebbs and flows to a very great height. The captain had to decide what was to be done under the circumstances in which he was placed. Four courses have been suggested as open to him: one, that he should have remained and anchored where he was; secondly, that he should have gone up the river to the place from whence he came; thirdly, that he should have gone down the river to West Point, where it was said that the ship, upon the ebb, would have settled upon soft mud; and fourthly, that he should have gone into deep water, where the ship would always have been afloat. Now, I think that the defts. had a right to a bonâ fide and reasonably sound judgment being exercised upon the matter. The captain decided upon remaining where he was.

The tide was ebbing and the weather threatening. If either of the other courses had been adopted, it might have been that the ship would have sustained no damage, or it might have been that the ship would have been totally lost; but I think this was a question for the jury, and that they have decided it; they have found that the captain did the best he could under the circumstances, and was not guilty of any negligence. The consequence was, that when the tide ebbed the ship took the ground and sustained damage; and the question that has been argued before us is, that this damage is too remote and so unconnected with the cause of action that it must, as a matter of law, be borne by the plt., so that the defts. cannot be responsible for it. I do not concur in this view; there has been damage; it must be borne by some one; neither the plt. nor his captain is in the slightest default. If the deft. had performed their contract no damage would have occurred; in consequence of their default the captain was compelled to exercise his judgment at discretion, and the jury have found that he did the best he could and was guilty of no negligence, which I understand that in deciding to remain where he was he exercised such a judgment at discretion as became a reasonable man acting prudently. His doing so was, no doubt, the immediate cause of the damage; but, in my opinion, in remaining there was, in contemplation of law, the same as if the ship had been compelled to remain there by a vis major. The rule is, that the damage must be proximate (not immediate), and fairly and reasonably connected with the breach of contract or wrong. As to what is so, different minds will differ, but many instances could be mentioned in which damages much more remote than the present were held to be the subject of compensation; as in Powell v. Salisbury, 2 You. & J. 391, and in Byn v. Wilson, 15 Ir. Com. Law Rep. 332, the Court of Q. B. in Ireland upon demurrer held that damages were recoverable in that case, which were infinitely more remote than the present, for the death that was caused by reason of the dock-keeper allowing the water to come into the canal where the person was cast. There is a case of constant occurrence at Guildhall: a barge is injured by collision in the Thames; she is taken to the nearest convenient fitting place upon the shore; upon the ebbing of the tide she comes down upon a pile and sustains further damage. My own belief is that compensation for such damage has been recovered over and over again without objection, and upon referring to some gentlemen of the bar, whose experience upon this subject is the greatest in the profession, I have been informed that it has invariably been so. Such damage is precise analogous to the present. Some possible cases were mentioned in the argument, and it was asked whether the defts. would in such and such a case have been responsible. One was, if the ship had been run down by another ship whilst at anchor: I think the liability in such a case would depend upon the circumstances, and a material one would be whether the running down ship was in the wrong. Another case put was, if the ship had been upset by a hurricane while she was anchored. I think that this would raise a question for the jury whether, all human probability, the same misfortune would not have happened to the ship wherever in the river she might have happened to be. In my opinion, the discussion of instances like these is of little bearing or weight when the facts of the case to be adjudicated upon are clear and well defined. In questions of damages, each case must be determined upon its own circumstances, but I think the point is decided by authority. In Jones v. Boyce, 2 Stark. Ev. 3rd ed. 2963, 1b. 741; 1 Stark. Rep. 493, the plt. was a passenger by a stage coach, and a rein broke; the coach the coach to the side of the road, and one of the horses was stopped by a post; the plt. jumped off his leg was broken, and he brought an action against the coach proprietor for damages. Lord Ellenborough said there were two questions for the jury: first, as to the deft.'s default in regard to the injury, which is immaterial to the present case; the second was, whether the deft.'s default was connected to the injury the plt. had sustained; if it was not so far conclusive as to create such reasonable apprehension in the mind of the plt. as rendered it necessary for him to jump down from the coach in order to avoid immediate danger, the action would not be maintainable. Amongst the observations on the peculiar circumstances of the case, he said that it was for the consideration of the jury whether the plt.'s act was such as a reasonable and prudent mind would have adopted; and he added, "If I place a man in such a situation that he must adopt a perilous alternative, I am responsible for the circumstances." I think the present case is analogous. The defts. did not perform their contract to admit the plt.'s ship into their dock; they thereby imposed on the captain four perilous alternatives, and he adopted one. The jury found that he did the best he could, and was guilty of no negligence, and no damage ensued to the ship. In my opinion the defts.' default directly conduced to this damage, and they are responsible for it upon the principle enunciated by Lord Ellenborough in Jones v. Boyce, which, in my opinion, is equally good law and good sense. For these reasons I think the damage is not remote, and that the learned judge submitted the right questions to the jury, and I concur with him in the verdict is unobjectionable. The rule therefore should be discharged.

POLLOCK, C. B.—I have to state the opinion of the learned brothers Channell and Pigott, and also my own. This case comes before us on a point reserved at the trial, namely, whether the damages are too remote; and, to assist our judgment, we are, first, the notes of the learned judge taken at the trial; secondly, the answer of the jury—"that the pilot and the captain did the best they could under the circumstances, and were neither of them guilty of any negligence;" and we have the fact that the jury could not agree on the other question, whether there was in fact any place of safety to which the vessel might have been taken?" The questions for our decision seem to be, first, ought the verdict to stand? (being, not a verdict found by the jury, but entered for the plt. by the learned judge, on the jury answering one question and being unable to agree upon another question, which we think the more important and decisive of the two); secondly, ought we to enter the verdict for the plt.? or, thirdly, ought we to direct a new trial? In deciding these questions, it is necessary to ascertain the facts of the case as found by the jury; with evidence so contradictory and repugnant, we cannot find any verdict ourselves. It is not our province. If the facts can be ascertained, then, what is the law applicable to them? We apprehend when the facts are known it is the province of the court to say for what matters damages are to be given. But the amount of damages is a question for the jury quite as much as the credit due to the witnesses. When the result of the evidence is uncertain it is for the jury to find the facts, and therefore they will often have to find whether facts fall within the rule of law to be laid down on the subject. The case of Hadley v. Baxendale was cited at the trial, and much commented on during the argument. That case was very much considered. A long argument took place several weeks before the judgment was given, and I know that great pains were bestowed upon it. Lord Wensleydale, the late Alderson, B., and my brother Martin were parties to it, and it is due to Lord Wensleydale and the late Alderson, B. to say that a more extensive and accurate knowledge of decisions in our law books, and a more acute power of analysing and discussing them, and, as far as my brother Martin is concerned, a larger acquaintance with the exigencies of commerce and the business of life, never combined to assist in the formation of any decision; and, certainly, it does not lessen the authority of that case that Lord Campbell, in Smeed v. Ford, 1 E. & E. 602, said that it merely affirmed what was to be found in Pothier, in 2 Kent's Com. 665, in the French Code, and in all the other authorities; and it may be added that Crompton, J. (against whose summing-up it was directed) in that same case said, he agreed with it as far as it went, which we consider to be agreeing with it altogether. I own, after this (I am now speaking my own opinion), that I cannot think the authority of that case is at all shaken by either of the matters that my brother Martin has cited from the Irish reports. I think the authority of Lord Wensleydale, Alderson B., my brother Martin, and Crompton J., fortified by Lord Campbell stating that that case only expressed what all the authorities, French, American, and English, as far as they went, embodied, cannot be considered as in any degree shaken by what has occurred since. That decision was not presented as any new discovery in jurisprudence, but we think it put in a clearer and more distinct light a principle which had been previously recognised in prior cases, and the want of which, in the English law, had been pointed out. The authorities are all collected in a note to Vicars v. Wilcocks, 2 Sm. L. C. 5th ed. 461. It is quite true, as remarked by Wilde, B., in the case referred to by my brother Martin, that that case is not applicable to, and does not decide, every case. No rule, no formula, could do that. Cases of damage differ as much as the leaves of a tree differ from each other, or rather as the leaves of different trees. No two are exactly alike, and one description cannot be applicable to all. No precise positive rule can embrace all cases, and, notwithstanding any rule of law that may be laid down, it must be admitted, after all, that the question of the amount of damages is one for the jury, and the jury only; and, provided the law on the subject be properly laid down by the presiding judge, and then the amount of damages be left at large to the jury, we apprehend a court would not interfere with their verdict because the jury had, apparently, come to some compromise among themselves, and had not strictly observed the supposed rule of law. We think that the decision of twelve jurymen, instructed from the bench in the rules of law, but exercising their own judgment on a subject connected with the business of life with which they are familiar, would, practically, lead to a result often more just and equitable than any mere rule of law would arrive at. And, that there may be no mistake as to our meaning, we may add that should this case go to a second trial, some of the jury might think the plt. entitled to recover the whole damage; others might think it the height of imprudence on the part of the master to attempt to remove a vessel from a dry dock to a wet dock about the time when the wind was blowing a hurricane (which from his evidence seems to have been the case), and from which charge of imprudence the verdict of the jury has not relieved him. The result might be a compromise, which we are confident the court would not, and which we think they ought not to disturb. We think we are not able to determine, from the materials before us, whether or not the loss was occasioned by circumstances which, according to the case of Hadley v. Baxendale and the other authorities, would make the dock company liable for the damage which the ship sustained. If the state of the weather was the efficient cause of the loss, we think the defts. are not liable. Now, as to the state of the wind; the evidence of the mate is, "Not much wind; blowing pretty stiff; a fresh breeze." The evidence of the captain was, "It was only a few hours before a perfect hurricane." James Dunster, the master rigger, says, "It was blowing so hard it would not have been safe to take her into deep water." If the weather was such that, on being excluded from the dock, she had no alternative but to perish on account of the gale or hurricane, which seems to me to have been the opinion of the master, then it may be doubted whether she ought to have been taken to the dock gates at all in such a state of the weather. And the opinion of the jury by a verdict should have been obtained on these and other circumstances, and the verdict ought to have been found by them on a larger issue than whether the master and the pilot did their best after they found the vessel could not be received into the dock, which I take to be the only finding of the jury. It is clear that the pilot thought the master was obstinate, and determined to do nothing to save the ship. We cannot find the defts. liable for this damage because the jury were disposed to relieve the captain and the pilot from the odium of a charge of negligence. The verdict of the jury ought to have gone more into the merits, in order to fix the defts. with these damages. What the jury did not find, and could not agree upon, was quite as important as what they did find; and the result of their verdict seems to be, "We cannot agree as to the liability of the defts., but we desire to throw no blame on the captain or the pilot." We are, therefore, of opinion that the jury have not found enough, in point of fact, to enable us to decide that the verdict entered for the plt. is what would have been, or (referring to the evidence actually given) ought to have been their verdict, if the entire case had been left to them to find a verdict for the plt. or for the defts. Looking at the evidence and the finding of the jury, we cannot come to any conclusion that would make the defts. responsible for the damage done to the vessel. If there was any place of safety to which the vessel might have been taken, and could have been taken (which we think is included in the learned judge's question), we think the plt. is not entitled to recover. The jury could not agree on an answer to this question. If they had found this question in the affirmative we think the plt. was clearly not entitled to recover, and we presume the judge would have directed a verdict for the defts. But, after many hours, they could not agree, and it is plain that some of the jury were of opinion in the affirmative, others might have been in the negative. It is true, they found that neither the captain nor the pilot was guilty of negligence, but we think it very uncertain what they meant by that finding. They certainly did not mean by that finding inferentially to decide the other question, or they would have found it, and not ultimately have disagreed about it. If there was a safe place to which the vessel might and ought to have been taken, a verdict for the plt. would be a great act of injustice, and we are invited to find this for the jury by a process of reasoning, when the jury would not, and apparently could not, and certainly did not, find it for themselves. As to entering a verdict for the defts. there is a similar difficulty, though perhaps not so great, because, if the plt. does not establish his case, the defts. are entitled to a verdict. But we think we cannot be certain what would have been the verdict of the jury if they had gone into, and had decided upon the whole case for themselves. We think, therefore, there ought to be a new trial.

CHANNELL, B.—Entirely agreeing as I do in the opinion which his Lordship has expressed in the judgment that he has just read, I have not thought it necessary to prepare any written judgment of my own. If no new light should be thrown upon the case by the finding of the jury before whom it will be tried again, then it is possible that the legal result may be that which my brother Martin has arrived at, in the elaborate judgment which he has read. But the question now is, whether the present verdict for the plt. is to stand, and I wish to say that I think the case is not at present ripe for decision.

FIGOTT, B.—That is my view, and that is why I concur in the judgment of the Lord Chief Baron. I do not think the case is concluded by the finding of the jury upon the one question that was submitted to them. It seems to me that they could agree upon one of the questions, and they could agree upon the other. That is inconsistent in view, and in that state of the matter I do not think the plt. is entitled to recover the large damages which he has sought to recover in this case.

THE MAGGIE ARMSTRONG v. THE BLUE BELL

Foul berth—Riding at single anchor in a gale.

One ship brought up during a gale in a fair berth in the Downs, and another ship coming up, anchored within a cable's length of her, riding at one anchor. The gale increasing, drove both ships from their anchor, when the last ship came into collision with the first ship, so that the first ship had to be taken to the beach in a sinking state and beached:

Held, that the ship last coming up was solely liable for the collision, from having given the first ship a foul berth in riding so close to her at single anchor.

Deane, Q. C. and Vernon Lushington for the Maggie Armstrong.

Brett, Q. C. and E. C. Clarkson for the Blue Bell.

Dr. LUSHINGTON gave judgment in this case, which was an action by the brig Maggie Armstrong, 289 tons, from Shields, coal laden, for Havre-de-Grace, against the brig Blue Bell, 191 tons, from Hartlepool, coal laden, for Shoreham, to obtain damages for a collision between them off the South Foreland at 7 p.m. on the 18th of last January. The Maggie Armstrong stated the wind as S.W., and the weather as heavy gale and hazy, with rain. The Blue Bell represented the former as from S.W. to S.W. by S., and the latter as thick at intervals, with rain, and a hard gale. The case for the plts. was, that the Maggie Armstrong brought up in a fair berth in the Downs, with her port bower anchor and sixty fathoms of chain, in ten fathoms water, and rode safely until the Blue Bell ran back to the Downs and brought up to the S.E. of her, and within a cable's length, thereby giving her a foul berth; that the Maggie Armstrong was riding taut, sheered to windward of the anchor, with her helm lashed a-starboard, her mainyard braced with the port and her foreyard square, and the ebb being strong, she was riding to the westward; that the Maggie Armstrong had her riding light duly exhibited, and that she was kept by her anchor watch; that the Blue Bell was then also riding sheer in the same way; that at the time and under the circumstances aforesaid, the Maggie Armstrong and the Blue Bell broke their sheers, and as the Maggie Armstrong was in the act of sheering lay with her head to starboard, the Blue Bell came stern on into the Maggie Armstrong midships, and with her anchor hook and flukes, and with her anchor, struck her severely in the side below the water's line, and also carried away her rail, bulwarks, gun, and covering board, and damaged her masts and stove in her boats on deck; that as the Blue Bell approached the Maggie Armstrong her foretopsail to endeavour to keep clear of the Blue Bell, but without effect. It was then that, in order to get clear, the Maggie Armstrong set her jib, but it immediately blew away, and she was obliged to slip her anchor and chain, and drove clear to leeward and away from the Blue Bell, and brought up in the Margate Roads, finding she was in a sinking state, a Deal Ramsgate lugger, and afterwards two tugs, were engaged to get her into Ramsgate Harbour, which they did in the evening of the following day, the 14th Jan., having been in the meantime to beach her, to prevent her from sinking in deep water. The defence of the Blue Bell set forth, that she was brought up by her bower anchor and forty-five fathoms of the side being ebb, having her yards braced wind, and her helm shored to starboard, and about W.N.W., riding to windward of the Maggie Armstrong, and having her anchor light up in this state of things the Maggie Armstrong had been riding at the distance of three lengths from her, and on her port bow, her sheer, and drove down towards her (the Blue Bell), rendering a collision between the two vessels imminent, whereupon those on board the Blue Bell hailed the Maggie Armstrong for her jib and staysail for the purpose of her getting clear of the Blue Bell; but this was not done, and the Maggie Armstrong, with her starboard side, the foretacking, came into contact with the starboard outwater of the Blue Bell, which was still steady to her anchor, and the Maggie Armstrong caused the Blue Bell also to break her anchor.

Looking at the facts indisputably proved in this case, it appears that, at the period in question, in Jan., there was a violent storm, and that the vessels having attempted to go down Channel, it was necessary to go back into the Downs in consequence of the intensity of that storm, and they ran to anchor, and as it is represented, as near shore as they safely could do. It is admitted on behalf of the Maggie Armstrong that she was the first that put back and came to anchor. That is a disputed fact, and if she came to a safe and anchorage, then all the other vessels that were up after her, if there was no other cause to prevent their so doing, were bound to give her a berth, and avoid giving her a foul berth. It is a main question in this case whether the Blue Bell gave her a foul berth or not. On the part of the Maggie Armstrong this is distinctly averred, and on the part of the Blue Bell it is as distinctly denied. The Maggie Armstrong brought up with sixty fathoms of cable, and the Blue Bell with forty-five fathoms.

It is sworn, as far as hard swearing goes, on behalf of the Maggie Armstrong, that she had a berth given her by the Blue Bell, and on the other hand, the Blue Bell says she brought up at a distance of three lengths from the Maggie Armstrong, and, consequently, did not give her a foul berth. As to whether the Maggie Armstrong drove or dragged her anchor, I apprehend it to mean about the same thing, the only difference being, when you say that a ship drives, it is without an accusative case, and in the other instance you say she drags, which I suppose to be about the state of things here. With respect to the state of the wind, weather, and tide, I apprehend it to be true, that if a foul berth was given to the Maggie Armstrong, these two vessels might have come into collision without the Maggie Armstrong dragging or driving. If the collision occurred without the Maggie Armstrong dragging her anchor—whether she did or not, we must consider what would be the strength of the wind and tide, and which way the Maggie Armstrong would have gone, provided she broke her sheer. That appears to me to be one of the most important questions to consider. In order to pronounce a decree for the Maggie Armstrong the court must be satisfied that she was not to blame in any part of the transaction, and the Blue Bell was to blame. The only blame attributable to the Blue Bell is this, that she gave a foul berth to the Maggie Armstrong, and that she was riding on such a night as this with a single anchor and forty-five fathoms of cable; but this amount of blame, in the absence of any corresponding blame on the part of the Maggie Armstrong, is sufficient to account for the collision, for the whole consequences of which the Blue Bell must be held responsible, and there must be a decree to that effect.

The Court was assisted by Capt. Redman and Capt. Weller, of the Trinity-house.

THE NORTH AMERICAN v. THE WILD ROSE.

Collision—Fog signals.

Although it is incumbent on steamships (notwithstanding their desire to make all progress) to slacken speed so as to avoid every possible collision; yet this necessity does not in any way relieve sailing ships from the duty of keeping a sharp look out, and sounding such fog signals and bells as the provisions of the statute direct.

Deane, Q. C. and Vernon Lushington for the North American.

Brett, Q. C. and Cohen, for the Wild Rose.

Dr. LUSHINGTON gave judgment in this case, which was an action brought by the sailing ship North American, 1833 tons register, against the British steamship Wild Rose, to obtain compensation for damage sustained by reason of the ship's coming into collision, in the river Mersey, about six a.m. on the 23rd May last. The wind was stated as from S.E. to S.S.E., and the weather as calm, but misty. The case for the North American was, that while at anchor, with her proper anchor lights exhibited, she having been anchored under the directions of a duly licensed pilot off Seacombe-ferry in about mid-river, the tide being about two hours flood, running from four to five knots; and those on board her being engaged in getting out her jibboom, the Wild Rose, which is one of the Seacombe-ferry boats, was observed about two ships' lengths distant coming on at great speed, and that shortly after, the steamer, notwithstanding hailing from the North American, ran on into her with great violence, the steamer's stern striking into her port side, before the mainmast, and doing great damage. It was then alleged that the collision was wholly occasioned by the improper navigation of the Wild Rose and by the negligence of those on board her, and that it was not caused by the negligence of those on board the North American, but was, so far as they were concerned, an inevitable accident. The defence for the Wild Rose represented that she is employed for the purpose of plying between Seacombe-ferry and the Liverpool landing-stage, and conveying passengers and goods between those two stations; that about 4.15 on the morning in question she left the Egremont-ferry, where she had been coaling for the Liverpool landing-stage, and that whilst so proceeding the master of the Wild Rose saw the North American lying athwart the tide, swinging to her anchor nearly in mid-river, but somewhat closer to the Cheshire side; that she reached the Liverpool landing-stage, and while remaining there the fog commenced and gradually increased and extended; that about 5.30 a.m., having left the landing-stage for Seacombe-ferry, she started from Seacombe-ferry for Liverpool, and the fog had then extended, and the North American was not visible to those on board the steamer; that on leaving Seacombe-ferry the master of the steamer took his station on the bridge between the two paddle-boxes, and the engineer and helmsman were at their respective posts; that the master of the steamer shaped his course so as to go south of the place where he had previously as aforesaid, on his passage from Egremont-ferry to the Liverpool landing-stage, observed the North American lying, and north of another vessel at anchor higher up the river; that from the time when the Wild Rose left Seacombe up to the time of the collision, her steam whistle was kept continually sounding, and a good look-out was maintained; that soon after the Wild Rose left Seacombe, the fog became suddenly exceedingly dense, and thereupon her engines were immediately stowed; that some short time afterwards the North American first became visible to those on board the Wild Rose, but at that time the two vessels were so near to one another that it was then quite impossible for the Wild Rose to avoid the collision; that her engines were, however, stopped at once, and were immediately afterwards reversed full speed, and her helm was put hard a-port; but, notwithstanding these precautions, the Wild Rose came into collision with the North American. The statements in the case of the North American were then denied, except those to which the defts. referred; and it was contended that a proper look-out was not kept on board the North American, that those on board that vessel did not duly hail the Wild Rose at a sufficiently early period; and that they improperly neglected to take any steps to avoid the collision; that, although there was a fog, they did not use and sound her bells, in accordance with the provisions of the Merchant Shipping Act Amendment Act 1862, but wholly made default in so doing; that the place where the North American was lying was opposite to a public ferry, and was such as to make it peculiarly incumbent on the North American to use all possible precautions for the purpose of warning other vessels of her position in the river; and that the collision was neither the fault of the North American nor the result of inevitable accident. Now, that there was on the morning of the 23rd May, that which any rational man would have termed to have been a fog existing at some time or other in the river Mersey, there cannot be a shadow of doubt, because there is evidence of facts from which that inference must necessarily be drawn: these are the entries from three of the landing places, and the fact that vessels had crossed backwards and forwards, and all of them had used the whistle. Assuming that to be a proved circumstance, but at what particular time the fog prevailed, and at what particular part of the river it was so dense as has been represented, is another and a very different question, upon which there is much contradictory evidence. Here is a vessel of 1300 tons lying in the river Mersey at anchor, and she is run into almost, if not quite, in a straight line, by a steamer whose custom and habit it was to cross the river plying for passengers. Under these circumstances there is no doubt what is the law, viz., that the steamer must show that that collision was occasioned by inevitable accident, and circumstances she could not control, or that it was exclusively the fault of the North American, since it is manifest that a vessel lying at anchor is incapable of getting out of the way, or of adopting any measure which might prevent a collision, at least to some extent. In the course of the argument it was suggested, but not argued, that the fog might have been so dense that it would have been incumbent on the steamer not to have proceeded on her usual occupation because of the danger she might incur. Had the circumstances given in evidence produced such a case, the court would not, for a moment, have hesitated in saying that it would have been the duty of the court, upon these pleadings, to have taken cognisance of it, and to have considered the case upon the fact, proved or not proved. I wish to make reference, as it is a matter of great importance, whether steamers are at liberty to follow their avocation in a thick fog, when following that avocation might produce damage to property, goods, or loss of life, to the case of the Giralama, decided by Sir John Nicholl. In that case the vessel was going down the river Thames in tow of a steamer, and having a pilot on board. When she started there was no fog, but a fog came on, and the learned judge laid it down in very strong terms, that it would have been the duty of the master to have superseded the pilot, and to have caused the vessel to come to anchor, rather than incur the risk of collision with other vessels. I, perhaps, might go quite the whole length that Sir J. Nicholl went on that occasion, but the general principle I should adopt, viz., that if there be an opportunity of stopping, attempting to follow a course which would produce possible injury to life, and certainly to property, it is the duty of those who have the control of steamers, notwithstanding the state of convenience and urgency of passengers, to hold their hand. Looking at the steamer's own description of the state of the morning, and the density of the fog almost immediately after she quitted Seacombe, it was a case in which the utmost vigilance was requisite and necessary, and she ought to have had the very best look-out; and not only so, but to have gone at that rate which would have enabled her, if taken by surprise, or coming in contact, or apparently in contact, with another vessel, to avoid collision. Taking into consideration the nature of the morning and the risk run, were all proper measures of precaution adopted on board the steamer, and, having regard to the size of the North American, was that ship descried by the steamer in due time, and whether or not, despite no bell having been rung on board the North American, might she not have been seen in time so as to avoid the collision? If so, the steamer is wholly to blame. If, on the other hand, the weather was so foggy that the North American ought to have rung a bell according to the statute, and did not, the North American would be in default. Upon the whole of the evidence the court was of the latter opinion, and must hold that the Wild Rose was not to blame for the collision, and there must be a decree accordingly.

The Court was assisted by Capt. Redman and Capt. Nesbitt.

PROCEEDS OF THE BONNE AMELIE.

The registry—Payment of claims not strictly necessities.Vessel having been sold in a damage suit, suit (for necessities) was instituted against proceeds of the sale of the vessel:The master's claim for expenses of a person in the defence of the suit did not contain claim for necessities; butowners having executed an act of abandonment vessel, the Court decreed payment of theAmelie, a schooner belonging to French, came into collision with an English vessel called the Siren, and was arrested at the instance of the owners of the latter vessel, and the Amelie was not bailed, and having been found alone to blame for the collision, was sold in satisfaction of the decree in thepresent suit, in respect of necessities and wages, was then instituted; and, after payment of the claims against the vessel in respect of the damage suit, there remained a balance of£1000 which did not appear in this suit also, but which the master in the damage suit had entered against the payment of the proceeds, and which was now moved to direct payment of the same from the proceeds of the sale of the vessel (the particulars of which sufficiently appear in the judgment) out of the above balance.The Court decreed that the balance of £1000 should be paid to the plaintiffs.7ton for the plts.

LUSHINGTON.—This is, in point of amount, a small sum, but it behoves the court to be cautious in exercising the power of directing sums demanded as to be paid out of the proceeds. Now there are two kinds of claims: one claim was for necessities such as money advanced for the purchase of butcher's meat and articles of that kind for the maintenance of the crew, and I have decided before, and again decide, that this is in accordance with the terms of the Act of Parliament as to the payment of money advanced, not to pay for necessities where a debt for necessities has been incurred, but in order to enable the master to maintain the crew, constitutes a valid claim. With respect to the other part of the claim, it is for two-thirds of the expense of the harbour-master in taking the vessel to London from Newcastle during the time the vessel was in the harbour, and the damage suit in order to assist the vessel in the master's interest in defence of the vessel and the other for the costs of his coming to London, and the master to attend the trial. Now in no case can I consider these to be necessities within the purview of the statute, but if no claim has been entered, and if the owners in France had received the proceeds which remain in the hands of the court, they would have very much inclined to have granted the motion, and for this reason, that by the act of the court in France the abandonment of the ship releases the owners from all personal responsibility, that, therefore, by that act the plaintiffs' claim in respect of this, which is a just claim, has been extinguished. As the case now stands, all I can do is to pronounce for so much as relates to what I have described as, wages, necessities. With regard to the other part of the claim, I make no order.

Subsequently the court was satisfied that the French owners had executed an act of abandonment, and that the caveat was withdrawn, and it, therefore, decreed payment of all the items claimed.

THE ALEPPO.

Collision—Evidence—Admission in the answer.Evidence of an order as to the lights given twelve hours before the collision is admissible, but not of conversation with respect to them.

A steamer steering N.E. $\frac{1}{2}$ N., and a schooner close hauled on the starboard tack, and heading W., came into collision. The answer on behalf of the owners of the steamer alleged that the schooner was seen three-quarters of a mile off on the starboard bow, but that she had no lights, and was mistaken for a vessel going the same way as the steamer. All the crew of the schooner were drowned, and the evidence for the plaintiff consisted of one witness as to the state of the schooner's lights some hours before the collision. The defendants called no witnesses:

Held, that the plaintiffs were not bound to call witnesses from the defendants' vessel.

And that, from the admissions in the answer, the schooner was seen in ample time for the steamer to have avoided her, and that therefore the steamer was alone to blame for the collision.

This was a cause of damage in respect of a collision which occurred on the 24th Aug. 1865, about eight miles to the westward of the Bardsea Island, between the schooner Charles Edward, bound from Duddon to Cardiff with a cargo of iron ore, and the screw steamer Aleppo, bound from Malta to Liverpool with a cargo of grain.

Milward, Q. C. and Cohen appeared for the plts.Brett, Q. C. and V. Lushington for the defts.

On behalf of the schooner it was pleaded that she was close-hauled on the starboard tack (heading W. with the wind from N.N.W.) with her proper lights exhibited, and a good look-out; that she kept her reach and was run into by the steamer, and that the collision was caused by the Aleppo and those on board thereof in not having a good look-out, and in not slackening and reversing her engines, and generally in not keeping out of the way of the Charles Edward.

On behalf of the owners of the Aleppo it was alleged that she had her proper lights exhibited and a good look-out, and the 5th article of the answer was as follows:

In these circumstances a vessel which afterwards proved to be the schooner Charles Edward was observed a little on the starboard bow, distant about three-quarters of a mile. No lights could be seen on board her, and it was conceived that she was going the same course as the Aleppo, and the Aleppo's helm was starboarded to give her a clear berth. Shortly afterwards the strange vessel was made out to be standing across the bows of the steamer, and the steamer's helm was thereupon put hard a-port. The engines were also slowed and stopped; but, nevertheless, a collision took place, the stem of the Aleppo striking the schooner on the port quarter whereby the schooner was sunk and lost.

All the crew of the schooner were drowned, and in support of the plaintiff's case James Coppack was called, who deposed that he was master of the Lady Caroline, which, with the Aleppo, put into Holyhead on the Saturday previous to the collision. Both vessels remained there till 2 p.m. of the Tuesday following. The witness also stated that he was on board the schooner just before she sailed, and was then asked by Milward whether he heard any order given by the master of the schooner as to her lights, whereupon Brett, Q. C. objected.—The order was given so long before the collision that it must be immaterial, and it was given behind the back of the defts.

Dr. LUSHINGTON.—If the learned counsel had asked what was said in common conversation I could not allow the question to be answered; but an order is a different thing, as it may be a fact as well as a declaration. Whether the question is immaterial or no must depend upon the answer.

The question was then put, and the witness stated that the master ordered the boy to get the lamps and clean them, as the schooner was going to sea that night and would want them. The witness also stated that both vessels put to sea together the same afternoon, and about six o'clock he saw the schooner's lights fixed and burning, and as late as ten o'clock saw ship's lights from the direction in which he believed the schooner then was.

No other witness was called for the plt., and the defts. declined to call witnesses.

Dr. LUSHINGTON, in addressing the Trinity Masters, said:—Now, Gentlemen, we are in a state of difficulty in this case. It is perfectly true, as Mr. Brett has said, that the determination to which we may come must not in any degree be affected by sympathy for those who have had the misfortune to be losers by the collision. We have no right to say that, because, by a great calamity, the lives of the crew and the property of the owners of the vessel have been sacrificed, therefore we should come to any other conclusion than that which the evidence justifies and the law requires. On the other hand, because the evidence of those on board the schooner is lost, I cannot think there was any obligation upon her owners to resort to witnesses from on board the Aleppo in order to illustrate their case. It is perfectly true that such testimony might have been resorted to; but it is so contrary to all our practice, and to all fair probability of attaining a just end, that I never could hold there was any obligation so to do; but, before we can come to a decision in the plt.'s favour, we must nevertheless be satisfied somehow or other that there is legal evidence to warrant the conclusion. Now, the plt.'s case may be proved not only by the evidence adduced, but by the admissions in the cause; and I begin by stating that I discard entirely from my consideration every fact in the petition which is not admitted in the answer, or the deft.'s preliminary act. What, then, are those facts? A small schooner, the Charles Edward, the property of the plt., had the misfortune to come into collision with the vessel arrested in this cause, a large steamer, proceeding at the rate of, according to the defts.' own statement, about nine knots an hour, with her topsails set, and steering by the standard compass N.E. half N. Now, the fifth article of the answer is this. [The learned Judge then read the fifth article, cited above, and observed that the same account was given in the preliminary act, and proceeded:] Admitting, therefore, that the schooner had neglected to comply with the Act of Parliament, and was sailing without lights, still, if she was seen at the distance of three-quarters of a mile, it must have been a very clear night, a fact which is directly deposed to by a witness, Coppack; and, assuming for a moment (and this is entirely for your consideration) that she was seen at the distance of three-quarters of a mile without lights, was there not ample time for the steamer to have discovered the true course of the schooner, and to have taken proper measures, and in due time to have avoided the collision? And you must also bear in mind that it is not alleged, so far as I can understand, that the schooner altered her course, but she continued it, whatever it was, and was seen for a little on the starboard side of the steamer. Now it is said, on the other hand, and very powerfully argued by Mr. Brett: "Yes, that may be true, but by being seen a little on the starboard side and without lights, the necessary or probable inference is, that the schooner was going on the same course as the steamer, and therefore the latter vessel was starboarded, and it was only when the error was discovered that it would be deemed necessary to port." The question, then, that I put to you is this, was there not, notwithstanding that the schooner was seen without lights upon the starboard bow, ample time and opportunity for the steamer, if she had been upon the starboard bow, and not proceeding at too rapid a rate, to have discovered how the schooner was going, and to have got out of the way? That is the question, and the important question, for your decision. Whether or no there were lights on board the schooner the evidence, in my view of the case, stands thus: unquestionably there is no direct proof that her lights were burning at the time, and it is averred in the answer that no lights were seen, and you have had a discussion as to whether that is not tantamount to an averment that there were no lights at all. Be it so; but, do you think that, under the circumstances, anybody could do more than say that no lights were seen on board the schooner? And you must also bear in mind that no evidence has been produced on the part of the defts. to show what was the state of things when the schooner was first seen, or what manœuvres beyond those stated in the answer were adopted on the part of the steamer in order to avoid collision. It may be a very prudent measure to keep back from the question all the testimony which might be given on the part of the deft.; but where this is the case I think the deft. is not entitled to any inference beyond that which fairly arises from the plea itself, and certainly to no favourable consideration as to points which might have been elucidated by the evidence. Now really this is the whole case. It is not necessary to trouble you further because the preliminary act and the averments in the fifth article of the answer entirely agree the one with the other, and I have already stated what appears to me to be the fair statement of facts with respect to them. I therefore ask your opinion upon two questions: first, whether you are of opinion that, it being admitted that the schooner was seen three-quarters of a mile off, a little upon the starboard bow, the night being certainly very clear, it was a just and fair inference on the part of those on board the steamer to suppose that the schooner was in the same course as the steamer; and secondly, whether it would not have been practicable to have discovered the schooner's course in ample time to have taken proper measures to have avoided her.

The learned Judge and the Trinity Masters then retired, and, after consultation for a few minutes, returned, when

Dr. LUSHINGTON said:—As this is a peculiar case I shall deviate from the usual custom and read the advice which I have received from the Trinity Masters. Had the Aleppo, when she first saw the schooner, put her helm a-port, the collision would not have taken place. Had the Aleppo, when she saw that the schooner was standing across her bows, gone on full speed and kept her helm a-starboard as it had previously been, she would have gone clear. It was the indecision of the Aleppo in changing her helm which caused the of booty of war the actual captors, though they may institute the suit, are plts. only in name, as the burden of proof rests with those claiming a right to share in the booty. In such cases those who have the burden of proof have also the right to begin.

THE BANDA AND KIRWEE BOOTY.

Booty of war—Right to begin—Practice.

This was a cause of booty of war, and had been referred to the court under the provision of 3 & 4 c. 66, s. 28, and of an Order in Council bearing date the 16th June 1864.

The booty had been captured at Banda and Kirwee in India, in the year 1858, by a force called the Madras column, under the command of Sir G. C. Whitlock, K.C.B., and it having been referred to court to declare who are the parties entitled to the booty and in what proportions. The suit was instituted on behalf of the Madras column, and on the issue of a citation calling upon all parties to appear in the suit, who claimed to share as captors, a petition was filed by the plts. claiming, as captors, to be exclusively entitled to the booty. Petitions and answers were also filed on behalf of the officers and men of various forces who claimed to be also entitled to participate as having constructively assisted in the capture.

The Attorney-General, the Queen's Advocate, Prentiss, and Ayrton appeared for the plts.

Plts., Q. C., Cotton, V. Lushington, Bovill, Q. C., Dr. Lushington, Q. C., V. Harcourt, Q. C., Brett, Q. C., Cohen, Solicitor-General, Pritchard, Coleridge, Bullar, E. C. Clarkson, Price, Q. C., Kempluy, James, Q. C., Denman, Q. C., Bayford, Karlake, Collier, Cole, Q. C., Piffard, Hughes, Pollock, Q. C., J. Paterson, F. Kelly, Hume Williams, Dr. Twiss, Dr. Tristram, and Goldsmith, for various defts. claiming as joint captors.

The right of the plts. as such to open the case was put on behalf of the defts., and a discussion ensued.

The Attorney-General.—This case is sui generis, in that it is the first case of military booty that has been referred to the court at all under the Act of Parliament, and it is also sui generis in another respect, and because, instead of a simple question between the actual captor on the one side and persons claiming to be captors by construction upon the other, we have a large number of defts. who cannot be reduced into less than ten or eleven distinct cases, all of which depend upon the view which may be taken of the effect of each of the various operations in the general design which is alleged to have existed. The right prima facie seems everywhere to all plts. to open the case to court, and if it were denied in this instance by one of the defts. would have, in the first instance, to open his case, and the plts. answer at eleven cases at once. And then after the plts. have been heard there would be eleven replies at once. In principle, and in point of convenience, the course of the case, and the time of the court, would be frustrated by the plt. opening his case, dealing with it upon the merits, which are as much known upon the present occasion to one party as to another, and a single reply would follow from the plts. in the usual manner. There is no rule of practice applicable to this court at all which can in the slightest degree interfere with it. Prize cases are not precedents for this purpose, nor is the Deccan case, for in that there were only one plt. and one deft.

Dr. LUSHINGTON.—There were more parties than those in the Deccan case.

The Attorney-General.—The only parties heard besides those whom I have mentioned were the East India Company; but your Lordship will recollect that they claimed, not as captors, but on quite a distinct footing. It would, under the circumstances of this case, be a positive injustice to the plt., under the pretence of recognising in him a prima facie right (because he is admitted at all events to have some interest), to deprive him of the usual right of plts. in all courts to make out their own case, and to have a general reply.

Roll.—It would be contrary to the ordinary course of procedure, and contrary to the convenience and justice of the case, if the plts. were now to begin. It is not in all cases the rule that the plt. begins; those upon whom the affirmative of the issue is thrown are the parties who have to begin. They are usually the plts.; but upon whom does the affirmative of the issue rest in the present case? Clearly upon the defts., as the resps. to the plts. in this case, to establish that they are entitled to share with Sir George Whitlock's column in the booty taken at Banda and Kirwee. What would be the case if they did not begin? It is utterly impossible, the plt.'s title being admitted, that he should meet the points which are raised by the defts. He will have to do that for the first time in his reply; new points will be put forward by him and pressed against us in his reply, and we shall have no means whatever of meeting those answers which may be given to our case. Whoever begins, it will be absolutely indispensable that some reply—whether one or more is another question—must be given to that reply to our case which the Attorney-General of course at some time or other must give. We rely first upon the universal practice, and next upon the fact that the universal practice is consonant to the convenience and justice of the case. There is no case in which an actual captor claiming the whole of the prize, and claiming to exclude some portion of the fleet, has actually begun, but, to use an expression more or less accurate, the constructive captors always begin.

The Solicitor-General.—In the report of the Deccan case, the following discussion took place:—Dr. Lushington: "Your Lordships will permit me to make one observation. Your Lordships were pleased to say the other day that the counsel for Sir Thomas Hislop were to commence. I humbly submit to your Lordships whether, as this is to be assimilated to a regular prize cause, where the commencement is on those who claim as joint captors, we ought not to begin." Mr. Harrison: "All our documents have been in the hands of the other side a considerable time, but we have heard nothing of joint capture." Earl of Liverpool: "I think it would be desirable that we should decide that now, would it not?" Dr. Lushington: "I should think it would, my Lord. Your Lordships will permit me to state that the ground upon which I humbly contend it would be more regular that we should commence, is simply this, that in every case within my experience in which a claim is made to share as a joint captor, the claim of the actual captor being admitted, in all those cases it has been customary for the joint captor to state his case, and to begin in the first instance; and I apprehend that is consistent with universal principles—that the onus probandi lies on him. He who has actually effected the capture cannot be expected to go on, for it will be impossible for him to know the grounds on which the case is to be put." The general rule of the Admiralty Court was followed in that case. Take the well-known case where an action of ejectment is brought by the heir-at-law, and the question to be tried is whether the heir is entitled or the devisee. The heir is the plt., but it is the well-known practice of all the courts, and in fact not disputed, that if the def., the devisee, chooses to admit the prima facie title of the heir, he is entitled to begin. The same rule prevails in every case in common law in which the affirmative issue is on the def., with the exception of one or two cases in which the damages are unliquidated; but they do not apply here. That being the ordinary rule certainly of the courts of Common Law and of the Admiralty Courts also, why is this case to be an exception? The principle is the same whatever may be the number of the joint captors, and the joint captors on whom the onus probandi lies should begin, otherwise the plt. will have in a great measure to prove a negative. He proves that he has captured; but that is not enough for him to do; he must also prove a negative against each of us.

[AM.]

Dr. LUSHINGTON.—It was impossible for me to have read these papers without anticipating that in all probability this very question would arise, and that I should have in the first instance to determine what course was best to adopt in order to attain the great end that is in view, namely, the due administration of justice. Now, the determination of the court depends partly upon what has been the established practice in questions of this description, and partly upon the consideration of upon whom the onus probandi lies, and lastly upon what course will be best to attain the end of justice. Now, with regard to the practice, there has been no practice, so to speak, with respect to booty taken on land. There has been an established practice with respect to vessels captured at sea, and with respect also to conjoint operations of the army and navy. In both those cases, without any exception, the rule has been that those who claim to share in the joint capture began to state their case, and afterwards were entitled to reply. I believe that no instance can be brought forward, either in the Court of Admiralty or in the Court of Appeal, in which this course was not pursued. If, therefore, practice is of importance, practice would induce me to adopt the course which has been followed in so large a number of instances. Now, with regard to the onus probandi, and to the fact that upon the present occasion the actual captors are the plt., in truth and in fact they are plt. in name only; they are made plt. upon the present occasion only for the purpose of calling into the arena those persons who might have set up a claim to the booty in question. I do not know that this was precisely the best course which could have been pursued. Another course might have been pursued had it been deemed necessary so to do, but this was clearly the most expedient. With regard to the onus probandi I apprehend that whenever the onus probandi is fixed upon a party it is the duty of that party to begin and to produce proof in order to establish his case. There is no onus probandi upon the Attorney-General's party; they are the actual captors, and unless another case can be made out which shall show that other parties are entitled to share with them, they are entitled to take the whole of the booty. Now, according to my knowledge, and so far as I am pretend to give an opinion upon the subject, in all cases appurtenant to the present where the onus probandi has been imposed upon a party, they are entitled to begin in order to fulfil that duty. Now, I believe it has gone so far as this: that even in cases where the onus probandi in the original instance did not attach upon a party, yet, if in the course of the proceedings the onus probandi did, and did attach upon a party, they were bound to produce the evidence. If my memory does not fail me, I think that even in the great trial in the Lerona case that was the principle that was adopted. And looking at all those matters, it appears to me with regard to the Attorney-General's proposition, that although it is true that some inconvenience might be avoided, and much delay might be saved, yet that it militates against practice and against principle, and I apprehend that it is my duty, whatever may be the course which this case may occupy, whatever labour there may have to undergo, to choose that course which is most adapted to attain the end of justice, and most consonant with past practice. Therefore, the proper course will be for the other claimants to begin.

THE FLORA.

Collision—Second arrest—Practice.

The jurisdiction which the court undoubtedly possess to order a second arrest in respect of the same cause of action should be cautiously exercised.

Application for such an arrest should be made to the court itself.

This was an application for a superadditio to the order of a second arrest of a vessel in respect of the same cause of action, and to condemn the plt. in the costs and damages occasioned by the second arrest. An action in respect of damages had been commenced in the sum of 1000*l.* against the vessel and her cargo.

Bail had been given in the sum of 1000*l.* and the property released, and it being desirable afterwards to increase the amount of the action to 3000*l.* the proctor for the def. agreed to the increase, and sent to the plt.'s proctor the names of the persons to give bail; subsequently, however, the owners of the vessel refused to give bail, and the plt. again arrested her.

V. Lushington moved for a superadditio and contended that the court only could order a second arrest in respect of the same cause of action, and that the cargo could not be arrested, as no freight had yet become due.

Dr. LUSHINGTON.—Surely, in all cases of damage to the cargo, as the presumption is that freight is due until the contrary is shown.

Brett, Q.C. and Clarkson contended that if the application for a second warrant had been made to the court it would have been granted, and therefore the def. had no cause of complaint. At common law, in order to increase the amount of damages, a second suit is instituted and the first one discontinued, and that is in effect what has been done in the present case.

Dr. LUSHINGTON.—The court has no doubt that it has the jurisdiction to order a second arrest, but it is a power which should be cautiously exercised; and, unless under exceptional circumstances, only after an application to the court itself. Under

C. and Butt, for the plts., opposed the defendants' claim that the defendants be condemned in the costs.

The case of the Commodore is clearly distinguishable, for in that case the difference between the appraised and appraised value, was only 15l. In the value as appraised is nearly half as much as that stated by the defendants:

Commodore, 1 W. Rob. 837;

Spinks' Eco. & Adm. Rep. N. S. 163.

SHINGTON.—I am of opinion that the result of this appraisement has been shown by the evidence.

As a general rule the defendants are called to the value of their property, and if the defendants are dissatisfied with the estimate they may issue a commission of appraisement, and if it be proved that the defendants have not stated the value of the cargo, the plts. are entitled to the costs of the commission. This is the general, though I by no means the universal rule, but in this case there is such a substantial difference between the appraised and appraised values, that the plts. are clearly entitled to the costs of the appraisement.

The owners of the cargo declined to accept it at the appraised value, and the bark was subsequently held to the collision.

decree a release of the cargo without costs.

20th Nov. 1866, the bark Flora and the ship Alan came into collision off Cornwall, and the Flora in consequence put into Falmouth, where the vessel, "her tackle, apparel, and furniture, and the freight due for the transportation of the cargo laden on board the said vessel," were arrested. The owner of the Flora ultimately declined to give bail, and the consignees of the cargo, which was destined for Hamburg, refused to accept it at Plymouth and insisted upon its being delivered at Hamburg in compliance with the terms of the charter-party. The charter-party contained no stipulations for payments on account of freight.

On the 1st Feb. 1866, the Court heard the principal cause, and was of opinion that the Flora was alone to blame for the collision, and the Flora and her owners, and the freight due, were condemned in the damage.

Mitford, Q. C. and V. Lushington, for the defendants, moved for a release of the cargo arrested on account of freight.—Cargo on board a wrong-doing vessel cannot as cargo be arrested by the owners of the other vessel: (The Victor, 1 Lush. 72.) It may indeed be seized for freight, but then only for such as has accrued, which in this case is none, as nothing has been paid or agreed to be paid on account, and the consignees decline to accept the cargo at a port short of its destination and pay pro rata freight. If the seizure be sanctioned the shipowner may be compelled to pay money which he may never be reimbursed, as the goods might be lost during the remainder of the voyage, and the freight prospectively paid would then never become due. The plts. have a remedy over in personam against the defendants, if the res is not sufficient to answer the claim. No case can be cited in which the owner of the cargo has been compelled, in order to obtain the release of his cargo, to pay anything not actually due:

The Leo, 1 Lush. 444; 6 L. T. Rep. N. S. 58;

The Rendenberg, 6 C. Rob. 142;

The Diana, 5 C. Rob. 60; 7 L. T. Rep. N. S. 897;

The Vrow Catharina, 6 C. Rob. 269.

But if the shipowner abandons the cargo the owner of it must either lose his property or pay a freight, for which, if the goods should be subsequently lost, he would never have been liable.

Brett, Q. C. and E. C. Clarkson for the plts.—

This is an application, not by the owner of cargo, but by the shipowner, the wrong-doer, and his object in asking for release of the cargo is that he may be enabled to earn freight, and not be liable to account for it to the plts. It is by the defendants' own default that the cargo has not been delivered at its port of destination, and the defendants are therefore bound to carry it on though at an additional loss. The shipowner's lien upon the cargo continues throughout the voyage, so as to enable him to earn the freight, and to that lien the plts. have now a right to succeed.

Mitford, Q. C. in reply.—According to the contention on the other side, the plts. would now succeed to the defendants' lien upon the goods, in order that the defendants may still carry on the goods, and so earn the freight. The right must be transferred with all its incidents, but the plts. do not propose to carry on the cargo.

Dr. LUSHINGTON.—It is clear that the owners of cargo on board a vessel which has occasioned a collision are in no respect responsible for the damage, as they have no right of interference or control over the ship, and therefore cannot be to blame. But it is also clear that all the property which is on board the ship, and is the property of the shipowner, is liable, and therefore the cargo is usually arrested by the plts. in order to obtain payment of the freight to which the shipowner would have been entitled. But the rights of the shipowner to which the pta. succeed extend no further, and therefore, if no freight is actually due, no right of arrest attaches upon the cargo. In this case the cargo was to be delivered at Hamburg, and has been carried to Plymouth only, and there is no stipulation in the charter-party for payment on account of freight, and no acceptance of the cargo at Plymouth. No freight, therefore, is due, and though the master, as agent of the shipowners, may tranship the cargo and carry it on to the port of destination, and so earn the freight, yet this right, even if it had been asked for by the pta., could not have been transferred to them by reason of the collision. Under the circumstances, I must release the cargo, but without costs.

(Before Judge KELLY.)

THE REPEATER v. THE BRAGA, OF KRAGEROE.

Rules of the road and foreign ships.

Norwegian ship held to be liable in damages and costs for having come into collision with a British ship through breach of the 11th article of the Admiralty Regulations as to rule of the road, such regulations being binding by convention on Norwegian ships, whether the collision take place outside or within British jurisdiction.

The Queen's Advocate, Dr. Todd, and Dr. Boga appeared for the Repeater.

Dr. Townsend, Dr. Elrington, and Dr. Coorigan appeared for the Braga.

KELLY, J., in giving judgment in this case, said:—About eight o'clock on the morning of the 27th Sept. last (1865), a British barque, the Repeater, of Sligo, 298 tons, her master and ten hands, at the time about 300 miles off the Banks of Newfoundland, was on her voyage from Gorston, for the port of Liverpool, to Quebec, with coals, close-bauled on the port tack, a light breeze from S.W. by W., with a lifting fog, and going about three knots through the water, her course being then N.W. by W. $\frac{1}{2}$ W., when she observed a sail emerging from the fog about two cables' length off, and about half a point on her starboard bow, nearly end on. That sail was a Norwegian barque, the Braga, of Krageroe, 439 tons, her master and twelve hands, proceeding on her voyage from Quebec to Cork with timber and deals, heading about E. by S., about four points free, the wind a-beam and, according to her, S.S.W.; her rate of going about five knots, and she very nearly at the same time and distance sighted the Repeater, about one half point on her starboard bow, coming towards her W. by N. $\frac{1}{2}$ N. Under such conditions as these, two vessels, one of them going free, were thus placed, steering nearly opposite courses, end or nearly end on to each other, with a conjoint velocity of eight knots, and less than a quarter of a mile distance between them. The masters of both of them seemed perfectly and must correctly aware of their duty, and, therefore, of the propriety and necessity of each at once putting his helm to port in order to avoid a collision. The evidence upon the part of the Repeater (the petitioner in this suit) is, that her helm was immediately put hard up, that is to port, and that she at once began to fall off, but that the Braga, instead of porting likewise, put her helm to starboard, followed round after the Repeater, when the master of the Repeater seeing the Braga within one hundred and thirty or forty yards coming down on him rather on his starboard bow, and that a collision had become inevitable, endeavored to diminish its violence, put his own helm to starboard, and had already come up a little when his barque was struck with great force by the Braga a little before the starboard cathead, the starboard bow of the Braga coming into violent contact with that of the Repeater. By that collision the bowsprit, jibboom, headstays, with sails and gear attached to the Repeater were broken and carried away, the cutwater broken, forecousers torn to pieces, the planks on the starboard bow stove down to the water's edge, and the covering board and deck ripped up, her state being such that master and crew felt obliged to abandon and burn her, under the humane permission of the master of the Braga, who kept by them, to take refuge on his vessel. From that collision the two vessels went clear almost immediately, the entire divergence from their first sighting each other of its disastrous termination occupying, at the very highest calculation, but three minutes and a half. In all the important details of this evidence, the master and crew of the Repeater, both in their direct and their cross-examination, were quite consistent and corroborative of each other. On the other side, the evidence on the part of the Braga is, according to her master, that she did port, and ported half a minute earlier than the Repeater, and that he did not give the order to starboard until after the Repeater had starboarded, when if he had not done so, but kept his port helm, the Repeater would have come into his port bow, and the collision would have been three times worse than it was. The case of the Repeater then is simply, that she alone ported, and that finding the Braga did not port, but starboarded, she, in order to avoid the consequences of that mistake of the Braga, was obliged to starboard also. The case of the Braga is a little more complex, it being that she not only ported, but was the first to do so, and that she starboarded after the Repeater had done so, to avoid the consequences of that error. It is observed upon the view of those two cases, that while that of the Braga admits that the Repeater ported, the case of the Repeater denies that the Braga ported at all; and namely, two issues are knit by them—the first, and most important one, namely, whether the Braga ported or not; secondly, if she did port, which vessel was the first to starboard. Now, the case of the Braga having distinctly tendered these issues, negatived altogether by the corroborative evidence of the Repeater's witnesses and case, it becomes necessary to examine details in the evidence of the Braga's case, and to decide how far these may be consistent and uniform with each other. Then, to test the accuracy of the master's evidence. His statement was, that he had ported half a minute earlier than the Repeater; but he has also stated that when first coming on deck he saw the Repeater falling off, and sent his mate aft to see how his helm was, and knew the shift of his helm only upon the mate coming back and reporting it to him. How, then, can he be considered a reliable witness as to having ported before the Repeater had, when by his own admission he did not know how his own helm was, when he was looking at the Repeater already under a port helm? Again, he states that he had opened the three masts of the Repeater fifty seconds after he had ported, and kept them in view for half a minute before he starboarded, thus making his time under a port helm to be just one minute and a half, whereas the man at the wheel, who should be best informed on that point, makes it but three quarters of a minute—just half the time. Again, the master states that his vessel encountered her port helm

THE MORNING STAR.

luffed up about one point; but Hampton, who was on deck with him at the time, says that he (Hampton) could not see the Braga was under the influence of a port breeze. Again, the master's evidence is, that the Repeater luffing up before he gave her helm to starboard; but Hampton, on the contrary, says that he saw her at the very time, states that he gave her the order to starboard he saw her coming up. These may appear to be (at least) minute criticisms, but borne in mind that such must necessarily be minutes—even half-minutes—are of no great importance in the investigation of a transaction which first to last, occupied but three minutes. Besides, they test the accuracy of the four witnesses produced on the part of the Braga, three are thus contradicting each other on both the points at issue; and upon the testimony of the boatswain the court should be slow to place reliance on account of the simulation of him in order to be examined in that foreign witness ignorant of the English language. The Court, however, having called for, and read Braga's log, will now read from it the account of the occurrence, and prefacing it in the language of Lord Stowell, when, in the case of Eleanor, that great judge was about to examine the testimony of witnesses by the entries in the log, he said: "Witnesses, when they give their evidence, may, perhaps, be aware it has some point of consequence, and may qualify themselves of past events so as to give a colour to it. But the journal (the log) is written in the hands of persons unacquainted with any intention of fraud, and may, therefore, be securely relied upon, whenever it is not prejudiced by its authors." Now, the question is as follows: "On the 27th of July, at half-past seven o'clock a.m., put a man on board, and about eight o'clock the man on board called out, 'Hard a-port;' and as the ship was at breakfast, came out in a hurry on board the stranger in sight on starboard bow, when we got to see the stranger, it seemed to me she was falling off, but in a moment bore down on us, and we then resolved to put the helm hard to starboard, if possible, to prevent the collision; but she was too close to each other, and it was impossible to escape the collision. The Repeater struck her bow on our starboard bow, which was our waterstay martingale, and got our anchor adrift, and split some of the planks on our starboard bow. We saw the resprit and jibboom break away after the collision, which was only a moment, and we were separated." The entry just read establishes beyond doubt the following most important facts, that the look-out had been only just a few minutes before the collision occurred, the first of the Braga being that she sighted the Repeater at half-past seven; secondly, that when the Repeater was sighted she was already under her weather or starboard helm; fourthly, that the Braga had not ported at all, but had luffed the Repeater not only falling off, but up also, off her own starboard bow; and, fifthly, that the log is not only silent upon it, but material and saving point, but only and we then determined to hard a-starboard, and put her under their weather or starboard helm; that she not only kept a-starboard whilst she was off her starboard bow, but put hard to starboard; and so it is thus truly stated in the log, that the Repeater turned with her bow on our starboard bow. The clear conclusions from the previous observations and from these entries is, that the Braga sighted the Repeater too late to port with any effect, and in order, to use the words of her own log, "to escape" (not lighten) the collision, put her weather helm hard a-starboard and never ported at all. If the court had entertained any doubt on this, it has been altogether removed by the opinion formed all through by the learned assessors who assisted the court, and who hold that, had the helm of the Braga been ported, as stated by her witnesses, and then starboarded, as also stated by her witnesses, the collision could not have taken place upon the starboard bow of the Braga, but must have occurred upon her port bow. Under all these circumstances, and with the full concurrence of my assessors, I pronounce the Braga to be solely in fault for this collision, for not having ported her helm, in compliance with the 11th article of the Sailing Rules, to which her country's ships are subject, whether within British jurisdiction or not, by convention between the King of Norway and our British Queen. I therefore make my decree accordingly, and with costs of suit.

The Court was assisted by Capt. Miller, of H.M.S. the Royal George, and Capt. Crosby, R.N.

UNITED STATES DISTRICT COURT OF ADMIRALTY.

Reported by R. D. BENEDICT, Proctor and Advocate in Admiralty.

SOUTHERN DISTRICT OF NEW YORK.

THE MORNING STAR.

Salvage—Corporation formed for salvage purposes—Quantum meruit.

A steamer valued with her cargo at 290,000 dols. ran aground on Deal Beach, about forty miles from New York city. A company formed expressly for the purpose of carrying on the business of wrecking and salvage, but employing masters and crews on regular wages and giving them no share of whatever compensation they received, applied to the owners of the steamer for the job of getting her off. They were asked what would be the cost of sending the assistance, and answered 2000 dols. or 2500 dols., whereupon they were employed, and sending down two schooners with heavy anchors and cables they, in about twenty-four hours work, got the vessel off and claimed 15,000 dols. salvage:

Held, that such a corporation could not have the characteristics of a salvor:

That if their compensation were to be given as salvage, they could only have the owners' share of what would be proper salvage:

That the compensation should be a quantum meruit.

Decree for 2500 dols.

The Morning Star was bound on a voyage from New Orleans to New York with a valuable cargo worth 140,000 dols., including 60,000 dols. in specie. Early on the morning of July 1, 1863, the wind being light and the sea smooth, but the atmosphere being misty and obscure, she grounded on the coast of New Jersey, near Deal Beach. The ship without her cargo was valued at about 150,000 dols. She went on the beach with so much force as to be unable to be got off without help. The libellants were the Coast Wrecking Company, a corporation incorporated by the laws of the State of New York, having authority by their charter to hire or own vessels manned and equipped, to be employed in towing, aiding, protecting, and raising vessels and their cargoes wrecked or in distress, whenever such wreck or distress occur, and to receive compensation or salvage therefore in like manner as private persons, and entitled to like liens and remedies.

The location of their business was in New York city, between thirty and forty miles from the place of the wreck of the Morning Star, but in familiar communication with the cruising localities of the vicinage. Their business was conducted exclusively by vessels, equipments, and materials paid for out of the corporate funds, and the officers and men on board those vessels did not participate personally in losses or gains springing out of their employment, but received payment in solido out of the funds of the corporation, as in ordinary cases of hiring. An agent of the libellants learning of the grounding of the steamship, applied to the master to employ the libellants to get her off. Other applications to the like effect were made by other parties. About noon of the same day, Mr. Merritt, another agent of the libellants, called upon Mr. Hubbard, the secretary and treasurer of the company, which owned the ship, at their office in New York, and solicited the employment of the libellants to get her off, giving the strongest assurances of their ability and readiness to perform the work promptly. Mr. Hubbard made some inquiries of other parties as to the sufficiency of the libellants. He testified, on the trial, that he had inquired of Merritt what would be the cost of sending down the relief vessels, and that Merritt told him that he could not tell the cost, but the president of the company could tell him, and that accordingly he went to the libellants' office, where he saw the president, or some officer having charge, who told him it would cost 2000 dols. or 2500 dols., and assured him that they had every apparatus for doing the work quickly and well, &c. Mr. Merritt and the president of the libellants' company both testified that they had no recollection of these conversations of which Mr. Hubbard testified. On Mr. Hubbard's return from making his inquiries he gave to Merritt a letter of introduction to the captain of the vessel, informing him that the libellants had been employed to get the vessel off.

Mr. Merritt accordingly, after dispatching two schooners with heavy anchors and cables to the place, went himself overland, arriving at the wreck before dark and delivered his letter to the captain. The passenger and crew had all been landed and the 60,000 dols. specie, which latter Mr. Merritt advised the captain at once to send to the city by express, and this the captain did. The schooners arrived during the night, and the next morning the work was commenced, the officers and crew of the Morning Star aiding with all their power, and on the next morning the vessel was got off, and being found to have sustained no serious injury, got up steam and came up to the city by her own power. The libellants claimed salvage for services, claiming 15,000 dols.

Hand (with whom was Marvin, J.), for the libellants, after arguing the questions of fact as to the employment of the libellants, argued that the main question was as to the amount of salvage. That the great increase of the commerce of the port, and the increase in the value and size of the vessels employed, have given rise to the necessity of having on hand greater facilities for saving vessels which get ashore in the neighbourhood. The libellants respond to this necessity of commerce. Anchors and cables of ordinary size, common ships' pumps, common tug-boats, and other ordinary instrumentalities, can no longer be relied on to get off from the beach ships of the immense size now built. Anchors and cables of extraordinary size and strength are needed, with the proper facilities for carrying them out. Steam-pumps throwing 30 and 80 barrels of water a minute are now employed by this company. It is submitted that the court should respond in like manner to the exigencies of commerce, and give reasonable encouragement to the company by its award of salvage. The case contains every element of very meritorious salvage services, entitling the salvors to the favourable consideration of the court. First, the ship was of no value where she lay. She was in imminent danger of total loss by the action or washing of every tide. Secondly, she was got off in the shortest possible time by the use of anchors and cables of extraordinary size, and by the exercise of the best professional skill of professional salvors. Thirdly, the salvors are a company organised for the purpose of rendering salvage services, having their capital invested in vessels, anchors, cables, steam-pump hoisters, and other apparatus built and kept on hand at large expense ready at all times for use with the necessary agents, servants, and crews. The counsel cited the case of the Delphos, 1 Newberry Ad. Rep. 412, in which on a valuation of 50,000 dols. the District Court of Louisiana awarded 45 per cent. and the case of the Independent, 2 Curtis Rep. 330, in which 7500 dols. was decreed on a valuation of 201,000 dols. to a tow-boat for towing a vessel out of a dangerous position in twelve hours.

E. C. Benedict and R. D. Benedict, for the claimants, argued that the agreement was made for not more than 2500 dols. The libellant is a corporation not an individual; it cannot of itself be an actual salvor; it cannot go to sea or command a schooner. It cannot have any humanity, any activity, or any zeal. It cannot pull and heave, or pump or risk its life and health. The most it can do is to own property which can be used in performing salvage services. The men who worked in getting this vessel off are the actual salvors if there be any. But they, no matter how skilful and faithful, were not salvors in any proper legal sense. They were, every one of them, the hired servants of the libellants, working for wages and nothing else, and expressly agreeing not to be entitled to salvage compensation. There was not a person connected with the undertaking who had the characteristic qualities of salvors. There was no zeal, spurred by self-interest, no temptation to risk, or daring, or hunger, or toil or exposure. They were only hired by the month or year to do a fair day's work for a fair day's wages. When parties so arrange their business that there are no living acting parties who can earn a contingent compensation, there can be no salvage to divide. They must then all be content with their wages, and reasonable compensation for the use of their implements, and for this the 2500 dols. would be an allowance at extravagant rates. Or if the court may give salvage, at least the libellants would not be entitled to recover the shares due to the individual salvors, but only the share usually given to owners of saving vessels. The case of the Delphos cited by libellants, is just such a case, the court decreeing to the owners one-third of the 45 per cent.

By the COURT.—As to the question whether any rate of compensation was named to Mr. Hubbard, the positive testimony of one witness to the transaction must outweigh as proof in the cause the non-recollection of the libellants' witnesses only alleging their want of any recollection of the fact. Moreover, there is an inherent probability in the circumstances that Mr. Hubbard's testimony is entitled to credit in the relation he gives of his interview with the agents of the libellants. They, in all their treating for the employment of their instrumentalities on the part of the Morning Star, descanted earnestly upon the special adaptation of the libellants' equipments for that particular service. Their agent had, moreover, valued the Star after she grounded; they knew her well, and the description and quantity of which would be required for her relief, are of the coast, the tides and currents; there, and they were strenuous suitors for employment. It would in such case be most apt that the owners of the ship would be charged for the undertaking; and equally probable that the libellants would be not less prompt to furnish an answer to the inquiry. And it be remarked that no evidence has been produced in court, after a sharp litigation in the cases, to demonstrate that 2000 dols. or 2500 was not an adequate compensation for the services actually rendered by the libellants. In addition to those considerations, the claimants furnished gratuitously their entire ship, officers, crew, and equipments, to the libellants, in aid of the wrecking operations, during the whole period the work was in progress. It is furthermore a circumstance of weight, evincing that the alleged salvors did not regard their services as purely of a salvage nature, that they, on arrival at the beach with the vessels to commence their work upon the wreck, advised the master of the Morning Star to send by the Express Company to New York the 60,000 dols. of specie, part of the cargo of the wreck, to avoid the danger of its loss if remaining with the ship, which would be a very unusual proceeding if the libellants regarded their operations to be a salvage of the ship and cargo. I am persuaded accordingly that the undertaking in its inception, as manifested by the conduct and intercourse between the parties, was upon the understanding that the compensation for the services to be rendered was upon the basis of a quantum meruit, under a limitation that the reward was not expected to exceed 2500 dols. It is quite competent for parties interested to agree upon a stipulated sum as a salvage reward for salvage services: (Marvin, Wreck and Salvage, 128, s. 119.) The agreed compensation is binding upon the salvors, and remains salvage, although limited to an amount agreed and stipulated between the parties. When an agreement is to perform labour upon a vessel in distress for a compensation to be paid at all events, whether the vessel be relieved thereby from peril or not, such agreement displaces a claim for salvage purely (The Whitaker, Sprague's Decisions, 282); and a quantum meruit is recoverable for the services. In that position of the arrangement the libellants, had their efforts to save the vessel been fruitless, would not have lost their labours and expenditures, but could have resorted to the equity of the proposition made by them to the claimants, and accepted by them, or receive the reasonable worth of the labour and disbursements made by them on the business. The corresponding acts of the parties were in fair accord with such reasonable meaning. The several parties met in this relation. The libellants had visited the stranded ship, made themselves acquainted with her exact position by inspection, and through their business, calling, and pursuit, fully understood the character and degree of help she needed, and requested to be employed in performing the service. The claimants asked what would be the cost of the work, and the libellants replied from 2000 dols. to 2500 dols. Upon that statement the claimants immediately placed the ship in the hands of the libellants' agent, who performed the job without loss or accident in a few hours' labour at the daytime, after he had reached the ship. These contracting parties, personally wholly strangers to each other, as it seems, transacted the business treated about in the most direct and summary manner; very much, I apprehend, as if it was regarded between them to be a direct bargain, conclusively closed by the few words interchanged between them at the time of interview; no difference of relations between them being contemplated after the ship was so placed in charge of the libellants, until their services were finished, and I consider that their rights towards each are now precisely as they would have been had the libellants literally fulfilled their agreement by going to the wreck at the time stipulated, and performed what they represented they would do (and actually did, two days afterwards), fastened their towing apparatus to the stranded vessel and drawn her harmless off the bank where she lay grounded. I consider therefore (as it appears by the proof) that the vessel was placed by the claimants in charge of the libellants, and was accepted by the latter as a bailment, for their labour to be performed by the latter, and thus consummating the contract in presenti by mutual delivery and acceptance between the agents of the respective parties. The libellants insist that the property being then in a state of wreck went into their possession in that condition, and was held by them under obligation of her owners implied by law, that the libellants should be recompensed for its rescue and restoration conformably to the principle recognised and enforced in cases of salvage at sea. On the contrary, the claimants maintain that the libellants together with others were suitors for the same job, and that it was notorious at the place of the disaster that the matter of furnishing relief to the steamer aground was subject of pursuit and solicitation between different applicants, and that the business had been allotted to the libellants. But I am not called upon to declare that the negotiation on the subject between the agents of the parties resulted in a formal contract which was capable, in case of any failure of either to carry it into execution not proceeding from his fault, of being pleaded and enforced as absolute against the other; not but that, in case the fulfilment of the arrangement on either side had been prevented by inevitable accident, the court might not administer the engagement as equitably one of a quantum meruit character, and afford relief to the libellants in proportion to the benefit bestowed by their labours and judicious conduct in the undertaking, though ultimately fruitless in its results. This would be quite compatible with the arrangement preliminarily adopted between the parties, considering it not regarded by either as absolutely of a salvage character. Then the interpretation of the proposition made by the libellants' agents to the agent of the claimants, and accepted by the latter, to pay 2000 dols. expenses for services to be rendered, and up to 2500 dols. if so much was earned, would enable the court to secure each one a reasonable remuneration out of the enterprise, and take from it the hazard of a total loss of labour and expenditure by a failure of complete success in the whole undertaking. The conduct of the libellants during the transaction indicates they did not regard their standing therein to be that of technical salvors; they accepted the injured steamer, her master, officers, crew, equipments, apparatus, engines, &c., as gratuitously contributed to the common service; they assented to, and, indeed, advised, that the claimants, before the forces provided for the relief of the stranded ship commenced operations upon her, should take from her the 60,000 dols. part of her lading on board, and send it from the place of the wreck by the express company to New York, which proceeding very little comported with a consciousness of holding the right of an inchoate salvor upon that value of cargo on the ship at the time of her wreck; and so also did the fact that the relieving vessel, the moment she had drawn the Morning Star from the sandbank, and her fires could be lighted and steam raised, delivered her up to her captain and crew, by whom she was navigated to her own berth at the New York docks. The counsel for the libellants urge most strenuously the great value and costs of the salvor vessel and her equipments and appliances employed by them in the services rendered on the occasion in question as a particular entering into the augmentation of the recompence to which the libellants are entitled, under the rules of evidence governing allowances to salvors by admiralty tribunals. That principle has been invoked as pervading and largely influential in favour of suitors throughout the administration of salvage laws in European and American jurisprudence, emphatically in encouragement of the modern practice followed by these libellants of putting in use vessels and crews of large and expensive completeness and fitness for the special business of saving vessels and cargoes by giving them open countenance through a distinctive grant of extra compensation, because of the remarkable completeness of their apparatus and ship's crew, and their energy and faithful conduct in perfecting the salvage of the Morning Star. They thus ask to have imputed and appropriated to this corporation, by the way of enhanced rewards imposed upon the wrecked, all moral and physical merits and personal gallantry and hazard, recognised in the books as justifiable causes for inflated compensation to individual salvors for services of high value and personal merit, and hazard on special exigencies. But I perceive no legal reason or justification for applying the rule referred to, however sanctioned in respect to individual salvors in cases of personal exposure of life or property, to corporate bodies having a figurative vitality imparted by positive law, and giving aid only on fixed wages. However much of commendable worth and heroism may have been displayed in fulfilling their stated services, the actors therein, on fixed wages, however faithful to their duties, would not be entitled in distribution out of the gratuities asked for from the judgment of the court, to one tittle of reward personally, but the bounty must be exclusively allotted to the corporators typified by positive law to be actual owners and actor in the transaction, and imbued with the sentiments and emotions of the liveliest humanity, but in reality actuated by no higher or other merit in acts of a salvage character than the fire insurer is in paying up his forfeited policy of insurance. Subordinate courts of admiralty jurisdiction will be apt to await the declaration of such rules of decision by tribunals of ultimate authority before pronouncing such to be the established law of salvage recompence, in respect to the distributive rate of reward to the owners of property used in effecting a salvage service. It can scarcely be assumed as a presumption of law that stock shares of a corporate body are imbued with faculties and emotions, moral or intellectual, of a higher order than the inert material whose value they represent by positive statute in a distributive dividend. In my opinion, had the engagement between the parties in this case been, as alleged in the libel, a plain contract for salvage services, the measure of compensation to be distributed to the libellants would be none other than the proportion legally pertaining to the property put in hazard by the service; and no fiction of law can be invoked vivifying the symbolical corporation into an assemblage of vital salvors, exercising the motions and faculties of living men consummating a meritorious salvage achievement, and thus becoming individually entitled to a fitting reward therefore. My conclusion upon the whole case is, that the employment of the vessel, her crew and apparatus, was in the first instance obtained by the importunity of the libellants for their own pecuniary interest, and with the same knowledge in all particulars, respecting the subject of negotiation, as was possessed by the claimants. That the services proposed to be performed by the libellants were for a consideration limited to 2500 dols.; and if upon equitable considerations, or on subsequent alterations of facts in relation to the subject of the bargain, great changes had occurred in the nature of the services to be performed, rendering it onerous and inequitable for the claimants to enforce such limitation of the sum to be paid to the libellants, yet there is no proof given in the cause showing that any such alteration did afterwards occur, or that the libellants are entitled to more for their labours and hazards than the sum upon which they were offered and undertaken. Wherefore a decree must be entered for the libellants for 2500 dols., with interest from Aug. 3, 1863, and costs of suit. The interest and costs of suit might have been barred by the claimants had they tendered satisfaction of the bargain at the price upon which it was undertaken by the libellants.

COURT OF QUEEN'S BENCH.

Barristers-at-Law.

SOMES AND OTHERS v. JENKINS.

Ship—Freight—Broker—Principal.

T., a shipbroker, engaged shipping room in the plts.' ship for goods. T. sent on the plts.' usual advertising card for freight to deft., with a note of the quantity of freight he had engaged for. Deft. then shipped the goods and took the mate's receipts with deft.'s name as the shipper. Deft. sent these receipts to T. with a set of bills of lading in his usual form, in which his name appeared as shipper of the goods. Plts. then procured the captain's signature to the bills of lading and returned them with a freight-note to T., debiting deft. as the shipper with freight. T. sent on the bills of lading to deft. without the freight-note, but making out another freight-note. Deft. afterwards paid T. the freight.

By the custom of the port the shipowner may retain the bills of lading until payment of the freight, when the freight is made payable there, or may part with them, and then the shipper has two months' credit from the sailing of the ship.

After the payment to T., and before the two months' credit had expired, T. stopped payment:

Held, under the circumstances that deft. was liable to the plts. for the freight.

This action was brought to recover 108*l* 5*s* 7*d* for freight of 330 hogsheads of beer from London to Bombay, per ship Star of India, and primage thereon.

The plts. are shipowners of London, and the deft. is a brewer at Lambeth, trading as Goding, Jenkins, and Co., who had contracted with the Indian Government to supply beer at Bombay, Kurrachee, and Madras.

On the 14th Sept. 1863 a shipowner and broker named Thomson agreed with the deft. to provide ship room for the conveyance of the beer at 28*s* per tun of four hogsheads and 5*s* primage, payable in London at two months after the sailing of the vessel.

The plts. did not know of that agreement, but believed Thomson was acting as broker for the deft. in the usual way.

Part of the beer was carried in ships belonging to Thomson and part in ships in which he engaged ship room.

On the 5th July 1864 Thomson engaged shipping room in the Star of India for 330 hogsheads of beer at 25s. tun, freight payable here. He sent to the deft. the plts.' card as to the sailing of the ship without informing him of the rate of freight, but intimating the number of hogsheads he had engaged room for.

When freight is payable here the shipowner may require settlement of the freight before parting with the bill of lading for the goods shipped, if he be not satisfied with the credit of the shipper.

On the 11th July the deft. shipped the 330 hogsheads of beer, and took the mate's receipts for them, which were forwarded by the deft. to Thomson. They stated the goods to have been shipped by the deft.'s firm.

A set of bills of lading in a printed form stating the shipment to be by the deft. were sent by deft. to Thomson, who having filled up the blank, sent the same to the plt.'s brokers for signature by the captain.

The captain's signature was procured and the brokers made out the freight-note:

[Lion]	591	150 hhds.	Tons.	25s.	103 2 6
[J. & Co.]	740	180	82		5 3 1
Various.
GODING, JENKINS, and Co.,					£108 5 7
Per Thomson and Co., Order.

The bills of lading so signed and the freight-note were taken up by Thomson and exchanged for the mate's receipts which were handed by him to the plt.'s brokers.

Thomson then forwarded the bills of lading to the deft.

The ship sailed and duly arrived at Bombay with the cargo, and the beer was delivered to the indorsees of the bills of lading from the deft.

On the first Saturday after the two months from the ship's sailing, application was made to Thomson for the freight, and as he did not pay afterwards to the deft., who refused to pay on the ground that he had paid the amount of the freight note to Thomson.

The freight note sent by the plts.' brokers to Thomson, was not sent on by him to the deft., but instead thereof another made out by Thomson as follows:

Messrs. Goding, Jenkins, and Co.,
London, 16th July.

Drs. to freight, &c., per ship Star of India , Capt. Holloway, for Bombay.
330 hhds. beer, 82½ tons, at 28s.	115 10 0
Primage	5 15 6
	£121 5 6

Bombay contract, No. 2, due 17th Sept.
PATRICK THOMSON and Co.

The deft. paid that freight to Thomson on 1st Aug. 1864, but plts. had no knowledge of this.

BLACKBURN, J.—I am of opinion that the plts. are entitled to recover this freight from the deft. If Thomson had in point of fact been acting as broker, and the deft. was his principal, there could be no doubt about the plts.' right to recover. But in Sept. 1863 there was an agreement between Thomson and the deft., by which Thomson engaged to find shiproom at the rate of 28s. per tun for a quantity of beer to be supplied by the deft. The fact of this agreement having been made was not known to the plts. when Thomson agreed for sending out the beer by the ship in question. The deft. then shipped the beer in plts.' ship, and took the mate's receipts. After that he sends the mate's receipts and bills of lading in which his name appears as the shipper of the goods to Thomson, who fills up the rate of freight he had contracted for, and sends them on to the plts.' brokers to procure the captain's signature. The bills of lading with the captain's signature and a freight-note are then sent to Thomson; but that freight-note is not brought home to the knowledge of the deft. By the usage of London, when freight is payable in London, the shipowner is not bound to give up the bills of lading, but may retain them until the freight is paid if he be not satisfied with the credit of the shipper, or he may part with them, and then two months' credit for payment of the freight is allowed. It was said that the deft. was not cognisant of this usage. It is not, however, necessary to decide whether that circumstance is material or not, because by law the shipper of goods at a particular port is to be held to deal with the shipowner according to the usage and custom of the port, and the shipowner has a right to treat the shipper as if he knew the usage and custom. It would be most inconvenient to hold otherwise, and the business of a shipowner could scarcely be carried on if he had a right to charge those persons only who might know, and not those who did not know of the custom and usage of the port. The deft. took back the bills of lading in this case, and paid the freight to Thomson without making inquiry of Thomson about the matter. As it turned out Thomson stopped payment. Under the circumstances, I think the plts. have a right to say to the deft. that they parted with the bills of lading to him, taking his promise that he would pay the freight, and, therefore, that they are entitled to recover.

MELLOR, J. concurred.

SHEE, J.—I am also of opinion that the plts. are entitled to recover. The learned judge recapitulated the facts, and said that it was quite consistent with all that appeared that Thomson was acting merely as the agent of the deft. in the shipment of the goods by the Star of India ship; and being of opinion that he so acted as agent, the plts. were entitled to recover.

Judgment for the plts.

COURT OF COMMON PLEAS.

Barristers-at-Law.

Feb. 9 and 16, 1866.

SEAGRAVE v. THE UNION MARINE INSURANCE COMPANY.

Marine insurance—Insurable interest—Broker taking bill of lading in his own name—Amendment.

The plt.'s firm, brokers and commission agents at Liverpool, shipped goods, the property of D. and Co. of Liverpool, for whom they were in the habit of selling, in the Ann and Isabella, for Londonderry. The goods were intended for M. of Londonderry, but in consequence of certain letters which had passed between the plt.'s firm and M., and in which a question had arisen as to the price, the plt.'s firm took a bill of lading in their own name which they forwarded unindorsed to the plt., and who was then in Ireland. The plt. saw M. on Saturday the 7th March, when they had some conversation about the goods. On Sunday the 8th March the Ann and Isabella was totally lost, and on Monday the 9th the plt. and M., before they had heard of the loss, entered into what they described as the final contract for the sale of the goods, and M. gave the plt. a bill for the price which has since been satisfied. The plt. and M. had both insured the goods, and M. subsequently brought an action against his underwriters and recovered the value of the goods, it being held that the letters passed the property to him. The plt. in this action alleged interest in himself and sought to recover an amount which was made up of the following items, viz., 50*l.* of the verdict obtained by M. and not paid, 40*l.* extra costs in the action brought by M., 104*l.* the difference between the interest M. recovered and what he had to pay his own bankers in order to raise money, and 20*l.* travelling expenses.

The plt. had never had the goods in his possession except for the purpose of shipment. At the trial the Judge told the jury, as a matter of law, that the plt. had an insurable interest as an unpaid vendor with a bill of lading making the goods deliverable to him or his assigns, and the jury having found that the final contract with M. was made after the loss, a verdict was taken for the plt. :

Held, that the above was a misdirection; that the plt. had no insurable interest, and that he was not entitled to amend the declaration by alleging interest in D. and Co., his principals, as the action was brought for M. and not for D. and Co., who had been paid.

This was an action on a policy of insurance on guano valued at 1150*l.* in the ship Ann and Isabella, from Liverpool to Londonderry. The policy, after reciting that George Seagrave and Co. had represented to the defts. that they were interested in the insurance thereinafter mentioned, &c., witnessed that, in consideration of the premises and of the sum of 5*l.* 15*s.*, "the said company promises and agrees with the said Geo. Seagrave and Co., their executors, &c., that the said company will pay and make good all such losses and damages hereinafter expressed, as may happen to the subject-matter of this policy, and may attach to this policy in respect of the sum of 1150*l.*," &c.

The adventures and perils were stated to be "of the seas, men-of-war, fire, enemies, pirates, rovers, &c.," and of all other perils, losses, and misfortunes that have or shall come to the hurt, detriment, or damage of the aforesaid subject-matters of this insurance or any part thereof."

The declaration was as follows :

That by a policy of insurance, bearing date the 4th March 1863, made between the plt. and the defts., they the defts., in consideration of certain premiums payable to them by the plt. in that behalf, promised the plt. to pay and make good all such losses and damages as might happen by perils of the seas on a voyage from Liverpool to Londonderry, to certain guano valued at the sum of 1150*l.* warranted free from average unless general or in consequence of the ship being stranded, sunk, or burnt, in the ship called the Ann and Isabella, beginning the adventure from the loading of the said goods on board the said ship at Liverpool aforesaid, and continuing until the said goods should be discharged and safely landed at Londonderry, and the said ship with the said goods on board sailed on the said voyage, and the plt. was then and thence until and at the time of the loss hereinafter mentioned, interested in the said goods to the amount of all the moneys by him insured thereon, and whilst the said ship with the said goods on board thereof was proceeding on the said voyage, and during the continuance of the said risk, the said goods were by the perils insured against wholly lost, and before suit all conditions were fulfilled, &c., necessary to entitle the plt. to be paid the 1150*l.* by the defts., yet the defts. have not paid the same.

Pices, men amongst, and that the plt. was not interested in the goods or any part thereof as alleged, and issue thereon.

At the trial before Martin, B., at the last Spring Assizes at Liverpool, it appeared that the plt. was a merchant at Liverpool carrying on business in partnership with his two brothers under the style of George Seagrave and Co., as brokers and commission agents. A Mr. McCarter, a merchant at Londonderry, had been in the habit of purchasing large quantities of guano from the plt., and it had been their custom to arrange the price at the beginning of the season, which regulated the price for the whole year. On the 14th Feb. 1863 McCarter wrote to the plt.'s firm as follows :

Gentlemen,—I duly received yours of the 11th inst. and feel obliged by your attention. I had twelve tons of your guano on board, and will not require any before 1st May; but if it serves you in any way to ship 100 tons more, payable on the above date, you may do so, providing freight does not exceed 6*s.* 6*d.*—Truly yours, Wm. McCarter.

To this the plt.'s firm replied as follows :

Dear Sir,—In accordance with your favour of the 14th Feb. we have now the pleasure to inform you we have succeeded in fixing the subcarrier Ann and Isabella, of Arbroath, to carry about 115 tons at your limit of 6*s.* 6*d.* per ton. We expect to have the cargo on board by the middle of next week. We presume we may value upon you at six months from the date of shipment, calculating it as a cash payment at the rate of 10*l.* per ton on the 1st May, i. e., charging you interest from this latter date till the due date of the bill. You will have learned from the analysis the continued improvement in the intrinsic value of the phosphate, which now, according to Dr. Apjohn, places it beyond comparison as the best manure for price in the market, and as you were one of our first customers in Ireland, we hope you will succeed in taking full advantage of the increased popularity which is sure to be caused by the more extensive use of the phosphate guano this year.—We are, &c., Geo. Seagrave and Co.

P. S.—Please say if you purpose effecting insurance at your end.

On the 2nd March McCarter instructed a Mr. Joyce to effect an insurance on the cargo for 1200*l.*, and Joyce, in pursuance of his ordinary course of business, gave him a memorandum of which the following is a copy :

Marine Insurance Agency, Belfast Bank.

Derry.—March 2, 1863.

Memorandum.—Wm. McCarter, Esq., is insured for 1200*l.* per Ann and Isabella, from Liverpool to Derry, by a declaration on an open policy per ship or ships for 10,000*l.* effected at Lloyd's, London, and dated 13th Jan. 1863, on guano valued at 1200*l.* at 10*s.* per cent.

J. J. Joyce, Agent.

On the 3rd March McCarter replied to the letter of the 26th Feb. as follows :

Gentlemen,—I am favoured with yours of the 26th and 27th Feb. You say "We presume we charge you 1*l.* a ton not cash at 1st May, and interest on draft from that date." I really cannot understand this when I know that Mr. Lawson supplies your guano in Scotland at 2*l.* 1*s.* net there to dealers; besides, I look as heretofore for the special allowance made to me at the origin of our transactions, and now that you are making some changes it may be as well that I should know how we are to get on for the future. I should be sorry indeed to appear unreasonable in my demands, but you will admit that there is no one in this country has a prior claim on you. I thank you for the mushroom spawn. If your Mr. Geo. Seagrave could send me half a dozen nice flowering shrubs, including verbena, in charge of captain, I'll do as much for him.—Dear yours, W. McCarter.

Messrs. G. Seagrave and Co.

The plt.'s firm received this letter on the 4th March, and, having shipped the cargo on the previous day, obtained from the captain a bill of lading, making the guano deliverable at Londonderry "unto the order of George Seagrave and Co. or their assigns," and on the same day they made out an invoice on a printed form as follows :

Liverpool 4th March 1863.

Particulars of phosphate guano delivered to account of W. McCarter, Esq., Londonderry, by George Seagrave and Co., Liverpool.

Terms not cash.

Per Ann and Isabella, of Arbroath.

The Ann and Isabella sailed on the 5th March. The bill of lading was sent to the plt., who was at the time in Ireland, and who arrived at McCarter's house on a visit on the 7th March.

On that day they had some conversation about the guano, and on the Monday morning, 9th March, they walked together to McCarter's office, where they had some further conversation, and the plt. then handed the bill of lading to McCarter, who accepted a bill of lading for the price, and told the plt. that he had effected an insurance on the cargo. On the same day they learned that the Ann and Isabella had been totally lost on the evening of Saturday the 7th.

The plt.'s firm were acting as agents for Messrs. Dixon, of Liverpool, who were the owners of the guano, and it was never in the possession of the plt. except for the purposes of shipment.

An action was subsequently brought by Joyce, as agent for McCarter, on the policy effected by

C. P.]

SEAGRAVE v. THE UNION MARINE INSURANCE COMPANY.

McCarter, on which the underwriters contended that there had been no complete bargain between the plt. and McCarter so as to pass the property to the latter; the jury in that case returned a verdict for the plt., which was upheld in the Court of C. P. (see Joyce v. Swann, 17 C. B., N. S., 84); but in that case the plt. was not called as a witness, and McCarter said that he and the plt. concluded the bargain on Saturday the 7th March.

On these facts it was submitted, on behalf of the defts., that the plt. had shown that he had no insurable interest, on two grounds: first, that Messrs. Dixon were the owners, and that there was nothing on the facts to show that the plt. had an insurable interest; and secondly, that the goods were sent by Messrs. Dixon to the plt.'s firm, and not to the plt. in his own name. It was also objected that the declaration did not set out the policy correctly.

Martin, B., in summing up, told the jury that he was prepared to hold that the plt. had an insurable interest by virtue of the bill of lading, and left to the jury the question whether there was before the 9th March any complete contract between the plt. and McCarter for the purchase of the guano, which the plt. could have hostilely enforced against McCarter in the ordinary case of goods sold and delivered, and goods bargained and sold. The jury found that there was not, and a verdict was thereupon entered for the plt. for 220*l.*, a sum agreed upon between the parties, which it was understood included 50*l.* which McCarter had failed to recover from an underwriter, extra costs in the action of Joyce v. Swann, and other incidental expenses.

It was agreed that it should be open to the defts. to move on any point except as to the amount of the damages.

Temple, Q. C. in Hilary Term obtained a rule for a new trial, on the grounds, first, that the judge misdirected the jury in telling them that the facts proved established a sufficient insurable interest in the plt.; secondly, that there was no sufficient evidence of an insurable interest in the plt. to entitle him to recover; and thirdly, that there was a material variance between the policy as set out in the declaration and the policy proved, in this, that the declaration alleges the insurance to be absolute and unqualified, whereas the policy contains the qualifying words following, "such losses and damages hereinafter expressed as might happen to the subject-matters of the policy, and might attach to the policy."

Brett, Q. C., Mellish, Q. C., and Potter now showed cause.—The issue was, whether McCarter was interested in the goods, and the judge properly left the question to the jury whether the final contract was made before or after the loss. The jury found that it was after the loss, and therefore that the letters did not pass the property. The court is not called upon to overrule the decision in Joyce v. Swann (ubi sup.), as, though the contract is the same, the parties are different and the evidence is different. Two persons may have an insurable interest, and it does not follow that because one has another has not. In Joyce v. Swann, Seagrave was not called, and the evidence was that the contract was made on the Saturday night; but here Seagrave has been called, and the jury have found that it was made on the Monday morning after the loss. Assuming that there was a contract with McCarter that would give him an insurable interest, it does not follow that there was none in the plt. The plt. is a commission agent, and has guano sent to him to sell; he proposes to sell to McCarter at 10*l.* a ton, and McCarter, in his letter of the 3rd March, objects, and proposes 9*s.* 15*s.*, and asks for an allowance; therefore, as a proposition of law, those letters make no contract. The goods are shipped by Seagrave, and he takes a bill of lading in his own name, and makes himself liable for the freight, for the very purpose of reserving to himself the right of dealing with McCarter, and the jury have found that the contract was not made till the Monday morning, when it is admitted that the ship was lost, and the cargo was not in existence. Even supposing that the contract was made before the loss, it would be satisfied by sending any guano, and this was shipped on account of Seagrave and Co., not for McCarter. [WILLES, J.—Brown v. Hare, 3 H. & N. 484, would be rather against you on that point.] Then I won't enter into it. The contract is made by Seagrave in his own name; he is the shipper pledging his own credit, and he takes a bill of lading in his own name, and makes himself personally liable for the freight. A factor who makes himself personally liable on the contract has a right to insure:

1 Arnould on Insurance, s. 119, 2nd ed. 801;

1 Phillips on Insurance, s. 311, 3rd ed. 177.

But it is enough for me to show that he is an agent who deals with the goods in his own name and makes himself personally liable for the freight. As trustee he would have an insurable interest, and it would be very inconvenient in a mercantile point of view if it were not so. As to the variance, that was disposed of at the trial. [WILLES, J.—It has been already stated by the court that we shall not dispose of this case on a formal matter.]

Temple, Q. C., C. Russell, and Cohen in support of the rule.—The case of Joyce v. Swann is clearly in point, and I submit that here there was no insurable interest. If Seagrave was a consignee at all, he was a consignee without any insurable interest; and though the bill of lading would be prima facie evidence of interest, on these facts there was none. It is plain that, when the goods were put on board the ship and Seagrave took the bill of lading, they were considered as sold, and the letters from McCarter confirms this, as there are several little features which are only consistent with the supposition that he thought the goods were coming. [WILLES, J.—There is a case in the 2 Q. B. which supports what you are laying down; it was there held that the fact of not answering was an assent to the course taken. Here there was the letter of the 26th Feb., and no answer till the 3rd March: see Richardson v. Dunn, 2 Q. B. 218.] If there was any insurable interest it belonged to Dixon and Co. or McCarter. I do not argue that there need be no insurable interest to enable a trustee to insure. The cases in which it has been held that such a trustee could insure are cases where no one who had the beneficial interest could have insured: (Lucena v. Crawford, 2 N. R. 268.) There Lord Eldon says that there must be a right in the property, or a right derivable out of some contract about the property, and at p. 324 he points out that there are different sorts of consignees. Here the goods appear to have remained in the hands of Dixon and Co. till the time of shipment, and it does not appear that the plt. had any storehouse or place where he could receive them as a factor, but he was a mere agent or broker. It is said that he is liable for the freight, but I do not see how the preservation of the goods can affect the question of freight. If the goods are lost as soon as the ship leaves Liverpool there is no freight, and if they arrive the master has his lien. Though personally liable for freight he would not suffer any loss by the goods being damaged. The only insurable interest was in McCarter, and this action is brought for his indemnity. It is said that there is a distinction between the evidence at the two trials, but the only difference is that the witness said that the final bargain was made on the Monday.

C. P.]

SEAGRAVE v. THE UNION MARINE INSURANCE COMPANY.

[C. P.]

[WILLES, J.—“Final” implies that there had been a bargain before.] Just so, and I was going to submit that, though there might have been a final bargain on the Monday, there might also have been a previous bargain which would pass the property in the goods, and I contend that the bargain was in the letters. [WILLES, J.—It is clear that there may be a sale and delivery without fixing the price.] Just so, and the question is not when the final bargain was made, but was it the intention of the parties that the property should pass; and the decision in Joyce v. Swann must be taken as conclusive on the letters, and there was no fact proved at the second trial which could alter their effect. Seagrave had no insurable interest, and this is a much stronger case than if he had been acting for any one abroad. He never had the physical control and possession of the goods, and he was not a consignee at all, but a mere conduit-pipe to direct where the goods should be sent: See

2 Duer on Insurance, 106;

De Forest v. Fulton Insurance Company, 1 Hall, Rep. (American), 84;

Wolff v. Horncastle 1 B. & P. 316;

Conway v. Gray, 10 East, 536;

Blackburn on the Contract of Sale, 126;

Sparks v. Marshall, 2 Bing. N. C. 761.

What is insisted on in the case would amount to this, that any person who is allowed by the owner of goods to put his name to the bill of lading has as insurable interest in the goods: see

1 Arnould on Insurance, 2nd ed. 167; and

1 Phillips on Insurance, 176.

Cur. adv. vult.

Feb. 16.—WILLES, J. now delivered the judgment of the court (Willes, Keating, and M. Smith, JJ.).—This was an action upon an insurance of guano valued at 1150*l.*, on board the Ann and Isabella, from Liverpool to Londonderry. The declaration averred interest in the plt. George Seagrave only; the pleas denied, first, the policy, upon which nothing turns; and, secondly, that the plt. had an insurable interest. At the trial before Martin, B., at the last winter assizes at Liverpool, the plt. had a verdict for 200*l.*, and the last term the deft. obtained a rule for a new trial upon various grounds, which came on for argument at the sittings after term, before Keating and Montague Smith, JJ., and myself, when we took time to consider. It appears, that, in the year 1864 McCarter, of Londonderry, suing in the name of Joyce, recovered in this court against Swann and other underwriters, upon an insurance upon the same cargo for the same voyage, the sum of 1200*l.*, of which he received 1150*l.* McCarter's interest was alleged to be that of a buyer of the guano before its loss from the now plt.'s firm; so that one set of underwriters has already paid the whole amount at which the guano was valued and insured in the policy now sued upon. The details were as follows:—Upon the 14th Feb. 1863 McCarter, who had from time to time bought guano of or through the now plt.'s firm, wrote to them, stating that if it suited them to ship soon 200 tons of guano at 6*s.* 6*d.* freight, to be paid for the 1st May, they might do so. Upon the 26th Feb. the plt.'s firm wrote to McCarter, stating that they had engaged the Ann and Isabella to take about 115 tons at 6*s.* 6*d.*, and that they expected to have the cargo on board about the middle of the next week, and proposed to draw upon him for it at 10*l.* per ton. McCarter must have made up his mind to take the cargo thus offered, for he did not write to countermand it; and, upon the 2nd March, he effected an insurance through one Joyce of this very cargo per Ann and Isabella for 1200*l.* Upon the 3rd he wrote complaining that the price charged was 10*l.* a ton, when it was only 9*l.* 15*s.* net in Scotland, but not refusing it; on the contrary, stating that he expected the usual allowance, which was a matter of course. Upon the 4th March the cargo was shipped at Liverpool under a bill of lading, making the goods deliverable “to the order of George Seagrave and Co. (the plt.'s firm), or to their assigns.” The invoice was made out the same day, describing the guano as “delivered to the account of McCarter” according to the letter of the 26th Feb. Then the plt.'s firm having upon the 4th March received the letter of the 3rd, effected with the present defts. the policy upon which this action is brought, upon the cargo, valued at 1150*l.*, to which extent from that time there were two insurances. The plt. at that time was at Belfast, and intended to visit Londonderry; and the invoice and bill of lading were forwarded to him, to be handed there to McCarter. Upon the 7th March, in the evening, the plt. arrived at McCarter's private house upon a visit, and informed him of what had been done; to which McCarter had no objection. Afterwards upon that night the ship and cargo were lost. Upon Monday the 9th, before the loss was known, the plt. and McCarter went to the office of the latter, and there, without more, the bill of lading was indorsed by the plt., and handed to McCarter, with the invoice, and he accepted a bill for the amount. They learnt of the loss the same day; but, so far as appears, neither did McCarter ask to have back, nor did the plt. offer to return the bill; indeed, that would have been inconsistent with all that had passed, and especially with McCarter's tacit assent upon the Saturday evening before the loss, and the payment upon the Monday accordingly. Further, upon hearing of the loss, McCarter asked, not for his bill, but for the policy effected by the plt., which the latter declined to give, and referred McCarter to his own underwriters. Both parties, therefore, treated the purchase as being between themselves effectual and binding, which it could not have been unless completed before the loss. Accordingly McCarter brought the action in the name of Joyce against the underwriters, and principally upon his own evidence with that of the documents, but without calling the now plt. as a witness, he established in fact to the satisfaction of a London jury under the direction of Erle, C.J., and afterwards in law to the satisfaction of this court, that what the parties, buyer and sellers, had agreed to act upon was the true construction of the transaction, and that the sale was complete by the letter of the 26th Feb., acted upon by the sellers by shipping on account of McCarter, and by McCarter by not rejecting the offer, by insuring upon the 2nd March (the goods being at his risk as well as on his account), by the letter of the 3rd March, which in this court was considered as a reluctant assent to take the cargo, by his assent and acquiescence upon the evening of the 7th March, when Seagrave (the plt.) informed him of what had been done, by taking the bill of lading, and paying upon the 9th without any new terms, showing that the transaction was complete at latest upon the Saturday, and by acting upon the sale as valid after news of the loss: (Joyce v. Swann). The non-indorsement of the bill of lading before the loss did not, it is scarcely necessary to remark, exclude that conclusion: (Care v. Harder, 4 East, 211; Browne v. Hare, 4 H. & N. 822; 29 L. J. 6, Ex.) McCarter, the buyer, thus obtained judgment for 1200*l.*, and he has been paid 1150*l.*, the whole amount at which the guano was valued in the policy now sued upon, and he paid the sellers as upon a successful adventure; so that the sellers got all they could have got if the cargo was safe, and thus both buyers and sellers were indemnified against any risk which was insured against by the defts.; and it might have been supposed that the insurers had heard the last of the matter. I appears, however, that McCarter was dissatisfied with the amount which he recovered in the name of Joyce as to the following particulars detailed by him at the trial, viz., 50*l.* of the former verdict not paid, 49*l.* extra costs, 104*l.* difference between the interest which he recovered and the interest which he had to pay his own bankers in order to raise money, 20*l.* travelling expenses, not alleged to have come within the suing and labouring clause, or to have had anything to do with the insurance. The mass of these items was irrecoverable under any circumstances against the underwriters upon either policy; and no one of them could by any proceeding be justly claimed against the present defts. McCarter, however, took a different view of his rights; and it appears now plainly that, by arrangement between him and the plt., the present action was brought in effect to enforce payment of the enumerated items, though, under good advice, a verdict was not sought for the whole 1150*l.*, a measure which, if resorted to, would, we believe, have so demonstrated the impropriety of the claim as to prevent the actual result of a verdict in the plt.'s favour. At the trial of this cause, the case was launched upon his own evidence, which was to the same effect as that given by McCarter, upon the trial of Joyce v. Swann, with these exceptions: first, that after the examination by counsel was over, in answer to a question put by the learned judge (being the question for decision), the plt. made the following statement, "I made the sale to McCarter on the 9th;" secondly, that the plt. stated that, instead of being principal in the actual or intended sale, his firm were only commission agents (not to be credere) of Dixon and Co., of the same town. And although the objection on the score of insurable interest was urged early in the case, the plt.'s only account of his interest was, that his firm were brokers, not factors; nor did it appear that the guano was ever in their possession as bailees, nor that they had any lien. The evidence was quite bare upon this point; and it is consistent therewith that the guano went straight from the stores of Dixon and Co. to the ship, and that the name of the plt.'s firm was put in the bill of lading in accordance with a not uncommon practice of brokers to carry on business in their own names, and not because they had any other interest in the transaction. And it appears to be the reasonable conclusion from the evidence of the plt., who gave no further account of his interest than that he acted as broker and agent for Dixon and Co., coupled with the fact that he sought to recover nothing upon his own behalf, but all for McCarter. The last additional fact as to which the plt. was examined was as to the payment of the bill given him for the price of the guano. At first he stated, "It has not been paid; 200*l.* or 300*l.* is still unsatisfied." "The bill is not been satisfied to a considerable extent." Messrs. Dixon have suffered a loss." But upon cross-examination he said: "McCarter dishonoured the bill at first. It was satisfied by mutual arrangement. We were put to expense by the dishonour and delay"—not, be it observed, by the loss of the goods. Now, the only way of reconciling these contradictory statements is, to suppose that the 200*l.* or 300*l.* spoken of by the plt. represent the 200*l.* or 300*l.* made up of the items already enumerated as claimed by McCarter, and which are, by agreement with McCarter (who is probably a good customer), to be allowed or not allowed to him, according to the event of the present action. Upon the evidence, without calling McCarter, the plt. relied; whereupon certain objections were taken for the defts., some of them founded upon mere formal variances, which we attach no importance, and one which is the main question, viz., that Dixon and Co., who had been indemnified by payment, and not the plt., were the persons interested in the policy, and that the plt. had not proved any interest in the subject-matter of insurance. The learned judge overruled these objections; and the defts. called McCarter (the real plt.) as a witness. McCarter, like the nominal plt., gave evidence to the same effect as in the former cause of Joyce v. Swann, with these exceptions, that after the examination by counsel was over, he, in answer to a question put by the learned judge (being the question for decision), made the following statement, viz., "The purchase by me was on Monday morning the 9th." As to the bill in payment of the guano, McCarter stated, "It is paid or satisfied." As to the items of claim already set forth, he added, "I expect to be made good this loss out of the policy now sued on." Such being the evidence, the learned judge told the jury that, upon McCarter's evidence, it appeared to him clear that there was no contract before the 9th March, at Londonderry, after the goods were lost, and upon that point he took the opinion of the jury, who adopted this direction, and found a verdict for the plt. No other question was left to them. With respect to the point of insurable interest, the learned judge ruled as a matter of law that the plt. had an insurable interest "as an unpaid vendor, and with a bill of lading making the goods deliverable at Londonderry to him or his assigns." The damages were agreed to be 200*l.* (representing the items already mentioned, or some of them), in the event of the plt. being entitled to retain the verdict. In the last term a rule was obtained for a new trial upon several grounds, amongst others a miscarriage in that the learned judge ruled as matter of law that the plt. had an insurable interest; and, the matter having been fully argued, and time taken to consider, we are of opinion that the rule for a new trial ought to be made absolute. In considering the case, three prominent points present themselves: first, that both McCarter's and the plt.'s policies were for the value of the guano only, and not for such extras as McCarter detailed in evidence; secondly, that this action is for McCarter's benefit; thirdly, that McCarter has already received from his underwriters, through Joyce, the whole amount at which the goods are valued in the plt.'s policy. It was argued, therefore, that according to the case of Bruce v. Jones, 1 H. & C. 769; 32 L. J. 132, Ex.; 7 L. T. Rep. N. S. 748, there was a complete answer to any further claim. We need not, however, consider this further at present, as there is no plea to raise the question, and if such a plea be added, it may, if necessary, be discussed upon a future occasion. Next it appears that the direction of the learned judge in point of law, and the finding of the jury in pursuance of that direction, are in conflict with the verdict in Joyce v. Swann, and the judgment of this court thereupon, of which verdict and judgment McCarter has already reaped, and now retains, the benefit. Nor was the evidence as to the question upon which the verdict passed substantially different from what was offered upon the trial of the former action, save in the answers given to the mixed questions of law and reasoning upon facts proposed to the nominal and to the real plt., and which was the very question to be decided by the court. Whether such a result can be deemed satisfactory it is at present unnecessary to consider; and the rule hardly raises the point with sufficient distinctness as an objection to the verdict. Thirdly and lastly, the report of the learned judge is distinct, that he thought "the plt. had an insurable interest as an unpaid vendor, and with a bill of lading making the goods deliverable at Londonderry to him or his assigns." In this statement of law we are, after much consideration, unable to concur. In point of fact, the now verdict finds that the plt. was not "vendor," because it finds that there was no valid sale, and no sale until after the loss. In point of fact also, the evidence of the plt. and of McCarter shows that payment was made by bill, which has been paid or settled; so that, if the plt. was a vendor, he was not an "unpaid vendor." This ground failing, and with it the argument that there might be an interest in respect of commission, which probably, like the price, was settled between the parties as upon a valid sale, it remains to consider what is the effect of the plt. being named as shipper and consignee in the bill of lading. That this as a matter of fact is prima facie evidence of interest, we entertain no doubt; but the question is whether, as matter of law, it is conclusive that there is an interest, even though the facts should show that the nominal shipper and consignee is a mere agent, having no lien upon the goods for advances, commission, or otherwise, nor the possession or custody of them as carrier, factor, warehouseman, or other bailee, nor any liability to account for their loss by the perils insured against, such as sustained the insurance by a carrier (Crowley v. Cohen, 3 B. & Ad. 478); by a warehouseman declaring himself a trustee (Waters v. Monarch Life Assurance Company, 5 F. & B. 870; 25 L. J. 102, Q. B.); a bankrupt or insolvent in possession of after-acquired property, by permission of his assignees (Marks v. Hamilton, 7 Ex. 323; 21 L. J. 109, Ex.); a ship carpenter having a lien for repairs (Tucker v. Scott, 6 Taunt. 234; 1 Marsh. 558); a person having an equitable assignment (Wilson v. Martin, 11 Ex. 684; 25 L. J. 217, Ex.). The evidence did not bring the plt. within any of these categories; and the loss which took place was a loss of the goods to the intended seller or the intended buyer, according as the sale was complete or not, and not a loss to the more intermediate agents. It was argued that the liability for freight as shipper made an interest; but by the loss of the goods on the way the freight was also lost; and, if the goods had arrived, the interest was in the shipowner's enforcing his lien, not in the goods themselves. It was further argued that the bill of lading gave a remedy against the master, and was as against him an estoppel; but, even as against the master, the bill of lading was not conclusive, if Dixon and Co. chose to interfere and to insist upon delivery to them; and such delivery would have been an answer to any claim by the plt., as was decided in the case of Sheridan v. The New Quay Company, 4 C. B., N. S. 618; 28 L. J. 53, C. P. The persons, if any, interested in the policy were Dixon and Co., and not the plt. The property was theirs. The temporary possession of it was that of the ship's master, as bailee; the plt., if there was a valid sale, was interested at the outside to the extent of his commission, if it was at risk, which it was not, for it was earned by the fact of sale, and there would be no lien for it against the buyer; and if there was no valid sale, he was a mere agent, who suffered nothing and incurred no liability by the loss, for he had discharged his functions, save that he held the shipping documents subject to the orders of his employers. We are not aware that it has ever been held that a mere agent, without possession or lien, has an insurable interest to the extent of the value of the goods, simply because his name appears in the bill of lading instead of that of his principal; and the general rule is clear, that, to constitute interest insurable against a peril, it must be an interest such that the peril would by its proximate effect cause damage to the assured. We are, therefore, after much consideration, of opinion that the learned judge was wrong in ruling as matter of law, even on the state of facts found by the jury, that there was an insurable interest in the plt. We were asked to amend the declaration by inserting a statement of interest in Dixon and Co.; and undoubtedly, if Dixon and Co. had sustained a loss, they might have adopted and recovered upon this policy; but we are of opinion that no such amendment ought to be allowed in this case, because the action is in our judgment brought for McCarter, not for Dixon and Co., who have been paid, and such an amendment might tend to frustrate, and could not tend to promote, the decision of the question which this action was brought to try. As to the formal objections raised to the declaration, they may be cured by amendment if and when the plt. thinks it worth while. We give the deft. leave to add a plea or pleas within eight days, upon condition that the plt. may within eight days thereafter enter a stat. processum to cancel the policy. For these reasons, and without these directions, the rule for a new trial is not absolute; and we hope we are not outstepping our province if we add a suggestion that, in the event of the matters of law decided by the court upon this or the former occasion being again contested by either party, the more convenient course will be that such party should be put to raise his objections by bill of exceptions, and thus obtain the benefit of reviewing our decision before a superior tribunal.

VALIERI v. BOYLAND.

Action by indorsees of bill of lading—Short delivery—Fraud of shipper—Evidence—18 & 19 Vict. c. 111, s. 8.

The indorsees of a bill of lading sued the captain, who had signed it, for the value of four bales not delivered. The evidence was, that the goods were shipped by certain persons acting as agents for the actual shipper, and that when the goods were put on board there was a dispute with the mate as to the number of bales shipped. He made a memorandum of the fact, but by mistake put down in the bill of lading sixty-nine bales instead of sixty-five, and had since died. Sixty-five bales were delivered:

Held, that there was evidence to go to the jury that the misrepresentation as to the amount shipped was "caused wholly by the fraud of the shipper" within the terms of sect. 8 of 18 & 19 Vict. c. 111.

Declaration:

That after the 14th Aug. 1854, in parts beyond the sea, to wit, at Constantinople, M. M. Katsiakis delivered to the deft. and the deft. received from the said M. M. Katsiakis, certain goods, to wit, bales of skins, to be by the deft. carried and conveyed in a certain ship of the deft. from Constantinople to London under a certain bill of lading signed by the deft. whereby the deft. agreed to carry the said goods and deliver the same at the port of destination (certain profits and casualties only excepted) unto the order of the said M. M. Katsiakis, or to his or their assigns, for certain freight payable for the said goods; and the plt. say, afterwards, and after the said 14th Aug. 1854, the said M. M. Katsiakis indorsed the said bill of lading to the plt. in order to pass the property in such goods to the plt., and that thereupon and by reason of such indorsement the property in the said goods passed to the plt., and the plt. say that before action brought all conditions had been fulfilled, and all things had been done, and all times had elapsed necessary to entitle the plt. to have the said bill of lading performed by the deft., and to sue him for the breach of contract hereinafter mentioned. Yet the deft., although not prevented by any of the excepted profits or casualties, made default in delivering a portion of the said goods agreeably to the bill of lading, whereby the plt. have lost the value of such goods, and been greatly damaged. And the plt. also sue the deft., for that the deft. converted to his own use, or wrongfully disposed of, the plt. of the use and possession of the plt.'s goods, that is to say, value of skins.

could M. Katinakis did not deliver, nor the debt, and goods as in the said first count alleged, of the indorsement as alleged, of default in delivery.

And the goods were the pita goods.

It was brought by the pita, merchants, as indorsees of a bill of lading signed by the master of the steamship Brenda, at Siof, for certain bales of lambskins. The bill, which is set out infra, stated that 119 bales were shipped, and contained a memorandum four bales more were in dispute, but, if they were to be delivered. Upon arrival, all were delivered, and the pita, in consequence, valued the value of the short delivery. It is alleged that the pita, were indorsees for a bill of lading within the provisions of the Lading Act, nor that 115 bales only were at the port of discharge. Three questions to the jury, viz., Were the goods shipped? any default by the debt? and was the wholly caused by the fraud of the shipper? sound each question in favour of the debt. At last point the debt had leave to move. Witnesses called for the defence were the ship and two of the crew. The debt, stated, signed the bill of lading on the faith of the ship, and that he knew nothing of the contents of the goods. The mate was dead, and other witnesses merely proved that a rose as to the number of packages, but nothing whatever to suggest any fraud of the shipper. The declaration by the debt was to the effect that he had received on board and there had been a dispute as to whether they were sixty-four or sixty-nine, in consequence he had added the memorandum signed on the bill of lading.

At last Mr. M. Katinakis, a correspondent, at Constantinople, purchased a quantity of goods to be shipped on board the steamship accordingly the vendor of the goods sent on board the vessel, and Mr. Katinakis then from the debt, the following bill of lading: as in London are Smith, Smith, and Co., 17, Street.

WALTER FLACE.

The action was brought to recover damages in respect of the four bales marked K in the margin of the above bill of lading, being four out of the sixty-nine which formed a part of the 119, the pita, having, in fact, only received 65 bales marked K. The amount of the claim 48l. 1s. 2d. was at the rate of 11l. 8s. per bale, from which a deduction of 1l. 18s. 10d. was made for freight.

Section 3 of 18 & 19 Vict. c. 111, enacts that Every bill of lading in the hands of a consignee or indorsee for valuable consideration representing goods to have been shipped on board a vessel shall be conclusive evidence of such shipment as against the master or other person signing the same, notwithstanding that such goods or other part thereof may not have been so shipped, unless such holder of the bill of lading shall have had actual notice at the time of receiving the same that the goods had not been in fact laden on board. Provided that the master or other person so signing may exonerate himself in respect of such misrepresentation by showing that it was caused without any default on his part, and wholly by the fraud of the shipper or of the holder, or some person under whom the holder claims.

The cause was tried before Byles, J., in London, after Hilary Term, when a verdict was found for debt, with leave to the pita to move to enter it for 48l. 1s. 2d. for him.

Sir Geo. Hargrave now moved accordingly.

KATE, C. J.—I think there should be no rule in this case, and that there was evidence to go to the jury that the mistake in the bill of lading was caused "wholly by the fraud of the shipper." Messrs. Katinakis, or persons acting with them, brought down the bales, and the persons who brought the bales alongside were guilty of the fraud. The mate said there were sixty-five, while they said there were sixty-nine bales; I think he was compelled to sign for sixty-nine bales. There was evidence to go to the jury that the person who had counted them as sixty-nine, when there were only sixty-five, was willing to overreach, and I think he knew that he had only shipped sixty-five, and that he knowingly took advantage of the mistake, and is guilty of fraud under the statute, and that the captain is exonerated.

M. SMITH, J.—I am of the same opinion. The persons who shipped the goods and took the mate's receipt are the parties guilty of the fraud in question. There may have been an honest dispute as to whether the mate's receipt was given for sixty-five bales or more; but whoever shipped the goods must have known that they were not shipped without dispute. The word "wholly" in the statute is clear, and the mate or other person signing the bill of lading must not be mixed up with the fraud.

CARR AND ANOTHER v. THE WALLACHIAN PETROLEUM COMPANY (LIMITED).

Charter-party—Substituted contract—Freight—Guarantee.

The plts. chartered a ship to the defts. to proceed to I. and take in a cargo for London. On the arrival of the ship at I. the defts. were unable to provide a cargo, and the plts. agreed to cancel the charter on the defts. guaranteeing them 9000l. gross freight home, the vessel to be placed on the most profitable charter or trade procurable, and to carry 300 tons. The vessel shipped a cargo of 300 tons, the freight for which would be 556l. 14s., and was totally lost on her voyage to London. In an action to recover the difference between 556l. 14s. and 9000l. guaranteed.

Held, that the liability of the defts. arose at the port of loading on the ship's sailing away with a cargo that would not earn 9000l. freight, and was not affected by the loss of the ship.

This was an action to recover the sum of 686l. 12s., under the following circumstances:—The plts. were the owners of two vessels called the Botanias and Isamudas, which they chartered to the defts. in Aug. 1864, the ships being then in the Danube. By the terms of the charter they were to proceed to Ibraila, and there load a full and complete cargo of petroleum oil and deliver the same in London on receiving 4l. 4s. per ton freight payable in London. The ships duly proceeded to Ibraila, but previously to their arrival there the defts.' stores had been destroyed by fire, and they were unable to provide cargoes. The defts. thereupon applied to the plts. to cancel the charters, and after some negotiations a Mr. Honsden, on the part of the plts., attended a meeting of the directors of the defts.' company on the 7th Sept., and a verbal arrangement was come to, the following minute of which was made in the books of the company.

It was proposed by the directors that the company should guarantee the above-named vessels (the Botanias and Isamudas) a sum of 9000l. each gross freight home on the following understanding: That Messrs. Carr and Co. place the vessels named at once on the most profitable charter or trade procurable, the vessels will carry 300 tons each of whatever cargo they may take on board, or should they not take 300 tons each, that a proportionate reduction of the guarantee should be made for any lesser quantity of cargo they may take. That the charter-parties dated the 9th and 10th Aug. last respectively for the vessels named be cancelled.

A copy of this resolution was forwarded to the plts. in a letter requesting them to cancel the charters, which they accordingly did. The vessels being unable to obtain any other cargo, loaded two cargoes, of 300 tons each, of barley on account of the plts., and proceeded on their voyage to London. According to the current rates of freight for barley at that time, the vessels would have earned 556l. 14s. The Isamudas arrived in London, but the Botanias was totally lost on the voyage.

The plts. brought this action to recover two sums of 3433l. 6s., being the difference between the two sums of 556l. 14s., which the vessels would have earned had they both reached London, and the sums of 9000l. each guaranteed by the defts. A verdict having been entered for the plts. for 686l. 12s.,

W. Williams subsequently obtained a rule to reduce the verdict by the sum of 3433l. 6s., on the ground that the defts. were not liable to pay that sum, the Botanias having been totally lost.

Sir G. Honyman now showed cause.—The dispute question is, what is the effect of the loss of this vessel. This is not the case of a person merely becoming surety for freight. If the cargo of petroleum had been loaded according to the charter we could have insured it, and the defts. having failed to load we had a right of action for a much larger sum than this, but instead of that we take this agreement. I submit that the defts. guaranteed that cargo which would pay 9000l. freight should be put on board, and as soon as the vessel sailed away with less than that amount they became liable to pay us the difference. [BYLES, J.—Is not the contract, that they will put you in the same position as if you had a 9000l. freight on hand which you would not earn unless the ship arrived? No; as here we could only insure about 5600l. freight, and under no circumstances could we get more than 6000l. (Yeoman v. Lindsay, 3 L. T. Rep. N. S. 886.) The agreement is, if you will cancel the charter we will enter into an entirely new contract. (BYLES, J.—If the other side are right you would have had insurable interest to the extent of 9000l., as I suppose they say it was guaranteed freight, 9000l.) I submit not, as we could only insure freight for the goods we had on board, and not what we should get as a collateral contract. This agreement was substituted for the original charter, which would have been broken when the defts. failed to load a complete cargo, and I contend that they became liable under that agreement on our failing to procure a ship which would pay 9000l. freight.

W. Williams in support of the rule.—This is a question as to the amount of damages, and the contract was made before breach of the charter: (See Shay v. The Bank of England, 6 Bing. 784.) If they had brought an action on the charter-party we might have pleaded a new arrangement before breach. We agree that they shall have a freight of 9000l. and to assume that they could not insure that sum is begging the question. I submit that they were carrying this cargo at 9000l. freight. If this is an engagement that if they got a full cargo they shall have 9000l. freight, that would give an insurable interest to the extent of 9000l. It is like the case of a merchant saying, "If you will put your ship on a certain line I will pay you 9000l. gross freight home," and he might wish to have the goods carried at merely nominal freights; surely in such a case the shipowner would be entitled to insure 9000l. and would not have to depend on the solvency of the merchant. Here the cargo is, in point of fact, carried free of freight, and they give us credit for the current rates, but I submit that we are not to be called upon to pay the difference unless the ship arrives and earns freight.

ERLE, C. J.—I am of opinion that this rule should be discharged. The question turns on the meaning of the guarantee. The defts. guarantee to the vessel 9000l. gross freight home; that was a substituted contract, and is to be construed by reference to the original contract contained in the charter-party, and that is that the vessels are to take home cargoes of petroleum at 4l. 4s. a ton. Therefore it is a contract to pay about 12000l. a ship, and the defts. substitute a contract that the plts. may load any other cargo, and the guarantee is 9000l. gross freight; that is, that at the time of loading the freight shall be worth 9000l., as it would under the original contract have been worth 12000l.; and if the defts. had only put on board 300 tons of petroleum instead of 300, their contract would have been broken at the port of loading. Here they guarantee that the goods put on board shall be worth 9000l. freight, and the contract is broken when goods to that amount are not put on board. The whole difficulty in this case has been caused by the use of the word freight.

G. F.]

MACANDREW AND ANOTHER v. CHAPPLE AND OTHERS.

[C. F.]

WILLES, J.—I am of the same opinion. I think the substituted agreement was a mere settlement of amount, and that was to stand as the original contract, and the liability came to a head at the same time as it would have done if the cargo had not been loaded. When the vessel weighed anchor it is clear that she had not a freight which could earn 900*l.*, and therefore the defts. were liable, and they are not the less liable because one of the vessels was lost. It is impossible to say if the loss would have taken place if the original contract had been fulfilled, and therefore we must look at the contract without considering that, and see when the liability occurred, and I think that was when the ship sailed away without a sufficient cargo to earn 900*l.*

BYLES, J.—I am of the same opinion. The guarantee is, that there should be freight worth 900*l.*; and it seems to me that the contract was broken at the port of loading.

M. SMITH, J.—I am of the same opinion. The liability under the guarantee must be determined by the amount of cargo put on board.

MACANDREW AND ANOTHER v. CHAPPLE AND OTHERS.

Charter-party—Condition precedent—Delay—Deviation.

A charter-party contained the following clause: that the ship E., "being tight, &c., shall with all convenient speed (on being ready), having liberty to take an outward cargo for owner's benefit, direct, or on the way, proceed to Alexandria," and there load a cargo of cotton, &c. At the time the charter was made the ship was at Newcastle taking in her machinery. She left Newcastle for the purpose of taking her trial trip, and, as there was some risk in crossing the bar of the Tyne, proceeded to London instead of returning to Newcastle. She was detained in London six weeks repairing machinery, during which time she took in cargo, and then proceeded to Constantinople, which is not "on the way" to Alexandria, and thence to Alexandria. It was found by the case that going round by Constantinople only caused two or three days' delay. On her arrival at Alexandria the charterers refused to load a cargo:

Held, in an action by the shipowners against the charterers for not loading, that the above stipulation only operated as an agreement, for the breach of which an action would lie, and not as a condition precedent the breach of which would entitle the charterers to throw up the charter-party.

This was an action brought by the plts. against the defts. for the recovery of damages for the loss sustained by the plts. by reason of the defts. having made default in shipping a cargo on board the plts.' vessel Ephesus under the circumstances hereinafter mentioned, and by consent of the parties, and by the order of Martin, B., dated the 2nd Aug. 1865, pursuant to the 16th section of the Common Law Procedure Act 1853, the following case (so far as is material) was stated without any pleadings.

The plts. are shipowners carrying on business at Liverpool and London under the style and firm of Robert MacAndrew and Co., and were before and at the time of the transactions hereinafter mentioned, and have ever since continued to be, the owners of the steamer Ephesus.

The defts. are merchants and shipowners carrying on business at Liverpool under the style and firm of Chapple, Dutton, and Co.

On the 15th Oct. 1864 the said steamer Ephesus was launched at Newcastle, a great portion of her engines and machinery having already been put in her, and was immediately afterwards placed in the hands of Messrs. Randolph, Elder, and Co., engineers, for completion ready for sea.

About the 1st Dec. 1864 negotiations were opened between the plts. and defts. for the purpose of the chartering of the Ephesus by the defts. These negotiations were conducted by Mr. Nance, a shipbroker, on behalf of the plts., and by Mr. Pothonier, a shipbroker, on behalf of the defts.

On the 7th Dec. 1864 the aforesaid negotiations were concluded by a charter-party being made by and between the plts. and the defts., and signed by or on behalf of the said parties respectively, which said charter-party was as follows:

London, 7th Dec. 1864.

Charter-party.

It is this day mutually agreed between Messrs. Robert MacAndrew and Co., owners of the good ship or vessel called the Ephesus, of the measurement of 1634 tons or thereabouts, now at Newcastle, and Messrs. Chapple, Dutton, and Co., of Liverpool, merchants, that the said ship being tight and staunch and strong, and every way fitted for the voyage, shall, with all convenient speed (on being ready), having liberty to take an outward cargo for owner's benefit direct or on the way, proceed to Alexandria, Egypt, or so near thereto as she may safely get, and there load from the factor of the said freighters in the customary manner a full and complete cargo of cotton in square bales, both in the hold and upon deck, the captain being at liberty to take other usual cargo (on freight) for ballast only, and to render customary assistance with boats and crew; in loading which the said merchants bind themselves to ship not exceeding what she can reasonably stow and carry over and above her tackle, apparel, provisions, and furniture, and being so loaded shall therewith proceed to London or Liverpool direct as ordered on signing B. lading, or so near thereto as she may safely get (cargo to and from, alongside, and at merchant's risk and expense), and deliver the same on being paid freight as follows:

Three farthings per pound for cotton, in full of all port charges and pilotage (the act of God, the Queen's enemies, restraints of princes and rulers, and fire, and all and every other dangers and accidents of the seas, rivers, and navigation, of whatever nature and kindsoever during the said voyage, always excepted), the vessel to be addressed to the charterers' agents free of commission, and to have a lien on cargo for all freight, dead freight, and demurrage; captain to sign bills of lading at any rate of freight, without prejudice to this charter. Freight to be paid on unloading and right delivery of the cargo in cash, less (if required) for ship's use at Alexandria 200*l.* to be advanced on signing B. lading, subject to 5 per cent for insurance, and all charges, twenty-five running days to be allowed the said merchant (if the ship is not sooner dispatched) for loading at Alexandria and discharging in England, and ten days on demurrage over and above the said lying at 70*l.* per day, penalty for nonperformance of this agreement, estimated amount of freight.

In the course of the negotiations Mr. Pothonier was informed by Mr. Nance that the plts. would not guarantee the time within which the vessel would be finished, and that he should, therefore, insert in the charter-party the words "on being ready," and these words were inserted accordingly.

After the making of the said charter-party the plts. urged Messrs. Randolph, Elder, and Co., from time to time, to complete the fitting-up of the Ephesus with as much dispatch as possible, and did all that was in their power to expedite the completion of the vessel fit for sea.

Between the time of the launch and the sailing of the ship from Newcastle, as hereinafter mentioned, several casualties occurred in the finishing of the engines and machinery, but Messrs. Randolph, Elder, and Co., were not guilty of any unreasonable delay in proceeding with the completion of the work. It is usual for steamers to make a trial trip before starting on their first voyage, and in order to have a satisfactory trial trip at Newcastle it is necessary for steamers to put out to sea, having to cross and recross the bar at the mouth of the Tyne—an operation accompanied by some risk in the case of a steamer of the size of the Ephesus at that period of the year.

About the middle of the month of Dec. 1864 the plts. proposed to the builders, at the request of Randolph, Elder, and Co., that the vessel should make a trial trip to sea and back over the bar; but this was objected to by the builders, and thereupon it was arranged that the vessel should make her trial trip from Newcastle to London instead of returning to the Tyne, and that the deficiencies of her machinery, if any, should be made good in London.

Accordingly, on the 12th Jan. 1865, the ship left Newcastle for London with 1400 tons of coals.

Before leaving Newcastle the ship, in order to avoid delay at Alexandria, loaded sufficient ballast to enable her to bring back a cargo of cotton from Alexandria, but no delay at Newcastle was occasioned by her so doing, or by the shipment of the coals.

The ship met with accidents to her machinery between Newcastle and London (where she arrived on the 15th Jan. 1865), and was detained in London repairing the same for about six weeks, but such repairs were executed there as speedily as they could have been done at Newcastle.

While in London the ship took on board goods for Malta, Syra, Constantinople, Smyrna, and Alexandria, but no delay was thereby occasioned, the goods being shipped before the repairs to the machinery were complete.

She sailed from London on the 1st March 1865, and again met with accidents to her machinery and put into Plymouth, and was kept there a few days repairing the damage done, after which she sailed on the 9th March 1865 from Plymouth for Malta, and after touching and unloading cargo there and at Syra, Constantinople, and Smyrna, arrived at Alexandria on the 29th April 1865.

The ship, when she sailed from Newcastle, was not complete and ready for the chartered voyage.

There is no usage of trade by which vessels bound from Newcastle or London to Alexandria are justified in taking goods to Syra, Constantinople, or Smyrna, if the geographical position of the various ports does not warrant such a course.

The question for the opinion of the court is, whether under the aforesaid circumstances the plts. have a right of action against the defts. for refusing to load the Ephesus at Alexandria, as aforesaid.

The court, or court of appeal, is to be at liberty to draw all such inference of fact as a jury would be entitled to do.

If the court shall be of opinion in the affirmative, then judgment shall be entered up for the plts. for 4133l. 3s. 9d., and costs of suit.

If the court shall be of opinion in the negative, then judgment of nol. pros., with costs of defence, shall be entered up for the defts.

Mellish, Q. C. (Cohen with him) for the plts.—The question is, if there was such delay in bringing the ship to Alexandria as to relieve the defts. from their obligations under the charter-party. There is no warranty as to the condition of the vessel when the charter was made, or as to the time it would take to get her ready. The words "on being ready" clearly imply that she was not ready when the charter was made, and therefore the ship is not represented as a complete ship practically ready for sea. It is found in the case that the plts.' agent told the defts.' agent that he would not guarantee the time when the ship would be ready. It is objected that that is not evidence; but I submit that it is admissible to show that the defts. were informed of the condition of the ship, and though it cannot alter the meaning of the charter, it is one of the surrounding circumstances. It may be said that there are two breaches of the charter, first, that the ship was not every way fitted for the voyage to Alexandria when she left Newcastle; and, secondly, that she did not proceed to Alexandria direct, but went to ports beyond what she was allowed to go to in order to take cargo. I submit that, according to the authorities, these are not conditions precedent, the non-compliance with which would entitle a party to throw up the charter; and the reason is, that they are stipulations which may be broken in every variety of way, and if they were held to be conditions precedent, the effect would be that if a ship was not ready on the very day, or if in the course of a long voyage there was an improper delay for one day or one hour, that would entitle the charterers to throw up the charter. Some of the cases which decide that such stipulations are not conditions precedent give this qualification, that if, by reason of the delay, the object of the voyage is frustrated, the charterers would be entitled to throw up the charter; but it is difficult to form a clear idea of what is the meaning of the objects of the voyage being frustrated. [WILLES, J.—Where the ship is so unworthy that she cannot carry the cargo, and the charterer has to charter another ship.] Possibly, but this ship was clearly seaworthy when she arrived at Alexandria; and I submit that going to London for a cargo was not a breach of the charter-party. That depends on the construction of the words "on the way." I contend that London is on the way, and that this is just what was intended by the stipulation, that as only a cargo of coal and iron could be procured at Newcastle, it might be desirable to take in a light cargo at some other port; and running up the river to London cannot be considered an unauthorised delay, this being a steamship which would go up in a few hours. Though a nominal breach of the charter, the result of the facts is that it did not cause delay, and it is clear that it did not frustrate the object of the voyage so as to justify the defts. in throwing up the charter: (Clipsdon v. Vertue, 5 Q. B. 265.) [SMITH, J.—In that case Wightman, J. seemed to think that the plea only showed the cause of delay.] Just so; and so here, the charter was never abandoned, and going to London was perfectly bona fide. The case of Tarrabochia v. Hickie, 1 H. & N. 183, is directly in point, except that here the ship purposely went to London to repair. Freeman v. Taylor, 8 Bing. 124, is the case in which the doctrine is laid down that the delay must not be such that the object of the voyage is frustrated. There the Chief Justice told the jury that, inasmuch as the freighter might bring his action against the owner and recover damage for any ordinary deviation, he could not, for such deviation, put an end to the contract; but if the deviation was so long and unreasonable that in the ordinary course of mercantile concerns it might be said to have put an end to the whole object the freighter had in view in chartering the ship, in that case the contract might be considered at an end. That ruling was upheld, and here I say that the deviation in going to London was only the means bona fide adopted for getting the ship off quickly, and going round to Constantinople is found to have caused only two or three days' delay, which is immaterial:

Behn v. Burness, 1 B. & S. 877;

Dimech v. Corlett, 12 Moore, 199.

E. James, Q. C. (Watkin Williams with him) for the defts.—Whether or not this is a condition precedent depends upon the intent of the parties as gathered from the contract itself, and not on matters subsequent. If it is a condition precedent, and the plt. has been guilty of a violation of it, the extent of the damage which the deft. has sustained is immaterial, the condition must be fulfilled. The oyage is from Newcastle to Alexandria, and the shipowner undertakes that he will proceed direct. "may leave out the words "on the way," as it is admitted that Constantinople is not on the way. By a concession of the charterer, and for the benefit of the shipowner, he may take a cargo, but he must proceed direct. If that is merely a stipulation the ship might have gone to Hamburg. The contract is entered into on that condition, that the ship shall sail direct. If she had gone to Edinburgh for her trial trip, and had then returned to Newcastle, my friend's contention might be right, as he might say that there was no unreasonable delay in starting, but here there is a breach of a condition of the charter. In Clipsam v. Vertue there was no condition or undertaking to go on the voyage "direct." The question is, whether this is a condition, and that cannot depend on whether the vessel was quick or not, or whether it took a long or short time to go to London. If the shipowner had said that the vessel should leave on a particular day, that would have been a condition; but here, instead of that, he undertakes that she shall proceed direct. Boone v. Burness confirms what I have said, that you must look to the intention of the parties at the time of making the contract.

ERLE, C. J.—In this case the charterer has not performed his part of the contract, and he contends that he has a defence to this action on the ground that there is a condition precedent on the part of the plt. which has been broken, and it is clear that a charter-party may contain that which is a stipulation, and binds as an agreement for the breach of which an action will lie, or that which is a condition precedent or subsequent, and which, if broken, will entitle the other party to put an end to the contract. The question if this is a stipulation for the breach of which an action merely will lie, or if it is a condition for the breach of which the party may say that he is exonerated, depends on the construction of the instrument. The charter-party says that the ship Ephesus being tight, staunch, and strong, and every way fitted for the voyage, shall, with all convenient speed (on being ready), having liberty to take an outward cargo for owners' benefit direct, or on the way, proceed to Alexandria; and that part of the charter-party is relied on by the deft. as being a condition precedent on the breach of which the charterer would be entitled to throw up the charter. The ship went to London, and then on to Constantinople, and that is a breach of the condition if it was a condition. I think it is perfectly clear that this is a stipulation only, and not a condition that the vessel shall not deviate even so little out of her course. I agree that if it were a condition the charterer would be exonerated, but I do not think that it is a condition. That being the construction of the charter-party, it is useless to go into the authorities. There is nothing to show that the object of the voyage was frustrated in this case. My judgment is founded on the construction of the contract, and this stipulation is merely an agreement to go direct to Alexandria, and if the shipowner omits to do that, it is a breach of the agreement for which an action will lie, but not a condition precedent.

WILLES, J.—I am of the same opinion. The defts. seek to answer this action by setting up a deviation in sending the vessel to London and Constantinople. It is settled that delay by deviation is the same as delay from any other cause, and deviation and delay having the effect of depriving the charterers of the benefit of the contract, or going to the whole root of the contract, and entirely frustrating the objects the charterers had in view in engaging the ship, would be an answer to an action for not loading a cargo; but a mere deviation falling short of that gives a right of action for damages, but does not defeat the charter-party to the extent of being an answer to an action for not loading. Boone v. Eyre, 1 H. Bl. 273 (n.); Ritchie v. Atkinson, 10 East, 295; and Davidson v. Gwynne, 12 East, 381, are cases which are not new, but cases in which the principle laid down in Boone v. Eyre has been applied. It is necessary to observe that it is impossible to read this case without seeing that the vessel was not engaged for a particular cargo, but that it was a speculation by the defts., and that is quite sufficient to justify the proposition stated that freights had been falling for some time, and that a few pounds difference in the freight is all the damage the late arrival caused to the charterer. Therefore, I think that this is not a case in which the charterers can resist an action for not loading.

BYLES, J.—I am of the same opinion. The principle is laid down by Erle C. J., in Seeger v. Duthie, 8 C. B. N. S. at p. 64, that "the construction to be put upon contracts of this sort depends upon the intention of the parties, to be gathered from the language of the individual instrument. Whether particular stipulations are to be conditions precedent or not must in all cases solely depend upon that intention as it is to be gathered from the instrument itself;" and that is the result of all the cases here is the ordinary and express stipulation that the ship shall proceed with all convenient speed to Alexandria. The condition, if condition it be, is not express but implied, and we are to see if construing it as a condition would cause inconvenience. If we decided that it was a condition it would defeat if not a majority, certainly a very large number of charter-parties, and the law is clear that it is a stipulation and not a condition precedent. The implied stipulation is not to deviate unless permitted, and in this case the ship went to Constantinople, which is out of the permitted limits. In the case cited by Mr. Mellish (Clipsam v. Vertue) there was a delay of six weeks, but still it was held not to be a deviation. Here the vessel merely went to London for her trial trip, and as to the vessel going to Constantinople, that is merely an actionable breach, and does not exonerate the defts. from performing his part of the contract.

M. SMITH, J.—I am of the same opinion. There is only one question as to the construction of this charter: whether the stipulation that the vessel shall go to Constantinople with all convenient speed—that is, with no more delay than is necessary for taking out a cargo—is a condition precedent? I am of opinion that it is not a condition precedent, but merely a stipulation. If the deft. has sustained damage, he can recover in an action on the contract; and that being so, the question as to what would be the consequence if the whole object of the charterer had been frustrated does not arise; therefore I think that our judgment should be for the plts.

COURT OF EXCHEQUER.

Reported by H. LEIGH and E. LEIGHT, Esqrs., Barristers-at-Law.

Monday, April 30, 1866.

CLARKE v. BURN.

Contract to load vessels—Action for breach of—Plea, refusal of plt. to pay for previous loadings—Condition precedent—Pleading.

Declaration, that it was agreed that plt. should purchase of deft. 30,000 tons of coal, and that deft. should ship the same on board certain vessels for a period of six months from 1st Aug., and should load each vessel within twenty-four hours after notice that the said vessel was ready to be loaded at the T. docks.

Agreement, that all conditions were performed necessary, &c., yet deft. broke the said agreement in this, that he did not load a certain screw steamer as agreed within twenty-four hours after the same was ready; and afterwards further broke the said agreement, and absolutely refused to perform the same, or to ship any more goods at all for plt. as agreed.

Plea to the second breach, that before deft. absolutely refused as alleged, plt. absolutely refused to pay, according to the said agreement, for certain coals that had theretofore been shipped for and delivered by deft. to plt., although requested by deft. to pay for the same according to the said agreement, and although everything had happened and been done necessary to entitle deft. to such payment, wherefore deft. refused to load until such payment was made, as he lawfully might:

Held on demurrer to be a bad plea.

Declaration:

That it was agreed by plt. and deft. that plt. should purchase of deft. certain goods, to wit, 30,000 tons of coal, and that deft. should ship the same on board of certain vessels from 1st Aug. 1864, and for a period of six months from that day, and that deft. should load every such vessel within twenty-four hours after the said vessel was ready to be loaded at the Tyne docks, the deft. having due notice thereof, and that all conditions, &c. necessary to entitle plt. to have the said agreement performed by the deft., yet deft. broke the agreement in this, that he did not load a certain screw steamer, called the S. M. Strachan and other screw steamers, as well as a certain sailing vessel called the Columbia as agreed, within twenty-four hours after the said sailing vessel and steamers were respectively ready to be loaded, and afterwards further broke the said agreement, and wholly and absolutely refused to perform or to carry out the same or to ship any more goods at all for plt. as agreed, whereby plt. &c. (allegation of damage). (Claim 3000)

Plea 6, to the second breach:

That before deft. absolutely refused as therein alleged, plt. absolutely refused to pay, according to the said agreement, for certain coals that had theretofore been shipped for and delivered by deft. to plt., although requested by deft. to pay for the same according to the said agreement, and although everything had happened and been done necessary to entitle deft. to such payment, wherefore deft. refused to load until such payment was made, as he lawfully might.

Demurrer and joinder in demurrer to said plea.

Plt.'s points:—1. That it does not appear upon the record that payment in full for the coals as delivered is a condition precedent to the plt.'s right to have the contract performed by deft. 2 That deft. should have set out the terms of the contract relating to payment for the coals to be delivered by deft. to plt. 3. The nonpayment by plt. for certain coals theretofore delivered by deft. to plt. does not justify deft.'s refusal to perform the contract on his part.

Def't.'s points:—That it sufficiently appears upon the pleadings that the payment for coal shipped for and delivered to plt. was a condition precedent to plt.'s right to insist upon a further shipment, and that, under the circumstances stated in the plea, the deft. was justified in refusing to ship any more coal till the coal already delivered had been paid for.

Gates, for plt., in support of the demurrer to the plea.—There was nothing to show that it went to the whole contract, and nothing that might not be compensated in damages. It did not appear on the record how plt. was to pay for these goods, nor that payment on delivery of each shipment was a condition precedent to the performance of deft.'s contract. If deft. relied on any breach of contract by plt. as a justification of his own misconduct, he should have set it out. In note 8 to Parsons v. Col, 1 Wms. Saund. 320 c., it was said: "Where a covenant goes only to part of the consideration on both sides, and a breach of such covenant may be paid for in damages, it is an independent covenant, and an action may be maintained for a breach of the covenant on the part of the deft. without averring performance in the declaration;" and the well-known case of Boas v. Eyre, 1 H. Bl. 378, note (a); 2 Black. Rep. 1312, was there referred to. [MARTIN, B.—The declaration states the contract to load certain vessels, and then goes on to aver a breach in not loading a certain steamer; and that is all right. It then proceeds: "and deft. afterwards further broke the said agreement, and wholly refused to perform the same, or to ship any more goods at all for plt. as agreed." Have you authority that that is a good breach?]

Hordley v. Delatour, 2 El. & B. 678; 22 L. J. 455, Q. B.; and Norris v. The Donkey and Black Sea Railway, &c., Campan, in error, affirming the judgment of the Q. B., 18 C. B. N. S. 81, 825; 31 L. J. 284 C. P., were to that effect. Withers v. Reynolds, 2 B. & Ad. 832; 1 L. J. N. S. 30, K. B., was also in plt.'s favour. There was nothing in the present declaration to show each shipment was to be paid for on delivery, and plt. was clearly within the judgment of Patterson, J. in that case. He cited also Dunston v. Gwynne, 1 East, 851.

Barnard contra, for deft., supported the plea and contended it was a good plea to the breach to which it was pleaded. The declaration said nothing about how the goods were to be paid for, and it must, therefore, be taken that each load was to be paid for on delivery. Where a large quantity of goods had to be delivered, extending over a long period of time, the vendor, in the absence of express agreement to the contrary, was entitled to be paid on each delivery, and that was the proposition established by Withers v. Reynolds, cited contra. The plea amounted to a traverse of ready and willing to deliver.

MARTIN, B.—I am of opinion that this is a bad plea. It does not, in my opinion, sufficiently state the circumstances. I can conceive circumstances existing which would justify a man in refusing to go on, but here we cannot say what the contract really is. I do not think it is within Withers v. Reynolds, and that case was not put upon payment of past loads. Our judgment must be for the plt.

BRANWELL, B.—I am of the same opinion, and general principle also I think this a bad plea. My brother Martin has said, it is not within Withers v. Reynolds. In my opinion Mr. Barnard's view is not law. Now, I can see no inconvenience in holding that each delivery is to be paid for at moment, but much the other way. It seems to me to be clearly a bad plea.

COURT OF ADMIRALTY.

Tuesday, July 25, 1865.

THE WILHELM.

Liability of ship for deferred delivery of cargo—Detention by frost.

The master of a ship, whilst waiting for cargo, omitted to take in sufficient stores and provisions for his voyage, and whilst subsequently taking in such provisions and stores the frost set in, and the ship was frozen in port and detained from the beginning of October until the breaking up of the ice in the ensuing year :

Held, that the owners of the ship were responsible to the owners of the cargo for any loss accruing from such detention ; it being, by maritime law, the duty of the master to convey the cargo to its port of delivery with all expedition ; and if by neglecting to avail himself of all fair opportunity the voyage is delayed and damage accrues to the owners of the cargo, the owners of the ship are liable to make good the sum.

Deane, Q. C. and Murphy for plt.

Brett, Q. C. and E. C. Clarkson for deft.

Dr. LUSHINGTON gave judgment in this case, which was an action brought on behalf of Messrs. Fontaines and Wilson, merchants of London, as consignees of 584 barrels of tar, part of the cargo of the brig Wilhelm, against the owners and master of that ship, to recover for the loss arising from the non-delivery of the tar. The petition set forth that by a charter-party dated in London the 1st April 1862, between the master of the brig and the plts., the brig, then in the Baltic, proceeded to Archangel on the 11th Aug., and on the 16th the master gave notice to the plts.' agent that he was ready to commence loading ; that a full cargo was ready to be shipped immediately, but that the shipment thereof, through the negligence or default of the master, was not completed until the 19th Sept., when the brig got under weigh and proceeded down the river on her intended voyage ; that the master, instead of putting to sea, as he could and ought to have done, shortly after leaving Archangel, brought the brig up off Modon Kerlede, where he remained without making any effort to prosecute his voyage, although the navigation was perfectly open and free from obstruction, until the middle of October, when the river was closed by ice, and the brig, with the plts.' cargo on board, was detained there until the breaking up of the ice in the following spring. It was then alleged that, if due diligence had been used by the master in loading the brig and proceeding on his voyage, the brig, with the plts.' cargo on board, would have arrived in England before the beginning of Nov. 1862 ; but that, in consequence of the negligence, mismanagement, or other default on the part of the master, the brig did not reach England until the 18th July 1863 ; that such negligence, mismanagement, and default were a breach of duty and a breach of contract on the part of the master, and by reason of such breach of duty and of contract the plts. had sustained considerable loss. The answer for the deft. pleaded that, by a charter-party dated the 1st April 1862, it was mutually agreed between the master of the above-named brig Wilhelm, then in the Baltic, with leave to take a cargo from Memel to Waterford, and the plts., that the brig, being tight, strong, and every way fitted for the voyage, should, with all convenient speed, sail and proceed to Archangel, or as near thereunto as she might safely get, and there load from the factors of the plts. a full and complete cargo of tar in barrels, and about 1000 mats ; ship to be provided with a deck cargo of tar which the plts. bound themselves to send or cause to be sent alongside the vessel at her port or place of loading aforesaid, and to be taken from alongside the vessel at her place or port of discharge free of expense to the master, and being so loaded should proceed therewith to Bristol, London, Newcastle-on-Tyne, Sunderland, or Hartlepool, as ordered on signing bills of lading, or so near thereunto as she might safely get (the act of God, the Queen's enemies, fire, and all and every other dangers and accidents of the seas, rivers, and navigation of whatsoever nature and kind soever, during the said voyage, always excepted), and by the said charter-party it was agreed that twenty-eight running days should be allowed to the plts. for loading the ship and discharging ; that the Wilhelm, after completing her voyage from Memel to Waterford with all convenient speed, sailed and proceeded to Archangel, where she arrived on the 11th Aug. 1862, but was not able to obtain a berth whereat to discharge her ballast until the 13th ; that on the 14th and 15th the ballast of the Wilhelm was discharged, and on the 16th the Wilhelm was ready to take in cargo, and her master on that day gave notice thereof to the agents of the plts. at Archangel, and made the necessary arrangements with the view of taking in her cargo ; that the plts. neglected to furnish the cargo of the Wilhelm in accordance with the aforesaid charter-party, and notwithstanding the requests and representations of the master, delayed furnishing the cargo, and in consequence of such neglect and failure, and not through any negligence or default of the master, the shipment of the cargo was not completed until the 18th Sept. following ; that on the 19th the Wilhelm left Archangel and proceeded to Modosko Roads for the purpose of proceeding over the bar, but owing to strong winds and the shallowness of the water on the bar, the Wilhelm was unable to pass over the bar, and she remained detained by strong winds and bad weather until the 8th Oct., when the Wilhelm, requiring provisions before proceeding to sea, was taken to Lupomoko Roads, and her master proceeded to Sollenburgh to obtain such provisions, and on the next day the ice set in, and the Wilhelm was taken to Lupomoko harbour, and although every endeavour was made to get her to sea, she was unable to proceed to sea, and became and remained frozen up, and was unable to reach England until July 1863. It was further pleaded that the Wilhelm was prevented by the dangers and accidents of the seas, rivers, and navigation, and by the negligence and default of the plts., from proceeding to sea before she became so frozen up, and that the master was not guilty of any breach of duty or breach of contract. The merits of the case were in a very narrow compass. As regarded the plts. the court think that the lapse of four days after the running days could be imputed to them as blame, or for the recovery of damages if otherwise entitled. As regarded the defts., it is satisfactorily shown on the contrary, that having got into the Modosko Roads on Sept. 22nd, they were unable to pass the bar from that day to Oct. 8th. After the vessel had been taken to Lupomoko harbour, it was impracticable for the vessel to proceed to sea. It was equally clear that, on the 8th or 9th Oct., if the Wilhelm had remained in the Modosko Roads, she might have crossed the bar and proceeded on her voyage. The question for the decision of the court was whether the alleged want of provisions which prevented the master's departure from the Modosko Roads did not amount to such as is contemplated by the Admiralty Court Act 1861, and gave the plts. a just right of action. It was the duty of the master to convey the cargo to the port of delivery with all due diligence and expedition, and if, by unreasonable delay or neglect to avail himself of the means in his power, the voyage was delayed and damage accrued to the consignees of the cargo, the owners were responsible. Amongst the duties to be performed by the master, the due provisioning his crew was one of the most apparent and most indispensable. This duty was especially stringent in a case like the present—of a voyage from a northern port at a late period of the year, where the opportunities of getting out into the open sea were necessarily rare, and the loss of an opportunity might lead to the detention of a vessel and her cargo for a whole winter. It was clear that the interests of commerce strictly regarded obedience to these rules, for upon the due arrival of the cargo might entirely depend the success of the adventure. It was true, it might be said in this case that it was the interest of the master to complete his voyage with all celerity. Such assertion might be true, but it was no answer to the complaint, if proved, for it only showed what was of frequent occurrence, that even self-interest would not insure due diligence. If the master wanted provisions he was most culpable in having neglected to have a proper supply. If the provisions required were merely fresh provisions, articles not of necessity but of comfort, for the purpose of obtaining them the master was not justified in quitting the Modosko Roads. The Court was of opinion that the delay in prosecuting this voyage, and consequent loss to the plts., was to be attributed to the negligence or want of due diligence on the part of the master, and that, consequently, the plts. were entitled to a decree for the damage, with costs.

THE THOMAS POWELL v. THE CUBA.

Collision—Inevitable accident.

In order to constitute an inevitable accident it is necessary that the accident should not have been capable of being prevented by ordinary skill and diligence—not extraordinary skill or extraordinary diligence—by that degree of diligence and skill which is generally to be found in persons who properly discharge their duty.

Milward, Q. C. and E. C. Clarkson for the Thomas Powell, and Brett, Q. C. and Vernon Lushington for the Cuba.

Dr. LUSHINGTON gave judgment in this case, which was an action brought by the screw steamship Thomas Powell, 401 tons, against the Cunard company's steamship Cuba, 1534 tons, to obtain compensation for the loss arising from the two ships coming into collision in the river Mersey about half-past seven p.m. of the 19th Feb. last. The Thomas Powell stated the wind as N.N.W., and the weather as blowing a gale, and clear but dark. The Cuba represented the wind as N., and the weather a gale. The case for the Thomas Powell was, that on the 17th Feb. she had arrived at Liverpool with a cargo of coal, and proceeded into the Huskisson Dock to discharge such cargo into a steamship called the City of Baltimore, which was then in that dock; that in the afternoon of the same day the City of Baltimore left the Huskisson Dock and proceeded into the river Mersey, and there brought up, and that the Thomas Powell, which had discharged a part only of her cargo, followed the City of Baltimore, and made fast alongside her and continued to discharge her cargo into the City of Baltimore until the afternoon of the following day, 18th Feb., when, in consequence of the weather, she was compelled to cast off and steam away; that at the time and on the day in question the Thomas Powell was lying at anchor in the river Mersey in a proper berth between Seacombe and Egremont; that the tide was ebb, and of the force of about six knots an hour, and that the Thomas Powell had a bright globular light on her foremast, and another on her mizen-boom, both of which were burning brightly, and a proper watch was being kept on board her; that in this state of things the Cuba, which had come in from sea, and had passed up the Mersey above the Thomas Powell, owing to the negligence or want of skill of her owners or those on board her, came into collision, and with her stem carried away the bowsprit of the Thomas Powell, and then fell alongside her on her port side, and did her a great deal of damage, and remained in contact with her until about eight p.m., when she went clear. It was then alleged that the helm of the Thomas Powell was ported before the collision, in order, if possible, to avoid it; that the collision was wholly the default of the defts. or their servants, and that it was not in any way occasioned by the Thomas Powell or those on board her. The defence for the Cuba was, that on the day in question she was on her homeward voyage from New York with mails and passengers; was off the port of Liverpool, but that, in consequence of the heavy weather, no pilot was able to board her until off Waterloo, in the Crosby Channel, when Thomas Lewis, a duly licensed pilot, succeeded in boarding her, and assumed the command; that about seven o'clock the Cuba was brought to an anchor with her best bower and seventy-five fathoms of chain, in about mid-river, off Seacombe, as it was not practicable for the vessel to proceed to her usual anchorage higher up the river; that the sea was so heavy that the tender could not come alongside to take the mails; that the tide was about two hours ebb, and running at the rate of five knots an hour; that the berth so taken up by the Cuba was a perfectly clear berth, and in particular was well clear of the steamer Thomas Powell, which had been observed whilst coming to anchorage, and which lay a considerable distance to the north-west of the Cuba; that the Cuba carried the Admiralty regulation lights duly exhibited and brightly burning, and also a white light on the signal staff, her steam was kept up, a good look-out was being maintained, and the pilot continued on deck and in charge; that in consequence of the heavy gale blowing against the tide, the Cuba would not ride quietly to her anchor, and in about half an hour from the time of anchoring broke her shear, and drove to the east side of the river, dragging her anchor, and approached the Waterloo-pier; that in doing so the Thomas Powell was observed following the Cuba across the river, and about 7.30, having no steam up, she drove into the Cuba with her stem, striking the Cuba's stern; that by this collision, and in clearing, the Thomas Powell suffered some damage; that the Cuba sustained little or no damage by the collision, and afterwards steered across the river and dropped a second anchor, and the next morning proceeded to her proper anchorage. It was then alleged that the collision was not caused by any negligence of those on board the Cuba, but was an inevitable accident; that if the collision was in any degree caused by those on board the Cuba, it was occasioned by the pilot, who was employed by compulsion of law, and that the collision was caused by the negligence of those on board the Thomas Powell. On these pleas the first thing to be considered was the averment made on behalf of the Cuba, that the collision was an inevitable accident. To constitute an inevitable accident it was necessary that the occurrence should have taken place in such a manner as not to have been capable of being prevented by ordinary skill and ordinary diligence. We were not to expect extraordinary skill or extraordinary diligence, but that degree of skill and that degree of diligence which is generally to be found in persons who discharge their duty. The evidence agreed with the preliminary act, that it was a very tempestuous night, and that the wind was blowing with considerable severity. Looking at all the circumstances, and considering where the vessels were anchored, the questions to be decided were, whether the collision was or was not the result of an inevitable accident, or whether any fault was imputable to the pilot of the Cuba, or whether, in the fair discharge of his duty, there was either a want of skill or gross negligence to which the blame of the collision could fairly be attributed? It had been said that the collision might have been avoided if the Thomas Powell had had steam power. As a fact there could be no doubt whatever that she had not steam power in a proper and usable condition; but whether that was neglect (looking at the circumstances of the case, and considering she was anchored at the state of the night), and an absence of reasonable precaution, are open questions. If the evidence of the pilot of the Cuba is to be believed, it was the Thomas Powell that came down upon the Cuba, and not the Cuba upon the Thomas Powell; but, on the other hand, it was but fair to observe there was the evidence of the mate of the Thomas Powell, who deposes just as strongly that the Thomas Powell never did break her shear, and that the collision was occasioned by the Cuba breaking her shear and coming down upon her. Under all the circumstances of the case, and on full consideration of the evidence on both sides, the court was of opinion that the Cuba was to blame for the collision, and that the blame was imputable to the pilot of the Cuba.

The Court was assisted by Capt. Were and Capt. Waller.

THE HANNAH PARK AND THE LENA.

Collision—Admiralty regulations as to rules of the road.

YEL, 18th, and 19th regulations: "Every vessel overtaking any other vessel shall keep out of the way of the vessel being overtaken, and where by such rules the one ship is to keep out of the way, the other ship shall keep her course, due regard being had, in the observance of both these rules, and their observance being subject, to all dangers of navigation, and to any special circumstances which may exist in any particular case, rendering a departure from such rules necessary in order to avoid immediate danger."

Yea: "That a steamer overtaking a sailing vessel could not comply with the first of the above regulations in consequence of the state of the weather, and the neglect on the part of those on board the sailing vessel to take proper precaution to avoid a collision."

Told, that the proof of such a plea was entirely on the steamer, who must make out in her defence that it was impracticable for her, in consequence of the state of the weather, to have seen the sailing ship in time to have avoided her; and that the steamer was pursuing her course at a reasonable speed, such weather considered.

Deane, Q. C. and E. C. Clarkson appeared for the Hannah Park.

Brett, Q. C. and Vernon Lushington for the Lena.

MAR. CAS.—VOL. II.

Dr. LUSHINGTON gave judgment in this case, which was an action brought against the owners of the steamship Lena, 875 tons, from Cronstadt for London, by the owners of the late brig Hannah Park, 258 tons, from the same ports of departure and destination, to recover for a total loss resulting from a collision between them in the Gulf of Finland, about 4 a.m. on the 15th Sept. last. On the part of the brig the wind was represented as N.W. by N. to N.N.W. and the weather clear and fine, blowing fresh with a strong sea; for the steamer, the former was stated as N.N.W., and the wind as blowing strong, with a heavy sea and a dark night. The case for the plt. was, that the brig was steering from W. to W. & S. close-hauled on the starboard tack, exhibiting her regulation lights brightly burning, when the masthead light of the Lena was seen astern of her, distant three or four miles; that the Lena approached and brought both her side lights also into view, whereupon those on board the brig loudly hailed the steamer, notwithstanding which she ran stem on into the brig's stern with such violence as to cause her to sink in about two hours. The defence of the Lena set forth, that she was steering S.W. by W. & W., and was proceeding under steam about eight and a half knots, carrying her proper lights brightly burning, when the brig was descried six lengths ahead of her, no light of any kind being visible on board her to those in the steamer; that, upon the brig being seen, the helm of the steamer was put hard a-port, and her engines were stopped and reversed, but nevertheless the steamer's port bow came in contact with the brig's starboard quarter; that after the collision the brig's crew boarded the steamer, and the brig sunk after daylight. There were three questions raised here: first, whether the collision was the result of inevitable accident; secondly, whether the steamer was solely to blame; and, thirdly, whether the brig herself was to blame, either for omitting to show a light, or, after the collision, in consequence of neglecting to do that which was incumbent upon her to do for the preservation of the property. It is agreed that the steamer was following very nearly, though not precisely, in the wake of the brig; and the Admiralty regulation states that "Every brig overtaking any other vessel shall keep out of the way of the said last-mentioned vessel." It is also provided that the vessel which precedes shall keep her course. It is manifest, the collision having actually taken place, this regulation was not strictly complied with; and on behalf of the steamer it is said that she could not comply with it in consequence of the state of the weather and the neglect of those on board the brig. The duty of proving that defence is clearly and entirely upon the steamer. She must make out affirmatively that it was impracticable for her, in consequence of such state of the weather, to have seen the brig in time to have avoided her; and, moreover, she must show that she was pursuing her course at that reasonable rate of speed, considering the state of the weather, that there was no impropriety of conduct in that respect which could avail against her. Regarding the conflict of evidence as to the darkness of the night, undoubtedly it was very great. The time of collision may be fairly taken at a few minutes, five or ten minutes, before four, and it is admitted the day was breaking at that time. There is one matter that ought to be taken into consideration, viz., that on board the steamer it was said the brig was seen seven to eight ship's lengths off. Taking it at seven, that is 1400 feet, which is more than 400 yards. As to whether it was the duty or not of those on board the brig to have hoisted a light, as a general proposition it must be admitted that it is the duty of those who use any chance of an approaching collision to take all reasonable means in their power to avoid it; but this must depend on the circumstances of the case. The third point is, whether or not after the collision occurred there was a dereliction from duty on the part of the master of the brig, in not adopting those measures which it is said could have been adopted to save the vessel. A case was cited where there was a collision with Her Majesty's ship Flying Fish, and the ship that came in contact with her was run ashore in the Bay of Rye some hours after the collision. The question arose then whether or not great damage had not accrued from the improper conduct of the master in not accepting the services offered to him by being towed off in that bay. I refused to hear that question discussed in the principal collision case; and I think when I come to look at the result I acted wisely, for when the matter came on as to the propriety of running her on shore, and the propriety of getting her off, fourteen or fifteen witnesses were examined, whose evidence was all contradictory and conflicting, when the question I should have put to the Trinity Masters would have been, whether the running her on shore was right or wrong. But whenever I meet with such a case again I will make a separate case of it. This is totally different, because all the witnesses here can speak to the facts, and no other witnesses could be produced. It has been said that the master of the brig was to blame for not having taken measures to prevent the ship sinking, that those measures could have been adopted, and with safety to the parties on board, and that the loss would have been avoided. In the first place, when the collision actually occurred, the master was left on board the vessel with, as he says, himself, a boy, and two seamen only. We must recollect, after a vessel of 876 tons, a steamer, has come immediately into collision with a brig of 259 tons, you cannot immediately expect that all on board the vessel run into are in entire possession of their wits so as to take all measures for their safety. Rational measures they must take. But at the same time they must not be expected to be very acute in their judgment, and it does not appear to me that after the collision anything could be done in the first instance. We will suppose that the rest of the crew were brought back from the steamer, and that the master had the power of getting all of his hands on board the brig; and that he had all his original crew. It has been said that the vessel remained afloat for the period of an hour and fifty minutes: the strong probability therefore is, under the circumstances, that she might have been saved. That that is a circumstance well deserving consideration I do not doubt, but it appears to me the main point in the case is the extent of damage which was actually done, because it must depend upon that whether there was danger of immediate sinking, or a probability that the danger could be temporarily repaired so as to bring the vessel into a state of safety. There is very little evidence from the steamer as to the extent of damage, and none that is satisfactory to my mind. The master of the brig described the hole as about as big as one of the windows of the court, and so large that the sea undoubtedly did from time to time get in. It was for the Trinity Masters, who assisted the court to say whether, under the circumstances, it was proved satisfactorily on the part of the steamer that the master of the brig neglected his duty; and by not doing that which might have been done with facility and safety, occasioned the ultimate sinking of his vessel, and the loss that has accrued. After carefully weighing the evidence on both sides, and upon the facts adduced, the court, under the advice and with the concurrence of the gentlemen who assisted it, is of opinion that the steamer was solely to blame for the collision.

The Court was assisted by Capt. Pigott and Capt. Weller, of the Trinity-house.

COURT OF COMMON PLEAS.

Reported by W. MAYD and W. GRAHAM, Esqrs.
Barristers-at-Law.

Thursday, June 21, 1866.

FRY v. THE CHARTERED MERCANTILE BANK OF INDIA, LONDON, AND CHINA.

Ship—Bill of lading—Freight payable as per charter-party—Lien.

The vessel of the plts. was chartered at S. to ship cotton to L. under a charter-party containing the stipulation, "the ship to have a lien on cargo for freight, 3l. 10s. per ton, payable on right delivery at the port of discharge." The goods shipped fell short of a full cargo. The bill of lading of these goods stated "freight to be payable as per charter-party." Thus of the cargo was shipped at a lower freight. The debts were indorsed for value of the bill of lading.

Held, that the plts. had no lien on the goods for the whole amount of freight, and that the provision as to freight being payable as per charter-party only incorporated the charter-party as far as the rate of freight was concerned.

SPECIAL CASE.

Messrs. Sanderson, Frys, Rigge, and Co., the plts. in this action, carry on business as shipowners and merchants in St. Helen's-place, in the city of London, and are the owners of the ship Her Majesty.

The debts are a chartered banking company, carrying on business in London, and also at Shanghai in China, where they have a branch bank.

In the autumn of 1864 the said ship Her Majesty was at Shanghai, and was by a charter-party, dated 14th Sept. 1864, chartered by Messrs. Dadabhoy and Co., of that place, to take a full and complete cargo of cotton and [or] other merchandise, which they bound themselves to ship in the usual way for London or Liverpool as ordered.

Amongst other clauses the charter-party contained the following one, which is chiefly material in the present case:

And, being so loaded, shall therewith proceed to London or Liverpool, as ordered at Shanghai, and deliver the said cargo on being paid freight as follows:—The ship to have a lien on cargo for freight. Three pounds ten shillings (3l. 10s.) sterling per ton of fifty (50) cubic feet measured in Shanghai to be paid to captain or his agents on right and true delivery at port of discharge (the act of God, the Queen's enemies, &c., &c. always excepted). The freight to be paid on unloading and right delivery of the cargo.

A fac-simile of the charter-party, which is partly in print and partly in writing, is annexed to and forms part of this special case.

After some difficulty and delay, the charterers Dadabhoy and Co., succeeded in procuring for the said ship a full and complete cargo which, for the purposes of this case, is treated as divisible into three portions.

The first portion, consisting of 185 packages of tea and 42 bales of cotton, was shipped by the charterers themselves, and on their own account, under the bill of lading hereinafter set forth, the freight for the same being payable at the same rate as that agreed upon in the charter-party, and amounting at 3l. 10s. per ton, to the sum of 101l. 8s. 10d.

The second portion (with respect to which similar questions arise between the plts. and other parties, viz., the Commercial Bank Corporation of India and the East) was also shipped by the charterers under a similar bill of lading, and at the charter rate of freight.

The third portion, being by far the largest portion of the cargo, was shipped by other merchants at various rates of freight all below the charter rate.

The difference between the total amount of the bill of lading freight payable upon the cargo as above mentioned, and the freight payable under the charter-party, was very considerable and amounted to the sum of 1710*l.* 8*s.* 10*d.*. The portion of the cargo which had been shipped by merchants other than the charterers as above mentioned was duly delivered as hereinafter mentioned upon payment of the freight due upon the bills of lading of the same, and no question arises with respect to this portion of the cargo.

The large deficiency above mentioned between the amount of the bill of lading and that payable under the charter-party, gave rise to a question between the plts. and the holders of the bills of lading of the first and second portions of the cargo above referred to respecting the right of the plts., upon the true construction of the bills of lading and charter-party, to a lien upon those portions of the cargo, under the circumstances hereinafter mentioned, for the whole balance of freight payable under the charter-party.

The following is a copy of the bill of lading under which the first portion of goods were shipped:

[B.B.] 185. Shipped in good order and well conditioned to Dadabhoy and Co., in and upon the good ship or vessel called the Her Majesty, whereof is master for this present voyage, Seymour, and now lying at anchor in the port of Shanghai, and bound for Liverpool, one hundred and eighty-five packages of tea, being marked and numbered as in the margin, and are to be delivered in the like good order and well conditioned at the aforesaid port of Liverpool, the act of God, the Queen's enemies, fire, and all and every other dangers and accidents of the seas, rivers, and navigation, of whatever nature or kind soever, excepted, unto or order, for to their assigns. Freight for the said payable in Liverpool as per charter-party, with primage and average accustomed. In witness whereof, the master or purser of the said ship hath affirmed to three bills of lading all of this tenor and date, one of which bills being accomplished the others to stand void.

GEORGE F. SEYMOUR.

Dated in Shanghai, 21st Feb. 1865.

The said Dadabhoy and Co., after the shipment of the above goods by them, applied to the defts.' branch bank at Shanghai to make them an advance upon the security of the same, and it was thereupon agreed that on receiving the bill of lading for the same, and also the letter of hypothecation hereinafter set out, the defts. should negotiate the draft of the said Dadabhoy and Co. for 1250*l.* on Mr. R. E. Gibson, of Liverpool, payable to the drawers' order, and by them indorsed to the bank.

The above arrangement was carried out, and in pursuance of it the defts. negotiated the said Dadabhoy and Co.'s draft upon the said R. E. Gibson for 1250*l.*, receiving from them at the same time the above-mentioned bill of lading, which was duly indorsed by them, and also the following letter of hypothecation:

The Chartered Mercantile Bank of India,
London, and China

Shanghai, 7th March 1865.

We having this day negotiated with you our bills of exchange drawn on R. E. Gibson, Esq., of Liverpool, the particulars of which are noted at foot, and having at the same time handed to you as collateral security for the due payment of the said bills, the bills of lading and shipping documents belonging to us of the several goods also stated at foot, our agreement is understood to be as follows:

We hereby authorise the said Chartered Mercantile Bank of India, London, and China, and the holders of the above bills for the time being, to take conditional acceptances to all or any of such bills, to the effect that on payment thereof at maturity the above-mentioned bills of lading and shipping documents shall be delivered to the drawees or acceptors thereof, and such authorisation on our parts shall be taken to extend to cases of acceptance for honour.

We further authorise the said bank, or any manager or agent thereof, on default being made in acceptance on presentment, or in payment at maturity of any of the above bills, or on the drawees suspension of payment during the currency of the bills, to sell the said goods, and to apply the net proceeds (after deducting usual commission and charges) in payment of such bills with re-exchange and charges, the balance, if any, to be applied in liquidation of any other debt or liability of ours to the said bank, any ultimate balance to be at our disposal. And in case the net proceeds of such goods shall be insufficient to pay the amount of any such dishonoured bills with re-exchange and charges, we authorise the Chartered Mercantile Bank of India, London, and China, or the holders thereof for the time being, to draw on us for the deficiency, and we engage to honour such drafts on presentment, or to pay the said bank in London.

We further authorise the said bank, or the holders of the said bills for the time being, in case the aforesaid power of sale shall not have arisen at any time before their maturity, to accept payment from the drawees or acceptors thereof, and on payment to deliver the said bills of lading and shipping documents to such drawees or acceptors, and in that event the said bank, or the holders of said bills, are to allow a discount thereon for the time they have to run, at the Bank of England minimum rate of the day, if taken up in London, or if in India, Ceylon, or China, at the current rate of discount of the day on Government acceptances in India, Ceylon, or China, as the case may be.

We also authorise the Chartered Mercantile Bank of India, London, and China, or any manager or agent thereof (but not so as to make it imperative), to insure the above goods from risk, including loss by capture and also from loss by fire on shore, and to add the premiums and expenses of such insurances to the amounts chargeable to us in respect of the said bills, and to take their recourse against the said goods or against us for their reimbursements, and also to sell any portion of the said goods which may be necessary for payment of freight, and the said bank are to take such measures generally, to make such charges for commission, and to be accountable in such manner, but not further or otherwise, as in ordinary cases between a merchant and his correspondent, it being hereby declared that the bank is not to be liable for the default of any broker or auctioneer employed in the sale of the goods.

Lastly, it is mutually agreed that the delivery of said collateral securities to your bank shall not prejudice your rights on said bills in case of dishonour, nor shall any recourse taken thereon affect the title of the bank to said securities to the extent of our liability to your bank as above.—We are your obedient servants,
DADABHOY and Co.

March 7.	1250 l.	R. E. Gibson, Esq.	[B.B.] 185 P Tea. [D] 42 B Cotton.	Her Majesty.

No copy of the charter-party was handed to the bank at Shanghai, and the officials of the bank there were not acquainted with its contents. They were given to understand that the freights were 70*s.* per ton.

The said ship having received orders to that effect at Shanghai, proceeded on her voyage to Liverpool; and shortly after she set sail the said Dadabhoy and Co. stopped payment, and their estate is now being wound-up in China by trustees, under a deed of assignment.

The news of the failure of Dadabhoy and Co. reached England before the arrival of the ship, as hereinafter mentioned. The draft above mentioned was accepted by the said R. E. Gibson, who failed before its maturity, and is still unpaid.

The said ship afterwards arrived in due course at Liverpool, and all the goods shipped by merchants other than the charterers were delivered to the consignees thereof upon payment of the freight according to the bills of lading for the same, and this (calculating the freight for the residue of the cargo, consisting of the first and second portions above mentioned at the charter rate) left a deficiency below the total amount of freight payable upon the cargo according to the charter-party of 1710*l.* 8*s.* 10*d.* as before mentioned.

Under these circumstances the defts., as the holders of the bill of lading and other documents above mentioned relating to the 185 packages of tea and 42 bales of cotton, shipped by Dadabhoy and

C. P.] FRY v. THE CHARTERED MERCANTILE BANK OF INDIA, LONDON, AND CHINA. [C. P.]

Co., claimed to be entitled to delivery thereof upon payment of the freight for the same at the charter rate, viz., 3*l*. 10*s*. per ton, amounting to 101*l*. 8*s*. 10*d*. The p*l*ts., however, claimed to be entitled to a lien thereon for the whole balance of the freight due and unpaid under the charter-party, as above mentioned.

The p*l*ts. and defts. entered into the following memorandum of agreement:

Memorandum. Whereas the Chartered Mercantile Bank of India, London, and China claims to be and are holders for value of a bill of lading, dated at Shanghai, 21st Feb. 1904, for 168 packages of tea, and a bill of lading, dated 2nd Feb. 1904, for 42 bales of cotton, which said tea and cotton are now in the custody of the agents of the shipowners at Liverpool. And whereas Messrs. Henderson, Fry, Rigger, and Co., the owners of the said ship, claim payment of a balance of 190*l*. 4*s*. 4*d*. as due to them for freight as per charter-party entered into by Messrs. Dadabhai and Co. at Shanghai, and they have accordingly asserted a lien on the before-mentioned tea and cotton for the full amount so due to them. And whereas the said bank, as holders of the said bill of lading, deny the right of the shipowners as against them to their alleged lien for charter freight, and claim delivery of the said 168 packages of tea and 42 bales of cotton on payment of freight at the rate of 7*s*. 6*d*. per ton, and which freight amounts to 101*l*. 8*s*. 10*d*. And whereas Messrs. Henderson, Fry, Rigger, and Co. have, for the purpose of enabling the holders of the said bill of lading, to deal with the said bank, held the said 168 packages of tea and 42 bales of cotton without prejudice, and on the understanding hereinafter mentioned, on receiving payment of the last-mentioned sum of 101*l*. 8*s*. 10*d*. It is therefore mutually agreed by and between the said parties, that on payment of the said sum of 101*l*. 8*s*. 10*d*. as and for freight on the said tea and cotton at the rate of 7*s*. 6*d*. per ton, the said Messrs. Henderson, Fry, Rigger, and Co. will deliver the said bank on order on their agents at Liverpool for delivery thereof, it being severally understood and agreed that for the purpose of any future proceedings it shall be considered that Messrs. Henderson, Fry, Rigger, and Co. have asserted a lien on the said tea and cotton for the whole of their said claim of 190*l*. 4*s*. 4*d*, and that the said tea and cotton are to be delivered without prejudice to their right to recover against any party any sum beyond the said sum of 101*l*. 8*s*. 10*d*, the sum to be determined as if the said tea and cotton still remained in the docks subject to their lien (if any). Dated 24th Sept. 1904.

The above goods were thereupon delivered to the defts. and sold, and the net proceeds thereof, amounting to 1314*l*. 17*s*. 11*d*., having been received by the bank, they have in hand (after retaining their claim on the goods) a balance of 224*l*. 12*s*. 7*d*. (subject to the deduction thereout of some law charges in reference to the matter), payment of which has been required of them by the trustees of Messrs. Dadabhai and Co's deed of assignment.

For the purposes of the present case it is to be taken that this claim is good and valid in law or in equity as against Messrs. Dadabhai and Co.

The questions for the opinion of the courts are:—1. Whether the p*l*ts. had a lien as against the present defts. upon the said tea and cotton for the unpaid balance of freight due under the charter-party or any part thereof. 2. Whether the p*l*ts. have a lien or claim to the said surplus of 224*l*. 12*s*. 7*d*. less law charges over and above the defts.' claim, and whether the defts. ought to hand the same over to the p*l*ts.?

If the court should answer the first question in the affirmative, the judgment is to be entered for the p*l*ts. for 1314*l*. 17*s*. 11*d*., being the net proceeds of the shipments or such part as the court may determine, and costs of suit.

If in the negative, then if the court should answer the second in the affirmative, judgment is to be entered for the p*l*ts. for 224*l*. 12*s*. 7*d*. less the before-mentioned legal charges, but without costs of suit.

If the court should answer both questions in the negative, then judgment is to be entered for the defts. with costs of suit.

(WANTED-PARTY

14th Sept. 1904.

It is this day mutually agreed between George F. Seymour, agent of the good ship Her Majesty (for and on behalf of himself as owner of the said vessel), hereinafter per register 1112 tons, now lying in port of Shanghai, and Messrs. Dadabhai and Co.

That the said ship, being tight, staunch, and strong, and every way fitted for the voyage, shall with all convenient speed take on board in Shanghai a full and complete cargo of tea and (or) other merchandise, cotton to be taken by the shipowner in Shanghai, the same to be placed alongside the ship within reach of her tackle, and not exceeding what she can reasonably stow and carry over and above her stow, apparel, provisions, water, and furniture, and exclusive of the poop and cabins, which shall remain for the use and benefit of the captain and owners, the said George F. Seymour to provide all necessary dunnage and ballast, and, being so loaded, shall therewith proceed to London or Liverpool, as ordered by charterers before final sailing of the vessel from Shanghai, or as near thereto as she may safely get, and deliver the said cargo on being paid freight as follows: the ship to have a lien on cargo for freight three pounds ten shillings (3*l*. 10*s*) sterling per ton of fifty (50) cubic feet, measured in Shanghai, to be paid to captain or his agents on right and true delivery at port of discharge.

The act of God, the Queen's enemies, fire, and all and every other dangers and accidents of the seas, rivers, and navigation, of what nature and kind soever, during the said voyage, always excepted.

The freight to be paid on unloading and right delivery of the cargo. The ship at port of discharge to be engaged to the owners or their agents, lay days to commence four hours after written notice being given the charterers in the vessel is ready to receive cargo, seventy working days to be allowed the charterers for loading the ship. All cargo to be loaded and discharged by people employed and paid by the ship. All port charges and pilotage at Shanghai, as in at London or Liverpool, are to be borne by the ship. Freight beyond that time to be paid by the charterers at the rate of eighty (80) Mks. dollars per day, paid in advance. Commission as customary to be paid to the brokers by ship's gross amount, earned under this charter. Penalty for non-performance of this agreement the estimated amount of freight.

Williams in reply.

ERLE, C. J.—I think our judgment should be for the defts. The case turns on the construction of the words in the bill of lading, "freight payable as per charter-party." The freight as per charter-party is 3*l*. 10*s*. per ton of fifty cubic feet, measured, &c., on right and true delivery at the port of discharge. The true construction of the words refers us to the charter-party for the rate of freight, and that is 3*l*. 10*s*. per ton. The charter-party contains a stipulation that the shipowner is to have a lien on cargo for freight, and it is contended that the shipowner has a right to demand the whole of the freight for every portion of the cargo from the holder of this bill of lading for these 300 bales. I think he has no right of lien for the whole cargo. The bill of lading incorporates the charter-party as to the amount of freight, but not the other terms of the charter-party. Is the stipulation that the shipowner is to have a lien for freight intended to enable him to hold these goods till the whole freight is paid? I think it is not. The judgment of Willes, J. in Chappell v. Confort is applicable to this case, and I agree with the opinion there expressed; but if you wish to import anything more than the rate of freight, the words should appear in the bill of lading, so as to give notice to the innocent holder. It is effectual as to the amount of freight only.

M. SMITH, J.—I am of the same opinion. The question in this case is, what is the meaning of the contract under the bill of lading. I think it should be interpreted according to the plain and ordinary construction of the words. The plt. undertakes to deliver 185 packages, freight payable in Liverpool as per charter-party, that is, that the amount of freight payable for those goods shall be that fixed by the charter-party. You may refer to it for the amount of profit, but it incorporates no other term. It is admitted that no action would lie on this bill of lading for the whole freight, and it would require very plain words which should make the particular goods liable for the whole freight. This case differs from cases where the freight is payable as a lumpsum, in which the lien might be preserved. But that is not the case here. The case of Kern v. Deslandes was the case cited most in Mr. Williams' favour, but I think it is distinguishable from the present case. The court there thought the holders of the bill of lading stood in the same position as the charterers. Whether that assumption was right or not is unnecessary for us to discuss now, and our judgment must be for the debts to the extent before indicated.

[Ex.]

SUTHERLAND v. ALLHUSEN AND ANOTHER.

[Ex.]

Judgment for debts on the first point; for the plts. as to the surplus.

ERLE, C. J.—I desire to add that my brother Byles (who had gone to chambers) concurred in the opinion we have expressed, so far as he heard the argument.

COURT OF EXCHEQUER.

Reported by H. LEIGH and E. LUMLEY, Esqrs., Barristers-at-Law.

Thursday, May 31, 1866.

SUTHERLAND v. ALLHUSEN AND ANOTHER.

Leading—Assumpsit—Contract for sale of goods—“Free on board”—Naming the ship—Condition precedent to delivery.

Assumpsit on a contract for the sale of fifty tons of bicarbonate of soda at “11l. per ton in 1 cwt. kegs; or, if taken in 10 cwt. casks, the price to be 10s. less per ton; free on board, to be delivered in equal monthly quantities during April, May, and June 1865.” Averment, that debts. duly delivered divers portions of the goods according to agreement, and that plt. was not required by debts. to accept delivery of the residue. Breach, non-delivery of the residue. Plea, that debts. were ready and willing to deliver the said residue according to the agreement, whereof plt. had notice, and that plt. was not ready and willing to accept, and would not accept, and did not require delivery of the same:

Held (on the authority of Armitage v. Insole, 14 Q. B. 728; 19 L. J., N. S., 202, Q. B.), that before the debts. were bound to deliver the goods, the plt. was bound to name the ship or the place where he desired the goods to be delivered, and that a tender of the goods by the debts. was not a condition precedent to their delivery, or to the ship or place being named by the plt.

This was an action for the non-delivery of fifteen tons, the balance or residue of fifty tons, of bicarbonate of soda in pursuance of a contract. The declaration stated that it was agreed that plt. should buy of debts. fifty tons of bicarbonate of soda of debts.' own manufacture, and that debts. should sell the same to plt. at certain prices therein named, and should deliver the same to plt. in such quantities as plt. should require, not exceeding one-third of the whole of the said goods in each of the respective months of April, May, and June next ensuing the date of the said agreement, and that plt. should, if required by debts., accept the said goods in the respective quantities within the respective times in that behalf aforesaid.

Averment, that debts. duly delivered divers quanties of the said goods under and according to the said agreement, and that plt. was never required by debts. to accept the residue or any part of the said residue of the said goods in the respective quantities &c., and that all conditions were performed, &c. to entitle plt. to have the said residue delivered and to maintain his action in respect of the breaches therein as alleged; yet debts. did not, nor would deliver to plt. the said residue, &c., and allegation of damage therefrom.

Pleas:—1. Non assumpsit. 2. Debts. were ready and willing to deliver the residue according to the agreement, whereof plt. had notice, and that plt. was not ready and willing to accept, and would not accept, and did not require a delivery of the same according to the agreement. 3. Exoneration and discharge of debts. from performance before breach.

At the trial before Mellor, J., at the last Spring Assizes at Newcastle-upon-Tyne, it appeared that plt., a commission agent at Newcastle, had contracted to buy from debts., who were alkali manufacturers, fifty tons of bicarbonate of soda. The bought note, as proved at the trial, was in the following terms:

Newcastle-on-Tyne, 24th Nov. 1864.

I have to-day bought from you fifty tons bicarbonate of soda of your own manufacture; price 11l. per ton, in 1 cwt. kegs; or, if taken in 10 cwt. casks, the price to be 10s. less—say 10l. 10s. per ton. Free on board. Terms cash, in fourteen days after each delivery, less 5 per cent. discount. Delivery in equal monthly quantities during April, May, and June 1865.

(Signed)

B. J. SUTHERLAND.

The sold note signed by debts., which was also in evidence, was, mutatis mutandis, in the same terms, except that it did not contain the words “free on board.” It was proved also that portions of the fifty tons were from time to time delivered during the months of May and June 1865, each delivery being preceded by an order from the plt. indicating a particular wharf or ship where he wished to have the goods delivered. At the end of June a balance of fifteen tons remained undelivered. In August following plt. sent an order for the balance. At that time debts.' stock was exhausted, and they refused compliance, in consequence of which the action was brought. The market price of bicarbonate of soda had risen between June and August from ten guineas to 13l. 10s. per ton. In the declaration as originally framed there was an allegation that the parties had agreed by parol for an extension of time for delivery. After the decision of Noble v. Ward in the Ex., 13 L. T. Rep. N. S. 639; 4 H. & C. 149; 35 L. J. 81, Ex.; 1 L. R. 117, the declaration was amended, after issue joined, by striking out this allegation.

The contract being proved, evidence was given of the facts on which plt. relied as extending the time for performance of it. These facts were denied by the debts., but the learned judge, being of opinion that the case turned wholly on the construction of the contract, no evidence was given by debts., and a verdict was taken for the plt. with agreed damages (if any) at 40l., leave being reserved to debts. to move. Accordingly a rule was obtained in Easter Term to set aside the plt.'s verdict, and to enter it for debts., pursuant to leave reserved, on the ground that upon the evidence the debts. were entitled to the verdict, and against that rule.

Temple, Q. C. and T. Jones, for plt., now showed cause, and contended that the onus was on debts. to offer to deliver. It was contended on the part of debts., on the motion for the rule, that, plt. having an option as to the manner in which he would take the goods, it was a condition precedent to debts. tendering them that plt. should exercise his option, and point out the place of delivery, and indicate in what sized casks he would take the goods. But that was not so. And, even assuming plt. to have failed to do his part, yet, before debts. could take advantage of such failure, they should have insisted on plt.'s taking the goods: (Carpenter v. Blandford, 8 B. & C. 575.) Was the option in the vendors or the vendee? If in the former, they should have tendered; if in the latter, yet, nevertheless, defts. were bound to deliver, according to the contract, in the smaller casks, unless before the time of delivery plt. notified his election to take the goods in the larger casks. The only duty on the face of the contract on plt.'s part was to be ready to pay on delivery, and defts.' entire duty was to deliver goods on board. [Manisty, Q. C., contra, for defts., refers to Armitage v. Insole, 14 Q. B. 728; 19 L. J., N. S., 202, Q. B., and the judgment of Coleridge, J. there. MARTIN, B. refers to Startup v. Macdonald, 12 L. J., N. S., 477, Ex.; 7 N. R. 269; 6 M. & G. 593.] The present case was not like, or affected by, Armitage v. Insole. There it was a contract to deliver on board a ship lying at Cardiff. But defts. ought, at any rate, to be ready and willing to deliver on board that ship. After part performance the objection was not good. All that defts. were entitled to do on plt.'s omission to name a ship was to rescind altogether, but that could not be done where part had been performed. Having had the benefit of the contract in May and June, they could not now rescind. Their remedy was an action for breach by plt. of a condition precedent to the performance, not of the whole contract but, of the remaining part of it. They cited also Behn v. Burness, in the Ex. Ch., 8 L. T. Rep. N. S. 207; 32 L. J. 204, Q. B.; 3 B. & S. 751.

[Ex.]

SUTHERLAND v. ALLHUSEN AND ANOTHER.

[Ex.]

Manisty, Q. C. and Hugh Shield, for defts., in support of their rule, were stopped.

POLLOCK, C. B.—I believe that we are all of opinion that it is not necessary to hear counsel in support of the rule. I am disposed to agree with my brother Martin that it would have been more agreeable to the court to have discharged this rule; but, on the authorities that have been cited and the facts before us, I own I concur with the rest of the court in thinking that it must be made absolute. The action is upon a contract, and the expression "free on board" does not necessarily import that the goods should be put on board ship; it would be competent to the parties to prove that the goods were to be delivered somewhere else. The buyer may have them on board a ship or may have them at a railway-station, or may have them at any other place pointed out by him. The only question here is, was it incumbent upon the defts. to tender the goods, or was it incumbent on the plt. to tender the ship or point out the place where they were to be delivered, and, if on board ship, to specify the ship by description and name? It has been decided, in a case where the expression "free on board" was used, that it is the duty of the person who seeks to have the goods to point out the ship, or specify the place where they are to be delivered, before he can complain that the goods are not on board the ship. I think the spirit of that decision clearly applies in omnibus to the present case, and that the plt. was bound, if he meant these goods to be delivered on ship board, to name the ship, and, if elsewhere, he was bound to name the place where he desired them to be delivered, and that it was not necessary for the defts. to tender the goods, as a sort of condition precedent to their delivery or to the ship being named, or the place being designated by the plt. That being so, it appears to me, looking at all the facts and the point reserved, that the rule obtained to set aside the verdict, or to enter it for the defts. must be made absolute.

MARTIN, B.—I regret also that I am constrained to give this judgment. The case has nothing to do with the construction of a contract, but with the performance of a condition precedent, with regard to which the case which has been referred to is directly in point. This contract was for the sale of fifty tons of bicarbonate of soda, and the deliveries were to be in the stipulated quantities during the months of April, May, and June 1865, and those deliveries were to be "free on board" in the Tyne, and the price was to cover that. Therefore, what the vendee, that is the plt., contracted for was, that there was to be delivered to him fifty tons of bicarbonate of soda in the months of April, May, and June, in equal quantities "free on board in the Tyne," at a certain price. One's common sense therefore, would point out that before the party could complain of the non-delivery of those goods the vendor ought to be told where on the Tyne, or on what ship on the Tyne side they were to be put. The case cited seems to me directly in point. At one time it could not be done, but now it is necessary that there should be a performance of all conditions precedent which are essential to be set out in the declaration. On a contract for a certain quantity of coal to be ready on board, with an averment of performance, and a breach of the condition that the goods had not been delivered according to contract, Patteson, Coleridge, and Wightman JJ. were all of opinion that, for the purpose of enforcing the contract, it was necessary for the vendee to name the ship to the vendor: (Armitage v. Insole.) I cannot distinguish between that case and the present; and the circumstance that now parties are bound to aver performance of conditions precedent cannot alter the law as to the effect and the nature of the contract when once we know what the contract is. I therefore think the defts. are entitled to succeed, though I regret it.

BRAMWELL, B.—I am of opinion that this rule should be made absolute. The contract being to do a certain thing, the defts. were not bound to deliver till the plt. told them where they were to deliver. The plt. did not tell them where they were to deliver before the day of delivery arrived, and consequently the defts. never were bound. That seems the plain and fair meaning of it upon the authorities.

CHANNELL, B.—I am of the same opinion. This does not arise on a question as to a right to rescind the contract. I am of opinion, notwithstanding what has been urged upon us by counsel, that there might have been, as against the vendee, as to part of the goods, an acceptance and performance of the contract. The contract here is for the sale of goods, and the plt. insists on shipment on board a certain ship in the Tyne, and in order to make out the case he is bound to indicate the ship before he can bring an action for the non-acceptance and non-performance of the contract, which raises the question whether the defts. were ready and willing to deliver and the plt. ready and willing to accept.

Rule absolute.

Ex.] EUROPEAN AND AUSTRALIAN ROYAL MAIL CO. v. PENINSULAR, &C. NAVIGATION CO. [Ex.]

Monday, June 4, 1866.

THE EUROPEAN AND AUSTRALIAN ROYAL MAIL COMPANY (LIMITED) v. THE PENINSULAR AND ORIENTAL STEAM NAVIGATION COMPANY.

'Ship' within the meaning of the Merchant Shipping Act (17 & 18 Vict. c. 104), ss. 53, 55—Ship converted into coal-hulk—Transfer of without bill of sale.

Ship registered under the Merchant Shipping Act may be so treated and dealt with as, at any rate between the parties to a transfer thereof, to be no longer a ship for the purposes of the 53rd section of that Act, and so to be transferable without a bill of sale like any other chattel, even, it would seem, although not becoming the subject of any of the contingencies specified in the 53rd section of the Act.

essel which had been registered was by the owners used for the space of four years as a mere coaling-hulk and workshop, moored at one of their coaling-stations; and was then transferred by them under an agreement with a company to which the owners transferred their business. She was described in the agreement and also in an invoice delivered, as a coal-hulk:

and, as a matter of fact, that under the circumstances of the case she was not a ship, at any rate as between the parties, so as to be by the 53rd section of the Merchant Shipping Act transferable only by bill of sale, and therefore that the property in her passed to the company.

This was an action of trover brought by the plts. against the defts. under the circumstances set forth below. By consent of the parties and in pursuance of the order of Bramwell, B. a special case was stated without pleadings.

The following facts appeared from the case:—

The defts. were engaged in the year 1853 in carrying mails, passengers, and goods by steam-vessels between England and ports in the Indian Ocean on the one hand, and Australia on the other. For the purposes of this line of vessels they had established a coaling station at King George's Sound, in Western Australia. The coal was sent out in sailing colliers, and, until the defts. in the year 1853 made use of the Larkins, as after mentioned, was discharged direct from the colliers into the defts.' steam-vessels or warehouses on shore. In the year 1853 the defts. purchased in England and sent out a vessel called the Larkins, to be used for coaling their vessels. This vessel was an old three-masted wooden vessel, which had been up to the time of its being so purchased always used as a sailing vessel, and was then duly registered and capable of being used as such. The defts. at that time caused her to be newly registered. They then loaded her with a cargo of coals and stores for the use of their vessels, and sent her direct to King George's Sound. Upon her arrival there all her masts, spars, and rigging, except the lower masts and standing rigging, were taken down and sent on shore, and she was moored fore and aft with two anchors. The officers and crew were then all discharged with the exception of two persons. The masts and rigging sent on shore were warehoused and taken care of there. From that time forward the Larkins remained at King George's Sound, and was used for the purpose of receiving on board the coal from the sailing colliers, storing it until wanted, and then delivering it out to the defts.' steam-vessels in the same manner as an ordinary coaling hulk, and she was also used as a workshop, and was never used for any other purposes. The plts. were incorporated in the year 1856 as a joint-stock company for the purposes of steam navigation, and in the latter part of that year they undertook the service of carrying mails, passengers, and goods between England and ports in the Indian Ocean on the one hand, and Australia on the other, in the place of the defts., who retired from such service. A written agreement was entered into at this time between the plts. and the defts. with respect to various matters, and among other things it was provided by article 2 of such agreement as follows:

The European and Australian Company agree to purchase, and the Peninsular and Oriental Company to sell, the coal-hulk Larkins, belonging to the latter company, now lying at King George's Sound, together with their stock of coals in Australia. The price of hulk, to be delivered in fair and sound condition, with all her appurtenances, is agreed at 6000*l.*, to be paid on receipt of notice of delivery, and of the coals 35*s.* per ton in store, to be paid for upon production of certificates of quantity supplied to each steamer.

In pursuance of this agreement, the Larkins was handed over by the defts. to the plts., one of the persons left on board as aforesaid delivering her over, on the 9th Feb. 1857, to their agent appointed for the purpose. On the 7th May an invoice was delivered to plts., in which she was termed the hulk Larkins.

In the month of Oct. 1857 the plts. accepted a bill of exchange drawn by the defts. for a sum including the price of the Larkins. In consequence of the pecuniary difficulties of the plts., the bill was not met at maturity and never was paid.

No bill of sale of the Larkins was ever executed by the defts. to the plts. From the 9th Feb. 1857 till the 18th May 1859 the plts. in the first instance, and afterwards the Royal Mail Company under an agreement with the plts., carried on the service with the vessels of the plts. as the defts. had previously carried it on, and employed the Larkins solely as a coaling hulk. In the early part of 1859 the plts. became greatly embarrassed, and were compelled to discontinue the service, and the bill before mentioned still continuing unpaid, the defts. thereupon applied to the said Royal Mail Company, who were then in possession of the Larkins under the agreement lastly before mentioned, to deliver her up to them, which the Royal Mail Company, without instructions from the plts., accordingly did on the 18th May 1859. Since then the defts. have resumed the service and employed the Larkins as before described. The plts. company is now in the course of being wound-up. It was to be taken as admitted for the purposes of the case that there had been a demand by the plts. and a refusal by the defts. to deliver up the Larkins before action brought, and the court was to be at liberty to draw inferences of fact.

The plts. contended that the property in the Larkins had passed to them, and that defts. were not entitled to resume possession, and the defts. contended the contrary. The question for the court was whether under the circumstances the plts. were entitled to recover. The Merchant Shipping Act (17 & 18 Vict. c. 104), s. 55, enacts that a registered ship, or any share therein, when disposed of to persons qualified to be owners of British ships, shall be transferred by bill of sale.

Horace Lloyd (with him Maude) for the plts.—The vessel in question is not a ship within the Act; it is a mere floating coal magazine, a chattel. The parties have treated it as such in their dealings with it. It cannot be contended that a ship may not lose its character as such and become a mere chattel. One often sees at seaports instances of old ships used as mere storehouses. The definition of a ship given in the Act is, every description of vessel used in navigation not propelled by oars. This vessel does not come within that definition.

this: had this vessel lost its right to sail about upon the seas as a British ship? This place where she was moored is a mere coaling station; there is no trade there; there would be no means, if the use of her as a coal-hulk ceased, of getting her away or utilising her in any way except by putting up again her rigging and spars which were preserved on shore, and sailing away. It is the commonest thing on the coast of Africa, in the palm-oil trade, for a ship to be used as a storehouse for some time and then to come home with a cargo herself. Would she, if she had done so, have been entitled to the privileges of a British ship? She never ceased to be upon the register. There are certain clauses that specify the events in which a ship ceases to be a British registered ship. The 53rd section enacts that where a registered ship is either actually or constructively lost, taken by the enemy, burnt or broken up, or if by reason of a transfer to any persons not qualified to be owners of British ships, or of any other matter or thing, any such ship as aforesaid ceases to be a British ship, the certificate of registry shall be given up under a penalty. The intention of the Act is, that the register shall be a complete list of all ships entitled to the privileges of British ships. So long as a ship is de facto a British ship on the register she cannot be transferred except by a bill of sale. [MARTIN, B.—The form of declaration mentioned in sect. 56 seems to be against your contention, for that must show how the vessel is propelled. POLLOCK, C. B.—Suppose the owner of a ship, after some calamity had occurred with reference to her, from some superstitious notion had made up his mind that she should not sail the seas again and sold her to be broken up?] She must be actually broken up, I contend, to pass otherwise than by bill of sale. Intention is not sufficient. The 53rd section is intended to provide for all cases in which what was once a British registered ship ceases to be so. If this is not so, there is a case where no provision is made for delivering up the certificate although the vessel ceases to be a British ship. There is nothing to prevent the transferees here using her as a British ship. [CHANNELL, B. referred to sects. 84 and 87, which provide, in cases where a ship is altered, for re-registration or forfeiture of the privileges of a British ship.]

Horace Lloyd in reply.—I submit that this is not really a question of law, but of fact. The question is, whether the Larkins was appropriated permanently to the purposes of a coal-hulk. [MARTIN, B.—They profess to sell her as a coal-hulk.] The argument of my friend proves too much. According to that it would have been impossible to convert her into a coal-hulk so as to pass as a chattel. This vessel, no doubt, continued to have a hull and a keel and other attributes of a ship, but all intention of using her as such had been abandoned.

POLLOCK, C. B.—I am of opinion that our judgment should be for the plts. I agree with Mr. Lloyd that this is substantially a question of fact, and I think that under the circumstances the vessel in question had ceased to be a ship.

MARTIN, B.—I think that this vessel had really become a mere chattel, a coal-hulk as she was described, and that, therefore, she was not a ship within the meaning of the Act. For four years before she was purchased she had been used as a coal-hulk, and occasionally as a workshop; after that the defts. sold her by the description of the "coal-hulk Larkins." In pursuance of the agreement of sale she was delivered to the plts., and an invoice was given in which she is mentioned by a similar description. I think, as against the defts., she must be taken to be what they describe her themselves. She had been for a long time used as a coal-hulk, and it was never contended that it was really intended that she should ever be used again as a ship. Therefore I think she is not within the Act requiring the transfer to be by bill of sale. The 55th section enacts that a registered ship shall be transferred by bill of sale, and by the 56th section no individual shall be entitled to be registered as transferee of a ship until he has made a declaration in the form marked F. in the schedule. That form and the form of the bill of sale are to state various particulars, the name of the ship, and how she is propelled. I am clearly of opinion that what the Legislature were there dealing with was a ship to be propelled by steam or otherwise, not a thing which had been a ship four years before, but was then used as a warehouse. I should say, too, that however that may be, as against the defts. who had themselves sold her as a hulk, she must be taken to be such. After that sale I think she must clearly be taken as intended to be used only for coals and other stores.

CHANNELL, B.—If we are bound to consider this a ship, I think Mr. Mellish's argument is unanswerable. But the question is whether we are not at liberty to deal with this as a question of fact, and I think under the circumstances we are entitled so to do. I think that this was not a ship, and the 53rd section is therefore not decisive. The forms given in the schedule seem to me to go far to support the construction we have put on this case in dealing with the question as a matter of fact.

ERROR FROM THE COMMON PLEAS.

Friday, June 15, 1866.

(Before POLLOCK, C. B., BRAMWELL, CHANNELL, and PIGOTT, BB., MELLOR and SHEE, JJ.)

NIELL v. WHITWORTH.

The defts. contracted to sell to the plts. cotton to arrive at L. per ship from C. to be of a certain quality, with this stipulation: "the cotton to be taken from the quay." The defts. on its arrival warehoused the cotton, and sent the plts. a delivery order. They refused to accept.

Held, that this was a stipulation introduced in favour of the seller, and not a condition precedent, upon the performance of which the vendee could insist; and that the contract amounted to a contract to deliver at a reasonable time and circumstances, the article to be at the buyer's charge from the time of its landing on the quay.

This was an action for an alleged breach of a contract for the delivery of certain cotton (reported from the court below, 11 L. T. Rep. N. S. 677).

The declaration stated:

That the defts. bargained and sold to the plts., and the plts. bought of the defts. certain cotton, that is to say, 500 bales of cotton guaranteed to be October shipment, at 15½d per lb. to arrive from Calcutta in Liverpool per ship or ships, and to be fair Bengal cotton, the said cotton to be taken from the quay; customary allowances of tare and draft, and the invoice to be dated from the date of the delivery of the last bale. The said cotton to be in merchantable condition, the damaged, if any, to be rejected, provided it could not be made merchantable. Brett, Q. C., in Michaelmas Term last, obtained a rule nisi to enter the verdict for the defts., or to reduce the damages, on the grounds that the stipulation in the contract, that the cotton should be taken from the quay, was in favour of the vendors, or, if not, that it was a stipulation only, and not a condition in the contract; and secondly, that the damages should be either nominal, or at most the difference between the contract price and the market price on the day of the breach. That rule was made absolute on the 26th Jan. last.

The pils. now appealed.

Mellish, Q. The term "delivery" includes acceptance by the buyers. As to the other question of damages, there is a direct decision against me in the Q. B.

MERSEY BOARD v. GIBBS.

MERSEY BOARD v. PENHALLOW.

Negligence—Public statutory trustees—Liability for servants—Review of authorities.

G., the owner of a cargo which was damaged by reason of the ship's stranding on a mud-bank negligently left at the entrance of a harbour vested in the Mersey Board by statute, sued the board for damage. The defence was that the board acted under a statute; that they derived no personal benefit from the management of the docks; that they took no part personally in the management, but merely appointed servants and officers in discharge of their public duty, and that the negligence was not theirs, but was solely that of one of their servants:

Held (affirming the judgment of the Ex. Ch.), that the case of public statutory trustees, if not servants of the Crown, did not differ from that of absolute owners levying tolls for their own benefit, and that the board were liable in damages to G.

Dictum of Lord Cottenham, L. C., in Duncan v. Findlater, 6 Cl. & F. 894, overruled.

This was a proceeding in error from a judgment of the Court of Ex. Ch. sitting in error from the Court of Ex., reversing the judgment given in that court in favour of the defts. below, who are the pils. in error, upon a demurrer to the declaration.

The action was commenced on the 15th Oct. 1855. It was originally brought against the trustees of the Liverpool Docks, but upon the passing of the Mersey Docks and Harbour Act 1857, by which the Liverpool Docks were vested in the Mersey Docks and Harbour Board, a suggestion was, pursuant to the said Act, entered upon the record, and the action was continued against the said board, the plts. in error.

The declaration contained two counts. The first count alleged that the plts. below were the owners of a cargo of guano on board the ship called the Sierra Nevada, and that the said ship in endeavouring to enter a certain dock of the defts. below, called the Wellington Half-tide dock, struck against a bank of mud remaining by the negligence of the defts. in the entrance of the dock. The second count alleged that the defts. below, knowing that the said dock was by reason of an accumulation of mud therein in an unfit state to be navigated, did not take reasonable care to put the same into a fit state for that purpose, whereupon the Sierra Nevada in endeavouring to enter into the dock struck against the mud, and the cargo thereby became damaged.

The defts. below pleaded four pleas. The first plea was not guilty, and the last a demurrer to the whole declaration. The plts. took issue on the first three pleas and joined in demurrer.

The demurrer was argued before the Court of Ex. in Easter and Michaelmas Terms 1856, and that court gave judgment in favour of the defts. below, on the ground that the case was governed by the decision in Metcalfe v. Hetherington, 11 Ex. Rep. 257: (see 1 Hurlstone & Norman's Reps. p. 439; 2 L. T. Rep. N. S. 806.)

The plts. below brought error upon that judgment, and the Court of Ex. Ch. reversed it, and gave judgment in favour of the plts. below: (see 3 Hurlstone & Norman's Reps. p. 164; 31 L. T. Rep. 22.)

The issues in fact came on for trial before Martin, B. and a special jury, at the assizes held at Liverpool in the autumn of 1858, when a verdict was found and given for the plts. below.

In Michaelmas Term 1858 the Court of Ex. was moved on behalf of the defts. below for a rule to show cause why a rule for a new trial should not be had, on the ground, among others, that the learned judge did not leave the question whether the defts. below had any knowledge of the existence of the mud-bank to the jury. The rule was refused as to this ground. A rule was granted on the ground of surprise, which was subsequently discharged.

The owners of the ship also brought an action against the plts. in error, in respect of the damage sustained by the vessel on the same occasion. That action (Penhallow and others v. The Mersey Docks and Harbour Board) came on for trial before the Lord Chief Baron and a special jury at the Middlesex sittings after Michaelmas Term, in the year 1859, when the learned Lord Chief Baron directed the jury, that if, in their opinion, the cause of the misfortune was a bank of mud in the dock, and the defts. by their servants had the means of knowing the state of the dock and were negligently ignorant of it, then in the opinion of him the Lord Chief Baron, the defts. below were liable. A bill of exceptions was tendered to this ruling, and the jury thereupon found a verdict for the plts. below, and judgment was signed thereon in the Court of Ex.

The defts. below in that action brought error, and the Court of Ex. Ch. overruled the bill of exceptions, and confirmed the judgment given by the Court of Ex.: (see 5 L. T. Rep. N. S. 42.)

The Acts of Parliament relating to the Liverpool Docks contain the following among other enactments: By sect. 81 of the 51 Geo. 3, c. cxliii., the harbour master and dock masters were empowered to direct the removal of vessels from one part of a dock to another. By sect. 82, the harbour master and dock masters were empowered to direct the time and manner of every ship coming into docks. By sect. 86 a penalty is imposed on master bringing a vessel into the docks contrary to the directions of the harbour master or dock master. And by the 6 Geo. 4, c. clxxxvii. s. 134, the trustees were empowered to pay as they should see occasion for damage caused by the insufficiency of works or the negligence of their servants.

The point of law to be determined in the present case was, whether a public board, the members of which receive no emolument whatever directly or indirectly, appointed under the provisions of an Act of Parliament to carry out certain duties imposed upon them by the Legislature for the general benefit of the community, are liable for damage sustained by reason of the default of one of their officers, where no improper conduct on the part of the board was the cause of the injury.

In the judgment given by the Court of Ex. Ch. in favour of the plts. below on the demurrer reversing the judgment of the Court of Ex. Ch., there were some expressions which at the time led to the belief that that judgment was to some extent based upon the allegation of knowledge in the first count. This belief induced the defts. below to bring error on that judgment until the issues were ascertained. On the trial of the issues no evidence was given or suggestion made as to actual knowledge on the part either of the defts. or of their servants of the existence of the supposed mud-bank, and the learned Baron who gave the cause refused to leave the question of knowledge to the jury.

This ruling was upheld by the Court of Ex. Ch. on motion for a new trial, and the Court of Ex. Ch. in the judgment in the action of Penhallow and others against the plts. in error, explained that the judgment of that court in the present case could at all depend upon the allegation of knowledge, and that the declaration was to be considered as amended so that the allegation of knowledge was struck out, and the case was reduced to the simple point of law already mentioned.

The defts. brought error to the H. of L. in these cases.

The following learned Judges attended the argument, viz., Channell, B., Black, J., Keating, and Shee, JJ., and Pigott, B.

Sir F. Kelly, Q. C., Mellish, Q. C., and Quain, J., the plts. in error, contended that the judgment ought to be reversed, because the declaration contained no averment that the trustees of the Liverpool Docks exceeded their statutory powers, or acted maliciously or oppressively, or without faith, contrary to their own judgment. A cause of action is by law sustainable against trustees acting without remuneration in the discharge of public duties imposed upon them by the Legislature for damage occasioned solely by the negligence of officers, the appointment of whom was a branch of the duty of such trustees.

The Solicitor-General (Collier), Sir H. Cairns, Q. C., Honyman, and W. Lushington, for the defts. in error.

The cases referred to in the arguments have been fully reviewed and discussed in the judgment and are therefore here omitted.

At the conclusion of the arguments the learned judges put the following questions to the learned judges: Mersey Board v. Gibbs—Does the declaration in this case state a good cause of action?

Mersey Board v. Penhallow—Is the judgment of the Court of Ex. Ch. right?

The learned Judges took time to consider the questions, and afterwards returned their unanimous opinion as follows by

MERSEY BOARD v. GIBBS. MERSEY BOARD v. PENHALLOW.

BLACKBURN, J.—My Lords, I have the honour, in answer to your Lordships' questions in these cases, to deliver the joint opinion of all the judges who heard the argument. The two actions before your Lordships, though arising out of the same transaction, do not come before your Lordships' House in precisely the same manner. In Gibbs v. The Mersey Board (the action by the owner of the cargo) the question is raised by a demurrer to the declaration, on which all the material averments must be considered as admitted to be true. The damages are assessed on the second count, and it is to the averments on that count that your Lordships' attention should be directed. On this record it is admitted by the demurrer that the defts. (the dock corporation, at that time called by the style of the Trustees of the Liverpool Docks), knowing that the dock and its entrance was, by reason of accumulations of mud, unfit to be used by ships, did not take due and reasonable or any care to put it in a fit state, but negligently suffered the dock to remain in such unfit state, whilst, as they well knew, it was used by vessels, and that the damage arose in consequence. In the action of Penhallow v. The Mersey Board (the action by the shipowner), the averments in the second count are similar to those in the first action; but they are not admitted by a demurrer. The question was raised at Nisi Prius on the plea of not guilty, which the jury have found for the plts.; but the charge of the Lord Chief Baron is brought before your Lordships by a bill of exceptions, by which it appears that he told the jury that if in their opinion the cause of the misfortune was a bank of mud "and the defts. by their servants had the means of knowing the state of the dock, and were negligently ignorant of it, then, in his opinion, the defts. were liable;" obviously meaning, that if the jury so thought they ought to find the issue for the plts. The exception taken to this summing-up was, that even if the jury thought the cause of the misfortune was a bank of mud, the defts. were not liable unless they knew that the dock and entrance were, by reason of the said mud-bank or otherwise, unfit for navigation. That is the only exception. Mr. Mellish, in the course of his very able reply at your Lordships' bar, contended that the statement in the bill of exceptions disclosed no evidence to go to the jury of negligence on the part of the defts. or their servants. But that is not the exception on the record; and we need hardly remind your Lordships that the party tendering a bill of exceptions is confined to the exceptions he makes at the trial. This is not a merely technical answer; had the exception been that there was no evidence of negligent ignorance fit to be left to the jury, the whole of the evidence bearing on that point would have been set out on the record, and then the Court of Error could have formed a judgment whether it was sufficient or not; as it is, the record contains no more of the evidence than is necessary to explain the exception really made at the trial, viz., that the Chief Baron told the jury, in effect, that it was not necessary to prove knowledge on the part of the defts. or their servants of the unfit state of the docks, and that proof that the defts., by their servants, had the means of knowledge and were negligently ignorant of it, would entitle the plts. to the verdict. The Court of Ex. Ch., in each of the cases, based their judgment on that of the Court of Ex. Ch. in the Lancaster Canal Company v. Parnaby, 11 Ad. & El. 230. In that case the defts. were a company incorporated by Act of Parliament for the purpose of making and maintaining a canal, which was to be open for the use of the public on the payment of rates, which the canal company were empowered to receive for their own proper use and behoof (i. e. to be divided among the shareholders). And the Court of Ex. Ch. in that case state the law thus (11 Ad.

& El. 242): "The facts stated in the inducement show that the company made the canal for their profit, and opened it to the public upon payment of tolls to the company; and the common law in such a case imposes a duty upon the proprietors, not perhaps to repair the canal, or absolutely to free it from obstructions, but to take reasonable care, so long as they keep it open for the public use of all who may choose to navigate it, that they may navigate it without danger to their lives or property." In the present case the dock board do not receive the dock rates for their own use and behoof, i. e., to be divided amongst themselves or their shareholders; but they are bound by the statutes, under which they are incorporated, to apply them to the purposes of the Acts, which may in substance be stated to be to maintain the docks and pay the very large debt contracted in making them. The Court of Ex. Ch. in both cases decided that this difference did not affect the question; that so long as the dock was kept open for the public, the duty to take reasonable care that the dock and its entrance were in such a state that those who navigate it may do so without danger was equally cast on the proprietors having the receipt of the tolls and the possession and management of the dock, whether the tolls are received for a beneficial or a fiduciary purpose. If this proposition is correct, the direction of the Lord Chief Baron excepted to was right, for a body corporate never can either take care or neglect to take care, except through their servants; and, assuming that it was the duty of the corporation to take reasonable care that the dock was in a fit state, it seems clear that if the corporation, by their servants, had the means of knowing that the dock was in an unfit state, and were negligently ignorant of its state, they did neglect this duty, and did not take reasonable care that it was fit. And after hearing the very able arguments at your Lordships' bar, we are of opinion that the judgment of the Court of Ex. Ch. was correct. It is pointed out by Lord Campbell in Southampton and Itchin Bridge v. Southampton Local Board, 8 El. & Bl., that in every case the liability of a body created by statute must be determined upon a true interpretation of the statutes under which it is created. It is desirable, therefore, in the first place to state what was the effect of the legislation, so far as it applied to these docks, at the time of the accident on the 12th April 1865. The docks in Liverpool have been made at different times under a great many different Acts of Parliament, the earliest being the 8 Anne, c. 12. At the time when the accident happened which gave rise to these actions, the latest of the Acts was the 14 & 15 Vict. c. 64. All these numerous statutes are public Acts, of which the courts must take judicial notice; and as many of the statutes were at that time still in force, though their provisions had been in many respects varied by those subsequently passed, it is extremely difficult to ascertain with precision what was, at the time of the accident, the exact state of the legislation peculiar to those docks. But having had the assistance afforded by the able and industrious counsel who argued at your Lordships' bar, we think we may venture to say that the effect of the material parts of the statutes is the following: The members of the Town Council of Liverpool and their successors were formed into a corporation by the style of the "Trustees of the Liverpool Docks." By statutes 51 Geo. 3, c. 143, s. 2, 6 Geo. 4, c. 87, s. 3, and 14 & 15 Vict. c. 64, ss. 2, 3, and 4, the powers of this corporation were to be exercised by committee. On this Mr. Mellish founded an argument which we shall notice afterwards. Subject to these provisions we may say that the effect of the legislation was, that the dock corporation were empowered to make and maintain docks and warehouses, which were to be open to the use of the public, paying dock rates for the use of the docks and warehouse rates for the use of the warehouses. The same accommodation and the same services were to be supplied to those using the docks and the warehouses respectively that would have been supplied by any ordinary dock and warehouse company to their customers. Powers are given to the trustees of the Liverpool Docks from time to time to close the docks for the purpose of cleansing and repair. General powers are given to them to appoint officers and servants; but the duties of those officers and servants are not in any place defined in the statutes, except by statute 51 Geo. 3, c. 143, ss. 80, 81, 82, 84, 85, and 86. By those sections the water bailiff or harbour-master, or any of the dock-masters, have power to remove wrecks and obstructions, and to regulate the time and manner in which vessels shall enter and leave the docks; and penalties are imposed on those who disobey the orders of those officers. On these latter sections, and on the decision of the Court of Ex. in Metcalfe v. Hethrington, 11 Ex. 257, an argument was raised for the defts., which we will notice afterwards. At present we will only observe that such powers are almost essential for the due use of any dock; and that accordingly it has been for many years the practice to insert similar clauses in all harbour and dock Acts, whether for private companies or public bodies. And in the Harbour Docks and Pier Clauses Act 1847 (10 Vict. c. 27), the clauses commonly in use are collected under the head "and with respect to the appointment of harbour-masters and pier-masters and their duties." It will be found on examining them that sect. 56 in the general Act is equivalent to sect. 80 in the 51 Geo. 3, c. 143; and that the other powers given to the officers of the Liverpool Dock Corporation are also given to the officers of all dock companies, whether for public or for private purposes, incorporated by any statute which incorporated the Harbours, Docks, and Piers Clauses Act 1847. By a general appropriation clause, 51 Geo. 3, c. 146, s. 29, all the revenues of the trustees of the Liverpool Docks are to be applied in the first instance to making and maintaining the docks, paying the interest on the large debt secured on the dock rates, and to paying "all the charges and expenses already incurred, or hereafter to be incurred, in the carrying into execution or under or in consequence of any of the former Acts or this present Act; and the residue in paying off the principal moneys of the debt." And when it is all paid off, the trustees are required to lower and reduce the rates, "as far as can be done, leaving sufficient for defraying all charges of management and other concerns of the docks, &c., and improving, repairing, and maintaining the same, and for the carrying into execution the provisions of this Act and the former Acts." By subsequent enactments the trustees of the Liverpool Docks are enabled to raise much more money on bonds, and to make much more extensive works; but in substance this clause still, at the time of the accident, remained the clause governing the appropriation of all moneys received by the trustees of the Liverpool Docks, including the moneys paid for the use of the docks and warehouses. There are some peculiar enactments in one of the statutes (6 Geo. 4, c. 187, ss. 130 to 136) which were relied upon as showing the intention of the Legislature, on which we shall remark afterwards; but with this exception, there is nothing in the statutes either extending or limiting the liability of the dock trustees to those paying for the use of the docks, so as to make it different from that which the general law would cast upon them under such circumstances. And, consequently, in our opinion the great question in both these actions is, what is the duty which the general law does cast upon a corporation, being the proprietors of docks maintained under such enactments? Now, it is obvious that a shipowner who pays dock rates for the use of the dock, or the owner of goods who pays warehouse rates for the use of a warehouse and the services of the warehousemen, is, as far as he is concerned, exactly in the same position, however the rates may be appropriated. He pays the rates for the dock accommodation, or for warehouse accommodation and services, and he is entitled to expect that reasonable care should be taken that he shall not be exposed to danger in using the accommodation for which he has paid. It is well observed by Mellor, J., in Coe v. Wise, 33 L. J. 281, Q. B., of corporations, like the present, formed for trading and other profitable purposes, that though such corporations may act without reward to themselves, yet in their very nature they are substitutions on a large scale for individual enterprise. And we think that in the absence of anything in the statutes (which create such corporations) showing a contrary intention in the Legislature, the true rule of construction is, that the Legislature intended that the liability of corporations thus substituted for individuals should, to the extent of their corporate funds, be co-extensive with that imposed by the general law on the owners of similar works. If, indeed, the Legislature has by express enactment or necessary intendment enacted that they should not be subject to such a liability, there is an end of the question; and if the Legislature had in the Act now under consideration, enacted that none of the revenue of the trustees of the Liverpool Docks should be applied to the purpose of discharging liabilities incurred in consequence of the trustees acting as proprietors of docks and warehouses, it would go far to show that the Legislature intended that they should not be so liable. But the appropriation clause in the Acts, now under consideration, has no such effect. It was, indeed, supposed by the Court of K. B., in Rex v. Liverpool, 7 B. & C. 61, that its effect was to prohibit the payment of poor-rates; but your Lordships' House has decided in the recent case of Jones v. Mersey Board, 35 L. J. 1, M. C., that this was a mistake, and that the trustees of the Liverpool Docks were out of that fund to defray all expenses incident by law to the maintenance of the docks, and, as such, poor-rates. We think on the same principle they are at liberty to apply the fund to the discharge of the liabilities which in execution of the Act, by keeping open the docks and warehouses, they must from time to time incur to their customers. It was pointed out in the course of Mr. Mellish's argument, that the effect of applying the revenue of the trustees of the Liverpool Docks to the payment of such a liability as the present, would be to postpone the time at which the rates would be reduced, and that consequently the ultimate loss would fall on those who were the payers of the rates at the time when the rates, but for this liability, would have been reduced; and so that, in the possible, but not very probable, event of the plts. being then persons using the docks, the loss would partly fall upon the plts. themselves. But we are unable to see how that affects the question whether the action would lie or not. A shareholder in an incorporated company, such as a railway company or an ordinary dock company, who has a cause of action against the corporation, does in effect, by obtaining redress, diminish the future dividends of the shareholders, including his own. In this respect his position is analogous to that of the ratepayer, yet it never can be contended that a shareholder in an incorporated dock company could not maintain an action for an injury to his ship from the neglect of the company. It was pointed out by Sir Hugh Cairns, in the course of his argument at your Lordships' bar, that the Legislature, in the 6 Geo. 4, 187, ss. 130 to 136, showed a clear intention that the funds of the dock trust might, in some cases at least, be applied by the committee to indemnifying parties who had suffered by the negligence of the servants of the trustees of the Liverpool Docks; and also that damages recovered against the trustees of the Liverpool Docks might be levied out of the rates, by the circuitous and somewhat clumsy process of distraining on the goods of the treasurer, who was to recoup himself out of the rates. And these enactments, so far as they go, seem to us to show that the Legislature at least did not intend to take away any liability of the trustees, which would otherwise have been cast on them by the general law, though we should not willingly infer from them that it was intended to impose any liability beyond that which would be imposed by the general law. Mr. Mellish also founded an argument on the wording of these sections, taken in conjunction with the enactments in the second clause of 51 Geo. 3, c. 143, and the second, third, and fourth clauses of the 14 & 15 Vict. c. 64, which it is proper we should now notice. The trustees of the Liverpool Docks were required by the second section of 51 Geo. 3, c. 143, to appoint a committee of their body, and all their powers were to be exercised by that committee, except in so far as the trustees of the docks might reserve any question for their own determination. By the subsequent enactments, this committee was to consist partly of the members of the trustees of the Liverpool Docks, and partly of members elected by the persons who had paid dock rates, and the whole of the powers of the trustees of the Liverpool Docks were to be exercised exclusively by this committee so constituted. When the error in the case of Gibbs v. The Trustees of the Liverpool Docks was argued in the Court of Ex., that court gave judgment upon the ground that the action, if it lay at all, lay against the committee, and not against the trustees of the Liverpool Docks: (1 Hurl. & Nor. 439.) But in the Court of Error, the defts. by their counsel, very handsomely agreed that the plt. should not be put to the expense and trouble of issuing another writ against the committee; but that, if the action would lie against either body, judgment might be given against the defts. on the record. Subsequent legislation has done away with the committee, and the question whether the writ ought in such a case to have been directed against the one body or the other can never in future arise. Your Lordships will probably agree with the Court of Ex. Ch. that this arrangement was one which ought not to be disturbed by the court, and there has been no attempt on the part of the counsel for the Mersey board (who now represent both the original defts. and the committee) to depart from the agreement. But Mr. Mellish argued that the whole scheme of the Legislature showed that the intention of the Legislature was to give to the committee an uncontrolled discretionary power to compensate such persons as in their opinion ought to be compensated, and no others. He did not say that they were to exercise this power capriciously, but quasi judicially, though without appeal; and he argued that the change of the constitution of the committee, by which one-half were to be elected by the ratepayers (though only introduced by the later Acts) rendered it less unlikely. But we do not think that such is a fair construction to be put on the enactments. It is contrary to the general rule of law, not only in this country but in every other, to make a person liable in his own cause; and, though the Legislature can, and no doubt in a proper case would, depart from that general rule, an intention to do so is not to be inferred except from much clearer enactments than any to be found in these statutes.

We have gone through these enactments, and we think your Lordships will hardly be inclined to dispose of this important case on any of the special provisions peculiar to these Acts. As we have already intimated, in our opinion, the proper rule of construction of such statutes is that, in the absence of something to show a contrary intention, the Legislature intend that the body, the creature of the statute, shall have the same duties, and render its funds subject to the same liabilities as the general law would impose on a private person doing the same things. This rule of construction was not admitted by the defts. They did not rest their case exclusively, or even mainly, on any special provisions peculiar to their own private legislation, but upon broader grounds, which, if we do not mistake them, were in effect two. They said that by the general law of this country, bodies, such as the present, are trustees for public purposes, and that being such, they are not in their corporate capacity liable to make compensation for damages sustained by individuals from the neglect of their servants and agents to perform the duties imposed on the corporation, or, at all events, that the duty of such a corporation was limited to that of exercising due care in the choice of their officers, and that if they had properly selected their officers, any evil which ensued must be the fault of the officer, and that redress for it must be sought against him alone. A great many cases were cited at your Lordships' bar as supporting this position, many of which are really not applicable to such a case as the present. Lane v. Cotton, 2 Ld. Raym. 646; Whitfield v. Le Despencer, Cow. 754 (the case of the Postmaster-General); and Nicholson v. Mounsey, 15 East, 384 (the case of the captain of the man-of-war), are authorities that where a person is a public officer in the sense that he is a servant of the Government, and as such has the management of some branch of the Government business, he is not responsible for any negligence or default of those in the same employment as himself. But these cases were decided upon the ground that the Government was the principal, and the deft. merely the servant. If an action were brought against the manager of the goods traffic of a railway company for some injury sustained by the owner of goods on their line, it would fail unless it could be shown that the particular acts which occasioned the damage were done by his orders or directions; for the action must be brought either against the principal or against the immediate actors in the wrong: (see Story on Agency, s. 313.) And all that is decided by this class of cases is that the liability of a servant of the public is no greater than that of the servant of any other principal, though the recourse against the principal, the public, cannot be by an action. The principle is the same as that on which the surveyor of the highways is not responsible to a person sustaining injury from the parish ways being out of repair, though no action can be brought against his principals the inhabitants of the parish. But the defts. in the present action are not servants of the public in that sense. For this we need do no more than refer to the recent decision of your Lordships' House in Jones v. Mersey Board, where they were held to be rateable as occupiers of the docks on the very ground that they did not occupy as servants of the public or Government. Another class of cases also cited depends upon the following principle. If the Legislature direct or authorise the doing of a particular thing, the doing of it cannot be wrongful; if damage results from the doing of that thing, it is just and proper that compensation should be made for it, and that is generally provided for in the statutes authorising the doing of such things. But no action lies for what is damnum sine injuria; the remedy is to apply for compensation

MERSEY BOARD v. GIBBS. MERSEY BOARD v. PENHALLOW.

under the provision of the statutes legalising what would otherwise be a wrong. This, however, is the case, whether the thing is authorised for a public purpose or for private profit. No action will lie against a railway company for erecting a line of railway authorised by their Acts, so long as they pursue the authority given them, any more than it would lie against the trustees of a turnpike-road for making their road under their Acts; though the one road is made for the profit of the shareholders in the company and the other is not. The principle is, that the act is not wrongful, not because it is for a public purpose, but because it is authorised by the Legislature: (see Rec v. Pearce, 4 B. & A. 36.) This, we think, is the point decided in The Governors of the British Plate Cast Plant Manufacturers v. Meredith, 4 T. R. 794; Sutton v. Clarke, 6 Taunt. 29, and several other cases, as is well explained by Williams, J. in Whitehouse v. Fellows, 10 C. B., N. S., 779; 4 L. T. Rep. N. S. 177. But though the Legislature have authorised the execution of the works, they do not thereby exempt those authorised to make them from the obligation to use reasonable care that in making them no unnecessary damage be done. In Brine v. The Great Western Railway Company, 31 L. J. 34, Q. B.; 2 B. & S. 402; 6 L. T. Rep. N. S. 50. Crompton, J. says: "The distinction is now clearly established between damage from works authorised by statutes, where the party generally is to have compensation, and the authority is a bar to an action, and damage by reason of the works having been negligently done, as to which the owner's remedy by way of action remains." This distinction is as applicable to works executed for one purpose as for another. This principle seems to have been acted upon in Leader v. Moxon, 2 H. Bl. 924, and it is to some extent recognised in Sutton v. Clark, 6 Taunt. 29, by Gibbs, C. J., who puts the judgment on the ground that the deft., in the execution of a duty imposed on him by the Legislature, had exercised his best skill, diligence, and caution in the execution of it. "We are of opinion," says Gibbs, C. J., "that he is not liable for an injury which he did not only not foresee, but could not foresee. He has done all that is incumbent on him, having used his best skill and diligence." This certainly implies, that in the opinion of those who concurred in that judgment the deft. would have been liable if he had neglected to use his best skill and diligence. In the subsequent case of Jones v. Bird, 4 B. & A. 837, Bayley, J. laid down a stricter rule. He said that the defts., who in that case were the persons actually executing a sewer, authorised by statute, were not protected merely because acting bonâ fide and to the best of their skill and judgment, "That," says he, "is not enough, they are bound to conduct themselves in a skilful manner, and the question was most properly left to the jury to say whether the defts. had done all that any skilful person could reasonably be required to do in such a case." And there is a considerable number of cases to which we shall afterwards refer, in which, on this principle, actions have been held to lie against bodies executing works under the authority of statutes for the improper mode in which their powers have been executed, though the defts. did not derive any profit from the execution of the works. There are, however, authorities that bear the other way upon this part of the case; and it is necessary to examine these authorities in order to contrast them with the others. It will be for your Lordships then to decide on which side the preponderance of authority lies. Those in favour of the deft. are Hall v. Smith, 2 Bing. 156; Duncan v. Findlater, 6 Cl. & Fin. 894; Halliday v. St. Leonard's, Shoreditch, 11 C. B., N. S., 192; and Metcalf v. Hethrington, 11 Ex. 257. It is necessary, in considering these authorities, to bear in mind the distinction between the responsibility of a person who causes something to be done which is wrongful, or fails to perform something which there was a legal obligation on him to perform, and the liability for the negligence of those who are employed in the work. This distinction is well stated in Pickard v. Smith, 10 C. B., N. S., 480; 4 L. T. Rep. N. S. 470; by Williams, J., who says: "Unquestionably no one can be made liable for any act or breach of duty, unless it be traceable to himself or his servant or servants in the course of his or their employment; consequently, if an independent contractor is employed to do a lawful act, and in the course of the work he or his servants commit some casual act of wrong or negligence, the employer is not answerable. That rule, however, is inapplicable to cases in which the act which occasions the injury is one which the contractor was employed to do; not, by a parity of reasoning, to cases in which the contractor is entrusted with the performance of a duty incumbent upon his employer, and neglects its fulfilment, whereby an injury is occasioned." "If the performance of the duty be omitted, the fact of his having entrusted it to a person who also neglected it furnishes no excuse either in good sense or law." Liability for the collateral negligence depends entirely upon the existence of the relation of master and servant, between the employer and the person actually in default, according to the well-known exposition of the law in Quarman v. Bennett, 6 M. & W. 509, where Parke, B. says: "Upon the principle that qui facit per alium facit per se, the master is responsible for the acts of his servant; and that person is undoubtedly liable who stood in the relation of master to the wrong-doer, he who had selected him as his servant from the knowledge of or belief in his skill and care, and who could remove him for misconduct, and whose orders he was bound to receive and obey; and whether such servant has been appointed by the master directly or immediately through the intervention of an agent authorised by him to appoint servants for him, or make no difference. But the liability by virtue of the principle of relation of master and servant must cease where the relation itself ceases to exist." In such a case as the present, the liability does not depend on that relation. Liability for doing an improper act depends upon the order given to do that thing; and the liability for an omission to do something depends entirely on the extent to which a duty is imposed to cause that thing to be done; and in the last two cases it is quite immaterial whether the actual actors are servants or not. Now, in Hall v. Smith, 2 Bing. 156, the action was brought against the commissioners for paving Birmingham (sued by their clerk), Norton, a surveyor, and Kimberley, a contractor, employed by them to make a sewer, for leaving a quantity of rubbish unguarded and unlighted, whereby the plt. was thrown down and injured. The commissioners were authorised by an Act of Parliament to order the making of the sewer. "No negligence," says Best, C. J., "was imputed to the commissioners themselves: they had ordered the tunnel to be made, and left the making of it to the defts. Norton and Kimberley, the former of whom was the surveyor and the latter the undertaker of the work. The accident happened to the plt. from these persons not putting up rails, and not having lights during the night." The close of his judgment is that "no action can be maintained against a man acting gratuitously for the public for the consequence of any act which he is authorised to do, and which, so far as he is concerned, is done with due care and attention; and that such a person is not answerable for the negligent execution of an order properly given." This, no doubt, is true: but it would be equally true if the defts., instead of being a body acting gratuitously for the public, had been a body like a railway company authorised to make the tunnel for their own profit. No action could have lain against them unless they stood in the relation of master to the parties actually guilty of negligence. This was not noticed by Best, C.J., as is pointed out in Scott v. Mayor of Manchester, 1 H. & N. There, Alderson, B. says, "Hall v. Smith goes too far—the person who selects the workmen is the party liable. Commissioners may get rid of liability by making contracts, but if they employ their own servants to do the work, they will be liable for the acts of such servants." But, he adds, "Hall v. Smith was rightly decided upon the facts." But though what Best, C.J. said in Hall v. Smith was irrelevant, and therefore of less weight, still, his opinion is an authority in favour of the defts. It is, however, based upon a ground quite inapplicable to the present, or indeed to any modern case. He points out clearly and forcibly that it is harsh and impolitic to cast on individuals, gratuitously, a public duty, and make them responsible out of their private means for the non-fulfilment of it. But for many years it has been the practice of the Legislature to exempt the private means of commissioners from liability, either, as in the present series of Acts, by incorporating them, or by enabling them to sue and be sued in the name of a clerk, and restricting the execution to the property which they hold as commissioners. The basis of Best, C.J.'s reasoning fails, and debile fundamentum fallit opus. Duncan v. Findlater, 6 Cl. & Fin. 894, was a Scotch appeal brought before the House of Lords on a bill of exceptions. The action was against the trustees of a turnpike-road, to recover damages for an injury sustained by the plt. from falling over a heap of stones negligently left on the road. It was stated on the bill of exceptions that the trustees had given directions, through their surveyor, that a drain should be filled up, and that the workmen engaged in filling up the drain left negligently the stones in the road. Assuming that the law of Scotland and of England are the same, it is clear that no one could be answerable for this sort of negligence unless he stood to those who actually were guilty of the negligence in the relation of master and servant. The Judge who presided at the trial took a different view of the law of Scotland, and directed the jury "that road trustees on a public road are liable for any injury which may happen to passengers, in consequence of the negligence or improper conduct of labourers or surveyors, or other persons employed by the trustees, or by the officers of the trustees, when engaged in any operation performed under the authority of the trustees." And to this direction there was an exception. If the body authorising the operation had been a railway company or a private individual, instead of being trustees of a turnpike-road, this direction would, according to English law, have been wrong; and this is pointed out by Lord Brougham, who says: "The rule of liability and its reason I take to be this—I am liable for what is done by me and under my orders by the man I employ, for I may turn him off from that employ when I please. And the reason I am liable is this, that by employing him I set the whole thing in motion, and what he does, being done for my benefit, and under my direction, I am responsible for the consequences of doing it." Language which is very similar to that already cited from Quarman v. Barnett. But though all that really was decided in that case was that the trustees were not liable for the negligence of persons in their employment who were not shown to be their servants, it is not to be disputed that Lord Cottenham's language goes a great deal further, and shows that, in his opinion, persons incorporated for the purpose of executing works could never in their official or corporate capacity be liable to damages at all, the remedy for any wrong or neglect being only against the individual corporators for their individual wrong or neglect. His reasoning on this point is: "If the thing done is within the statute, it is clear that no compensation can be afforded for any damage sustained thereby, except so far as the statute itself has provided it. And this is clear on the legal presumption that the act creating the damage, being within the statute, must be a lawful act. On the other hand, if the thing done is not within the statute, either from the party doing it having exceeded the powers conferred on him by statute, or from the manner in which he has thought fit to perform the work, why should the public fund be liable to make good his private error or misconduct." Lord Cottenham is there speaking of a body of trustees acting under the Scotch Turnpike Act, but his reasoning in general. And the dilemma, if a good one, is applicable to all cases. This is, no doubt, a very high authority, being said by the L. C. in the H. of L., though in a Scotch case, but not being the point decided by the House, it is not conclusively binding, and we think that, with great deference to his high authority, we must dissent from the position there laid down, both on principle and on the preponderance of authority. It is pointed out by Lord Campbell, in Southampton and Itchin Bridge Company v. Southampton Local Board of Health, 8 Ell. & Bl., that in every case the liability of a body created by statute must be determined upon a true interpretation of the statute under which it is created. And if the true interpretation of the statutes is, that a duty is cast upon the incorporated body, not only to make the works authorised, but also to take proper care, and use reasonable skill, that the works are such as the statute authorises, or, as in the present case, to take reasonable care that they are in a fit state for the use of the public who use them, there is, with great deference to Lord Cottenham, nothing illogical or inconsistent in holding that those injured by the neglect of the statutable body to fulfil the duty thus cast by the statute upon it, may maintain an action against that body, and be indemnified out of the funds vested in it by the statute. Accordingly the Court of Q. B., in Ward v. Lee, 7 Ell. & Bl. 426, and the Court of C. P. in Clothier v. Webster, 12 C. B., N. S., 798; 6 L. T. Rep. N. S. 461, have expressed an opinion that an action lay against a local board of health in its corporate capacity, for an injury sustained from making improper works. And in The Southampton and Itchin Bridge Company v. Southampton Local Board, the point was expressly decided. And this decision was followed and approved of by the Court of Ex., in Ruck v. Williams, 3 Hurl. & Nor. 308, where it was held that an action would lie against the improvement commissioners of Cheltenham (sued by their clerk) for the improper mode in which they caused a sewer to be made. And Bramwell, B. forcibly observed: "I can well understand if a person undertakes the office or duty of a commissioner, and there are no means of indemnifying him against the consequences of a slip, it is reasonable to hold that he should not be responsible for it. I can also understand that if one of several commissioners does something not within the scope of his authority, the commissioners as a body are not liable; but where commissioners, who are a quasi corporate body, are not affected (i. e. personally) by the result of an action, inasmuch as they are authorised by Act of Parliament to raise a fund for payment of the damages, on what principle is it that if an individual member of the public suffers from an act bona fide but erroneously done, he is not to be compensated? It seems to me inconsistent with actual justice, and not warranted by any principle of law." In Whitehouse v. Fellows, 10 C. B., N. S., 765, the Court of C. P. decided that an action lay against the trustees of a turnpike-road sued in their quasi corporate capacity by their clerk, for negligence in the manner in which they had caused drains to be made. This decision it is hardly necessary to point out, though quite consistent with all that was decided by the H. of L. in Duncan v. Findlater, is directly opposed to the opinion of Lord Cottenham. And lastly, in Brownlow v. Metropolitan Board, 13 C. B., N. S., 768; 6 L. T. Rep. N. S. 187, it was decided that an action lay against the Metropolitan Board for the injury sustained by a shipowner for the improper construction of a sewer in the bed of the Thames. And this decision was affirmed by the Court of Ex. Ch. (16 C. B., N. S., 546). It must rest with your Lordships to say whether those decisions to which we have referred are to be overruled. We think they are not consistent with Lord Cottenham's opinion. Before leaving this part of the subject we ought to call your Lordships' attention more particularly to the case of Holliday v. St. Leonard's, Shoreditch, 11 C. B., N. S., 192; 4 L. T. Rep. N. S. 406. The point actually decided there was, that there is an exception from the general law making a master liable for the negligence of his servant, where the servant is employed by a public body. The Court of C. P. did not intend to decide anything inconsistent with the decisions of the Court of Ex. Ch. now at your Lordships' bar, or with their own decision in Whitehouse v. Fellows, 10 C. B., N. S., 765. And the point which they did decide does not arise in the present case, so that it is unnecessary directly to decide anything upon it. But we think that we ought to call your Lordships' attention to the case, as much of what was said in the course of the judgment by Erle, L. C. J. is based upon the opinion of Lord Cottenham in Duncan v. Findlater, and is therefore an authority making against the view we have submitted to your Lordships. There remains only one further point to consider. The Acts under which the Liverpool Docks have been made contain, as has been already mentioned, clauses enabling the trustees of the docks to appoint water-bailiffs and harbour-masters, and confers on those officers powers of regulating the manner in which vessels shall enter the docks, &c. It was argued that the effect of these clauses was to confine the duty of the trustees to that of selecting proper officers, and they could not be responsible further. The case of Metcalf v. Hethrington, 11 Ex. Rep. 257, was cited as an authority for this position, and we think it is a decision much in point. The Court of Ex. there, in construing the Maryport Harbour Act, attributed this effect to enactments not very dissimilar to those now in question, and we agree, if this was so, the consequence would follow that the plts.' remedy would be, not against those who appointed the officer, but only against the officer himself. But we cannot agree in so construing the present Acts. As has been already pointed out, clauses almost identical with those now in question are inserted in every Harbour and Dock Act, whether the docks be, as in the present case, the property of public commissioners or of a trading company. And we cannot think that it was the intention of the Legislature to deprive a shipowner who pays dues to a wealthy trading company, such as the St. Catherine's Dock Company, for instance, of all recourse against them, and to substitute the personal liability of a harbour-master, no doubt a respectable person in his way, but whose whole means, generally speaking, would not be equal to more than a very small percentage of the damages, when there are any. If these enactments are in the present case so construed as to relieve the Mersey Board from liability, the corresponding enactments in the Harbours, Piers, and Docks Clauses Act 1847, must also be so construed as to relieve all trading dock companies from liability, and that we think a reductio ad absurdum. This was not brought to the notice of the Court of Ex. when deciding Metcalf v. Hethrington. With greatest respect for those who joined in that decision, we think it was erroneous. For these reasons, we answer both your Lordships' questions in each of these cases in the affirmative, that is, in favour of the plts. below, the resps. in error.

(Cur. adr. vult.)

The LORD CHANCELLOR.—My Lords, these are two appeals depending very much on the same principles as those which led to the decision of your Lordships' House last year in the case of the Mersey Docks and Harbour Board v. Cameron. The question there was whether the trustees of the docks and harbour, who are a body having no beneficial interest in the tolls and other produce of the docks, were rateable to the relief of the poor. The argument was that, as a public body not receiving toll for their own benefit, they were not liable; but your Lordships, after a long argument, decided that they were. The question in the present two cases is different. Both cases arise out of the one transaction. A ship called the Sierra Nevada, in entering, or endeavouring to enter, one of the docks, sustained an injury by reason of a bank of mud left negligently at its entrance. The ship and the cargo were damaged. Two actions were brought against the apps., one by Gibbs, as owner of the cargo, the other by Penhallow, as owner of the ship. I do not think it necessary to go through the pleadings. In both cases the Ex. Ch. held that the apps. were liable. In both cases they have appealed, and the ground of appeal is that they are not a public company, deriving benefit, like a railway, from the traffic, but a public body of trustees constituted by the Legislature for the purpose of maintaining the docks, and for that purpose having authority to collect tolls to be applied in the maintenance and repair of the docks, then in paying off a large debt, and ultimately in reducing the tolls for the benefit of the public. In the case of Gibbs it must be taken as admitted by the apps. that, knowing that the dock was, by reason of an accumulation of mud therein, in an unfit state to be navigated, they did not take reasonable care to put the same into a fit state for that purpose, whereupon the Sierra Nevada, in endeavouring to enter into the dock, struck against the mud, and the cargo thereby became damaged. In the other case, which did not arise upon a demurrer, it must be taken as an established fact that the apps. had, by their servants, the means of knowing the dangerous state of the dock, but were negligently ignorant of it. It is plain that if the apps. are liable in the former case, they must be liable also in the latter. If the knowledge of the existence of the mud-bank made them responsible for the consequences of not causing it to be removed, they must equally be responsible if it was only through their culpable negligence that its existence was not known to them. The principles, therefore, which are to regulate the judgment of the House in the one case, must also decide it in the other. And the question therefore, is, what are the principles which regulate the liabilities of such a body as that of the Mersey Docks and Harbour Board? Where such a body is constituted by statute having the right to levy tolls for their own profit in consideration of their making and maintaining a dock or a canal, there is no doubt of their liability to make good to the persons using it any damage occasioned by their neglect in not keeping the works in proper repair. This was decided by the Court of Q. B., and their decision was affirmed in the Court of ror, in the case of Parnaby v. The Lancaster Canal Company, 11 Ad. & El. 223. The ground on which a Court of Error rested their decision in that case stated by Tindal, C. J. to have been that the company made the canal for their profit and opened to the public upon the payment of tolls. And the common law in such a case imposes a duty upon the proprietors to take reasonable care, so long as they keep it open for the public use of all who may choose to navigate it, that they may do so without danger to their lives or property. The only difference between that case and those now standing for decision by your Lordships is, that here the apps., to whom the docks are vested, do not collect tolls for their own profit, but merely as trustees for the benefit of the public. I do not, however, think that this makes any difference in principle in respect to their liability. It would be a strange distinction to persons coming with their ships to different ports of this country that in some ports, if they sustain damage by the negligence of those who have the management of the docks, they will be entitled to compensation, and in others they will not, such a distinction arising not from any visible difference in the docks themselves, but from some municipal difference in the constitution of the bodies by whom the docks are managed. It is impossible to argue, after the decision of this House in the case of the Mersey Docks and Harbour Board v. Cameron, that the apps. are not in the occupation of the docks. They are as much the occupiers of them as if they received the tolls and dues for their own use and benefit. The principle of that decision, coupled with that of Parnaby v. The Lancaster Canal Company, must govern this case. The apps. are the occupiers of the docks, entitled to levy tolls from those who use them and are liable to the same responsibilities as would attach on them if they were the absolute owners, occupying and using them for their own profit. It cannot be denied that there have been dicta, and perhaps decisions, not capable of being reconciled with the result at which I have arrived. But the whole series of authorities have been so fully brought under review in the very able and elaborate opinion of the learned judges delivered by Blackburn, J. in answer to the questions put to them by your Lordships, that I do not feel myself called on to do more than to express my concurrence in that opinion. I content myself, therefore, with moving your Lordships to give judgment in both cases for the debts in question.

Lord WENSLEYDALE.—My Lords, the Court of Ex. Ch. in both these cases founded their judgment on that of the Ex. Ch. in the case of Lancaster Canal Company v. Parnaby, 11 Ad. & Ell. 330, in which case there was a company incorporated by Act of Parliament for the purpose of maintaining a canal to be open for the use of the public on payment of rates which the canal company might receive for their own benefit (that is, the profit to be divided amongst the shareholders), and the court held that the common law imposes a duty on the proprietors not perhaps to repair the canal or absolutely to free it from obstructions; but to take reasonable care, so long as they kept it open for the use of all that might navigate it, that they might navigate it without damage to their lives or property. Of the propriety of this decision there could be no doubt where the profits were received for the benefit of the company. In the present case the dock board do not receive the rates for their own use, but to be applied to great public purposes for the benefit of all the subjects of the realm, that is, to maintain the docks for the use of any who choose to frequent and pay the debt incurred in their construction; and the court decided that there was no difference between that case and the present. If this question were res integra not settled by the authority of decisions, I am strongly inclined to think that this decision of the courts could not be supported. It would appear to me that this case falls within the principle of those cases which have decided that when a person is acting as a public officer on behalf of Government, and has the management of some branch of the Government business, he is not responsible for the neglect or misconduct of servants, though appointed by himself in the same business. This was the principle of decision in Lane v. Cotton, 2 Ld. Raym. 646, and Whitfield v. Le Despencer, Cow. 754, and other cases. The subordinates are the servants of the public, not of the person or persons who have the superintendence of that department even if appointed by them. Thus the Postmaster-General, who has the management of one department of the public service, the duly receiving, and conveying and delivering of letters from and to different places, which is eminently beneficial to the whole community and causes profit to the Government, is not responsible for any of the servants of the Post-office department, though he might appoint or dismiss them, and whether the Postmaster-General be an individual, as he is now, or two, as in the case of Whitfield v. Lord Le Despencer, or if more, however numerous, or the Crown were to make a corporate body for the regulation and government of the Post-office, neither individuals nor a corporate body would be responsible for the neglect of their servants. In this case, if there had been a postmaster-general for all the ports of England to take care that the receipt and discharge of goods, and the repairs of ships should be easy and convenient, and the receipt of Custom duties convenient, or suppose his duties to be limited to a certain number of ports; or suppose a corporation were appointed instead of an individual, would it cause that corporation to be responsible for the defects of its officers by whom alone they act in the management of the docks, and in the due discharge of its duties towards the public, on whose behalf it was acting? If we had now only to review a great number of cases connected with this subject decided in different courts, many contradictory and many very unsatisfactory, I should be disposed to abide by the decision of the case of Metcalf v. Hethrington, 11 Ex. Rep. 257, where the trustees and managers of the harbour were held not to be responsible for the defaults of the persons actually employed in conducting the business of the harbour. If this case depended only on the decision of the courts below I should feel great difficulty indeed in supporting the decision of the Court of Ex Ch. But I cannot help thinking that the decisions of your Lordships' House, which are no doubt binding upon your Lordships and all inferior tribunals, have gone so far that they have concluded the question, and ought to be considered as deciding that the apps. are responsible. In the case of the Mersey Docks and Harbour Board Trustees v. Cameron, and Jones v. Mersey Docks and Harbour Board Trustees in July 1864 (11 H. of L. Cas. 444), your Lordships, upon a full review and consideration, after a difference of opinion between the consulted judges, decided that the apps., the Mersey Dock and Harbour Board, were liable to be rated as occupiers though they occupied those docks for the purposes of those who frequented the port and derived no benefit from the occupation, and that they did not occupy for public purposes in such a sense as to exempt them from liability to poor-rates. It seems to follow, therefore, that they were not considered as being on the same footing as occupiers of public buildings for the Post-office or other Government purposes, but were liable as mere private individuals, and if so, it is difficult to say that they were acting on behalf of the public benefit, and therefore were irresponsible for the neglect and defaults of their servants, by whom alone they could act. Whether they were acting for the benefit of the public or not seems to be decided by that case. As we are bound by your Lordships' decision, the opinion of the learned judges delivered by Blackburn, J. must be considered as correct, and therefore ought to be affirmed.

Lord Wensleydale.—My Lords, I entirely concur in the conclusion derived from the authorities, and from the principles of law laid down in the very able opinion delivered to your Lordships by Blackburn, J. I concur also in the observation of my noble and learned friend on the weakness, and that judgment ought to be given for the debt in error. But I think it desirable to say a few words with reference to the difficulty felt by the learned judges in consequence of certain observations that fell from Cottenham, L. C., and which are reported in the case of Dunlop v. Finlader, 6 Cl. & Fin. I can well divine what was at that time passing in the mind of my Lord Cottenham. My Lord Cottenham seems to have thought that if a corporation be trustees of property for the direct benefit of certain individuals and there is no other corporate property; and if in their capacity as trustees an act is done by order of the corporation which amounts to a tort or trespass and gives a right of action and a right to damages to any private individual, a court of equity would not permit an execution to issue on any judgment that might be recovered against the property of the corporation, seeing that it is property held upon trust for certain beneficiaries, and that the corporation as trustees have no interest therein. But, my Lords, I apprehend that was a misapprehension on the part of the noble and learned lord, and that it would lead to very mischievous consequences. It is by no means true that a court of equity is able to protect the property of beneficiaries against the act of trustees. If trustees alienate property for valuable consideration to a person who pays that consideration without notice of the trust, the interest of the beneficiaries suffers from that act, and it would be a very unreasonable and a very mischievous thing if, in the case of a corporation dealing with the public or with individuals, such corporation should, by any act of theirs in respect of property committed to their care, give a right of action to individuals, that such individuals should be deprived of the ordinary right of resorting for a remedy against the body doing or authorising those acts, and should be driven to seek a remedy against the individual corporators whose decision or order in the name of the corporation may have led to the mischief complained of. It is much more reasonable in such a case that the trust or corporate property should be amenable to the individuals injured, because there is then no failure of justice, seeing that the beneficiary will always have his right of complaint and his title to relief against the individual corporators who have wrongfully used the name of the corporation. My Lords, the learned judges observed—and with very great correctness—that it is not everything that falls from a noble and learned lord in advising the House, which is to be considered as the opinion of the House. Those observations of Lord Cottenham, which directly tend to this conclusion, that the corporation in the case supposed would not be amenable, nor would the corporate property be liable, but that the party injured would be obliged to have resort to the individual members who directed the act to be done, would, if they were recognised as the law, undoubtedly lead to great evil and injury. My Lords, I cannot observations to the case of a remedy sought wrongful act, because you are very well aware the rule has been well established that if, in the case of a contract entered into with a corporation, by Act of Parliament, the contract is made corporation vis-à-vis of the corporation, the corporation may not be entitled to recover under that contract. That may be a very convenient rule, and it is not all affected by the considerations we are now with. But with regard to the observations attributed to the noble and learned Lord Chancellor (I mean, I conceive that they ought not to be regarded as establishing any rule that at all interferes with the decision at which your Lordships have arrived in the case now before you. With regard to what has been suggested by my noble and learned friend (Lord Wensleydale), that it would be a more correct principle to hold public debtors not to be answerable for inferior servants, that is quite correct where an officer, fulfilling a duty, is directly appointed by the Crown, acting as the servant of the Crown; but its application to the case of trustees incorporated for the purpose of public works, and standing in relation to the public in the way these trustees stand in the present case. I concur, therefore, in the opinion of my noble and learned friend.

COURT OF COMMON PLEAS.

Reported by W. MATE and W. GRAMER, Esqs.
Barristers-at-Law.

May 31, June 2 and 4, 1866.

GRILL v. THE GENERAL IRON SCREW COLLECTOR COMPANY (LIMITED).

Carriers by water—Bill of lading—Receipted by Barratry—17 & 18 Vict. c. 104, s. 296—Negligence of ship's crew—"Gross" negligence—Crew's negligence—Fruits of the sea—Disposition under a commission—Irregularity.

In an action on a bill of lading by the shipper against the shipowner it appeared that the bill which the defts. ship was totally lost, was on the persons in charge of defts. ship negligently boarding their helm when they ought, according to rules laid down in sect. 296 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1854 (17 & 18 Vict. c. 104), to have put a person on board the ship at the time of the loss was called, but by sect. 299 of that Act it is that, in case damage to property arises from negligence by any ship of any of the said rules damage shall be deemed to have been occasioned by wilful default of the person in charge of the such ship. The bill of lading accepted, upon peril, barratry of the master and mariners, and damage of the sea, of whatever kind or source:

Held, first, that to constitute barratry there was an unlawful act wilfully done, and that the wilful default in the statute did not make this a rule for all purposes, but was only used for the purpose of expressing that the ship was in fault, and the person in charge of the deck must explain his

Secondly, that the loss having been brought about by negligence of the defts., it was not within the peril of the sea in the bill of lading:

GRILL v. THE GENERAL IRON SCREW COLLIER COMPANY (LIMITED).

that there is no difference between "gross" and "negligence, and that "gross" is only used as opinion, and not as a definition:

that it was only necessary for the plt. to show that was caused by the negligence of the defts., and was not of ordinary care on the part of a ship, and that he was not obliged to go and negative the fact that if the other ship was something which she was not bound to do, it was not wrong in not doing, the loss would not be covered.

was made to examine witnesses on behalf of on interrogatories which were sent out, and the cross-interrogatories, but the gentleman who sent the plt. and defts. examined the witnesses as:

as if this was an irregularity on application he made to quash the depositions, and that it is late to object to them at the trial.

but there was no irregularity.

was an action on a bill of lading by the plt., sent, at Messina, Sicily, against the owners of the steamship Black Prince, to recover the value of goods lost in that vessel in consequence of collision between her and the steamship Arazas of St. Vincent.

declaration was on the bill of lading, and set excepted perils, which were, "the act of Queen's enemies, pirates, robbers, thieves, or master or mariners, restraint of princes, fire, accident or damage from machinery, steam, or from other goods by contact, leakage, or otherwise, and accidents or of the seas, rivers, and steam navigation, of whatever nature or kindsoever." The declaration averred that the defts. did not safely or properly carry and deliver the goods, but took such improper care of their steam-vessel, and did and directed and managed the same in an unsafe, negligent, and improper manner, that through the gross carelessness, &c. of the crew their servants and mariners in that and not otherwise, the said steam-vessel was forced and violence ran foul of and struck a certain other steam-vessel, to wit the Arazas, whereby the plt.'s goods were sunk and wholly lost to the plt.

1.—1. A traverse of the bailment. 2. Not 3. That the defts. were prevented from carrying and delivering the goods agreeably to the bill of lading which they received the same by the defts. perils.

defendants, taking issue, and to the third plea, supposed excepted perils in the plea mentioned wholly of the collision in the collision mentioned, and that the collision arose wholly caused, and the said supposed perils caused by and through the gross carelessness, the defts. by their servants and mariners in collision and not otherwise, and that the defts. were prevented from carrying the goods by the collision, or any of them, further or otherwise the replication mentioned.

other pleadings are not material to the question on this rule.

a trial before Erie, C. J., at the sittings after Term in London, it appeared that the goods were shipped by the plt. at Messina on the defts.' vessel the Black Prince, in October the vessel proceeded on her voyage. Two witnesses were called who were on board the Arazas at the collision, and stated that on the 8th Nov. a light, which turned out to be the Black Prince, was seen right ahead, and about four or five miles off; that the helm of the Arazas was ported and the light brought about three points on the port bow. Shortly afterwards the light was seen close on the Arazas, and orders were given to port the helm and stop the engines of that ship, which were done, and almost immediately afterwards the collision took place, the port bow of the Arazas striking the starboard beam of the Black Prince, and the Black Prince went down. No witnesses were called who were on board the Black Prince, but it was clear from the evidence that she must have starboarded her helm when she ought to have ported. Both the Arazas and the Black Prince were English ships, and the latter was owned by the defts.

Erie, C. J. told the jury that if they were of opinion that the Black Prince was sunk by reason of negligence on the part of the crew bringing about a collision with the Arazas, and that the Arazas could not by reasonable care have avoided that collision they would find for the plt., and that the plt. was bound to prove that there was no want of ordinary care in the management of the Arazas, by the exercise of which the collision would have been avoided. The jury found a verdict for the plt. for £1220.

In the course of the trial it was proposed to put in evidence, and his Lordship admitted, certain depositions taken at Messina by virtue of a commission. The judge's order was an order to examine on interrogatories, and the commissioner was commanded to examine on interrogatories and voir dire witnesses for the plt., the plt. to be at liberty to examine on interrogatories, and to put additional questions voir dire, with liberty to the defts. to cross-examine upon cross-interrogatories and additional voir dire questions. Interrogatories were sent out, and the defts. did not join in the commission, but sent out cross-interrogatories. At the examination both the plt. and defts. were represented, and the gentleman who appeared for the plt. put questions to the witnesses, but did not use the interrogatories, and the gentleman who appeared for the defts. and was not a lawyer cross-examined, and one of the witnesses named was not called.

E. James, Q. C. in Easter Term obtained a rule calling on the plt. to show cause why the verdict should not be set aside and a verdict entered for the defts. pursuant to leave reserved, on the ground that the conduct of persons in charge of the defts.' ship brought the case within the exception of barratry in the bill of lading, or why there should not be a new trial on the ground that the judge ought to have told the jury that the loss was caused by peril of the seas within the bill of lading, and also that he ought to have left to the jury whether the loss was caused by gross negligence; also, whether the loss might not have been avoided by care on the part of those on board the Arazas, and on the ground of the misdirection of the depositions taken at Messina, or why judgment should not be stayed on the ground that matters set forth in the replication to the third plea do not take the case out of the protection given to the defts. by the bill of lading. Against this rule

The Solicitor-General (Collier), Hannen, and Cohen now showed cause.—The first ground is that the acts of negligence proved amounted to barratry, and my friend relies on sects. 296, 297, 298, and 299 of the 17 & 18 Vict. c. 104. This case has already been considered in The General Iron Screw Collier Company v. Moss, 15 Moo. P. C. C. 132; 4 L. T. Rep. N. 8. 188. The contention on the other side is, that the words "wilful default" in sect. 299 make this barratry. If it was with the intention to defraud the owners it would be; but the essence of all crimes is the intention. This point was taken in the Admiralty Court and overruled:

C. P.] GRILL v. THE GENERAL IRON SKEW COLLIER COMPANY (LIMITED).

The Seine, Swab. Adm. Rep. 411;

The Druid, 1 W. Rob. Adm. Rep. 391.

In 2 Arnould on Marine Insurance, 3rd ed. 712, it is said that "barratry, in the English law, may be said to comprehend not only every species of fraud and knavery covinously committed by the master with the intention of benefiting himself at the expense of his owners, but every wilful act on his part of known illegality, gross malversation, or criminal negligence, by whatever motive induced, whereby the owners or charterers of the ship (in cases where the latter are considered owners pro tempore) are in fact damaged." Phyn v. The Royal Exchange Insurance Company, 7 T. R. 506; Earle v. Rowcroft, 8 East, 126, may be relied on by the other side, and the effect of the decision there is, that there may be barratry without an express intention to injure the owners; but there the captain did an illegal act, and did it against his better judgment and in breach of implied orders from the owners, though for their benefit. In Tuff v. Warrum, 1 C. B., N. S., 740, though the precise point was not raised, there is a construction of the statute excluding the contention of the other side:

Morrison v. The General Steam Navigation Company, 8 Ex. 722;

Buller v. Dixon, 8 M. & W. 306.

A wilful default must be shown on the part of a person who knows it to be wrong; it must, in fact, be shown to be a crime, or it is not barratry:

2 Parsons on Maritime Law, 239;

Todd v. Richie, 1 Stark. 240.

There must be a wrongful intention on the part of the master; a deviation is not barratry, because it is not done with a wrongful intention:

Phyn v. The Royal Exchange Insurance Company, 1 Pritch. Adm. Dig. 147;

Wright v. Pickford, 8 M. & W. 448.

It does not follow that, because an act is by statute made wilful for a particular purpose, it is so for every purpose. It is reasonable that when a statute provision is broken the owner should be liable, and the words "wilful default" are put in for that purpose, but not for any other, and all the cases show that there cannot be barratry if the owner would be liable, but there must be such a breach of trust that the owners would not be liable: (The Ida, 1 Lush. 6.) The second point, that the loss was caused by peril of the sea, has been already decided in Lloyd v. The General Iron Srew Collier Company, 8 H. & C. 284; 10 L. T. Rep. N. S. 586, which was a case arising out of this very collision, and the pleadings are identical. [WILLES, J.—The Court of Ex. does not seem to have been aware that this court had decided the point above eleven years before: Phillips v. Clark, 3 C. B., N. S., 156.]

Jones v. Picher, 3 Stewart & Porter, 125 (American); Dakin v. Ooley, 33 L. J. 115, Q. P.; 10 L. T. Rep. N. S. 268.

The next point is, that the judge ought to have asked the jury if the loss was caused by gross negligence, but it has been held in many cases that there is no difference between negligence and gross negligence: (Wilson v. Brett, 11 M. & W. 113, per Rolfe, B. at p. 115.) [WILLES, J.—That was considered in Beale v. The South Devon Railway Company, 8 H. & C. 337; 3 L. T. Rep. N. S. 665. KILN, C. J.—I have no doubt I thought it my duty not to use a word to which I cannot attach any distinct meaning.] Then it is said that the interrogatories were not put, but the defts.' agent cross-examined the witnesses. [WILLES, J.—If no application was made to quash the depositions, they cannot object to them at the trial.] No, I submit that they cannot, and the questions were only to prove that the goods were put on board.

E. James, Q. C., Karstain, Q. C., and Sir was in support of the rule.—This is difficult an action by one shipowner against another in collision; this is an action on a contract question is what are the rights of the party that contract. Even a common carrier his legal position by entering into a special contract. (Curry v. The Lancashire and Yorkshire Railway, 7 Ex. 707.) Here the contract is to make responsible, barring certain things. To make barratry no intent to damage need be shown, the act is wilfully and deliberately done. The master had implied instructions to obey the Parliament, and he has not done so, as if that he must have starboarded his helm. A wilful violation of the law by which the loss is fact damaged:

Hayman v. Parish, 2 Camp. 148;

8 Kent. Com. 304.

In Phyn v. The Royal Exchange Insurance Company the deviation was not a violation of the law, it is purely a question of contract, and the law may limit his liability:

Austin v. The Manchester, Sheffield, and Lincolnshire Railway Company, 10 C. B. 464;

Great Northern Railway Company v. Illingworth, L. J. 319, Q. B.;

Smith's Law of Master and Servant, 131;

Hunney v. Field, 2 C. M. & R. 482.

The case of Lloyd v. The General Iron Srew Collier Company does not apply, as that was a deviation question in this case is, not as to the collision but whether, if there had been greater care on part of the Araxes, it would not have so soon the blow as not to have sent the Black Prince bottom. The loss is not caused by the collision alone, but by the violence of the collision the jury have found that the Araxes could ordinary care have avoided the collision; but consistent with that that they could have prevented the damage to the goods. Then as to the interrogatories, in sending a commission out it is important to know if the examination is to be by or by interrogatories, as, if the former necessary to send some one out who knows the thing of legal proceedings. In some cases the witnesses do not exactly answer a question necessary to put another, and therefore generally power in the commission to examine cross. This examination was not according to terms of the commission, as the commission did not put the cross-interrogatories. The commission did not the agent of the parties to dispense with was ordered by the commission. They did not WILLES, J.—I am of opinion that this rule be discharged. With respect to the affidavits the depositions, I should regret if it turns any objection going merely to the irregularity the proceedings, and not to the merits, taken; but in this case I am not satisfied irregularity has taken place. The commission exists in this, that whereas the commission obtained by the plaintiff for an examination interrogatories of witnesses on his behalf and whereas the defendants, through not submitting cross-interrogatories

P.] GRILL v. THE GENERAL IRON SCREW COLLIER COMPANY (LIMITED).

o those witnesses, one of those witnesses, whose name it is stated would have been important, was called, whereby the cross-interrogatories were put to him; and that in respect of others of the cases who were called the written interrogatories were read and furnished by the defts. were not asked; and that the examination of some of the depositions consisted only of a series of questions put by Mr. Talavera, who was instructed to attend the examination on the part of the defts., and who got answers to the cross-interrogatories. The court was asked in vain to have pointed out any matters to the benefit of the defts. that were not put forward by the gentleman who represented them, and the fact that they cannot be pointed out shows that, for all practical purposes, the cross-interrogatories, the substance of them, were administered, though in a written form, to the witnesses called, and the defts. have really suffered no detriment whatever. This objection, therefore, has no solid foundation, and only amounts to this, that the questions were put by word of mouth instead of being read from written paper, and that being so, I think my Lord is right in allowing the depositions to be received in evidence. If it be any satisfaction to the defts., I would desire to say that, having read the examination by this gentleman, I cannot agree that he needed any want of either mercantile or legal assistance. Now we have to discuss the really important questions in the case. The first of them which was reserved is, whether the loss which took place under the circumstances of this case was a loss in respect of which the defts., as shipowners, were liable but for the exemption in the bill of lading which has been answerable to the plt. as a shipper, yet which falls within the exceptions in the bill of lading, as being a loss caused by a barratry, or by the perils of the sea. And first with reference to whether it was a loss by barratry. For the purpose of deciding that question, of course it is necessary for the court to be satisfied whether a barratrous act appeared on the evidence, and that a reasonable conclusion from the evidence was that the act by which the loss took place was something barratrous on the part of those on board the Araxes. The Araxes appears to have been running on her right course; there is no proof of negligence whatever on her part. She appears to have been off on her starboard bow. Her helm was ordered so as to bring the Black Prince on her port side, and in that position they remain till shortly after the collision; the collision being that the Araxes ran into the Black Prince on her starboard about midships, whereupon the Black Prince sank, the goods on board of her belonging to the plt. were entirely lost. It must be admitted that the proper conduct of the parties was, that while the Araxes was right in porting her helm, the Black Prince must at some period have starboarded her helm. There being no circumstances shown to justify a departure from the rule which requires vessels to port their helms, necessarily, the Black Prince, or those on board of her, were in fault. I do not follow what was the extent of that fault. The amount of negligence might be set down such as would make the owners liable, at any rate, for an amount of negligence up to an act of misfeasance, even an act of malfeasance, so as in the latter to surpass negligence altogether. The evidence appears to have come from the people on board the Araxes, and no evidence was given by people on board the Black Prince. There was no evidence in any way of whether what was done was done wilfully or only by default. Under these circumstances, apart from the statute, it would hardly be added, I suppose, on the part of the defts. that there was a proof of barratry, barratry consisting of something done in fraud of the owners. It is not like the case referred to in the argument, in which it has been held that the master, by using the vessel in smuggling, or for some other unlawful purpose, without leave of the owner, although he intended that the owner should have the benefit of the adventure, was guilty of barratry. Those cases do not at all prove the propriety of the definition contended for, for this simple reason, because nobody has a right to risk the property of another in wilfully doing an unlawful act without his leave, whether his intention be to benefit him or not. It is that sort of intention one sometimes hears of in a case of forgery. A person puts another's name to a bill, and on the part of the prisoner it is urged that he had large expectations of money from some one, and was sure to have the money in his pocket so as to take up the bill, and intended to do so. The answer to which is, that he had no right to incur the risk of his being in funds, and had no right to put his good intentions against the peril to which he exposed the person who took the forged instrument, or the annoyance to which he put the person whose name he thought proper to use. His good intentions are utterly immaterial. That, I take it, is the explanation of why the master, in doing an act which is obviously unlawful, though he chooses to take the risk of being punished and intends the owner to get the benefit of it, if he has not his leave to incur the risk, does a barratrous act. It must be an unlawful act wilfully done which occasions the injury. Here there is no evidence that the act done was of such a character that it was barratrous. But it is said that the effect of the statute is to make it by a fiction of law a barratrous act; because the statute says that if damage shall accrue from the non-observance of any of the regulations set down, it is to be deemed to have been occasioned by the wilful default of the person in charge of the ship; and it is said that by reason of that provision it must be taken for all purposes, among others for the purpose of this case, that the helm was wilfully starboarded by the persons on board the Black Prince, and that the collision was therefore caused by an act that was barratrous because an act contrary to law and an act which redounded to the disadvantage of the owners. Upon consideration I am unable to arrive at that conclusion. The statute in question was certainly not passed with a view to determine cases of the description of that now before us; questions arising upon a contract between the shipper and the shipowner. That statute was passed with a different intention, namely, for the regulation of ships and for determining the rights of shipowners inter se. It appears from the case cited from Swabey's Reports, that it was thought by Dr. Adams, that the expression "wilful default" might be construed to mean malfeasance; but it was held in that case by the learned judge of the Admiralty Court, that the statute had no such intention as that, and that the words "wilful default," which I think it must be admitted are rather unhappily chosen, were chosen for the purpose of expressing that the ship on board of which the blunder has been made of not porting the helm, under the circumstances in which the rule applies, was to be considered the ship which was in fault; and that, unless the person on board could explain why he did not port the helm, he must be answerable for the like consequence, as if he had wilfully abstained from doing so. That appears to me to be strongly confirmed by the subsequent Act. For the purposes of this case we are dealing with the 17 & 18 Vict.; but the court is at liberty to see how the Legislature dealt with the subject in the subsequent Act, and, looking at the 25 & 26 Vict. c. 63, I find that wilful default is still referred to, and that in sects. 27, 28, and 29, provision is made

GRILL v. THE GENERAL IRON SCREW COLLIER COMPANY (LIMITED).

with reference to what is to be the presumption the court should act on in case of collision; and by sect. 29, "If in any case of collision it appears to the court before which the case is tried that such collision was occasioned by the non-observance of any regulation made by, or in pursuance of, this Act, the ship by which such regulation has been infringed shall be deemed to be in fault, unless it is shown to the satisfaction of the court that the circumstances of the case made a departure from the regulation necessary." Therefore, when it was seen what difficulties presented themselves in the case in Swabey, and the Legislature came again to deal with the subject, it excluded any doubt by showing that "wilful default" was not used in any case which would exclude the conclusion that the act was a negligent one for which the owner of the vessel was liable. I consider, therefore, that the statute was passed not for the purpose of altering the rights of parties who were contracting with one another, but, as far as the learned and very able arguments which we have heard has enabled me to judge, I think I may say that "wilful default" is not an expression of art, and for the reasons I have stated I think it is loosely used simply for the purpose of showing first, that the vessel is in fault, and secondly, that the person who is on deck is to be called on in any proceeding against him to explain his conduct in not complying with the Act, and that he is to be considered as in "wilful default," and punishable as a person who has wilfully neglected his duty, unless he can explain how it was he did not comply with the statutory regulations. That is the whole scope of the enactment, and it appears to me not to affect the question between the parties under the circumstances now brought before the court. Then comes the question, the importance of which one could not exaggerate if it was not that the shipowners have the remedy in their own hands to exclude, by more precise language, the consequences which it may be said they have entered into. That is the question whether, upon the true construction of the bill of lading in this case, the loss has happened by perils of the sea within the expression "perils of the sea" in that document. I do not propose to say much on this point, because I conceive that it has been already decided in the Court of Ex. (Lloyd v. The General Iron Screw Collier Company) in a similar action to the present brought in respect of the very same collision, and arising upon the construction of the same language. But as reference has been made to the case of insurance as if it was one not sufficiently considered in that case, and not well to be distinguished from the case of an action on a bill of lading, I will say a word upon that. With respect to a policy of insurance it must be remembered that it is a positive contract to insure against the perils described, and not an exception from liability, and therefore it is only necessary to see whether the perils, in respect of which the assured seeks to recover, come within the description in the insurance in point of fact. Moreover, I should observe that the general words at the end of the specified perils in the policy of insurance, "all other perils that may come to the ship during the voyage," clearly show that, although the perils to which the ship has been exposed may have been brought about by circumstances not strictly coming within the description of "perils," yet, if a loss happens by the perils specified, the previous circumstances are to be rejected as immaterial. Therefore you have a question whether the loss happened by a peril of the sea plus the negligence of A. B.; perils of the sea to which the vessel might have been exposed but for the misconduct of C. D. or what not. With respect to the action on a bill of lading, that stands, as it appears to me, on a very different footing. The contract is a contract to carry with reasonable care and safety unless prevented by certain excepted perils; and therefore, when you prove that the damage is caused by one of the excepted perils, but also prove that there has not been scurrying with reasonable care, by reason of which the goods were exposed to the peril, you have conflicting portions of the contract which you must choose between. On the one hand the owner of the vessel promises reasonable care, skill, and diligence to his master and mariners; on the other hand he says, "I am not to be answerable if the accident happens by perils of the sea." How are you to reconcile those? It has been said they may be reconciled by saying that if the accident happens by perils of the sea, but is brought about by want of due care and skill on the part of the master and mariners, you have a breach of the contract before you come to the exception. Whether that is an answer or not is unnecessary to consider now; we are bound by the case of Lloyd v. The General Iron Screw Collier Company, which, so far as I have been able to turn the matter over in my mind, is supported by the case of Phillips v. Clark in this court. It will not require very much diligence to find, on the authorities referred to, and on what has been called the general mercantile law, abundance to show that this is a new doctrine, and I would make no further remark on this part of the case beyond saying that the question arose at the trial of the issue as it was on the replication on which the Court of Ex. pronounced judgment, with one exception, and that depends on the use of the word "gross" in the replication, whereas the learned judge at the trial laid down that with reference to the circumstances of this case gross and ordinary negligence was to effect the same, and although in a portion of the summing up the word "gross" was used, yet it was accompanied by a statement, in which I think I concur, that there was no distinction at all for the purposes of this case between gross and ordinary negligence. Here we may endeavour to obtain information upon the meaning of the word "gross," which it was said was improperly rejected or made surplusage within the summing up. So far as the argument has gone, I have been unable to ascertain what is the injury that is complained of by the defendant in using the word "gross." What does it mean? No one appears to be able to give an answer. I apprehend the answer has been given long ago in former cases, and I own I entirely agree with the dictum of Lord Cranworth that "gross negligence" is ordinary negligence with a vituperative epithet. That was the law laid down in Wyld v. Field, and upheld and recognised in the Ex. Ch. in the judgment of Crompton, J. in Beale v. The South Devon Railway Company. The confusion seems to have arisen in using the word "negligence" as if it was an affirmative word, whereas, in truth, it is a negative word; it is the absence of such care, skill, and diligence as it was the duty of the defendant to the performance of the work which he is said to have performed. Then if you begin with what is the amount of care, skill, and diligence which a man ought to bring? In the case of gratuitous bailment it is said, if you employ a man of no skill to ride your horse, he is bound to such skill as he possesses, and that you can require no more, and that he is liable for gross negligence in that sense. But, if you employ a man to ride your horse who professes to be a groom, he will be answerable unless he had competent skill in horse-riding. Therefore the word "gross" is a word which, as pointed out by Sir Patrick Colquhoun in his summary of the Roman civil law, is used as a description, not as a definition. If we have to separate law from fact, and to leave the question of fact to the jury, we could not get nearer to a practical definition of "gross negligence" than we can get

GRILL v. THE GENERAL IRON SCREW COLLIER COMPANY (LIMITED).

tionable; the want of such care, skill, and diligence it was reasonable to expect under the circumstances. When you are dealing with a bailee for hire by act of omission of his in the course of his employment, the want of due care, skill, and diligence, if there be any, is therefore necessarily gross negligence. It is only introducing confusion and to mislead the jury, in my opinion, to use the "gross" instead of using, as my Lord appears to have done over and over again on this occasion, want of due care and skill in navigating the vessel. I apprehend that was clearly a correct thing to say, and that the introduction of the word "gross" might even have led to complaint on the part of the plaintiffs, that the jury might have been misled by the use of an epithet to which they might have attributed more weight than it really deserved.

There is only one point remaining, and I think I now understand what is intended to be represented to the court, which is this, that this not being an action by the Araxes against the Black Prince, but an action by the owner of goods on board the Black Prince, the plaintiff undertakes to show that the damage happened to the goods not by perils of the sea, but by the negligence of the crew; he does not sustain that the collision which rests upon him, by showing merely that the collision between the two vessels happened by the negligence of the crew on board the Black Prince, but he must go further and show that the collision under the circumstances up to the point of the collision, by which the goods were lost, were caused by the negligence of the people on board the Black Prince, and not with any contributory negligence on the part of the Araxes. And the argument went on; it was said that if the Araxes could have done so as not to impinge with such violence upon the Black Prince, though she was not bound to do so, yet, if she had done so, peradventure the collision would not have been accompanied by a loss of goods. I have taken great pains to understand this point, because of one's difficulty in apprehending it, but I think it comes to this; given that there was negligence on the part of the people on board the defendants' vessel, and that if there had not been the negligence the goods of the plaintiff would not have been lost, still the defendant seeks to divide the question of collision, and so qualify his own wrong, and to say that though what took place would not have taken place if there had not been negligence, yet there were other circumstances which might have intervened and did not, and which, if they had, would have prevented the loss occurring. That either means that the Araxes was negligent, or it does not. If it means that the Araxes was negligent, I should like to have pointed out here she was negligent. The fact is, there is no evidence of wrong on the part of the Araxes. If she had backed, and slowed, and fumbled about the Black Prince, she might have done more damage. If it is not wrong for the Araxes not to back, the fact of her not having done something which she was not wrong in not doing, and which it was not her duty to do cannot qualify the damage done by the defendants. The defendants are to pay for their wrongful act. This brings me to the point which is perfectly clear, which is scarcely matter of authority, but for which there is an authority in Davis v. Garratt, 6 Q.B. 361, that if a man does a wrongful act, and a consequence follows as the ordinary consequence of that act, he cannot get rid of that consequence by showing that it must have happened if he had not done the wrong. All the points in this case appear to me, as I have already stated, to be of great importance; the court is exceedingly anxious to counsel for the assistance which they have rendered it in the course of the argument, and the whole it appears to me that on none of the points ought the rule to be made absolute.

M. SMITH, J.—I also think that the rule should be discharged. [His Lordship stated the facts.] It is contended that starboarding the helm was in contravention of the positive rule of the Merchant Shipping Act, and, being so in contravention of law, that it was barratry on the part of the master. Sect. 299 of the Act and the evidence fail to establish any such case. It was perfectly consistent with the facts proved that those on board the Black Prince were asleep, or that those who ought to have been on deck were asleep below; and it would be strange to say that, though the act of going to sleep may be wilful, yet, if the master or men in charge of the deck are asleep, and an accident is occasioned thereby, that would be barratry within any definition which has hitherto been given. Take the case of the master getting drunk, which is a more wilful act. If an accident was caused by his want of care, it is hardly to be contended that there was barratry so as to bring the case within the exception in the bill of lading. I entirely agree with Willes, J., that the words in the statute have not that effect. It is clear to my mind that it was not the object of the Legislature to alter the effect of contracts made between the shipowner and merchant; and, looking at the whole scope of the Act, it certainly does not seem to have been the intention to release the owner of the offending ship from the consequences of such an act. The next part of the rule relates to the motion for a new trial; and the first ground is, that the judge ought to have told the jury that the loss was caused by a peril of the sea within the exception of the bill of lading. That raises very much the same question as arises on the replication; but it is said that my Lord ought to have told the jury that the foundering of the ship was immediately caused by the perils of the sea and that the negligence of the crew, being the causa causans of that effect, had no effect on the perils. It seems to me that that would have been directly in opposition to the judgment of the Court of Ex., and it is sufficient to say that I think my Lord was bound by that decision at Nisi Prius, and that we are bound by it here. The next ground is, that my Lord ought to have left to the jury the question whether there was gross negligence. I conceive my Lord put the case with perfect propriety in the direction that he gave to the jury, and it has not been suggested at the bar in what way he could have put it differently, unless he had used the word "gross" which is found in the replication. I think it is a word which is indefinite in itself, and which, without explaining what he meant, would not have tended to enlighten their minds as to the question they had to determine. There is no doubt that the expression "gross negligence" is to be found in some of the decisions, but it is only one mode of expressing, perhaps, that in a particular case there is a less degree of care required than there might be in other cases; and when you have to define between "negligence" and "gross negligence" it certainly seems to be more scientific and more intelligible to define what are the degrees of care than to attempt to say what are the degrees of negligence. As I read the replication, it would have stood equally well without the word "gross;" the question is, whether there was a want of that due care, skill, and diligence which a captain and crew ought to bring to the service of the ship. The other point of misdirection is, that my Lord ought to have asked the jury whether, although the collision was caused by the negligence of the Black Prince, the foundering of the ship and the loss of the cargo was not caused by the negligence of those in charge of the Araxes. It seems to me that the argument on that point might prevail if there were facts to justify it; but I think there is an utter absence of facts which would have justified my Lord in putting such a question to the jury. As far as the evidence goes, there was no want of care on board the Araxes, and it is matter of pure speculation by the counsel for the defts. to suggest that something might have been done on board the Araxes which might have prevented the collision, or might have rendered it less injurious than it was. There is no other point except that which arises on the replication, which, as I have said, is very much the same question as arises on the first ground for a new trial. There is certainly one other point which in this important case one would hardly have expected, that is, that the depositions were improperly received by my Lord. Now, my Lord could not have refused to have accepted those depositions, unless they had been taken without authority, and the counsel for the defts. have scarcely contended for so wide a proposition as that. It seems to me that they were taken with authority, and that, if there had been any irregularity in the mode of taking them, the proper method of taking advantage of that would have been to apply to the court to have them suppressed, certainly not to wait until the trial and then take objection to their admissibility. Upon all these grounds, therefore, I am of opinion that the rule should be discharged.

ERLE, C. J.—I have nothing to add to the observations of my learned brothers, except that I am authorised by my brother Keating to say that he concurs in the judgment which my brothers Willes and Smith have delivered.

Rule discharged.

The word "gross" was struck out of the replication, and the defts. had leave to appeal, on the ground of barratry, and that the loss was caused by perils of the sea.

BAINES AND OTHERS v. EWING.

Assumpsit—Marine insurance policy—Underwriters—Broker signing policy for his principal—Broker exceeding his authority—Custom at Liverpool—Principal and agent—Private instructions—Indivisibility of contract.

Deft., in writing, authorised his brokers at Liverpool to underwrite policies of marine insurance in his name and on his behalf, "not exceeding 100l. on any one vessel." The custom at Liverpool is for the broker to sign his principal's name to the policy, but it is well known there that in almost every case the broker's authority is limited to a certain sum, though the amount of such limit is only known to the broker and his principal. The brokers, without deft.'s knowledge, underwrote a policy in his name for 150l. for the plts., who were ignorant of the limit imposed: and in an action by the latter thereon it was Held, that the deft. was not liable for all or any part of the 150l., as the brokers had exceeded their authority, and the contract was one entire and indivisible contract.

This was an action brought on a policy of marine insurance to recover from deft., as an underwriter, the sum of 150l., the amount for which the plts. alleged the deft. had underwritten the said policy. The declaration was in the usual form, and the deft. pleaded that he did not subscribe the said policy, and did not become an insurer as alleged, on which plea issue was joined. At the trial before Lush, J.

and a special jury, at the last spring assizes at Liverpool, a verdict was taken for plts. by consent for 150l., with leave to deft. to move to enter a verdict for him, or to reduce the damages. No witnesses were called by either party, but the facts as stated verbally at the trial by the respective counsel, and as they appear on the shorthand writer's notes, were admitted and agreed to by both sides, and were materially as follows:—The plts. are shipowners in Liverpool, trading under the firm of James Baines and Co., and deft. is a gentleman of property living in London. In July 1861 deft. authorised Messrs. North Ewing, and Co., insurance brokers, of Liverpool, to underwrite policies on marine risks, in his name, to the extent specified in the written authority, which he wrote and sent to them, and which was in the following terms:

Messrs. North, Ewing, and Company.

Gentlemen, I hereby authorise you in my name, on my behalf, to underwrite policies of insurance against marine risk, not exceeding 100l. by any one vessel, and I authorise you, &c.

(The document went on to give them authority to adjust and sign off losses, and to give the usual credit note, and to make payment and do other things usual and customary in Liverpool between underwriters and brokers.)

I remain, &c. &c.

Richmond, 28th July 1861.

WM. EWING

It appears that the system of business pursued in Liverpool on these occasions is somewhat peculiar and different from that of London. In the former place there is an underwriters' association, and when a person instructs a broker to underwrite for him, the broker does not take the policy to the underwriter to sign, but the broker signs it for his client the underwriter. If a broker has a principal desiring to be an underwriter, the broker lays the name of his principal before the underwriters' association, and if they assent to the name, it is entered in their book, and then the broker underwrites in his name. So, in the present case, upon the deft. giving authority to North, Ewing, and Co., to underwrite for him, they from that time signed policies in his name. But it is well known in Liverpool that, in almost all cases, if not in all, a limit is put to the amount to which the broker can sign his principal's name; that is, the principal gives leave to sign for 100l., or some other fixed sum, on any number of ships, or on any terms he pleases; but, when the name is given to the association, that limit is not named, and it is, in fact, known only to the broker and his principal. It was admitted as a fact that plts. did not know of the limit imposed in the present case, nor of course that it had been exceeded; neither was deft. aware until afterwards that the limit had been exceeded, nor did he subsequently ratify what his agents had done. Under the above circumstances, on the 2nd Oct. 1862, and whilst the above authority was in force, the policy in question was executed, and was underwritten by North and Co., in deft.'s name for 150l., on which the action was brought. The total loss was admitted. A rule having been obtained in Easter Term last to set aside the plts.' verdict, and to enter a nonsuit or a verdict for the deft., on the ground that there was no evidence of authority given by deft. to underwrite the policy, or why the damages should not be reduced,

Brett, Q. C. and Quain, for the plts., now showed cause.—Deft. allowed the brokers to hold themselves out as his agents to underwrite for him, and though they might not be general agents for many purposes, they were so for the particular purpose of signing all policies brought to them; nor could the business of an underwriter be carried on if the insured were bound to inquire on every occasion into the agent's authority. The distinction here was not between a general agent and an agent to do a particular thing; but it was this, that, in the case of an agent with certain powers to do certain things, those powers could not be limited by secret instructions. In such a case a man would be bound by the usual authority in the case of an agent whom he had put before the world as such: (2 Duer's Marine Insurance (American), sects. 49-50, pp. 345-6.) [MARTIN, B.—It is notorious in Liverpool that the authority of these agents is limited. BRAMWELL, B.—That must mean a limitation of the agent's apparent authority.] The question would be, what were the usual incidents of such an authority, and one of the natural incidents in such a case was to underwrite in different sums according to the agent's discretion. Then was it altered by the fact that it was known in Liverpool that in almost all cases there was a limit? It must be taken with the fact that the limit was never known to the public, which showed that inquiry was never made, and the right of the assured to assume that the agent was doing his duty between himself and his principal was not prejudiced. It was intended by the principal that the limit should not be made known, and plts. were entitled to say that deft. held out his agents as authorised to sign to any amount. The definition of a general agent was well stated in Story on Agency, sect. 126, and sect. 127, in notis. It was like the case of a factor, Ib. sect. 131. Then as to the second point, the contract was divisible, and the authority might be separated where it could be done without injury to the party to be bound. Here there was authority to the extent of 100*l.*, and to that extent, without being damified, deft. was clearly bound. [Mellish, Q. C., contra.—Deft. is, or is not, entitled to a verdict on non assumpsit.] The distinction was well established where an agent, professing to act for his principal, pursued his authority up to a certain point, and then exceeded it, [BRAMWELL, B.—That is precisely what was not done here.] It was laid down in Co. Litt. 258 a, that though, where a man did less than the authority committed to him, the act was void, yet where he did what he was authorised to do, and more, it was good for that which was warranted, and void for the rest. [BRAMWELL, B.—That is to say, under an authority to enfeoff a man in one acre, an enfeoffment of him in two acres would be a good enfeoffment of the one acre. But here the contract is one and indivisible.] That depends on how such a contract was construed. By construing it as a contract to the extent of the authority below 150*l.* the difficulty would be gotten rid of, and the excess would be severable. [MARTIN, B.—You may as well say that a contract for 1*l.* is 240 separate contracts for so many pennies.] (This latter point was here given up by plt.'s counsel without further argument, upon the Court's intimating their opinion that it was not arguable.)

[Ex.]

BAINES AND OTHERS v. EWING.

[Ex.]

E. James, Q. C., Mellish, Q. C., and H. T. Holland, contra, for deft. in support of their rule, were not called on.

MARTIN, B.—With regard to the latter point, the contract is one entire and indivisible contract for 150*l.*, and in my judgment the point attempted to be made is utterly unarguable. As to the other question, it seems to me to be a very clear point indeed. Here is a contract which was made by agents on behalf of their principal, and to make the principal liable, the plts. have of course to prove the agents' authority; accordingly at the trial this document was produced and proved. Here it is [his Lordship reads deft.'s letter to North and Co. of 26th July 1861], and that document was put in to prove the contract in the declaration for 150*l.* Now, if it stood there simply, all parties are agreed that the contract which was made was one which the agent had no authority to make. But then it is said that there is a custom in Liverpool, well known amongst commercial firms there, that as between the principal and the agent the latter is always, or so almost always as to amount to a general usage, limited to a certain amount for which he is to sign his principal's name, the precise amount of the limit being a secret between themselves, and of course unknown to third persons or to the public generally; and it is to be taken here that it is well known that there is a limit, and that when a person's name is given in the underwriters' association that limit is not made public, though it is nevertheless a matter of notoriety that such a limit exists. And it is said that the plts., when dealing with a person whose authority must have been known by them to be so limited, were bound to inquire into the extent of that authority. Avoiding all refinements and taking a common sense view of the matter, I am unable to see how the deft. by giving this authority can be said to have authorised the signing of his name to an amount beyond the extent of the limit therein expressly stated, or how it can be construed other than an authority to sign his name for 100*l.* and no more. The rule to enter a nonsuit must be made absolute.

BRAMWELL, B.—I am entirely of the same opinion. The actual authority here cannot be relied on, and therefore it was contended by Mr. Brett that the deft. had held out the brokers as his agents having an authority to make this contract, which in fact they had not. But what is the authority itself? Why it is one with a limit, confining the agents within a certain amount. If no such limitation were usual and customary amongst the Liverpool insurance brokers, it might no doubt give rise to an important question which it is not necessary to decide in the present case. The mode of doing business at Liverpool in these cases must be taken into consideration, and the utmost that can be said is that the agents were held out as having the authority which the custom at Liverpool confers upon them, and which it is plain, having regard to the mode of doing business there, and to the custom, is only a limited authority. Then Mr. Quain assimilated the case to that of an auctioneer or a factor, with a power limiting him to sell at a certain price, and he cited Story on Agency, s. 131, in confirmation of his argument. I should like to see the cases to which Story, J. refers; but certainly that of Fenn v. Harrison, 3 T. R. 757, which is one of them, does not, in my opinion, establish the proposition in support of which it is cited; and I doubt whether, under an authority to sell at a particular price, he would be authorised to sell at any price. Mr. Quain also asked, how is the business of an underwriter to be carried on if the view of this matter contended for by the deft. is to prevail, and it is to be held that the brokers had not the authority contended for by the plts. to bind their principal? The answer to that question is twofold: first, that the business is carried on; and secondly, that there is no difficulty in its being so. People entering into these insurance contracts trust to the honesty and veracity of the broker, and that he will not exceed his authority, and to the solvency of the party named as the principal, and generally speaking their trust is well founded and all is right.

CHANNELL, B.—I also am of opinion that, as to so much of the rule as seeks to set aside the verdict for the plts. for 150*l.*, and to enter a nonsuit or a verdict for the deft., the rule must be made absolute. As to the other portion of the rule which seeks to reduce the damages to 100*l.*, though I am clearly of opinion that we have no right to separate the amount and to enter a verdict here for 100*l.*, yet it is not necessary for debt, that we should decide that point; for, if we are right in our judgment upon the previous branch of the rule, that is enough. The material question is, whether or not the debt is liable in respect of this policy, which has been signed in his name by his agents? If we are at liberty and are bound to look at the express authority which was given here, it not only does not establish, but, on the contrary, expressly negatives the authority contended for. Then it is said that we are not to look at it simpliciter, but in connection with the fact that the limit imposed on the brokers is a private matter between them and their principal, and that the amount or extent of their authority is not disclosed to the public, and that they as general agents have authority in this particular instance to bind third persons contracting with him. Now, I agree with the law as it is laid down relative to private instructions; nor do I mean to intimate a doubt as to the rule with regard to general and particular agents, or to say that, in order to have this authority, they need be general agents for every purpose: a man may be a special general agent, and the authority may be general as to the particular business to which it applies. But, looking at the facts of this case, and the admission on both sides that it is understood that such a limit is usually, if not always, imposed on the broker's authority, although the precise amount of that limit is unknown to third parties—which, in my opinion, is not material to the decision of the case—I am of opinion that the debt is not liable. Upon these grounds I agree with the rest of the court in thinking that the rule to enter a nonsuit must be made absolute.

KEMP v. HALLIDAY.

Marine insurance—Constructive total loss—Raising sunken ship and cargo.

A ship sailed with a general cargo, and on the voyage sustained sea damage, the admitted subject of general average. She put into port with her cargo on board for repairs; and a part of the cargo was taken out and the repairs proceeded with. While the repairs were going on, the ship with the cargo left in her sank in deep water in consequence of a hurricane. The owner of the ship abandoned her, but the agents of the insurers subsequently raised her and the cargo:

Held, that, in considering whether this was a constructive total loss, the liability on the part of the cargo or freight to contribute in a general average towards the expenses of raising the ship should be taken into account.

Per Martin B. and Willes J.—The case is not sufficiently stated to enable the Court to pronounce judgment.

Error from the Court of Queen's Bench, brought by the plt. upon the judgment for the debt upon a special case.

Action upon a policy of insurance on the ship Chebucto, as for a total loss of the ship on a voyage from Liverpool to Rio Janeiro. The policy was dated Oct. 6, 1863, and underwritten by the debt. for 25*l*.

Plea, payment into court of 18*l*. 15*s*. as for a partial loss only.

At the trial before Mellor, J., in London, the verdict passed for the plt., subject to the opinion of the Court on the following special case:—

1. The Chebucto, the vessel insured, belonging to the plt., sailed on the 21st Oct. 1863, from Liverpool to Rio Janeiro, on the voyage insured, laden with a general cargo.

2. In the due prosecution of her voyage the ship met with heavy gales, and worked, strained, and leaked very much, so that it became necessary by reason of the perils of the sea, for the safety and preservation of the cargo, ship, and crew, to cut away all forward, and to bear up for and to put into Falmouth harbour as a port of refuge, where the vessel with her cargo on board came to anchor on the 12th Nov. 1863.

3. By reason of the premises a certain average loss was sustained.

4. On the arrival of the ship at Falmouth, the master of the ship applied to Messrs. Broad and Sons, ship agents, at Falmouth, requesting them to act as agents for the ship, and Messrs. Broad and Sons agreed to do so.

5. On the recommendation of surveyors employed by the master the ship was passed inside the break-water, and was moored to the pier for the purpose of being repaired, and a portion of her cargo was discharged, the heavier portion of her cargo, however, being left in the ship. The repairs were then proceeded with, but were not completed by the 2nd Dec. 1863.

6. On the 2nd Dec., while the ship was lying moored to the pier, there blew a hurricane, which caused the ship with that part of the cargo which had not been discharged to sink at her moorings at a place where at low water there was a depth of twenty-two feet, and at high water a depth of forty feet.

7. On the same day, viz., 2nd Dec. 1863, the plt. was informed by a telegram sent to him by the master of the ship that she had sunk in Falmouth harbour; and on the following day a Mr. Amos, a person experienced in surveying and repairing of ships, arrived at Falmouth with full authority from the plt. to investigate the whole matter, and to act for him in all matters concerning the ship as, according to the best of his judgment, would be best for all concerned. Mr. Amos having examined the position of the ship, and having informed himself of her prior condition, and taking into consideration the probable injuries the ship had sustained, and having formed a judgment of the cost of raising her, and of her further repairs, came to the conclusion that it would cost more to raise and repair her than she would be worth when repaired. Accordingly on the 4th Dec. he, on the part of the plt., gave notice to Broad and Sons that the plt. abandoned the ship, and would not be responsible for, and would have nothing to do with raising or repairing her.

8. On the 7th Dec. a surveyor, Mr. Thomas, by orders of Messrs. Broad and Sons (which were given on their own responsibility, and not as agents for the plt.), commenced raising the ship, and on the

Ex. Ch.]

KEMP v. HALLIDAY.

[Ex. Ch.]

20th of that month he succeeded in raising her with all those goods on board which had not been discharged before the 2nd Dec. She was subsequently moved into dock by orders, and under the superintendence of the master, who had remained at Falmouth since the arrival of the ship in that harbour, notwithstanding that Mr. Amos, on his visit to Falmouth, had expressly ordered the captain to have nothing to do with the ship; and at the commencement of this action she was lying at Falmouth safely moored.

9. On the 4th Dec. the captain, by the instructions of Amos, signed and sent by post a notice of abandonment to Davies and Co., of Liverpool, the brokers who had effected the policy of insurance, and who then held the same; and on the 9th Dec. Davies and Co. gave due notice of abandonment to the deft. as follows:

Liverpool, 9th Dec. 1863.

Messrs. Burn and Airley.

Gentlemen,—On behalf of the owners of the Chebucto, we beg to give you notice that the vessel is abandoned to you in Falmouth harbour.—Yours very truly,

D. W. DAVIES and Co.

10. The value of the cargo which sank in the ship, and which was raised in her, was, when raised, 1750*l*. The value of that previously taken out was 7000*l*. The amount of the whole freight by the charter-party was 475*l*., and upon the portion of goods sunk 237*l*. 10*s*. The whole net freight was 75*l*. The questions that were left to the jury were, whether there was a constructive total loss of the vessel first at the time when Mr. Amos gave notice to Broad and Sons that the plt. abandoned her; or secondly, at the time she lay moored: both of which questions were answered in the affirmative. In putting these questions to the jury no account was taken of any liability on the part of the cargo or freight to contribute in general average towards the expenses of raising the vessel or towards the general average loss at sea, and it is to be taken as a fact that if such liability for either loss ought to have been taken into calculation, and the estimate of the cost of raising and repairing ought to have been reduced by the amount of the general average to be so constituted, then there was not a constructive total loss. The Court or Courts of Appeal were to be at liberty to draw inferences of fact in the same way as a jury would be entitled to do.

The questions for the opinion of the Court of Q. B. were, first, whether the plt. is under the above circumstances entitled to recover on the policy against the deft. as for an absolute total loss as distinguished from a constructive total loss; and if the Court should answer the above question in the negative, then, secondly, whether it was material, in determining the question of constructive total loss, to take into account the liability, if any such existed, of the cargo and freight to make a general average contribution towards the expenses of raising the ship or towards the general average loss at sea; thirdly, whether the notice of abandonment was given too late.

The case was argued before Blackburn and Shee, JJ. in Easter Term 1865. After taking time to consider the learned judges differed in opinion, and the judgment of the court was entered for the deft. in conformity with the judgment of Blackburn, J., the senior judge.

Thereupon the plt. brought error.

Watkin Williams for the plt.—The decision of the Court of Q. B. was erroneous. The first point is whether, in estimating the cost of repairs, the shipowner should give credit to the owner of the cargo for a contribution for general average as for a partial loss on the voyage to Falmouth. [Cohen, for the deft., said that he should not press that point.] If any general average could have been called for, then there was no constructive total loss. [ERLE, C. J.—By the tenth paragraph of the case it appears that, “in putting the case to the jury no account was taken of any liability on the part of the cargo or freight to contribute in a general average towards the expenses of raising the vessel, or towards the general average loss at sea; and it is to be taken as a fact that, if such liability for either loss ought to have been taken into calculation, and the estimate of the cost of raising and repairing ought to have been reduced by the amount of the general average to be so contributed, then that there was not a constructive total loss.”] In this case no claim for general average arose at all, which only arises when expenses are voluntarily incurred for the purpose of avoiding a danger to the whole of the ship and cargo: (Benecke's Marine Insurance, cap. 5, edit. 1824.) Here the ship was raised, with the cargo on board, without the authority of the owners. In Job v. Langton, 6 E. & B. 779, the ship was stranded, and after the cargo was taken out of her, she was got off, and it was held that the expenses of getting her off were not the subject of general average, as they were not incurred for the joint benefit of ship and cargo. In Moran v. Jones, 7 E. & B. 523, where the ship was stranded, the cargo taken out and warehoused, and then the ship was got off and repaired, and afterwards the cargo was reshipped and conveyed to its destination, it was held that the expenses were the subject of general average. The distinction between the two cases was held to be that the warehoused goods remained in the custody of the master of the ship, and were reloaded and carried forward without any interference on the part of the owner of them. The present case ought to be regarded solely with respect to the thing itself, and not to collateral considerations; and the question is, whether under all the circumstances it was prudent to repair the ship? If the cargo had been bullion, could the shipowner have been bound to encounter the risk so as to entitle himself to contribution from the bullion? This vessel when sunk was a wreck, and by the 17 & 18 Vict. c. 104, s. 450, notice not having been given to the receiver of the district all claim to salvage was forfeited. The master had no right to impose a charge on the cargo without the consent of the owners of it. The rule that where the ship is restored to the assured there is no total loss applies to cases of capture and recapture only; but the better opinion is that recapture does not reduce it to a partial loss, except in cases where the ship is restored in a slightly damaged state only:

Phillips on Insurance, s. 1545;

Bainbridge v. Nelson, 10 East, 329;

McIver v. Henderson, 4 M. & S. 576.

Cohen for the deft.—There was no constructive total loss in this case. The jury have found that the expense of repairing the ship was less than her value when repaired. The cost of raising the vessel ought not to have been taken into consideration without also taking into consideration the sum that was to be earned by her being raised. The ship and cargo were at the bottom of the sea, and if the master had raised them the expenses would clearly have been the subject of general average. It is conceded in the case (par. 7) that there was not an actual total loss. It cannot be said that there was ever an effective privation of the spes recuperandi:

Arnould, 1021, 2nd edit.;

Phillips on Insurance, 1527;

2 Parson's Maritime Law, 408.

Submersion does not per se authorise the abandonment of the ship; the question being whether the expense of raising and repairing the vessel is reasonably justifiable. This is a case for general average within the rule in Moran v. Jones, where the cargo was taken out, warehoused, and repaired. The Court of Admiralty always apportions the salvage equally where ship and cargo are simultaneously saved :

Watkin Williams in reply.—The case of Hamilton v. Mendes, 2 Burr. 1198, which decided that where the ship is restored to the owner it is not a case of total loss, was one of capture and recapture, where the assured resumed possession of the vessel. But here the owner declined to have anything to do with the vessel when raised by the agent of the insurers; and the jury have found that there was a constructive total loss.

Cur. adv. vult.

ERLE, C. J.—In this case we affirm the judgment for the deft., and give the same answer to the two questions in the special case as was given by the court below, being of opinion, first, that there was no absolute total loss; and secondly, that it was material, in determining the question of constructive total loss, to take into account the liability, if any such existed, of the cargo and freight to make general average contribution towards the expenses of the ship. The real dispute was confined to the second question, and although the case has been argued with remarkable learning both here and in the court below, yet our decision turns upon inference of fact from the statement in the special case more than upon any point of law. We do not lay down a rule that all claims for contributions to the ship from any other interest ought to be taken into account in determining whether the ship was worth raising. But we hold that the plt., in considering whether the submersion of his ship containing cargo as stated in the case was a constructive total loss, was bound to take into his estimate the fact that cargo would be saved by the operation which raised the ship, and would contribute to the expense thereof, and that the circumstances which would go to increase or diminish the outlay required for raising and repairing the ship, and the circumstances which would go to increase or diminish the benefit to be derived from that outlay, are elements in calculating whether the cost of raising would exceed the value when saved. We infer from the statements in the case that there was a common peril of destruction imminent over ship and cargo as they lay submerged; that the most convenient mode of saving either ship or cargo, or both, was by raising the ship, together with the cargo; that the expense required for such raising would be an extraordinary expense for the common benefit of both; that the cargo would be liable to a general average contribution towards that expense; and that the shipowner would have a lien on the cargo to secure the payment of that general average. If those facts are properly inferred from the statements of the special case, it follows that the plt., in calculating the cost of raising, was bound to take into his estimate the contribution which would become due to him from the cargo, secured to him by a lien thereon, and, if so, the special case provides that the deft. should succeed. If the case had not been so stated, and we had to apply the common rule, we should consider that a prudent owner uninsured would calculate on the amount of the general average contribution inseparably connected with the raising of the ship, and safely secured, with as much reliance as if he could calculate on the value of the ship itself when repaired, it being clear that all the items both of cost and value on which the owner is to make his calculation when electing between repairing or abandoning are subject to contingency, and are matter of conjecture only. In this decision we have adopted the principle upon which Blackburn, J. relied below, and we refer to his judgment for a more ample statement of that principle in the application of it to this case. My brothers Martin and Willes desire me to say that in their opinion the judgment ought to be for a new trial, on the ground that the facts are not sufficiently stated to enable the court to pronounce judgment.

Judgment affirmed.

COURT OF ADMIRALTY.

Monday, Feb. 26, 1866.

THE ALEXANDRA.

Stowage of cargo and damage to goods—The Baltic trade—General cargoes—Heat and fermentation.

On an allegation that damage to cargo originated from defective stowage, and heat and fermentation arising from the cargo being stowed in too close conjunction with other cargo :

Held, that the plts. must establish affirmatively that the cargo on its arrival at its port of destination was in a damaged condition; and that the onus then falls on the ship to prove that the original stowage was good, and that the perils of the sea, subsequently occurring, created the damage.

Dr. LUSHINGTON.—This cause is instituted under the 6th section of the Admiralty Court Act of 1861, against the Prussian steamer Alexandra, by Messrs. Borch and Jepson, the consignees and alleged owners of two parcels of butter, imported in the Alexandra from Copenhagen to Hull, and the ground of complaint is that damage was done to the butter in breach of the contract evidenced by the bill of lading. That the butter arrived in a damaged condition is not denied, and nothing turns upon the terms of the bills of lading, which were of the usual tenor that the goods were to be delivered in the same condition as shipped, perils of the sea excepted. The only question in reality is, whether the damage was occasioned by perils of the sea or by improper stowage? The facts, as far as I am able to state them accurately, are as follow:—The Alexandra sailed from Stettin to Hull, stopping at Copenhagen as a port of call. The cargo in her main fore hold consisted of spelter for Hull, and general cargo for Copenhagen. Altogether there were about 100 tons of spelter in plates of about one and a half feet long, one inch thick, each weighing from seven to fifteen pounds. The master, who had been ten years a master, acted on the occasion as stevedore. This was in accordance with his usual habit and the general custom of trade for ships in that part of the world. What seems to have been done was, in the first place, to put dunnage at the bottom of the main fore hold, above that to stow the spelter to the extent of ninety-five tons, and over that again the general cargo for Copenhagen, the other five tons of spelter being secured on deck. In the after main hold there were casks of zinc at the bottom, and above that a grain cargo. The vessel had a good voyage to Copenhagen. On her arrival there the master delivered his general cargo, which was above the spelter, and in its room took in a cargo for Hull, consisting of wool, bran, and butter. These he stowed himself, with the following precautions: leaving the spelter where it was, at the bottom of the fore hold, he began by placing above the spelter, at the fore end, fifteen or sixteen bags of wool; the rest of the surface of the spelter he covered with bags of bran weighing about one hundredweight each. Then came three or four tiers of bran bags over the whole surface. When he had done this he took out some bags of bran from two places in the fore part of the hold. Each of these places he first lined with loose planks, then filled with the five tons of spelter which he brought down from the deck; so that the spelter, guarded by the planks, lay, as it were, embedded in the bags of bran, the surface of the whole being level from bulkhead to bulkhead. Then over the spelter he put planks, and over the planks he stowed another tier of bags of bran. The consequence was that the fore part of the fore hold, where the spelter was, was higher by one tier of bags than the rest of the hold—and it was this space of the rest of the hold, terminated at one end by the after bulkhead of the hold and at the other by the extra tier of bran bags protected by a bit of boarding, that the master chose for the stowage of the butter. He first threw gutta-percha covers right across the bran bags and firmly lashed them; over the covers he laid planks of deal, and on the planks he placed the butter casks on their sides; with their ends fore and aft. The casks he secured from moving by chocking them under the bilge with firewood, and also placing firewood in the same manner above them, and then fastening ropes over them to planks screwed into the ship's sides; these ropes and the bags of bran, the master deposes, were quite sufficient to keep the five tons of spelter in their place. After the cargo was loaded there was still left a space three or four feet high between the butter and the decks. The hatchways were secured with double tarpaulins. The master swears that the agent of the shipper was present, saw the butter stowed, and made no complaint. This is the statement of the master, and the facts so deposed to are not contradicted by any direct evidence, though it is difficult to see how any such evidence could be produced by the plt., the consignee of the cargo. On the 4th Sept. 1863 the ship left Copenhagen, and experienced very violent gales for four days. On the 8th the master finding that the cargo had shifted to the starboard side, and had given the vessel a considerable list, and hearing also the cargo knocking about, put about and ran to Norway. On the 9th he anchored in Christiansand. A protest was immediately made, and has been since extended here, after, however, part of the cargo had been returned; still, to the truth of this protest, the master, mate, and one of his seamen have sworn in this court. No time was lost in making survey of the vessel and cargo at Christiansand. The first survey was dated 10th Sept., and was held by the town serjeant with his customary assessors, a ship's carpenter, and a captain of the navy, in the presence of Lloyd's agent, and persons representing the Hamburg Insurance Company. It contains the following passage: "It was found that the vessel had a list of two feet on the starboard side. On sounding the pumps we found 14 in. of water, and 6 in. in the engine-room, although during the voyage no leakage had been discovered. On the ship we could discover no other damage than that the deck seams over the engine-room had opened and the oakum had come out; also, that on the saloon hatchways the forepart of the hatch-ram was damaged or split. The hatchways, which were properly provided with double tarpaulins, and tight all over, were opened in the presence of a Royal Custom-house officer. Through the mid-hatchways no water was forthcoming; but still we found in the main fore hold that the cargo, which consisted of bran bags, butter, and spelter plates, had been displaced so much that the different articles were mixed together, and a great part of the butter and bran had come out of their packages, so that it had been mixed together to a paste. In consequence, a great part of the remainder of the cargo was smeared and wet. Through the hatchways aft we noticed several bags which were rotten, so that we presume the water had gone through the hatch-rams. At the hatchways aft the saloon we noticed that a small quantity of water had entered into the cargo through the breaking loose of the hatch-rams; also that some water had entered by the port side without doing any considerable damage to the cargo, which consisted of barley. On account of the above mentioned, we consider it necessary for preserving the cargo that the two middle holds should be discharged." What was really effected on this survey will best appear from the terms of the second survey, which took place on the 15th Sept. (as the first survey was on the 10th), and was conducted by the same persons:—"With regard to the cargo in the middle of the ship—that is, the fore hold—which consisted of bran, butter, and zinc, the damaged part was discharged, and properly stored in the warehouse, so that the remaining part of the bran bags which was left in the hold was only partly smeared with the butter, in consequence of which no particular damage is to be feared, and it was therefore decided not to discharge any more. The fore hold was then properly cleared, and put in order to take the cargo on board. Amongst the bran which had been discharged out of the hatchways aft and gone into the warehouse, we found 46 bags in a small degree damaged by sea water. Amongst the cargo which had been loaded in the middle of the hold was 33 kegs of butter, wholly and partly without damage. Besides, we found 34 bags of bran which were smeared with butter, and out of that in the hold, consisting of butter and bran mixed together, 68 firkins were taken up. And we advised the commander of the steamer to take the bags of bran and firkins of butter to England, as the same, as far as we could judge, would not be worth much if put up to public auction. Besides, we advised that if the damaged cargo were taken on board again, it must not come into contact with the remainder of the cargo." As there is no ground for distrusting the terms or accuracy of these surveys, it is clear that a great part of the damage had occurred before the ship reached Christiansand, and in reloading the ship at Christiansand the master acted under the orders and superintendence of the surveyor. The spelter and about 500 bags of bran had not been moved from the hold. Over these the master now placed gutta-percha covers, then boards, bought at Christiansand, and on the boards he placed side by side, not above one another, the following items: first, the damaged bran, which, though removed from the ship, had never been taken out of the bags it was in the fore part of the hold; secondly, the mixture of bran and butter in new casks with no top to them; and, thirdly, the thirty-three casks of undamaged butter. So loaded, the ship sailed from Christiansand on the 16th Sept., and on the same day she met with such rough weather that she put back to Mandal. On the 18th she sailed again, and after experiencing a heavy gale arrived at Hull on the 21st Sept. On the arrival of the ship at Hull, the plt., as consignee of part of the cargo, went on board, and could identify by the marks only thirty-three out of his ninety-two casks of butter. On the same day also, the plt. received a letter from the agents of the ship, asking the plt., as one entitled to receive a portion of the damaged cargo, to attend the delivery thereof and to render assistance in separating the damaged goods. At the same time an average agreement was presented to the plts. for signature, containing some statement of the circumstances of the voyage. The other consignees of the cargo consented to sign the average agreement, but the plts. refused to do so, and the cargo appears to have been at once discharged. The bran was taken to the quay and then to the storehouse of Messrs. Smith, Lee, and Co., the good butter and the mixture being discharged into a shed on the quay. As to the mixture, the plts. received notice that it would be sold by auction on Oct. 2. At the sale a Mr. Thompson and a Mr. Fothergill bought the whole (except half a dozen barrels), melting the butter out of the mixture, and selling it for butter grease at a clear profit of 60%. The plt. bought the other barrels at the rate of about 4s. per hundredweight, instead of 112s. which would have been the market price of undamaged butter, and a specimen of the mixture which they thus bought was exhibited at the hearing. With regard to the good butter, the defts.' solicitor wrote to the plts.' solicitor on the 14th Oct. as follows: "The good butter is now in the warehouse and will soon spoil. Will your clients Messrs. Borch and Jepson have it, or say what is to be done with it. We will forego our lien for, but not our right to, freight; rather than useless damage should be incurred." This offer the plts. refused, thinking that by that time even the good butter might have become bad; in short, they refused to accept the cargo or to pay freight, and instituted this suit. The plts.' case is: that the butter was melted through bad stowage, and hence the damage to them. In support of their case they produced witnesses to prove that heat existed in the hold and in the bran on the arrival of the ship at Hull, and their witnesses account for this heat, either by the heat of the engine-room, or by the fermentation of the bran. The first question is, was the butter ever melted? No one, certainly, ever saw the butter in a liquid state, and the evidence therefore consisted in great part of inference or opinion. The plts. and their witnesses, provision merchants at Hull, who saw at Hull the mixture of the bran and butter, and also the bran in the bags (most of them saw it on board ship, and others on shore shortly after the discharge, and others in both places), state that without liquefaction the butter could never have become so intimately mixed with the loose bran from the bags that burst, or have penetrated so far into the bran packed in the bags which remained entire. Some of the bags, Mr. Hunt says, were penetrated right through with the butter. On the other hand, Professor Way, judging from the specimen of the mixture produced in court—to which, however, as a fair average sample, several of the defts.' witnesses take exception—though he does not go the length of saying positively that the butter never had been melted, is inclined to think that the mixture was the result of purely mechanical means; at all events, he has no doubt that a purely mechanical process of shaking and rubbing together could produce such a mixture. And Mr. Thompson, who at the time was managing clerk to Messrs. Reinold, the agents of the ship, and who bought the mixture, and actually melted the butter out of it and sold it, deposes that there was a marked difference between the mixture as he bought it and the same mixture after he had exposed it to heat and allowed it to get cool, and is confident that the first mixture was not the result of liquefaction; but that during the tempestuous weather of the voyage to Christiansand the cargo was displaced and violently shaken up. The plts., however, gave evidence to prove that there was heat enough in the vessel to account for the melting of the butter. The principal witness on this point is Mr. Wilson, foreman to Messrs. Smith, Lee, and Co. On the arrival of the ship he went on board. He deposes that he found the hold hot—hot enough to melt butter that was loose. He did not, however, see any butter melting, because the butter had been discharged before he went on board. He declared that, though he did not examine the bran carefully on board, yet the bags were hot enough to melt butter. The bags were then removed to the warehouse of Messrs. Smith, Lee, and Co. Mr. Wilson deposes that on the arrival of the bags in the warehouses they were still hot, though not so hot as they were on board the vessel; that he examined every bag, and at once separated the damaged from the sound bran. About two days after the bran had been discharged, the plt. Mr. Jepson went to inspect it with Mr. Wilson and Mr. Terry, who is a general merchant at Hull. The bran was lying in the warehouse of Messrs. Smith and Co., piled up in paper bags; but whether the separation by Mr. Wilson of the sound from the unsound had been already effected does not appear. However, Mr. Jepson and the others found that some of the bags had burst, and on cutting open some of the others found the bran much heated and saturated. The heat of the bran was so great that they could not bear their hands in it. As to the saturation, Mr. Terry says: "The butter had penetrated some of the bags from half an inch to an inch, forming a kind of crust within the bags." Mr. Jepson says: "The greasy matter had actually gone through the bags into the middle of the warehouse." Mr. Hunt, the assignee for the sale of the bran, deposed that the bran from both the holds, but especially the fore hold, was hot, that the butter had gone right through many of the bags, that the bran which was not heated was not touched by the butter, and that that which was heated was in most, but not in all cases, affected by the butter. This is the plts.' evidence, and one thing is certain, that out of 1170 bags of bran, about 282 were rejected by the purchaser as damaged. The defts., on the other hand, deny that there ever was any heat in the hold. If the butter was melted, they say that it must have been melted before the vessel reached Christiansand, that the mixture of the butter and bran was collected, and at Christiansand bags of bran were found smeared with butter. But at Christiansand the cargo was twice surveyed, and in neither of the surveys is there one word as to liquefaction of butter, or as to the presence of heat on board. Nor more is there in the evidence of Mr. Cottingham, the plts.' witness, who was at Christiansand when the Alexandra put in, and went on board and saw the men scraping up the mixture. On the contrary, the survey points to the derangement of the cargo as the cause of the mixture, and Mr. Cottingham speaks of bad stowage. It is almost unnecessary to refer to the facts specified by the master in disproof of any heat having been found in the hold at Christiansand, as, for instance, that the butter and bran were taken up in baskets from the hold to the warehouse, and that no butter ran out; that the butter casks which were not broken showed no signs of having been heated. The master also deposes that, at Christiansand, neither the bran which he left in the hold, nor the bran which he took out and again put on board, was hot. Then, with regard to the condition of the hold upon the arrival of the vessel at Hull, the defts. produce a number of witnesses (including Mr. Saxby, who discharged the whole of the butter from the vessel on to the quay) who depose that the hold was not hot, that the bran was not hot, that the butter was quite hard, and that there was no leaking from any of the butter casks. The evidence three barrels, which had been sound at demand, were sound still. The pte. would for the presence of this alleged heat in one way. One explanation is, that the heat of the melted the butter. The fore hold was separated from the engine-room by a wooden partition one and a half inches secondly, a vacant space of four inches; an iron bulkhead quarter of an inch fourthly, a vacant space of six inches, and by an artificial draught of air. Then the boiler; the fire itself was another foot off, and one circumstance alone proves a heat (if any) in the hold could not have come from the engine, for heat from the engine if it had penetrated into the hold, would have most affected the butter nearest to the engine; but it appeared at Christiansand, the contents of kegs in the fore part of the hold had been all wasted and mixed with bran, of kegs which stood next the aft bulkhead on their sides had not suffered, with one exception that a cask had one of its ends knocked off and farthest from the engine—and even that cask the butter had not come out. The master described it, it only “looked like” a proof that the damage to the butter was from shaking, since the butter next to the aft bulkheads of the hold would, as being in the part of the hold nearest to the stern of the vessel, be the least shaken. The explanation offered of the alleged heat is the action of the bran. The pte. produced a provision merchants and grain importers, that bran is liable to ferment, whether dry or wet, and that it should never be stowed along with butter. But Professor Way is decisive that bran will not ferment unless either it be in an immoderate quantity when shipped, or be wetted after it. Now, neither of these circumstances were here. It was admitted that the bran was wet, and no water seems to have forced its way into the fore hold during any part of the voyage, although some did into the aft hold. It proved to be a common practice to stow bran and butter together in the same hold, and on one occasion butter and bran were commingled in the very same hold of the Alexander. The pte., however, suggested two possible causes for fermentation: first, that the butter, by penetrating the bran, set up fermentation; secondly, that the heat of the engine in the fore hold, and the heat of the bran in the aft hold, and the process expelled the natural moisture of the bran in the form of vapour, being unable to escape on account of tarpaulins, and would be forced into moisture at the colder part, that fore part of the hold, and then this moistening upon the undried bran there, would cause such an addition of moisture as to set up fermentation. I mention these two theories, only to reject them. It is clear that they rest upon a supposition that the engine heated the hold. Upon this supposition I have already pronounced. The result of the evidence seems to me to be that the butter was never melted at all. I had the appearance of the butter mixed with bran, and of the bran bags made greasy by the melted butter. I also think that, if fermentation ever took place in the bran, it was not until after the bran had been discharged on deck from some of the bran bags which had stood in the aft hold; for in the fore hold the butter was any wet. I do not mean to say that I make this evidence, and especially that which was the case at Hull in a heated state, as also the hold—facts which would tend to show that the cause of the amalgamation was heat, and not the tempestuous weather which the ship had encountered. There is, undoubtedly, a serious conflict of evidence, and that too amongst witnesses apparently entitled to the confidence of the court. All the court can do under such circumstances is impartially to weigh that evidence, and say which under all the circumstances ought to preponderate. The pte. are bound to establish their own case affirmatively to the extent of proving that their own proportion of the cargo or goods on arrival at the port of discharge were in a damaged condition. This proved, the onus then falls on the defendants, of proving that the original stowage was good, and that the perils of the seas subsequently occurring created the damage. I think that the evidence shows that the original stowage was done in the ordinary form, and with the usual precautions; that the butter became mixed with the bran, not from heat, but by the displacement and shaking up of the cargo; and that this displacement may fairly be attributed to the storm to which the ship was undoubtedly exposed on her voyage to Christiansand; in short, that the damage arose from perils of the sea, as excepted in bills of lading. I must pronounce therefore in favour of the ship and against the claim of the pte.

THE ALEXANDRA.

BURKE v. ROGERSON.

Suezship—Vessel—Cargo—Munitions of war—Belligerent risk—Concealment of—Discharge of duty—Evidence—Pleadings—Correspondence not in issue.

The deflt. R. agreed to sell two steamships to the A. D. Steam Navigation Company, of which the pte. were two of the directors, and it was agreed that the purchase-money should be paid partly in shares and partly in bills of exchange accepted by the company, and that the vessels should be mortgaged to R. to secure the remainder of the purchase-money. The pte. then agreed to indorse certain of the bills, and in consideration of that guarantee, R. agreed that they should be owners of two-thirds of the property mortgaged. The vessels were never formally transferred to the company, and no mortgage was ever executed, but soon after the agreement R., acting as agent of his own firm, and assuming to act as agent of the company, dispatched the vessels to Constantinople, and thence dispatched one of them to Trebizond, laden with munitions of war for the Circassians, who were then at war with Russia:

Held, that, as the dangerous nature of the cargo, which exposed the vessel to extraordinary risk, was concealed from the company by R., he could not have enforced the agreement against the company, and (on this ground affirming the decree of the M. R.) that the pte. were entitled to be relieved from their liability.

Correspondence between R. and the company's manager at Constantinople, which tended to show that R. had dealt with the vessels when at that port as his own absolute property, and had contemplated a sale thereof of one or both of them, was admitted as part of the evidence, although neither the correspondence itself nor R.'s alleged intention to sell was put in issue by the pleadings.

This was an appeal by the deflt. Rogers from a decree of the M. R., the hearing before whom is reported 13 L. T. Rep. N. S. 113.

From that report, and the judgment below of Turner, L. J., the circumstances of the case and the nature of the contention sufficiently appear.

Southgate, Q. C. and Lorock Webb, for the plts., supported the decree.

Selwyn, Q. C. and Marten argued the case on behalf of the app.

Fooks, jun., for the defts., the Anglo-Danubian Steam Navigation Company, and for the deft. Couchman, took no part in the argument.

Southgate, Q. C. replied.

Judgment was reserved until the 29th May, when Lord Justice TURNER said:—The plts. in this suit are two of the directors of the Anglo-Danubian Company, a limited company, which was formed in the year 1862 for the purposes, amongst others, of navigating the river Danube by steamships, and of working some coal-fields at Dobra, in the neighbourhood of that river. The nominal capital of the company was 220,000*l.* divided into twenty-two thousand shares of 10*l.* each, and at the first meeting of the company it was resolved that there should be five directors and that three of the directors should constitute a quorum of the board. The company had before the 28th May 1863 two steamers, called the Papin and the Bellet, working on the Danube, and on the 28th May 1863 John Rogerson, a shipowner, carrying on business in London and Newcastle under the firm of J. Rogerson and Co., made the following tender to the company: "To the directors of the Anglo-Danubian Steam Navigation Company,—We hereby offer to supply you with the three following steamers now in full working operation on the river Tyne, viz., Chesapeake, 2000*l.*; Louise Crawshay, 5500*l.*; Harry Clasper, 7500*l.*—15,000*l.* The Chesapeake to be allowed to take on our account a quantity of goods to a port in the Black Sea at 4*l.* per ton freight on weight.—John Rogerson and Co." At the same time and in connection with this tender John Rogerson made an offer to lend money to the company and to take shares in it. This offer was as follows: "To the directors of the Anglo-Danubian Steam Navigation Company (Limited). I am willing and hereby offer to lend your company the sum of 11,000*l.* at 5 per cent. interest upon the company's acceptances for that sum to be drawn for in such proportionate amounts in each bill as I may require; one-half the amount to be drawn and accepted for at four months' date, and the other half at six months. The company to be entitled to require renewed bills at four and six months respectively, according to the tenor of the original bills to be drawn for one-half of each bill as it arrives at maturity upon payment in cash of the other half. The amount due upon such bills to be further secured by a mortgage in the usual form on the ships Harry Clasper, Louise Crawshay, and Chesapeake, and also by such deed of mortgage or charge upon all calls upon shares in the company now made, and due and owing, or to be hereafter made, such deed to be prepared by my solicitor and settled by counsel, and to contain all such clauses, agreements, and powers for my protection as counsel shall advise. A certified list of shareholders, amount paid on shares, and calls due to be forthwith furnished to my solicitor, as instructions to prepare the deed. I am willing also to take at par and pay in cash for 400 fully paid-up shares in the company, on the conditions hereinbefore contained being complied with. All legal expenses incurred by me to be repaid me by the company in any event." Upon this tender and offer being made, the directors of the company, at a meeting held on the same 28th May, resolved to accept the tender, subject to the approval of the boats, and to accept the offer subject to certain conditions and qualifications; but no final arrangement was come to at this meeting. Subsequently, and on the 1st June 1863, Rogerson made a further tender to the company in these terms:—"To the directors of the Anglo-Danubian Steam Navigation and Colliery Company (Limited),—Gentlemen, we propose to sell you the following steamboats to be delivered in good working order in the river Tyne: the steamboat Chesapeake for 2000*l.*; ditto Louise Crawshay, 5500*l.*; ditto Harry Clasper, 7500*l.*—15,000*l.* Payment in cash on delivery. The Chesapeake to take out for our account to a port on the Black Sea at 4*l.* per ton freight a quantity of goods. The Chesapeake and Louise Crawshay to be paid for now. The Harry Clasper to be paid, 2000*l.* on account, and the balance on receipt of your order to send this boat out, which must be given within twelve months. The Harry Clasper, and this notice is given, to be worked by us for our sole benefit, and to be delivered over on demand in good working condition." The ships were then surveyed and reported on, and another meeting of the directors of the company was then held on the 2nd June 1863, at which the following resolutions were passed:—"The board having taken into consideration the amount in arrear for deposits and calls upon all the shares, as well those that have been forfeited as those that have not been forfeited, and having also considered the amount that yet remains to be called up upon the non-forfeited shares, are of opinion that this company will be justified in purchasing two boats and accepting a loan of 5500*l.* on the following terms, viz., to purchase (subject to inspection) the boat called the Louise Crawshay for 5500*l.*, and the Chesapeake for 2000*l.*, making together 7500*l.*, to be paid for as follows: 2000*l.* to be paid by Mr. Rogerson on his taking 200 shares in the company, which are to be deemed as fully paid-up shares, and by the company's acceptances for 1000*l.* and 1000*l.* and 750*l.*, in all 2750*l.*, payable at four months after that date, and also the company's acceptances for 1000*l.*, and 1000*l.* and 334*l.* and 416*l.*, making in all 2750*l.*, at six months after date; but the payment of all such acceptances to be deemed satisfied, if the board shall so desire, by half the amount of such acceptances being paid in cash when due, and the other half by acceptances of the company, payable at four and six months, as the case may be, according to the tenor of the original acceptances. The due payment of these acceptances to be collaterally secured by a mortgage of the two boats above mentioned, with power of sale not to be exercisable until after default, and after fourteen days' written notice to the company, and also to be secured by a mortgage of the calls already made and unpaid, and hereafter to be made, on the shareholders whose names are stated in a list to be furnished to Mr. Rogerson or his solicitors, with liberty, however, for the directors to apply a sum not exceeding 1500*l.* out of such arrears or calls towards the debts and liabilities of the company. Mr. Rogerson also to provide funds as and when required to the extent of 1000*l.* for the purpose of dispatching and working the two boats above mentioned, and also for working the boats called the Papin and the Bellet, and for working the coal-fields at Dobra under arrangements to be made to the mutual satisfaction of Mr. Rogerson and the directors. The directors defer the consideration of the purchase of the boat called the Harry Clasper. Mr. Rogerson having expressed his approval of the above, it was therefore resolved that the purchase of the two boats called the Chesapeake and the Louise Crawshay be carried out, and the payment for the same effected in the manner and upon the terms above mentioned, but subject to legal approval." Then they read the letter of the gentleman who inspected the ships, who reported in favour of the vessels, and then it was further resolved, that simultaneously with the above arrangements being carried out to the satisfaction of the legal advisers of the company, and of Mr. Rogerson, the latter should be empowered, subject to the limit of expense after mentioned, to get ready and insure and dispatch to the Danube, for and on behalf of the company, the two boats called the Louise Crawshay and the Chesapeake, and also to provide and send out by these boats proper materials for working the colliery, and that he also be empowered to send out for the company and maintain seven men for working the collieries, he also, for the company, to pay their wages. It was further resolved "that the court will reimburse Mr. Rogerson for any necessary expenses that he may incur to the satisfaction of the directors for the above purposes to the extent of 1000*l.*, Mr. Rogerson on his part undertaking to provide the necessary funds to that extent as and when required, it being understood that such reimbursements may be made, if the directors shall so desire, by acceptances of the company to be given from time to time according to the outlay actually made and approved, and to be payable respectively at four months after date." It was further resolved, "that Mr. C. Lankasky be appointed manager of the boats and collieries, and of the traffic and business of the company, at the weekly salary of 3*l.*, in addition to his reasonable and necessary travelling expenses. Mr. Lankasky to act in accordance with written instructions to be furnished to him through the secretary of the company."

In pursuance of these arrangements, 200 shares in the company were, on the 6th June 1863, allotted to John Rogerson, and he paid 2000*l.* for the shares and received it back again in part payment of the purchase-money for the ships. In further pursuance of these arrangements, seven bills of exchange drawn by John Rogerson upon the company for sums amounting in the whole to 7500*l.* were accepted by the company, three of these bills being at four months for the sums of 1000*l.*, 1000*l.*, and 750*l.*, and the other four bills being at six months for the sums of 1000*l.*, 1000*l.*, 416*l.*, and 334*l.*; and on the 11th June 1863, all these bills thus accepted were handed over to John Rogerson. On the same day the secretary of the company, at the request of John Rogerson, addressed to him a letter which was in these terms: "I am instructed by the board of directors to authorise you to dispatch the two steamers, the Chesapeake and the Louise Crawshay, to the Danube immediately, together with such materials as you may deem requisite to work the boats and conduct the traffic of the company on the river, and the Theiss and Save. I am further directed to authorise you to send out such a number of miners, and such quantities of tools and materials, as you may deem requisite to work the mines of the company at Dobra." In the meantime an arrangement had been come to between the plts. and John Rogerson for the plts.' indorsing the bills upon terms agreed upon between them. These terms were contained in two letters of guarantee bearing date respectively the 5th June 1863, and were as follows: "Gentlemen,—In consideration of your agreeing to guarantee the payment of the acceptances of the Anglo-Danubian Steam Navigation Company drawn for the purpose of paying for the boats to the extent of two-thirds of the 5500*l.*—that is the difference between the 7500*l.* and the 2000*l.* which Rogerson paid to Kearns and received back in respect of the ships—"to the extent of two-thirds of the 5500*l.*, that is 3667*l.*, I engage that you shall not be called upon to pay under that guarantee except upon the following date, viz., twelve months from the dates of the bills 1833*l.* 10*s.*, eighteen months from the dates of the bills 1833*l.* 10*s.*, you agreeing to indorse new bills to take up those first drawn until they will come to the dates named, that is, twelve and eighteen months respectively, at which date you become owners of two-thirds of the property mortgaged to Jno. Rogerson and Co. It is further understood that you will accept bills to raise the funds to work the boats and colliery, you being liable, in event of the company not paying, to the extent of two-thirds of the amount, which is not to exceed 1000*l.*" The other letter of guarantee of the same date was signed by Rogerson and Co., Burke and Kearns, and it is in these terms; it is addressed to Mr. Rogerson: "Sir,—We agree to the contents of your letter dated 5th June 1863; that is, we guarantee payment of the acceptances of the Anglo-Danubian Steam Navigation Company to the extent of 3667*l.*, in event of the company not paying them, in twelve months, say for 1833*l.* 10*s.*, at eighteen months for 1833*l.* 10*s.*, and we also agree to keep our indorsement on bills to keep them negotiable until they mature. We also agree to accept bills to raise the funds to work the boats and colliery, and to be liable for two-thirds in event of the company not paying the same to the extent of 1000*l.*, John Rogerson and Co. being responsible for the remaining one-third to the bank." The company also afterwards accepted two other bills drawn upon them by Rogerson for the sums of 500*l.* and 300*l.* in part of the 1000*l.* agreed to be advanced by him.

The two steamships, the Chesapeake and the Louise Crawshay, were dispatched by John Rogerson and Co. from Newcastle and proceeded to Constantinople. They reached that place at the following times, the Chesapeake on the 20th Aug., and the Louise Crawshay on the 23rd Sept. 1863. They were not sent on to the Danube. The Chesapeake, when she left this country, and indeed when she was agreed to be sold to the company, had on board a considerable quantity of munitions of war for the use of the Circassians in the war in which they were then engaged with Russia, and after her arrival at Constantinople she proceeded with this cargo to the neighbourhood of Trebizond, where she delivered the cargo, and then returned to Constantinople, arriving there on the 18th Sept. Her crew was soon afterwards discharged by Rogerson, and she was berthed at Constantinople. The crew of the Louise Crawshay was also discharged soon after her arrival at Constantinople, and she was also berthed there. The three bills for 1000*l.*, 1000*l.*, and 750*l.*, which were drawn payable at four months, became due on the 8th Oct. 1863. They were not paid by the company, and on the 9th and 12th Oct. 1863 John Rogerson commenced an action at law against the plts. upon these bills. The plts. thereupon, on the 22nd Dec. 1863, filed the bill in this cause against John Rogerson, William Scott, who was his partner in the firm of J. Rogerson and Co., and John William Couchman, another of the directors of the company who had taken part in the resolutions of June 1863, and in the indorsement of the bills by the company, and also against the Anglo-Danubian Company, setting forth in detail a great variety of circumstances connected with the purchase of the ships by the company, the indorsement of the bills by the plts., the guarantee given to them by Rogerson and Co., the dispatch of the vessels from this country, their being berthed at Constantinople, and their having been, as alleged, subsequently employed by Rogerson, and therefore praying "that it might be declared that, under the circumstances, the plts. were altogether discharged from liability on the bills so indorsed as aforesaid, and that the defts. John Rogerson and William Scott are severally bound and ought to indemnify the plts. against the actions of Messrs. Lambton and Co."—there was an action brought by Messrs. Lambton and Co. upon one of the bills which had been indorsed, and which the plts. had been compelled to pay—"or that the defts. J. Rogerson and W. Scott may be decreed specifically to perform the agreements of the 2nd and 5th June 1863, the plts. being ready and willing, and thereby offering specifically to perform such agreements on their part. That an account may be taken under the directions of the court of all moneys received by J. Rogerson and W. Scott, or either of them, or by any other person for their or his use, and of all moneys, if any, agreed to be paid to John Rogerson and William Scott, or either of them, and not yet received for or in respect of the conveyance of passengers or freight conveyed by or otherwise for or in respect of the use or employment of the steamers the Chesapeake and Louise Crawshaw respectively, since the 2nd June 1863, and of the profits realised by J. Rogerson and W. Scott, or either of them, for the adventure or speculation. That it may be declared that what upon taking such account may be found to be due from J. Rogerson and W. Scott respectively, ought to be applied, so far as may be necessary, in satisfaction of the sums due on the seven several bills of exchange;" and then the bill prays for an injunction to restrain the actions commenced on the indorsement of the bills.

The bill, which is most loosely and inaptly drawn, rests, as I understand it, on the right of the plts. to be relieved from their liability upon the bills on several grounds. First, that the agreement by the company for the purchase of the ships was made upon the faith of representations on the part of Rogerson which were not well founded, and of promises on his part which were not performed, and amongst other such representations and promises, it alleges that he promised that the ships, if the company would purchase them, should be forthwith vested in the company, and he would procure the company to be duly registered as the owners of them, and the ships should be immediately dispatched to the Danube, which the bill alleges was of great importance to the company, with a view to their securing the benefit of the autumn trade on the river in that year; but that in fact Rogerson had not at the time any title to the ships, and that the ships were never in fact sent to the Danube; secondly, that the mortgages stipulated for by the agreement of the company to be made to Rogerson, were not in fact procured by him to be made; and, thirdly, that the deft. Rogerson was not entitled under the agreement for the purchase by the company to take any freight to any port on the Black Sea, and that he took on board the Chesapeake the munitions of war above mentioned with full knowledge of the purpose for which they were intended, and thereby exposed that vessel to the risk of being seized and confiscated by the Russians, and that he wholly concealed from the plts. the fact of the vessel being laden with such munitions of war.

The deft. Rogerson, by his answer, insists in effect that he had a good title to the ships, and that the ships were not sent to the Danube in consequence only of the necessary funds for that purpose not having been supplied by the company or the plts., he having expended the 1000*l.* agreed to be advanced by him; that the mortgages were not taken by him only in consequence of the agreement on the part of the company to furnish the list of the calls and of the shareholders not having been fulfilled by them; and that under the agreement with the company he was entitled to carry cargo, although consisting of the above-mentioned munitions of war; and by the answer he wholly denies having made any such false or fraudulent representations as are alleged by the bill, and he alleges that the sale of the steamships proceeded throughout upon the footing of the plts. being personally responsible for the purchase-money.

There is an enormous mass of evidence in the cause, consisting in part of letters and other documents, and in part of affidavits and depositions. Amongst the letters in evidence there is a long correspondence between the deft. Rogerson and Mr. Lankasky, the managing agent of the company at Constantinople, from which it clearly appears that, very soon after the steamships had been purchased by the company, the deft. Rogerson contemplated selling the ships when they arrived at Constantinople, and that he was continually intending to do so, and gave express directions that this intention on his part should not be made known to the Anglo-Danubian Company. The parol evidence, consisting of the affidavits and depositions, is painfully conflicting and contradictory, and if it were necessary to decide the case upon that evidence, I should find great difficulty in arriving at a conclusion upon it, although, upon the whole, I think that the evidence on the part of the plts. is more trustworthy than that on the part of the defts. In the progress of the cause the plts. paid into court to the credit of the cause the sum of 3333*l.* 13*s.* 4*d.* as the price of an interim injunction to restrain the proceedings in the actions brought against them, and at the time of the hearing of the cause there was in court the sum of 3823*l.* 14*s.* 2*d.* Bank Three per Cent. Annuities, which had arisen from the money so paid in. The steamships were also sold in the progress of the cause, and at the time of the hearing there was also in court the sum of 1706*l.* 9*s.* 5*d.* Bank Three per Cent. Annuities, which had arisen from the proceeds of the sale of the steamships. There was likewise in court at the time of the hearing of the cause the sum of 550*l.* 15*s.* Bank Three per Cent. Annuities, which stood in trust in the cause, and in another cause of the Anglo-Danubian Steam Navigation and Colliery Company (Limited) v. Rogerson, and had arisen from moneys paid in by the company. Upon the hearing of the cause the M. R. made the following decree:—It was declared that the plts. were not liable upon the bills of exchange indorsed by them as in the pleadings mentioned, or any of such bills; and generally an injunction was granted to restrain the defts. from suing upon those bills, and the plts. having, pursuant to the order we made and the M. R. before us, paid the sum of 3333*l.* 13*s.* 4*d.* into court, and that being invested, and there being in court in the whole this sum of 5530*l.*, it was ordered that 3823*l.* Bank Three per Cent. Annuities, part of the 5530*l.* Bank Annuities, and any interest accrued due upon them, be transferred and paid to the plts., but such transfer and payments were not to take place until after a certain time: that in giving back to the plts. the sum which they had paid in as the price of the injunction, the court being of opinion that the injunction was proper, and the injunction was made perpetual. Then it was declared that Rogerson and Scott were bound to recoup to the plts. the sum of 1003*l.* 14*s.* paid by them on the 4th Jan. 1864 to Messrs. Lambton and Co.; that is, Burke and Kearns having been made liable upon one of the bills which they had indorsed, which had been handed over to Lambton and Co., and having been compelled to pay that amount, they were entitled to recover that amount from Rogerson and Co. Then there is a direction to tax the costs. And it was ordered that the plts. Burke and Kearns do pay to the Anglo-Danubian Steam Navigation and Colliery Company and John William Couchman, their costs and add those costs to their own, and then it was ordered that Rogerson and Scott should pay to the plts. the balance of the sum of 1003*l.* 14*s.* and interest, and of the taxed costs of the plts. in this suit, and Rogerson having paid into court to the credit of Burke v. Rogerson the sum of 1537*l.* 19*s.* 2*d.* appearing to have been the proceeds of the sale of the steamers, it was ordered that 1706*l.* 9*s.* 5*d.* Bank Three per Cent. Annuities, being the residue of the 5530*l.* 3*s.* 7*d.* like annuities which had arisen from the sale of the ships, be sold; the residue of the Bank Annuities which were in court was ordered to be sold, and it was ordered that out of the money to arise by such sale, and any interest to accrue on the sum of 1706*l.* 9*s.* 5*d.*, the 1000*l.* and interest should be paid, and out of the residue of those moneys the costs were to be paid; it provided for the payment of the costs, that is, applying the proceeds of the sale of the ships to the payment of the amount which had been paid upon the bills, and also payment of the costs, and it was ordered that the ultimate residue should be paid to the deft. John Rogerson, and there is a special direction given as to what is to be done if that money is not sufficient to pay the 1003*l.* 14*s.* and interest and the costs in full. That is the substance of the M. R.'s decree.

The appeal before us is by the deft. Rogerson from this decree. In disposing of it we must first consider upon what evidence we are to proceed. It was objected on the part of the app. that the correspondence between him and Lankasky, the manager of the company at Constantinople, with reference to the sale of the ships after they arrived at Constantinople, ought not to be received in evidence against him. Neither the correspondence itself, nor the fact of such a sale having been intended, is put in issue by the pleadings in the case, and it is wonderful that the plt. should not have put that upon the record. But this correspondence cannot, I think, be wholly disregarded. It must, as it seems to me, be receivable in evidence at least to this extent, to show that the ships were detained at Constantinople for the app.'s own purposes, and not for the reasons alleged by him, and whether it would be sufficient for that purpose I need not say. I am satisfied, however, that this correspondence is not so put in issue as that the court can properly act upon it without some further inquiry, and I proceed therefore to consider the points of the case without reference to this correspondence, and first, as to the point relied upon by the plts. that the app. had no title to the ships. I think that the plts. cannot maintain their right to the relief given by the decree upon that ground. The agreement between the company and the app. fixes no time for the completion of the purchase, and there is nothing so far as I can find upon the face of the agreement which can make the immediate completion of the purchase of the essence of the contract. What was really of importance to the company was not the transfer to them of the ships, but the dispatch of the ships to the Danube, and they were in fact dispatched upon the voyage and by the order of the company, as appears by the letter of the 11th June 1863; that letter may well be considered to have constituted Rogerson the agent of the company to dispatch the ships, and to amount in effect to the delivery of possession of the ships to the company. But whether this be so or not the company surely cannot be heard to complain that Rogerson had at this time no title to the ships when they directed him to deal with them before any title was shown; and if they could not then complain of an absence of title on his part, I see no fixed period at which they could become entitled so to complain. This part of the case does not even rest here, for as early as the 13th June both the company and the plts. knew that Rogerson was not the registered owner of the ships, and yet they continued to treat the agreement as subsisting, and took no steps to repudiate it.

Then as to the ships not having been sent to the Danube, I think the plts.' title to the relief given by this decree fails upon this point also, for Rogerson was not bound to advance beyond 1000*l.* for sending the ships to the Danube and for other purposes, and when the ships reached Constantinople he had advanced beyond that amount, and both the company and the plts., though applied to for the purpose, failed to supply the further funds which were necessary for sending forward the ships.

Again, as to Rogerson not having procured the mortgages which by the agreement were stipulated to be made to him, I do not think that there was any such default on his part in this respect as could entitle the plts. to the relief given by the decree. He was entitled, I think, to have the whole transaction completed at the same time, and was not bound to take the mortgage of the ships without the mortgage of the calls, and the company has never supplied the means of completing the mortgage of the calls, which under the agreement they were bound to do. Besides, the draft mortgage of the calls was sent to them for approval upon the 13th June, and was not returned by them until the 19th Aug. 1863, when Rogerson was on the point of leaving this country. Then, as to the representations alleged to have been made by the app. Although, as I have said, I distrust the evidence on his part more than that on the part of the plts., I am far from being satisfied with the evidence on their part as to these representations, and I should hesitate long before affirming this decree upon the faith of that evidence. If it was necessary to decide this case upon the question whether the representations alleged to have been made by the app. were in fact made by him, I am disposed to think that we could not safely come to any decision upon it without some further investigation, either by means of issues, or by examination of witnesses before us.

But I think it is not necessary to take either of these courses. I am satisfied upon the evidence that the Chesapeake, when dispatched from this country, was, and was known by the app. to be, laden with munitions of war for the use of the Circassians in their war with Russia, and that this fact was not communicated by the app. either to the company or to the plts., and I think that this fact alone is sufficient to entitle the plts. to be relieved from their liability upon the bills in question. It is, as I have stated, alleged by the answer of the app. that the negotiations for the purchase of the ships proceeded upon the footing that the plts. were to be responsible for the full amount of the purchase-money, but upon whatever footing the negotiation may have proceeded, I am satisfied that it was concluded upon the footing that the plts. were to be liable as sureties, and not as principals. The indorsements of the bills, and the letters of guarantee, are but parts of one and the same transaction, and must be looked at together; and by the letters of guarantee Rogerson, in consideration of the plts. agreeing to guarantee the payment of the acceptances, enters into certain engagements referred to in the letters, and the plts., on the other hand, guarantee the payment of the acceptances. It is by the indorsements only the plts. could be liable for the full amount of the bills; they would not be liable for more than two-thirds of the amount upon the guarantee itself. The plts. therefore were in the position of sureties, and I take it to be clear beyond all doubt, that in all cases of principal and surety, the surety paying the debt is entitled to the benefit of all securities which the creditor has against the principal. Upon that rule, therefore, the plts. paying these bills would be entitled to the benefit of the mortgages agreed to be given to Rogerson; but, beyond this, it is in terms agreed by the letters of guarantee that the pita, upon payment of two-thirds of the amount of the bills, should become owners of two-thirds of the property mortgaged to Rogerson and Co., so that in any event the pita, to the extent of two-thirds at least of what they should pay upon the bills were to have the benefit of the mortgages.

Now, what was the position of Rogerson as to these mortgages? His right to have them granted to him would be enforced only in equity; but, would a court of equity have decreed the company to grant these mortgages when it appeared that the fact of one of the ships being laden with a cargo, which, to say the least, would expose her to extraordinary risks, was known to the app., and was concealed from the company? I am of opinion that it would not. It was said for the pita, that by carrying this cargo the ship was rendered liable to seizure and confiscation. I do not enter into that point; I do not think it necessary to do so. It is, in my opinion, sufficient that she was exposed to extraordinary risks, and that this fact was concealed from the pita. The correspondence with Lenkasky proves that Rogerson was well aware of the risk to which the ship was exposed by carrying this cargo. Rogerson, therefore, in my opinion, could not have compelled the company to grant these mortgages, and of course could not give the pita the benefit of them, and in this state of circumstances I think he has been properly held to have released the pita from their liability upon the bills. To this extent, therefore, I agree in the decree appealed from; but the decree has gone further and has fixed the payment of the 1000*l.* and of the costs upon the proceeds of the sale of the ships, and I cannot follow the decree to this extent. If the ships had not been sold, I do not see how a sale of them could have been ordered to meet these payments, and I think that the proceeds of the sale of them must stand in the same position as the ships themselves would have stood in if they had remained unsold. In my opinion, therefore, this part of the decree ought to be discharged, and these sums ordered to be paid by Rogerson and Scott. This, however, is more a matter of form than of substance, and ought not, I think, to abate the app. from the payment of the costs of the appeal, which, in my opinion, must be ordered to be paid by him.

Lord Justice KNIGHT BRUCE said:—My conclusion is the same, and substantially on the same grounds.

GLAHOLM v. BARKER.

The 17 & 18 Vict. c. 104 (the Merchant Shipping Act 1854) ss. 510, 511, and 514—Collision at sea—Loss of life—Liability of owner of moffasent vessel—Damages, extent of.

The Merchant Shipping Act 1854, s. 510, taken per se, limits the amount of damages recoverable against the owner of a ship causing the death of a seaman at sea, to 30*l.*; but the 511th section enables the claimant of such damages to sue the owner for more, if he thinks that amount not sufficient. The 514th section then provides that where the damages actually sustained exceed in the aggregate the sum for which the owner of the injuring vessel is liable, and that excess is recovered against him, the funds so recovered are to be distributed rateably among the parties entitled thereto.

See Glaholm v. Barker, 13 L. T. Rep. N.S. 317, s. c. on appeal, 18 L. T. Rep. N.S. 653.

This suit was originally instituted by the owners of a British vessel called the Edith Murray, to restrain certain actions at law against them. It appeared that in the month of Feb. 1864 the Edith Murray ran into a collier called the Thomas Barker. The result of that collision was that eight seamen on board the Thomas Barker were drowned. Their personal representatives then brought actions under Lord Campbell's Act, 9 & 10 Vict. c. 93, against the owners of the Edith Murray, to obtain compensation by way of damages for the deaths so caused. The pita at law estimated the amount of their damages at the rate of 15*l.* per registered ton of the freight and vessel the Edith Murray. That rate the defts. at law contended was an excessive one, that in truth there was either no right of action at all, or that the liability was limited to 3*l.* per ton aforesaid.

Under those circumstances the bill in this suit was filed praying an injunction to restrain the actions, and a direction that the proper amount of the liability might be ascertained in this court.

On the 24th April 1865, the M. R. held that the actions must be allowed to go on, and that the liability of the pita in equity was 15*l.* per ton: (13 L. T. Rep. N.S. 317.) From that decision an appeal was carried to the Lords Justices, who confirmed the decision of the court below. Their Lordships held that the liability under Lord Campbell's Act (9 & 10 Vict. c. 93) of shipowner for damages in respect of loss of life occasioned by a collision at sea was (although there might be no passengers aboard), by the Merchant Shipping Amendment Act 1863 (25 & 26 Vict. c. 6), modified and limited to a sum not exceeding 15*l.* in each ton of his vessel's registered tonnage: (13 L. T. Rep. N.S. 653.) The further prosecution of the suit under those decrees was carried on in chambers.

The suit now came before the court in chambers upon the question whether the damages which could be claimed by the widow and children of the seamen who had been lost were limited to 30*l.*, whatever might be the actual damage sustained by the family of the deceased. The decision of the question depended on the construction to be put upon (in particular) the following sections of the Merchant Shipping Act 1854, viz., the 510th, 511th, and 514th.

By those enactments, that is to say, by the 17 & 18 Vict. c. 104 (the Merchant Shipping Act 1854), part ix., sect. 510, it was enacted that the following rules be observed as to the damages recovered in any such inquiry as in the Act was particularly mentioned, and the application thereof, viz.: that

1 The damages payable in each case of death or injury should be assessed at 30*l.*

2 The damages found due on any such inquiry as aforesaid should be the first charge on the aggregate amount for which the owner was liable, and should be paid thereof in priority to all other claims.

3 All such damages as aforesaid should be paid to Her Majesty's Paymaster-General, and should be distributed and dealt with by him in such manner as the Board of Trade directs, and in directing such distribution the Board of Trade should have power in the first place to apportion and retain any costs incidentally thereto; and in the next place, as regarded the sums paid in respect of injuries, should direct payment to each person injured of such compensation not exceeding in any case the statutory amount as the said board thought fit, and as regarded the sums paid in respect of deaths, should direct payment thereof for the benefit of the husband, wife, parent, and child of the deceased, or any of them, in such shares, upon such evidence, and in such manner as the said board should think fit.

4 The Board of Trade should refund to the owner any surplus remaining under the control of the said board.

BROWN v. TANNER.

as aforesaid, and the sum so refunded should form a residue thereafter mentioned.

Board of Trade should not, nor should any person or it, be liable to any action, suit, account, claim, or whatsoever, for or in respect of any act or matter omitted to be done, in the distribution of such as aforesaid.

the amount paid to Her Majesty's Paymaster-General or aforesaid was insufficient to meet the demands of the several claims thereon should abate proportionally.

by sect. 511 that, on a completion of such inquiry as aforesaid, if any person has estimated the damages payable in respect of any injury, or if the executor or administrator of any deceased person has estimated the damages payable in respect of his death, or if the sum of such damages is greater than such statutory amount, or in case of a promise having been made by the Board of Trade, or of an amount accepted by such board by way of compensation for such injury or death as aforesaid, the person so injured, or the same should, upon repaying or obtaining the amount by the Board of Trade to the owner of the amount in respect of such injury or death, be at liberty to bring an action for the recovery of the same in the same manner as if no power of instituting an action had thereinbefore been given to the Board of Trade, subject to the following proviso, viz., that any damages payable by such person should be payable only out of the residue (if any) of the aggregate amount for which the owner is liable, after deducting all sums paid to Her Majesty's Paymaster-General in manner aforesaid; and that if the amount recovered in such action did not exceed double the amount, such person should pay to the debt. in such action the costs thereof; such costs to be taxed in England as between attorney and client, and in Scotland as between agent and client.

in cases where any liability had been, or was alleged to have been, incurred by any owner in respect of loss of life, or injury, or loss of or damage to ships, boats, or goods, and claims were made or apprehended in respect of such loss, injury, or damage, subject to the right thereinbefore given to the Board of Trade of recovering damages in the United Kingdom in respect of loss of life or personal injury, it should be lawful for the High Court of Ch., and for the Court of Session, and in any British possession or colony any competent court, to entertain proceedings at the instance of any owner for the purpose of determining the amount of such liability, subject as aforesaid; "and for the purpose of such amount rateably amongst the several persons entitled to such damages," with power for any such court to stop all actions pending in any other court in relation to the same matter; and any proceeding entertained by such High Court or Court of Session, or other competent court, should be conducted in such manner and subject to such regulations as to making any persons interested parties to the proceedings as to the exclusion of any claimants who did not appear within a certain time, and as to requiring security from the owner, and as to payment of costs, as the court should think fit.

ROMILLY.—I am of opinion, in this case, that it depended solely on the 510th section of the Merchant Shipping Act 1854, the amount of damages recoverable from the ship's owner should be limited to 30*l.* in each case of death. But the 511th section of that statute seems to raise some doubt upon the point. I think the 511th section intended to provide this: that if the claimant thinks the sum of 30*l.* is not sufficient, he may bring an action for the extra amount of damage which he claims, whether the Board of Trade does or does not institute any inquiry in the matter. I think the proper construction of the 514th section is this: that when the damages actually sustained by the families of the seamen in the aggregate exceed the sum for which the owner of the wrong-doing ship is liable, and that excess is recovered against him, the funds so recovered from the owner are to be distributed rateably amongst those entitled to damages. Damages sustained by the claimants are to be ascertained in the same way as if the liability of the owners was unlimited. If the damages so ascertained are together less than the amount of the owner's liability, then the sum for which the owner is liable is to be applied in payment in full of the damages so ascertained. If, on the other hand, they exceed the amount of his liability, then such sum is to be distributed rateably among the persons entitled to it.

V. C. STUART'S COURT.

BROWN v. TANNER.

Freight—Assignment—Subsequent charge—Notice—Priority.

B., a registered mortgagee of a ship, by a deed of even date referred to in the mortgage-deed, took a general assignment of the freight as an additional security; subsequently the freight of a particular voyage was assigned to C.:

Held, that C., who had given notice of his assignment to the charterers of the ship, was entitled to priority over B. who had given no such notice.

The question in this case was whether the plt., Robert James Brown, was entitled to priority as assignee of part of the freight of the ship Pharamond over the debt. George Tanner, who was a mortgagee of that ship, and assignee of the whole of its freight.

The facts were these:—

In 1862 the ship Pharamond was mortgaged by its owner, Henry John Hall, to the debt. by way of security for 2000*l.*, and by a deed of even date, referred to in the mortgage-deed, the whole of the freight earned or to be earned by the vessel was also assigned to the debt. as a further security for the above sum. The mortgage was duly registered on the following day in the form required by the Merchant Shipping Act.

In Nov. 1863 the vessel was chartered from the owner by Messrs. Phillips, King, and Co., to proceed from Algoa Bay or the Mauritius to London, with such cargo, and subject to the payment of such amount of freight, and under such terms and conditions as in the charter-party were mentioned. It appeared that Hall had accepted certain bills of exchange drawn by the plt. to the amount of 1000*l.*, and in order to secure their payment he, on the 20th May 1864, assigned all the freight payable under the above charter-party to the plt. On the 16th July 1864, the plt. gave a written notice of his assignment to the charterers.

The Pharamond arrived in London in the early part of Sept. 1864, and shortly afterwards the debt. took possession of her, but not before the cargo had been partially discharged, and on the 30th Sept. he gave notice of his claim to the charterers and all the consignees of the freight.

Subsequently, the plt. applied to the charterers to pay him the freight remaining due under the charter-party, but in consequence of the debt.'s claim they refused to do so, whereupon the plt. served a notice of stoppage for the freight upon the London and St. Katharine Dock Company.

The following correspondence between the solicitors of the parties fully sets forth their respective claims. On the 9th Nov. the plt.'s solicitors wrote to the agent of the solicitor acting for the debt. as follows:

V.C. S.]

BROWN v. TANNER.

[V.C. S.]

The Pharamond.

Dear Sir,—There appearing to be conflicting claims to the freight per this ship, we think it desirable to communicate with you (as representing Mr. Tanner the mortgagee) on the subject. It appears that Mr. Hall, the owner of the ship, executed a statutory mortgage in favour of Mr. Tanner, on 21st Sept. 1862, which was recorded at the Custom-house on the 26th Sept. 1862. On 27th Nov. 1863 the ship was chartered by Messrs. Phillips, King, and Co., for a voyage from Alga Bay to London at a freight of so much per ton. Hall being indebted to our client, Mr. Robert James Brown, upon certain bills, and proceedings being taken against Hall in respect of such bills, he proposed to assign such freight to Mr. Brown, and accordingly, on 20th May last, Mr. Hall executed an assignment of such freight to Mr. Brown. At the time the assignment was executed Mr. Brown had no notice or knowledge of the ship being mortgaged other than is to be collected or inferred from the registration at the Custom-house. On the 16th July 1864 notice of such assignment was given to Phillips, King, and Co., the charterers. The ship arrived in London early in September. Possession of the ship was not taken by your client till after the discharge of the cargo, though he has, we understand, lodged stops for the freight. Under these circumstances, our contention is that our client, as assignee of the freight for value without notice to the charterer, is (as against Mr. Tanner, the mortgagee not having taken possession) entitled to the freight payable under the charter with Messrs. Phillips, King, and Co. Messrs. Phillips, King, and Co. happen to be clients of ours. The stops which have been lodged will only complicate matters, as Phillips, King, and Co. being thoroughly responsible parties, are at all times able to pay whatever freight is payable by them. We understand that some notices have been given on behalf of Mr. Tanner to the various consignees of cargo, claiming the freight payable by them; but we do not consider this assists Mr. Tanner, because it is, we apprehend, clear that there is no privity between the actual shippers and the shipowner, and that the bill of lading freight belongs to Phillips, King, and Co. as owners of the ship for the voyage; the master signing the bills of lading not as agent for the owner, but of the charterers, Phillips, King, and Co. We cannot but think that, upon consideration, you will arrive at the conclusion that our client Mr. Brown is entitled to the freight as against Mr. Tanner, the mere mortgagee of the ship; but if you think otherwise, we would suggest that the amount of freight payable by Phillips, King, and Co. should be deposited in some bank, and that the facts, which cannot, we think, be in dispute, be put into the shape of a case for the opinion of the court. All stops should be removed against payment of the charter freight by Phillips, King, and Co. We shall be glad to hear from you as soon as possible.

We are, dear Sir, yours very truly,
COTTERILL and SONS.

In reply to this letter Mr. Baker, the agent of the deft.'s solicitor, wrote:

Pharamond.

Dear Sirs,—In reply to yours of the 11th inst. I beg to forward you on the other side copy of the letter received by me from my client this morning, which will convey his views better than words of my own.

The copy of the letter referred to was this:

Pharamond.

Dear Sir,—I have seen Mr. Tanner on Messrs. Cotterill and Sons' letter to you of the 11th inst., respecting Mr. R. J. Brown's claim to the homeward freight of this vessel. It is clear from Messrs. Cotterill and Sons' letter that they are ignorant of the circumstance that Mr. Tanner took an assignment of all freight and earnings of this vessel by an indenture bearing even date with his registered mortgage, and which is mentioned in the latter. With this assignment Mr. Tanner considers his claim to the freight payable by Messrs. Phillips and King cannot be questioned, and even assuming that there was simply the statutory mortgage I cannot arrive at the same conclusion as Messrs. Cotterill and Sons state they have done. Mr. Tanner will release the freight upon receiving from Messrs. Phillips and King the freight payable under the charter-party.—Yours truly, EDMUND H. CLARKE.

The plt. alleged that, when he took his assignment, he had neither notice of the deft.'s claim nor any means of obtaining information of the same, further than appeared by the register of the ship, and which register, although it recorded the deft.'s mortgage on the ship, made no reference to his alleged separate security on the freight. He therefore submitted that he was entitled by virtue of his assignment, and the notice thereof given by him to the charterers, to priority over the alleged charge on the freight claimed by the deft.

The bill, which was filed against the charterers and the owner of the vessel as well as the deft. Tanner, prayed (inter alia) for a declaration that the plt. was entitled to a charge on the said freight in priority to the deft. That if the court should be of opinion that the deft.'s securities had priority over the plt.'s charge, then that the plt. might be at liberty to redeem the deft., and that he might be decreed to execute proper transfers of the premises comprised in his securities to the plt., the plt. submitting in such case to pay what should be found due and owing to the deft., or else that the premises comprised in the deft.'s securities might be realised and the proceeds duly applied under the direction of the court. That the defts. might be restrained from paying the freight payable under the charter-party or any part thereof to any other person than the plt., except under the court's direction, and from doing or continuing to do any act whereby Messrs. Phillips, King, and Co. might be prevented from paying the freight to the plt. And that a receiver might be appointed.

The deft. Tanner by his answer alleged that, on the arrival of the Pharamond in London from Alga Bay, he learnt for the first time that the vessel had been chartered by Messrs. Phillips, King, and Co. and he immediately placed his agent in possession of her, but not before she had broken bulk. He further alleged that he was totally ignorant of the plt.'s alleged transactions with Hall in respect of the freight, and he submitted that he had no means whatever of giving notice of his securities to parties who had no interest when such securities were taken, and of whom he knew nothing, and that if the plt. had searched the register and then applied to him for information, the fact of the assignment of all the freight and earnings of the vessel would have been communicated to him. He further submitted that it was impossible for him to have given notice of his assignment to Messrs. Phillips, King, and Co., as he was not aware until the vessel's arrival in London, that they were the charterers. He therefore claimed to be entitled to the freight, not only as first mortgagee of the vessel, but also upon the ground of his having taken possession of her, and stopped the delivery of the cargo by giving notice of his securities before the freight was paid or payable.

Malins, Q.C. and Druce for the plt. contended that it was incumbent upon the deft. to have put himself in possession of the ship before the discharge of the cargo, but nothing was done on his part until after the cargo had been partly discharged; consequently he had never been in the position of a carrier, and could claim no lien on the freight. The plt. had no knowledge of the deft.'s assignment. The deft. had throughout acted with great carelessness: he had taken no steps to give notice of his charge on the freight, but had merely registered the mortgage on the ship. The plt., on the other hand, had served the charterers with due notice of his security, and had done everything in his power to insure his claim. They therefore submitted that he was entitled, as assignee without notice of any previous incumbrance, to priority over the deft. They cited

Cato v. Irving, 5 De G. & Sm. 225;
Gardner v. Cazenove, 1 H. & N. 423;
Lindsay v. Gibbs, 22 Beav. 522;
Kerswill v. Bishop, 2 C. & J. 529.

E. K. Karlake, for the deft. Tanner, argued that in equity the deft.'s assignment was of equal value with the plt.'s. A security on future freight was as good as that on freight actually being earned, and it was only where the second assignee had no notice of the previous incumbrance that he could claim priority; but here the plt. at the time of his assignment had constructive notice of the deft.'s claim on the freight; it was referred to in the deed mortgaging the interest in the vessel to the deft., and the plt., having knowledge of that deed, was is presumed to have made himself acquainted with the whole of its contents. The deft. had done all that he could to perfect his security on the freight. At the time of his assignment the vessel was lying idle, and there was no one then to whom notice could be given; he could not know when the vessel was likely to be chartered without keeping an agent always on board, but as soon as he heard of the charter-party he gave notice to the charterers. Moreover, it was not essential to give notice until the freight had been actually earned. He cited

THE VICE-CHANCELLOR.—I think that the right of the deft. as against the right claimed by the plt. in the freight of this particular voyage cannot prevail. It is clearly established that freight by a particular voyage can be assigned, notwithstanding the fact of the ship and the freight generally having been previously mortgaged. It was so decided by the M. R. in Lindsay v. Gibbs (supra). It is in vain to say that the mere notice of the deft.'s existing mortgage can in any way affect the assignee of this particular voyage. The assignment to Tanner was an assignment of all freights to be earned after 1862, but he took no steps to secure his claim, and it was not until the plt. had given notice of his security that he exercised his right to take possession. I consider that the question has been already disposed of by the decision in Lindsay v. Gibbs, but the principle, which is of much older date than that case, amounts to this, that the right of a first mortgagee who does not choose to secure his incumbrance cannot prevail as against the right of a second mortgagee who has taken that trouble. There must be a decree for the plt. with costs. The plt. will pay the charterers their costs in the first instance, and recover them afterwards from the deft. The charterers must pay over the freight after deducting all proper disbursements.

ERROR FROM THE COMMON PLEAS.

Monday, Feb. 5, 1866.

TAMVACO V. SIMPSON.

Ship and shipping—Charter-party—Freight—Advances on freight—Lien—Court of competent jurisdiction—Estoppel.

A charter-party contained a clause that freight should be paid "on unloading and right delivery of the cargo, less advances in cash at current rate of exchange; one-half of the freight to be advanced at freighter's acceptance at three months, on signing bills of lading." The charterer gave his acceptance accordingly, and received from the purchaser of the cargo the agreed price of the cargo, less the amount of freight remaining to be paid to the captain on delivery at Alexandria, the port of discharge. Before the acceptance became due, and before the vessel arrived at Alexandria, the charterer became insolvent, and executed an inspector-ship-deed. The captain, having heard of the insolvency, refused to give up the cargo without payment of the whole freight, which was ultimately guaranteed by persons at Alexandria, at the request of the purchaser of the cargo. The captain sued them in the Consular Court of Alexandria, and they, by the authority of the purchaser of the cargo, paid him the whole amount of the freight. The charterer's acceptance came to maturity after the captain had obtained the guarantee for payment of the whole freight, and was dishonoured:

Held, first, that the purchaser of the cargo was entitled to receive it on payment of half the freight:

Held, secondly, that the proceedings in the Consular Court did not debar him from recovering in this court the amount paid to the captain in excess of what he was entitled to demand.

Error on a judgment of the C. P. on a special case, a full report of which will be found in 13 L. T. Rep. N. S. 160. The judgment of the court below was for the plt.

Lewers appeared for the plt. in error, and Mellish Q. C. (Bidder with him) for the deft. in error.

POLLOCK, C. B.—We are all of opinion that this judgment must be affirmed, and as the court below entered so fully upon the question I do not think it necessary to say more than that, in my opinion, the bill of exchange was not given as an advance to be repaid, but as an actual prepayment. It is so stated in the receipt which was indorsed by the shipowner upon the bill of lading, which bill was passed to the plt., a bond fide indorsee, before the bill of exchange had been actually dishonoured, and he was entitled to have the cargo upon paying the residue of the freight.

MARTIN, B.—I give my judgment for the plt. in the court below on the ground that there was no lien on the cargo at Alexandria on account of the insolvency of De Mattos, and the probable dishonour of the bill consequent upon it.

BLACKBURN, J.—I also shall express no opinion as to whether the bill was a prepayment of freight or a mere advance, but I agree in thinking that there was no lien while the bill was current. I cannot conceive it to have been the intention of the parties that the shipowners should receive both the bill and payment. The vessel arrived before the bill was dishonoured, and there was a conversation of the cargo; therefore the plt. is entitled to recover.

Judgment of the court below affirmed.

SURREY SUMMER ASSIZES, 1866.

Guildford, Wednesday, Aug. 8, 1866.

(Before CHANNELL, B.)

ALDWORTH V. STEWART.

Ship—Power of the captain—Assault and imprisonment.

The captain of a ship has authority to exercise so much force as is necessary for the safety of the ship.

To imprison a passenger in his cabin for seven days for alleged insolence to the captain personally is an exercise of such power, and an action for the false imprisonment will lie.

Nisi Prius.]

THE DAFNE v. THE LADY NORMANBY.

[Ass.]

This was an action for an assault and false imprisonment, to which def. pleaded that he was the captain of a passenger ship trading between Melbourne and London, and that the plt. was a passenger in the ship, and misconducted himself towards the def., and so behaved himself that it became necessary for the preservation of due discipline on board the ship, and for the safe and proper conduct of the ship, that the plt. should be taken to and confined in his cabin; and that def., when the plt. had been requested to go and had refused, "gently laid his hands upon the plt. for the purpose of compelling him to go to his cabin, using no unnecessary violence, and by reason of the plt.'s wrongfully struggling and resisting, the def. necessarily and unavoidably a little assaulted him, and for the preservation of due discipline necessarily imprisoned him and kept him imprisoned."

Replication, first, denying the plea; secondly, that def. used excessive and unnecessary violence.

Murphy appeared for the plt.

Sir Geo. Heyman appeared for the def.

It was proved that the plt. had resided in Australia for thirteen years, and in June last was a first-class passenger to England in the Red Rover, a ship of which the def. was the captain. Soon after embarkation the plt., who was accompanied by his wife, complained of the provisions; the def. was much offended, warm words were used, and ultimately the plt. was by the def.'s order taken forcibly to his cabin, and kept there for seven days. The heat was very great, and the close confinement affected his health. On his representing this to the captain, and on the petition of others of the passengers, he was released. The official log contained the following entry: "Whereas on the 2nd May 1866 Mr. Aldworth, a saloon passenger, was confined to his cabin for his insolence for putting his hand to his nose to the captain, which was witnessed also by Richard Rogers, apprentice, and he is required there to stay until he writes an apology for his insolent conduct." The plt. denied this alleged act, but admitted that he laughed and grinned at the def. A fellow passenger was called to confirm his story, and the captain and the boy Rogers affirmed the accuracy of the log; that it had been read to plt., and an offer made to him to come out if he would tender an apology.

In answer to a question by the Judge, the def. stated that he knew of no custom or usage in the Australian passenger line of imprisoning passengers for alleged insolence to the officer in command; but he said that he had known it to be done.

CHANNELL, B.—There is a distinction between merely excluding a passenger from the dinner-table if he did not conduct himself properly and imprisoning him. He believed the custom in the East India passenger ships to be to exclude from the table.

Sir G. Heyman, for the defence, said it was an action of a trumpety character, a case for merely nominal damages. The captain had a difficult and responsible duty, and the necessary discipline of a ship could not be preserved unless he had power to some reasonable extent to punish for insolence.

Murphy, in reply, said that it was a case of the utmost importance as well as novelty, and it would practically determine whether the captains of passenger ships were privileged to beat and imprison passengers at their own will.

CHANNELL, B., in summing up, said that it had been rightly termed a case of great importance. The def. was not responsible for bad provisions; that fault was with others. But the question for them was, whether the def. had supported his plea justifying the assault, which was not denied. This was the point to which he would direct their attention. It was undoubtedly necessary that the captain of a ship should be intrusted with considerable authority, and it was true as a general proposition that the captain had some authority over the passengers as well as over the crew. But this authority was based upon necessity, and was limited to the preservation of necessary discipline and the safety of the ship. It was true that the captain was not bound to wait for actual mutiny, and he might arrest any movements towards it on the part of the passengers or crew. But then there must be some as calculated, in the apprehension of a reasonable man, to interfere with the safety of the ship or the due prosecution of the voyage. He referred to the authorities cited in Maude and Pollock's Treatise on Merchant Shipping Law. The necessity for exercising a due control over the use of this arbitrary authority was all the greater, because it was exercised on the high seas, on a sort of floating territory, perhaps thousands of miles from land, without opportunity, until weeks or months afterwards, of appealing to the law for redress in case the authority should be abused. The def., in his evidence, admitted an assault and a false imprisonment, and of a very serious character, and for which he must be liable, unless he made out his justification. Upon that the question was whether, in view of the seriousness, it was really necessary for the safety of the ship, or the due prosecution of the voyage, that the plt. should have been thus seized and imprisoned. The jury would bear in mind that the ship was one of considerable magnitude, and must have had a considerable crew; and could they say that they were satisfied that the plt.'s conduct, whatever it was, rendered such measures necessary for the safety or due management of the ship? He denied the particular act alleged, but even assuming it had been committed, did it raise any necessity for such treatment? Even if there was any necessity for the exercise of the captain's authority, was the necessity made out to the extent to which it had been exercised? For the plt. not only denied the alleged justification, but set up excess. Those, then, were the two questions which arose—had there been any necessity for the exercise of the authority? and, even if there had been such a necessity, had there been excess beyond what was necessary?

*Verdict for the plt., damages 3*l.

COURT OF ADMIRALTY.

THE DAFNE v. THE LADY NORMANBY.

Admiralty regulations—Customs—Rules of the road—Construction of—Sailing ships meeting and on—Collision.

11th regulation: If two sailing ships are meeting and on, or nearly end on, so as to involve risk of collision, the helm of both shall be put to port, so that each may pass on the port side of the other.

12th regulation: Where two sailing ships are crossing so as to involve risk of collision, then, if they have the wind on different sides, the ship with the wind on the port side shall keep out of the way of the ship with the wind on the starboard side; except in the case in which the ship with the wind on the port side is close-hauled, and the other ship free, in which case the latter ship shall keep out of the way; but if they have the wind on the same side, or if one of them has the wind aft, the ship which is to windward shall keep out of the way of the ship which is to leeward.

Brett, Q. C. and E. C. Clarkson for the Dapper.

Deane, Q. C. and Vernon Lushington for the Lady Normanby.

Dr. LUSHINGTON gave judgment in this case, which was an action brought by the owner of the brig Dapper, 177 tons register, from Sunderland, coal-laden for Ipswich, against the brig Lady Normanby, 287 tons register, from Havre de Grace, in ballast, for Newcastle, to recover for a total loss resulting from a collision between them off Kettleness, near Whitby, about seven p. m. on the 23rd Feb. last. For the Dapper the wind was stated as W.S.W., and the weather as dark but fine; for the Lady Normanby the former was represented as W. by S., and the latter as clear. The case for the Dapper was that, the tide being the last quarter ebb, and of the force of about one knot, she was under double-reefed topsails, on the starboard tack, going at between four and five knots, steering S.E., carrying proper lights, when those on board her observed three green lights on her starboard bow, at some distance apart, and apparently belonging to vessels, proceeding so as to pass clear of her on her starboard side, and she kept her course; that the first two of such vessels did pass clear of her on her starboard side, but that the last—the Lady Normanby—which, when her green light was first seen from the Dapper, was distant about a mile, about three points on her starboard bow, after continuing for some time with her green light only in view, opened her red light and shut in her green light to the Dapper, and caused danger of a collision with the Dapper; and thereupon the helm of the Dapper was ported, and afterwards put hard a-port, notwithstanding which the Lady Normanby ran against and with her port bow struck the Dapper a violent blow on her port bow and stove it in, and did her so much damage that she soon began to sink. It was then alleged that the Lady Normanby at once sailed away without rendering or attempting to render any assistance to the Dapper or those on board her, although those in charge of the Lady Normanby could, without danger to the Lady Normanby or her crew, have rendered such assistance, and although the Lady Normanby was loudly hailed from the Dapper and requested to stand by her; that endeavours were made by the master and crew of the Dapper to save her, but such endeavours were ineffectual, and they were compelled to take to the long boat and leave her, and she was totally lost, with everything on board her, the long boat being taken in tow by a brig, and towed until she was off Whitby, when she was cast off, and pulled into that place by the master and crew of the Dapper; that just before the collision the Lady Normanby appeared to have luffed, and her green light was again seen from the Dapper; that those on board the Lady Normanby did not keep a proper and efficient look-out; that the helm of the Lady Normanby was improperly ported; that the helm of the Lady Normanby was improperly starboarded; that the collision was occasioned by the negligent and improper navigation of the Lady Normanby, and that no blame with regard to the collision is attributable to the Dapper, nor to any one on board her. The answer of the Lady Normanby pleaded, that it was about low water, and she was proceeding under two double-reefed topsails, jib, foretopmast staysail, foresail, mainsail, and trysail, close-hauled on the port tack, heading N.W. by N., going five knots, carrying the Admiralty regulation lights, when the red and green lights of the Dapper were perceived a mile to a mile and a half off, bearing about one point on her port bow; that shortly afterwards the Dapper shut in her red light, and advanced, with her green light visible, in a direction to pass the Lady Normanby on her starboard side; that the Lady Normanby kept her course close-hauled to the wind, exhibiting her green light only to those on board the Dapper; and that when the vessels were a short distance only from each other, the Dapper ported her helm and exhibited her red light to the Lady Normanby, and rendered a collision between the two vessels imminent, whereupon the helm of the Lady Normanby was put hard a-port, notwithstanding which the Dapper with her port bow struck the Lady Normanby on her port bow with great violence, stove in the same, broke her foreyard, and rendered her unmanageable, so that she was unable to heave to. It was then pleaded that the collision was occasioned by the negligence or improper navigation of the Dapper, and that it was not in any way occasioned by the Lady Normanby. There was extreme difficulty in ascertaining what was the truth amidst this conflicting evidence, because it appears to the court that the evidence on both sides was incumbered with much improbability. Looking to the Act of Parliament, how does the case stand with respect to the obligations imposed on the one party or the other? Does the case fall within the statutory regulations or not? Now, one of these vessels was pursuing a N.N.W. course, and the other was originally pursuing a S.S.E. course, but just about the time of collision a S.E. course. That being so, what says the 11th article: "If two sailing ships are meeting end on, or nearly end on, so as to involve risk of collision, the helms of both shall be put to port, so that each may pass on the port side of the other." If these two vessels were approaching each other in the manner which is stated in this article, then, of course, the duty was imposed upon both of porting at a reasonable opportunity and time; and if that they did not do, both would be to blame. If the case does not fall within the 11th article, does it fall within the 12th? "When two sailing ships are crossing so as to involve risk of collision, then if they have the wind on different sides the ship with the wind on the port side shall keep out of the way of the ship with the wind on the starboard side, except in the case in which the ship with the wind on the port side is close-hauled and the other ship free, in which case the latter ship shall keep out of the way." Now, if these vessels were not meeting, were they crossing so as fairly to bring the case within the provisions of this article. If they were crossing so as to come under the regulations prescribed by this article, then it is clear that, as the Lady Normanby was close-hauled on the port tack, and the Dapper was free upon the starboard tack, it was the duty of the Dapper to keep out of the way; but attached to that there is another consideration, which is, if the case falls within this 12th article, not only was the Dapper bound to keep out of the way, but the Lady Normanby was bound by the 18th article to have kept her course. I will assume that neither of these articles applies, and that the vessels were sailing, meeting in parallel courses, so that there was no real risk of collision if both kept their courses. Then I apprehend neither of these articles would directly apply, but that in that case the vessel would be to blame which deviated from her proper course, and so produced the collision. These are the three sets of circumstances I request your consideration upon. You will also judge from the circumstances in evidence whether the Lady Normanby, as charged, heartlessly abandoned her duty of giving assistance. It appears that the Lady Normanby was on the port tack close-hauled bound for Newcastle, and the Dupper was sailing free, bound for Ipswich; and, according to the case made against the Lady Normanby, it is this, that the two other vessels that were in company with her passed straight on without any difficulty, and went past this vessel and proceeded on their voyage, but that she unnecessarily ported her helm in order to pass a vessel which was ahead about seventy fathoms off the Dupper. I cannot understand upon what possible view of this case it is consistent with probability that a vessel close-hauled on the port tack should, in order to pass another vessel which, according to the case made, there was no reason to suppose she would come in contact with, port her helm, and endeavour to cross the bows of that vessel, except it is that she would lose her way, and have to make it up afterwards. The case made by the Lady Normanby against the Dupper is, that she was sailing on a south-east course, and when there was no probability of conflict she without rhyme or reason ported her helm, and so brought about the collision.

The Court was assisted by Captain Farrer and Captain Close, of the Trinity-house.

THE ALLAN v. THE FLORA.

Rules of the road—Admiralty regulations—General construction of.

The 19th article of the Admiralty Regulations of the rules of the road, which directs that "in obeying and construing all the other and previous regulations, due regard is to be had to all dangers of navigation, and to any special circumstances existing in any particular case, rendering a departure from such rules necessary, in order to avoid immediate danger," does not prescribe any specific course to be adopted or pursued, since such prescription would necessarily involve on many occasions the destruction of the very ships it was framed to preserve.

Brett, Q. C. and E. C. Clarkson appeared for the Allan.

Millward, Q. C. and Vernon Lushington for the Flora.

Dr. LUSHINGTON gave judgment in this case, which was a suit instituted by the British ship Allan, 924 tons register, from the Gulf of St. Lawrence to London, with a cargo of deals, against the Spanish barque Flora, 320 tons register, from Havannah to Hamburg, with a cargo of tobacco, for a loss resulting from a collision between them about fourteen miles south of the Eddystone Lighthouse, on the morning of the 16th Nov. last. The Allan represented that the weather was clear, with light clouds and stars visible, and a strong westerly swell. The Flora stated the night as dark. The case for the Allan was, that the tide being flood running half-knot, she was under all plain sail, close-hauled on the starboard tack, steering E. by S. $\frac{1}{2}$ S. making four knots, carrying her proper lights, when the green light of the Flora was seen, distant about a mile, and about three points on her lee bow; that she (the Allan) was kept as clear to the wind as possible, and as the Flora, which was on the port tack, continued to approach the Allan without any apparent change in her course, those on board the Allan hailed the Flora loudly and repeatedly, notwithstanding which the Flora ran aftermost hawse of the Allan, and with the fore shroud of her starboard main rigging carried away the Allan's jibboom and bowsprit, and being entangled with the wreck thereof swung round with her starboard bow into the starboard main chains of the Allan, and there lay beating for nearly two hours, doing a great deal of damage; after which the Allan was drawn clear astern by setting her main and mizen topsails, the top-gallantsails braced all aback, all the canvas having been taken in on her foremast directly after the collision to save such mast from being carried away; that as soon as the two vessels were clear of each other the crew of the Allan, as she still lay aback, proceeded to secure her foremast, the headstays of which were all adrift, and while engaged in doing so the Flora ran down towards the Allan, and owing to the negligence and mismanagement of those on board her caught the port bow and anchor of the Allan with her port main-rigging, and did further serious damage to the Allan, and was finally got clear by cutting away some of her said port main rigging; that the collision and the damages arising therefrom, were occasioned by the neglect and improper navigation of the Flora, and no blame in respect thereto is attributable to any of those on board the Allan. The defence of the Flora, on whose behalf a cross-action was brought, set forth that she was close-hauled on the starboard tack, heading E.S.E., carrying her regulation lights brightly burning; that she was taken aback, and having come round on the port tack she proceeded on that tack, heading W.S.W., for some time, to get sufficient way on the barque to tack her; that the barque being ready to tack, and the sea appearing clear for that purpose, the Flora was put in stays, all hands being on deck; whilst in stays a light was suddenly seen by Antonio de Gonlisolo, the look-out man, on the barque's starboard side, and immediately afterwards the barque was struck on her starboard quarter with great violence by the stem of the Allan coming up channel, and on board of which no regulation lights could be seen; that the two vessels fell alongside, head and stem, and remained in contact for nearly three hours; that the vessels at last got clear, and the Allan dropped clear astern for some distance. The Flora having lost nearly all her sails, lay quite powerless. It was then alleged that the Allan then gathered way, and by bad management advanced and came with great violence into the port side of the Flora, and did much further damage; that after the vessels finally cleared, the Flora put into Plymouth; that the collisions were both caused by the improper navigation of the Allan, and by the negligence of those on board her, and were in no degree the result of any neglect on the part of the Flora. The questions for our consideration are, which of these two vessels was to blame for the collisions which have occurred, or whether they were both to blame on the same account. It appears that the Flora intended to go into stays, and was, according to her own account, in stays. The question will be, whether she took those measures which were proper to be taken preliminary to going into stays, and whether she did that after having taken a proper survey of the state of the sea immediately surrounding her, so as not to run the risk of a collision in case of a vessel being near her. According to the Flora's own statement, she had one person on the watch at the time in question, and, according to her own statement, from the admitted facts, and according to her own plea, the Allan was not seen coming, although she was a large vessel. Why did she not see the Allan? Assuming for the moment the Allan carried lights, why did she not see those lights? There was nothing in the state of the weather to prevent her seeing them, because, taking the whole of the evidence together, it is clear that it was an ordinary night, and you might see a vessel carrying lights at the distance of a mile, and she does not see them. Provided she could have seen them at that distance, I apprehend she would have avoided, or might have avoided, by adopting proper measures, the collision altogether; that is to say, she probably need not have gone into stays in the immediate neighbourhood of a vessel that was coming down upon her. What must be the reasons, and the only reasons, why the lights were not seen in due time? Either there was an insufficient look-out on board the Flora, or there were no lights burning brightly on board the Allan. There are three witnesses to whom it would be unfair to impute perjury from the Allan, who state that the lights were burning at the time, and there is nothing to negative that on the other side. It was said by them that the lights were not seen, and under the circumstances the balance of evidence is in favour of the Allan, that she had her lights burning at the time. If the Flora ought to have seen the Allan in due time, and if she had so seen her, she might and ought to have taken measures to avoid the collision; there can be no other conclusion than that the Flora was to blame. Then it may be asked, was or was not the Allan to blame for the course she pursued? It is abundantly clear that, in the first instance, she did that which was right, because she was on the starboard tack close-hauled, and according to the 12th Admiralty regulation she was bound to have kept her course. She did keep her course; and was she to blame in not taking any other measure to avoid a collision? It may be that the circumstances are such in a case like this that a departure from the strict rule of road as laid down in the Admiralty regulations is justified, and the question before the court as far as the Allan is concerned is, whether there was such a justification for departure from the rule in the present case. I have no doubt, looking at the 19th Admiralty regulation, that if the circumstances of the case were such that there was immediate danger, perfectly clear to the apprehension of those present, the Allan would have been justified in departing from the strict letter of the 12th rule. The 19th rule does not prescribe any particular measures that should be adopted in departing from the strict terms of any of the previous regulations that it governs, but it merely states that in construing and obeying these regulations, as far as possible, you may take into consideration urgent attendant circumstances. I believe that is common sense, for if any rule were laid down by Parliament or any other authority that could never be departed from in certain states of circumstances, such a rule would necessarily involve, on many occasions, the destruction of those ships, which it was intended to preserve. Upon a careful consideration of the evidence on both sides, the Court is of opinion that the Flora was solely to blame, and there must be a decree to that effect.

THE UNITED KINGDOM, THE HERCULES, THE RESOLUTE, AND THE RELIEF v. THE SYRIAN.

Salvage claim—Duration of service and extent of property rescued.

In awarding the amount for salvage services well performed, the Court holds the shortness of the duration of such services as an element of meritoriousness; and where the amount of property saved is very large, the Court will not take advantage of the extent of such amount further than to give a liberal reward, according to the meritoriousness of the services actually performed.

Aspinall, Q. C. and Cohen appeared for the United Kingdom.

The Queen's Advocate and E. C. Clarkson appeared for the Hercules.

Deane, Q. C. and Butt appeared for the Resolute and the Relief.

Milward, Q. C. and V. Lushington appeared for the Syrian.

Dr. LUSHINGTON gave judgment in this case, which was an action for salvage compensation against the screw steamship Syrian, of 1500 tons, from Alexandria to Liverpool, with cotton, by the steamships United Kingdom, Hercules, Resolute, and Relief, for services rendered to the steamer at the entrance of the Mersey on the 24th Nov. 1865. From the evidence in the case it appeared that the Syrian, on-coming into the Mersey, grounded on the Zebra Flats, the sea being at the time very heavy, and the wind W.N.W. After remaining for some time in this position, and failing to get off, she made signals for assistance. These eventually were answered by the United Kingdom, which, coming up, made fast to the Syrian, and assisted in partly removing her from her position on the bank. The steam-tug Hercules then came up, and the United Kingdom and the Hercules succeeded in getting the Syrian off, but she afterwards touched on the Little Burbo Bank. The steam-tug Resolute then came up, and the three tugs, by their united efforts, got the steamer into the channel; the steam-tug Relief then came up, and it was alleged that by the assistance she gave, she in reality rescued, or prevented the steamer from getting on the Taylor Bank until the other tugs helped to tow her up the Mersey to the Birkenhead Docks. The Syrian, however, being a long ship, could not be taken into the lock leading from the low-water basin into the Birkenhead Docks, and she was therefore taken by the Resolute and the Relief to the Morpeth Dock, where she was moored in safety. It was alleged in the evidence on the part of the salvors that some of the crew of the Syrian were so alarmed for their safety at the time the steamer was on the Zebra Flats, that they made preparation for effecting their escape by lowering a boat, and that this boat, just when the United Kingdom arrived, was capsized, those in her having previously got back to their ship. It was also alleged that the Syrian's steering apparatus was out of order, and that her engines were defective in action. Great labour and exertion were attendant on the performance of the services of the tugs, and damage arose to the tugs in rendering such services, from the destruction of their hawsers and other gear. The pilot of the Syrian was examined on behalf of the United Kingdom to show the extent of the services rendered by that vessel; and the damage alleged to have been sustained by the tug in giving assistance was admitted on the part of the steamer, and the representations of the tug's crew were in this respect taken as true. The value of the property saved was 120,000*l*. On the part of the owners of the Syrian, it was admitted that a salvage service of great merit had been rendered, and for which the salvors should be liberally remunerated; but it was contended that many of the facts alleged by the tugs as to the extent of the services rendered by them were greatly exaggerated. All that had to be considered was the fair result of the evidence of the pilot, the extent of the danger actually incurred, and the extent of the services actually rendered by each of the tugs employed; and these considerations would enable the court to arrive at something like an equitable conclusion as to the quantum of salvage to be given for the whole service, and the proportion in which the amount awarded should be divided amongst the different claimants. The court had to consider also the state of the weather at the time when the service was rendered, the condition of the steamer in respect to her steerage powers, and whether the locality where the transaction took place was peculiarly dangerous or not. The danger of the steamer beating to pieces on the Zebra Flats, the probability of the statement that she was in still greater danger when on the Burbo Bank, the quarter from which the wind blew, and the services then undoubtedly rendered by all the tugs, must also be well weighed. It was urged that the service of the Relief tug, when the steamer was in danger of getting on the Taylor Bank, were very prominent, and they certainly seemed to have been very prompt and energetic. As to the period of time which the salvage services occupied, the court had often had occasion to observe that the shorter the period occupied in rescuing a ship from distress the more meritorious was the service. In dealing with the present case, the court also bears in mind that there is a large amount of property saved; but for the single purpose of remembering that it is enabled out of an ample fund fitly to remunerate meritorious services well performed; and the court does not hold the large value of the property saved as a ground for attempting to extort from the owners of that property or from the underwriters, as the case may be, more than full recompence for such services. In this case there are sufficient ingredients to show that a considerable amount of salvage ought to be given. And, looking at the danger with which the property was threatened, and the risk to life that might have occurred to those on board the steamer, the Court, under the advice and concurring with the opinion of the learned assessors, awards to the United Kingdom, 3000*l.*; to the Resolute, 2800*l.*; to the Hercules, 2500*l.*; and to the Relief, 2000*l.*, besides damages and costs.

THE ESTHER v. THE CONCORDIA.

[ADM.]

THE ESTHER v. THE CONCORDIA.

Admiralty regulations as to rules of the road—Construction of — “Steamships meeting end on” — Collision.

13th regulation: If two ships meeting under steam are crossing so as to involve risk of collision, the helm of both shall be put to port, so that each may pass on the port side of the other.

14th regulation: If two ships under steam are crossing so as to involve risk of collision, the ship which has the other on her starboard side shall keep out of the way of the other.

19th regulation: In obeying and construing the above rules due regard is to be had to all the dangers of navigation, and to any special circumstances which may exist in each particular case rendering a departure from such rules necessary in order to avoid immediate danger.

Deane, Q. C. and E. C. Clarkson appeared for the Esther.

Milward, Q. C. and V. Lushington for the Concordia.

Dr. LUSHINGTON gave judgment in this case, which was an action brought by the owners of the French screw steamship Esther, 261 tons register, with a general cargo from London to Rouen and Paris, in charge of a duly licensed pilot, against the General Steam Navigation Company's paddle steamship Concordia, 326 tons register, from Boulogne to London with passengers and cargo, to recover for the loss resulting from a collision between them off St. Katherine's wharf, in the river Thames, between twelve and one p.m. on the 16th Nov. last. The Esther represented the wind as easterly, and the weather as fine and clear; the Concordia stated the former as westerly, very light, and the latter as fine, but hazy. The case for the Esther was, that the tide being nearly high water, and of the force of about one knot per hour, she was under steam proceeding down the river nearly in mid-channel, and at the rate of about three knots an hour, when the paddle-wheel steamer Concordia was seen coming up the river under steam, nearly a-head of, and at a distance of about one-third of a mile from the Esther; that the helm of the Esther was ported, and afterwards put hard a-port, but that those on board the Concordia did not port the helm of the Concordia as they ought to have done, but, on the contrary, improperly starboarded the same, and although the engines of the Esther were stopped and reversed, the Concordia, without having duly stopped and reversed her engines, came into collision with the Esther, the starboard fore sponson of the Concordia taking the stern of the Esther, and thereby great damage was occasioned to the Esther. It was then alleged that the collision was occasioned by the improper conduct of those on board the Concordia, in neglecting to keep a good look-out and port their helm, and improperly starboarding it, and in neglecting to duly stop and reverse their engines, and by improper navigation. The defence on the part of the Concordia was, that she was being navigated very carefully and slowly up the river to the south of mid-channel, making two knots, and frequently stopping on account of the craft in the river. Just shortly before the screw steamer Esther was observed, the helm of the Concordia was put hard a-starboard to avoid a barge; that the Esther was then noticed coming down the river, about a quarter of a mile distant, on the Concordia's starboard bow; that if the Esther had kept her course there would have been no risk of a collision, but the Esther would have passed well clear on the starboard hand of the Concordia; that the Concordia's helm was accordingly kept hard a-starboard, but as she had very little way through the water her head did not pay off considerably; that the Esther, however, improperly, and without any reason, put her helm hard a-port, and came towards the Concordia, whereupon the Concordia stopped, and reversed her engines, but that the Esther, notwithstanding she was hailed, drove stem on with great violence into the starboard fore sponson of the Concordia; that the collision was wholly occasioned by the improper navigation of the Esther, and by the negligence of those on board her, and was not occasioned by those on board the Concordia. The evidence is more unsatisfactory and more difficult, if not impossible to be reconciled. I see no reason to impute to any of the witnesses on either side an intention to deceive the court. I believe they are all entitled to the benefit of intentional veracity, though they differ so much among themselves, and are contradicted by others. You will not forget, in considering this case, the usual state of the river, and the circumstances occurring at the time requiring great care, and no doubt being matter of difficulty as proved by the evidence; and you will regard all the occurrences that happened at the moment in question. The true question raised is, whether or not the Concordia was not bound to have ported her helm, and whether the Esther was not to blame for having improperly ported her helm so as to produce this collision. The first point upon the law that arises is, whether these two steamships were meeting end on, or merely end on so as to involve risk of collision, in the words of the 13th article of the ing Rules and Regulations; because, if they so meeting, then the directions are, that the of both ought to be put to port, so that each on the port side of the other, and it is clear he helm of one was not put to port. There are some to this rule, which are contained in the article, which states that "due regard must be any special circumstances which may exist particular case, rendering a departure from necessary"—mark the next words—"in avoid immediate danger." The next point here there existed any special circumstances a departure from the 15th article. What the danger there was on the present occasion led to the fact alleged, that there was a the way, and, if the Concordia had starboard she would have run over it, and probably destruction of life as well as property. one difficulty upon this point, for I am trace through the evidence what became emerge. If the case was that the Concordia had a barge and got ahead of it, then of course could be no immediate danger. If it were put whether there was any immediate danger of into contact with that particular barge, I say there is not evidence to satisfy my mind fact. The evidence of Mr. James, the har- master of London, was, that there was quite a barge round, so that neither could the continue her course straight down the river direction she was going, nor could the Con- cordia because of the vessels round her. arg the vessels round the Concordia there is ch evidence, except that there was ample us of there being vessels to the south. As to from where the Esther was down to where Concordia was when she starboarded, the other so is directly opposed to that of Mr. James. is abundant evidence to the effect that that the way was clear, and that not only might she have pursued her course, but that the she might also have gone on. It appears to ity well agreed that the distance between the and the Concordia when the Esther was first ed from the Concordia was about a quarter of , and the question is whether she had then ured her helm. Though it is a matter I to you which is exceedingly in doubt, yet, as shend, it was after she had starboarded that the Esther. If the Esther was aware at the hat the Concordia was merely dead in the and utterly unable to help herself, and if she spable, and had the power of seeing and ng what the Concordia was doing, and the she was in, then, notwithstanding the rule , and though the vessels might be end on, yet ould not be justified in porting and running in the Concordia. The Concordia represents that she t moving at all, or not perceptibly moving, ght to have been treated almost as a vessel at

Supposing these two ships were crossing involve risk of collision within the meaning words of the 14th article, and the ship which other on her own starboard side should keep the way, what would then be the state of s? The real is, question whether or not there licent evidence to establish that there was s of immediate danger so as to justify the in departing from the regulation which as that two vessels approaching each other end on shall port when there is a risk of s. It was stated for the Concordia that there sges in the way which prevented her from ing with the statute. I am of opinion that s not sufficient evidence to establish im- danger so as to justify a violation of the rule; or deliberation by the elder brethren of the house, they have confirmed my opinion, and I must therefore pronounce against the Concordia.

THE UNA v. THE THOMAS LEE.

Steamers and sailing ships—Collision—Admiralty regulations—Construction of the 15th, 16th, and 19th articles.

Regulation 15:—If two ships, one of which is a sailing ship and the other a steamship, are proceeding in such directions as to involve risk of collision, the steamship should keep out of the way of the sailing ship.

Regulation 18: Where, by the above rule, one of two ships is to keep out of the way, the other shall keep her course, subject to the qualifications contained in the following article, viz.:

Regulation 19: In obeying and construing the above rules due regard must be had to all the dangers of navigation, and due regard must also be had to any special circumstances that may exist in any particular case rendering a departure from such rules necessary in order to avoid immediate danger.

Case of the "sailing ship" (a) in default.

Dunn, Q. C. and Vernon Lushington appeared for the Una.

The Queen's Advocate and E. C. Clifton for the Thomas Lee.

Dr. LUSHINGTON gave judgment in this case, which came before the court on an action brought by the owners of the late brig Una, 246 tons, from London, in ballast for the Tyne, against the screw steamship Thomas Lee, 486 tons, from Newcastle, coal laden, for London, to recover for a total loss resulting from a collision between them in S.W. reach of the Swin; about a mile from the Middle Light, at a quarter past five p.m. on the 21st of last December. The wind was stated by both parties as being N.W. by N. For the brig, the weather was represented as fine and clear but dark, with a moderate breeze; and for the steamer, as dark and rather hazy, blowing a strong breeze. The case for the Una was, that the ebb tide was just commencing, and she was proceeding at the rate of about five knots, heading N.E. by N., close-hauled on the port tack, and carried her coloured lights fixed and screened as required by law, burning bright and clear, when the red and white lights of the steamer were observed by those on board her below the Middle Light vessel and about a point on her starboard bow, and distant about two miles; that she kept her course without any alteration, and the steamer, with her red and white lights alone visible, got clear on to the weather bow of the brig, which still kept her course until the hull of the steamer became visible, and she appeared to be passing so close as to be dangerous, whereupon the helm of the Una was ported a little, but that the steamship suddenly starboarded her helm, and ran at full speed across the bows of the brig, the stem and starboard bow of which came violently in contact with the starboard side of the steamship abaft her midships, whereby everything forward on the brig was carried away. The Thomas Lee, on whose part a cross-action was brought, pleaded that the tide was about high water, and she was steering S.S.W., making seven to eight knots under steam alone, exhibiting the Admiralty regulation light, when the green lights of two vessels, one of which was rather astern of the other, were seen on her starboard bow, and at the distance of about one mile, and directly afterwards the bright light of a vessel riding with her head to the northward was seen ahead, and thereupon her helm was starboarded to pass clear of the vessel riding; that the foremost of the two vessels carrying the green lights kept on her course to pass the steamship on her starboard side, but the sternmost of them (which proved to be the Una), instead of keeping also on her course, altered her course under a port helm, and notwithstanding that the helm of the Thomas Lea was put hard a-starboard, the Una ran into and struck the Thomas Lea on the starboard side, about twelve feet before the poop, and stove in her side, and did her so much damage that her cargo ran out of her hold, and she had to be run aground on the Maplin Sand to prevent her from foundering. By the rules established by the authority of Parliament in that case, the duty imposed upon the steamer was to give way, and to keep out of the way of the sailing vessel, and the sailing vessel was directed to keep her course. That being so, the first inquiry was, whether the Thomas Lea did all in her power to keep out of the way of the sailing vessel, whether the measures she took for that purpose were the right measures or not, and whether the collision was brought about by the violation by the sailing vessel of the 18th of the rules, whereby she was directed to keep her course, unless she was compelled, with a view to avoid immediate danger, to adopt a different mode of proceeding. The burden of proof first lies upon the Thomas Lea. She was bound to show she took all the proper measures in order to avoid the collision; but if it should appear that she did not take the proper measures to avoid the collision, and that also the sailing vessel was to blame for altering her course, it signified not whether she ported or starboarded, but that she altered her course, and thereby contributed to the collision. The result would be simply that both the parties would be to blame. With regard to the steamer the statement from the evidence of the second mate was very justly relied on by the Queen's Advocate, and from this it would appear that the steamer came round the Middle Light under a starboard helm, and that as soon almost as she came round the Middle Light, notice was given by the look-out man that there were two green lights two or three points on the starboard bow, and it was admitted on all hands, and had not been questioned in any way whatever, that the sternmost of those green lights was the Una's. The questions to be determined are: first, what, if anything, ought to have been done on board the steamer; and it is not an unimportant question to understand at what distance they were at the time. The evidence was not very clear as to that distance, but it was probably a cable or cable and a half. Before anything was done with regard to the Una, a report was made that there was a bright light right ahead, upon which an order was given by the master to starboard the helm, and the helm was subsequently starboarded, and the consequence was she passed by the bright light, leaving it upon her starboard hand. It appeared, therefore—for there did not appear to have been any alteration made in the course of the steamer at the time—that she would be from originally two to three points, having the Una upon her starboard bow, and she would then be from four and a half to five points. Under those circumstances, so far as can be gathered from the evidence, the steamer proceeded straight on, keeping her course until she approached the Una. Then arose the question as to whether the steamer did everything in her power to avoid the collision whether the statement she gave of the Una was consistent with truth or not was also another consideration, viz., according to the Una's own statement of it she was or was not to blame. If the Una early ported, and thus contributed to the then for that she was to blame. If she under pressure of expectation of success that did not contribute to the collision, a slightly porting would not affect the result. After giving the most careful consideration evidence adduced on both sides, the Court opinion that the Una was solely to blame collision that had occurred, and there was decree to that effect in both actions.

The Court was assisted by Captain De Captain Close, of the Trinity-house.

JUDICIAL COMMITTEE OF THE PRIVY COUNCIL.

Reported by JAMES PATTERSON, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

(Present—The Right Hon. Lord CHURCHILL, KNIGHT BRUCE and TURNER, L. J., Sir COLERIDGE, and Sir E. V. WILLIAMS.)

THE HELENE.

OHRIOFF v. BRISCALL.

Ship—Charter-party—Lading—Negligence in stowage of oil—Action by assignees of bill of lading.

B. shipped forty-seven casks of oil from Lap Liverpool, the bill of lading having on the words "not accountable for leakage." The oil was stowed in the same hold with rags and was formed part of the cargo that was taken on board the desire of the charterers, and nearly half of leaked during the voyage, owing to the heat on the wool. Neither shippers nor shipowners bore the risk of stowing oil with wool. The oil was frequently on board during the loading, and there was no fault or complaint as to the mode of stowage.

Held (reversing the decrees of the Court of Admiralty that, first, the fact that the shipowners were of the risk of stowing the two materials held was no evidence of negligence on the secondly, even if they had known such risk, the fact of the shipowner not putting up bulkheads must have been expensive) was no evidence of negligence. Thirdly, the word "leakage" in the bill of lading was not confined to "ordinary leakage," but included without any limit. Fourthly, the memorandum bill of lading protected the shipowner as to age except that caused by negligence, and there was no negligence shown, there was no action.

Where, whether, if a plea of leave and license is pleadable against the shippers, such plea would allowable against the indorsees of this bill of lading.

This was an appeal from a decree of the Admiralty.

Messrs. Briscall and Co., of Liverpool, and assignees of the bills of lading of certain carried into the port of Liverpool in the Helene, of which Ohrioff and others, of Liverpool, were owners, brought an action against the shipowners under the 6th section of the Admiralty Court Act 1861.

The Helene was a Prussian ship, and at the time of the institution of the suit no owner or charterer was domiciled in England.

On the 6th July 1864 she was lying in the ghorn, and her master entered into a charter with Lloyd and Co., who were merchants and owners of oil at Leghorn. Under that charter Lloyd and Co. from time to time loaded on the ship various goods, and on the 10th Aug. shipped on board thereof forty-seven casks of oil, for which the master of the ship signed a bill of lading in the usual form, and on which was this memorandum—"Weights, measurement, and contents unknown, and not accountable for leakage."

The bill of lading was indorsed in blank by the owners, and assigned to the resps.; and at the time of the institution of the cause the resps. were alleged to be owners of the said olive oil and assignees of the bill of lading.

Messrs. Thomas Lloyd and Co., under the charterparty, appointed one Tito Mirandolie as head stevedore, to superintend the stowage of the ship, and he accordingly superintended such stowage; and Lloyd and Co., or persons acting on their behalf, were continually on board the ship, and saw how the cargo of the ship and the oil were stowed, and no complaint of, or objection to, the manner in which the same were stowed was at any time made by the master or mate, or any of the crew of the ship.

After the casks of oil and the cargo of the said ship had been loaded and stowed, the said Tito Mirandolie, at the office of Lloyd and Co., and with their knowledge and assent, gave the master of the ship a certificate certified by the British consul at Leghorn.

The cargo of the ship was received on board, and stowed as it was presented for shipment by the said Messrs. Thomas Lloyd and Co.; and, amongst other goods, 111 bales of wool, and thirty-four bales of rags, were so received and stowed, and the master of the ship was necessarily obliged to stow the wool and rags in the same hold with and near the oil.

The ship sailed from Leghorn on or about the 28th Aug.; and in the course of the voyage she on several occasions met with and experienced gales of wind, bad weather, and heavy seas, and in consequence pitched and laboured excessively, and quantities of oil were pumped up.

She arrived at Liverpool on or about the 19th Oct. 1864; and on delivering her cargo it was found that a large quantity of the oil had leaked out, and that many of the casks were wholly or partially empty. And the resps. alleged that there was a loss of 2001½ gallons of oil out of 4888½, or thereabouts.

On behalf of the resps. it was alleged that this leakage was not leakage within the meaning of the bill of lading, but that it arose in consequence of the said bales of wool and rags being stowed in the same hold with and near the oil; and that the wool and rags, in the course of the voyage, having become soaked, the staves of the casks were thereby dried up, and the casks rendered leaky.

The stowage of the cargo of the ship was admitted by the resps. to have been in all other respects good.

On the part of the apps. it was contended that the leakage had been occasioned by the slackness and badness of the casks, and had not been occasioned, as alleged, by the resps.; and even if it had been so occasioned, they were not responsible, inasmuch as the said Thomas Lloyd and Co. could not have complained of such stowage, and the resps. were in no better position.

No evidence was given by the resps. as to the state of the casks when shipped at Leghorn, or as to the quantity of oil in them.

The said certificate of the said Tito Mirandolie was tendered in evidence in the court below, but, being objected to on behalf of the resps., the learned judge rejected it.

Evidence was tendered by the resps., objected to by the apps., and received by the learned judge, as to the price at which the empty casks, in which the oil had been contained, were sold.

The following were the material parts of the judgment of

Dr. LUSHINGTON.—The plts., Messrs. Briscall, oil merchants at Liverpool, in June 1864, purchased there a quantity of oil of the agent of Messrs. Lloyd and Co., of Leghorn, a firm largely engaged in the oil trade. In July following Messrs. Lloyd chartered the Prussian barque the Helene to proceed to Liverpool, and they shipped on board her the oil purchased by the plts. In October the vessel reached Liverpool. The oil shipped to be delivered to the plts. was 4888 gallons. The whole quantity actually delivered was less than that quantity by 2000 gallons. The plts. were the assignees of the bill of lading, and also the proprietors of the oil. For the deficiency they bring this action against the ship, in effect against the owners. The first question which arises is, What was the cause of this deficiency? And that question being decided so far as the materials before the court enable it, the next question is, Assuming that the court is right in its opinion as to the facts, whether upon such a given state of facts the plts. are entitled to recover? As to the facts, it is a case of conflicting evidence, and therefore, as I apprehend, it behoves the court to consider at every step on whom the onus probandi rests. The bill of lading is in the ordinary form. It states that the oil was shipped in good condition, that the master is to deliver it in the same good order and condition, save the dangers of the seas; and also that he (the master) is not accountable for leakage. If the master does not so deliver the oil, I apprehend that it lies upon him to allege and prove a legal excuse. He must prove the facts to exonerate him from his obligation to deliver, more especially if such facts, generally speaking, can be proved from the ship only. It is proved in this case, and there is no contradictory evidence, that ordinary leakage does not exceed one per cent. The leakage in this case is therefore extraordinary leakage, and must be accounted for by some extraordinary cause. The plts. allege that the oil was improperly stowed, and particularly that large quantities of rags and wool were stowed in the same hold, near the oil, whereby the damage was occasioned wholly or in part. The defts. allege that the leakage arose from the slackness of the casks, their defective state increasing by bad weather, and they aver that the cargo was well stowed. It is not denied that independently of the mixing rags and wool with the oil casks, the cargo was well stowed. The two principal questions of fact then for consideration are, first, the condition of the casks; and second, the effect of stowing wool and rags in contiguity with, or in the immediate neighbourhood of, the casks of oil. If the casks were defective, it is not and cannot be contended that any loss arising from that cause should fall upon the ship-owners; it is the fault of those who shipped the oil. Now it is to be observed that according to the bill of lading the oil was shipped in good order and condition. So far, therefore, as was apparent, the casks must, I think, be assumed to have been in that state. The shipowner, however, cannot be responsible for secret defects, nor can he in his own defence be stopped from proving them. The non-discovery of secret defects cannot be negligence, nor can it be a part of the contract of the shipowner to protect the shipper from the consequences of his own defective merchandise. I incline to think that the onus probandi upon this point of the condition of the casks is first upon the shipowner, who asserts the affirmative that the casks were defective. The court has, I regret to say, to deal with very conflicting evidence, and that, too, as to simple facts between witnesses of respectability, and some of great experience. The true issue, however, it must be observed, is not whether the casks in question were the best possible casks, but whether they were of the usual and ordinary kind, of ordinary material, strength, and goodness. How this is to be ascertained is, I feel, a question of some difficulty. It is left in some doubt whether mere inspection of the casks would lead to a satisfactory conclusion, or whether nothing short of chipping the casks would enable an experienced person to form a judgment. There is no evidence as to the condition of the casks at Leghorn, except the assertion in the bill of lading; the evidence is all as to their condition on their arrival at Liverpool, which I will now proceed to state. [After stating the details of the evidence the learned Judge continued:] I think the result of the evidence is properly expressed by one of the witnesses, when he said that the storing wool with oil is risky. Then how does the case stand? It is clear that there was great leakage, and that it was not occasioned by the weather. Two causes only for the leakage are suggested—the state of the casks and the effect of the wool. I am of opinion that the casks were not so defective as to occasion the whole of the extraordinary leakage. Then the only remaining possible cause is the effect of the wool upon the oil; and though some of the evidence denies that the wool was the cause in this particular case, all agree that wool might heat and occasion oil casks to leak. Under these circumstances I am compelled, by what I must term the exhaustive method of reasoning, to conclude that the stowage of the wool in the hold with the oil was the cause of this leakage. It is possible that in some degree this leakage may have been occasioned by the defective state of one, two, or more casks; but it is wholly impossible for me in this judgment to pursue inquiry as to the particular casks. Assuming, then, that the loss was occasioned by reason of improper stowage, by want of sufficient separation of the oil and wool by bulkheads, or otherwise by want of ventilation, the question arises, Have the plts. a right of action against the ship in this court? This is denied on the part of the defts. Their argument, if I understand it aright, is as follows: By the 1st section of 18 & 19 Vict. c. 111, the plts., as indorsees of the bill of lading, to whom the property in the goods has passed by reason of the indorsement, have had transferred to and vested in them all rights of suit and liabilities in respect of such goods as if the contract contained in the bill of lading had been made with themselves. Then by the 6th section of the Admiralty Court Act 1861, practically the plts. acquire the same rights against the vessel itself; consequently, the plts. have no better right than Messrs. Lloyd and Co., who shipped the oil. Then it is argued that Messrs. Lloyd and Co. would have had no right; and, therefore, that the plts. have none. The ground on which it is contended that the shippers, Messrs. Lloyd and Co., would have had no rights is, that they, and not the master, were responsible for the defective stowage; for it is said Messrs. Lloyd and Co. were the charterers; by the terms of the charter they furnished the whole cargo, that is, not only the oil sold to the plts., but the rags and wool also; and by the charterer also, the cargo was to be taken alongside, and from alongside the ship by the merchants at their own risk and expense, and to be received and stowed by the master as it might be presented for shipment. But though this was so, and although the shipping of oil with wool is, as I think it is proved by the evidence, a hazardous measure; yet if the master of the vessel will take them both together, I apprehend he is bound to take extraordinary precautions to prevent mischief, and cannot protect himself by showing that both kinds of goods were sent on board by the same person; for an authority by the shipper or charterers to stow the goods clearly does not amount to an authority to stow them in a careless or negligent manner; for which I cite Hutchinson v. Guion, 5 C. B., N. S., 149-162. Again, it is said that the whole cargo was, in accordance with the charter, stowed by a head stevedore appointed by the charterers, and therefore that the master could not be liable for bad stowage. But, on reference to the charter, it appears that the terms were, "the charterers being allowed to appoint a head stevedore at the expense and under the inspection and responsibility of the master for proper stowage." These words appear to me to answer the objection, and remove the case out of the authority of Blakie v. Stenbridge, 6 C. B. 894, where similar words were not contained in the charter-party, and where the court held the true construction of the charter-party to be, that the cargo was to be brought alongside at the risk and expense of the charterer, and that it was to be shipped and stowed by his stevedore, and consequently at his risk, though at the expense of the shipowner, and subject to the control of the master, on behalf of the shipowner, to protect his interest. There seems, therefore, no reason for saying that Messrs. Lloyd and Co. would have been estopped from suing the master for damages on account of improper stowage. But even if they would have been estopped, why should it follow that the plts. would be estopped also? The shippers and the assignees of the bill of lading do not stand to each other as agent and principal, but as vendor and purchaser. The rights and the liabilities which the assignee of the bill of lading under the 1st section of 18 & 19 Vict. c. 111, has transferred to him, as the same rights and liabilities in respect of such goods as if the contract contained in the bill of lading had been made with him; but in them cannot be included the rights and liabilities as between the shipper and the master dehors of that contract in respect of other goods, or of the charter party. If so, the bill of lading would always incorporate the charter-party, which it never does unless expressly stated: (Chapple v. Comfort, 10 C. B., N. S., 802.) I think the rights of the plts. as assignees of the bill of lading could not be curtailed by any liability of the charterers towards the master, not being a liability imposed upon the plts. under the bill of lading. The objection, therefore, to the plts.' right of action, I think, fails on every ground; and there must be judgment for the plts. with costs, and a reference to the registrar.

THE HELENE. OHRLOFF v. BRISCALL.

The plts. now appealed to Her Majesty in Council.

E. James, Q. C. and R. G. Williams for the apps.—The bill of lading, having the memorandum upon it, "weight, measurement, and contents unknown," evidence ought to have been given by the resps. as to the state and contents of the casks when shipped, and no such evidence was given. The loss in question, being prima facie a loss by leakage, for which, by the bill of lading, the apps. were not responsible, it lay upon the resps. to show affirmatively that such loss was occasioned by the negligence of the apps. or their servants, and not upon the apps. to negative any such negligence, or to show affirmatively how the loss had been occasioned. The evidence on the part of the resps. was wholly insufficient to establish such negligence, and at all events was rebutted by the evidence on the part of the apps., and the judgment was against the weight of evidence. The only negligence alleged by the resps. being the stowing of wool and rags in the same ship with oil, evidence ought to have been given by the resps. to show that such stowage was negligent and improper, whereas it appeared that such stowage had been approved of and sanctioned by oil merchants of long standing at Leghorn, and that a cargo such as that carried on board the said ship was a usual cargo, and did not contain a larger proportion of wool or rags than usual. There was no evidence that the master, or mate, or any of the crew of the said ship knew that there was any risk in stowing oil and bales of wool and rags together, or that there were any usual or reasonable precautions which they might have taken to prevent the loss in question, and which they did not take. There was no sufficient evidence that the wool and rags had become heated in the course of the voyage, and in fact it appeared that upon the hatches being opened upon the arrival of the ship at Liverpool, there were none of the usual signs of heating. Moreover, the master and mate were not cross-examined on behalf of the resps. upon this point. It appeared that the leakage in question was occasioned by the slackness or badness of the casks in which the oil was contained, and was increased or partly occasioned by the bad weather which the ship encountered. The cargo was stowed by and under the superintendence of a stevedore appointed by the said Thomas Lloyd and Co., and the apps. are not responsible for any loss occasioned by such stowage. Messrs. Lloyd and Co. having approved of and assented to the manner in which the oil and cargo were stowed, could not recover for any loss thereby occasioned, and the resps. were in no better position. Messrs. Lloyd having, as they were entitled to do under the charter-party, required, and caused, and occasioned the shipment and stowage of oil, and wool, and rags together, they could not recover for any loss thereby occasioned, and the resps. were in no better position. Lloyd and Co. were the agents of the resps. for the shipment of the oil, and the resps. were bound by their acts. The stowage complained of was no breach of the contract contained in the bill of lading:

Cur. adv. vult.

LORD CHELMSFORD.—This is an appeal from a judgment of the High Court of Admiralty in an action brought by the resps., under the provisions of the Admiralty Act 1861, as owners and assignees of the bill of lading of forty-seven casks of oil, against the Helene, of which the apps. were owners, and in which the oil had been carried from Leghorn to Liverpool. When the ship arrived there many of the casks were partially empty, and this action was brought to recover damages for this leakage of the oil, as having been occasioned by negligence and breach of contract, and breach of duty on the part of the apps. The great question in the action was one of fact, viz., what was the cause of the leakage which was the subject of complaint? The learned judge of the Court of Admiralty decided this question, after a most complete and able examination of the evidence, and we see no reason to find fault with his decision. The evidence, in his opinion, established that the leakage was caused, not by the perils of the sea, not by the defective quality of the casks, but by their being stowed in the same hold with some rags and wool which formed part of the cargo that was taken on board at the desire of the charterers. Assuming that this was the cause of the leakage, the apps., the shipowners, deny that they are responsible for it, because by the memorandum in the margin of the bill of lading, the shipowners are not to be accountable for "leakage." On the argument different views were suggested by counsel as to the meaning of this word "leakage." For the resps. it was contended that the word means only ordinary leakage (which, according to the evidence, amounts to 1 per cent.), and does not extend to extraordinary leakage, such as that in question, amounting to an alleged deficiency of 2000 gallons. On the part of the apps. it was denied that, according to the natural and ordinary meaning of the words employed, the amount of leakage was at all limited in quantity; but it was conceded that, in accordance with the case of Phillips v. Clark, 2 C. B., N. S., 156, the words in the margin did not protect the shipowners from responsibility for leakage occasioned by their own negligence. It was, however, contended, on behalf of the apps., that the plts. must, in order to entitle themselves to the action, give satisfactory proof of such negligence, and that they had failed to do so; and after a careful consideration of the case, we have come to the conclusion that this case is well founded. Notwithstanding the evidence of the notoriety at Liverpool of the deleterious consequences of the collocation of oil in casks with rags and wool, or other matters tending to generate heat, we do not believe that either the shippers or the shipowners in this case were aware of them. If the shippers knew of them, they also knew that the wool and rags which they made a part of the cargo must necessarily be stowed, and were, in fact, stowed, in the single hold of the ship; and with this knowledge we think it impossible that they should have abstained from mentioning the inevitable leakage in the then condition of the ship, and from requesting some means to be applied to prevent it, such as dividing the hold by bulkheads. Nor do we think the shipowners were in a better state of knowledge on the subject. Had they been so, it is inconceivable, as it seems to us, that they should have received a cargo so composed without some remonstrance with the shipper for selecting such mischievous companions to form part of the cargo with the oil. If the shipowners were ignorant of the consequences of taking such a cargo, we do not think it amounted to culpable negligence on their part to stow, in the only place they could be stowed, the goods which, under the charter-party, the charterers had a right to insist, and did insist, should form a part of the cargo. On this question it is, in our opinion, very material to consider not only that the charterers so insisted, but also that the cargo was according to the terms of the charter-party received on board, and stowed as it was presented for shipment by them, and that they were shown to be very frequently on board as the stowage progressed, and were well acquainted with the mode of stowage (which was effected in a masterly way), and never made any complaint of or objection to it. Nor do we think the ignorance of the shipowners in itself amounted to negligence. It can hardly be imputed as misconduct that the shipowners should be ignorant of latent mischief of this nature, when Lloyd and Co., who are proved to have had very great experience as oil merchants, were in the same state of ignorance. But even if the apps. knew, or ought to have known, what the consequences of such stowage must be, we are not prepared to say that they were guilty of negligence in not putting up bulkheads. Assuming that they could have been so constructed as to protect the part of the hold where the oil was stowed from the influence of the heat generated by the wool and rags, still this could not have been done without much trouble and considerable expense, which we cannot concede that the shippers had a right to throw on the shipowners because the shippers chose to load the ship they had chartered with a cargo of such a nature. And to this we may add that, even supposing the shipowners to have been aware of the usual consequences of stowing such a cargo in the same hold, they might have well come to the conclusion that the shippers were also aware of them, and would not have put such a cargo on board unless they had been assured that the casks were of such extraordinary strength and goodness as to be capable of resisting the usual influence of a heated temperature. For these reasons we think the resps. failed to prove that the leakage was caused by the apps.' negligence. It may be observed that the learned judge of the Admiralty Court appears to have adopted the construction of the word "leakage" contended for by the resps., viz., that it means "ordinary leakage" only, and consequently the judgment adverts but little, if at all, to the question whether negligence on the part of the shipowners had been proved. But we do not think such a construction allowable. The condition that the shipowners are not to be accountable for leakage does not, in its ordinary and grammatical sense, put any limit to the quantity of leakage; and on principle, therefore, we do not think it would be justifiable to add any such limit to its terms. Nor are we aware of any authority for doing so. It follows that, in our judgment, the memorandum protects the shipowner as to all leakage except that caused by negligence, and therefore, if no negligence is shown, there is no cause of action. Another point was raised and argued before us, viz., that the conduct of the shippers as to the stowage was such that it would support a plea of leave and licence by the shippers, if the action had been brought by them. But it was contended on behalf of the resps. that, by reason of the Bills of Lading Act, 18 & 19 Vict. c. 3, such a plea was not allowable in an action by the indorsees of the bill of lading. It is unnecessary, however, to decide this point, as our opinion is against the resps. on the question of negligence. On these grounds their Lordships will humbly advise Her Majesty that the judgment of the Court of Admiralty should be reversed, with costs, both in the court below and on this appeal.

PEASE v. GLOAHEC.

THE MARIE JOSEPH.

Sale—Stoppage in transitu—Bill of lading—Indorsement—Fraudulent possession—Lien.

M. shipped goods which he had sold to S., and sent a bill of lading (which was indorsed to order and assigns) to his agent A., who indorsed the same to S., taking the acceptance of S. in consideration thereof, and also getting back the bill of lading from S. to hold as security till the vessel arrived. S. next got back by fraud the bill of lading from A., and then indorsed the same to P. for value, after which M. claimed to stop the goods in transitu:

Held (reversing the judgment of the Court of Admiralty), that, as S. had transferred the bill of lading for value to an innocent purchaser, the right of M. to stop the goods was gone, and it made no difference that S. had got back the bill of lading from M.'s agents by fraud.

This was an appeal from an interlocutory decree of the High Court of Admiralty of England, in a cause instituted on behalf of the apps., Peases, Hoare, and Pease, of Hull, the assignees and owners of a bill of lading of the cargo laden on board the vessel Marie Joseph, against the said vessel, her tackle, apparel, and furniture, and against Jean Marie Gloahec, the master and owner of the said vessel Marie Joseph intervening, which decree pronounced against the damage proceeded for, dismissed the said Jean Marie Gloahec and his bail from the said suit, and condemned Messrs. Pease in costs.

On the 11th Feb. 1864 Messrs. Maxwell and Dreossi, of Bordeaux, having sold to Messrs. Scarborough and Tadman, of Kingston-upon-Hull, sixty tons of linseed cake, shipped same at Bordeaux for conveyance to Hull, on board the Marie Joseph and Jean Marie Gloahec, the master and owner of the said vessel, by bill of lading made on the same day, promised to deliver the same at Hull in order or assigns, he or they paying freight.

Messrs. Maxwell and Dreossi indorsed the said bill of lading to Messrs. Scarborough and Tadman, who subsequently indorsed the said bill of lading to the apps., to whom (as alleged by the said apps.) the property in the said cargo passed.

On the 5th April 1864 the Marie Joseph, with the said sixty tons of linseed cake on board, arrived at the port of Hull, and the apps. (as alleged by them) gave the resp. notice that they were entitled to have the said linseed cake delivered to them, and demanded the delivery thereof, which was refused by the said Jean Marie Gloahec, though the apps. offered to pay the freight, &c.

The resp. admitted his refusal to deliver the cargo to the plts., and justified such refusal by reasons of the following facts:—

In the month of Feb. 1864 Walter Stericker, of Kingston-upon-Hull, as agent for the said Messrs. Maxwell and Dreossi, agreed with Messrs. Scarborough and Tadman for the sale to them of sixty tons of linseed cake, they paying for the same by their acceptance at three months' date. The said linseed cake was accordingly shipped, as before stated, and the bill of lading indorsed by Maxwell and Dreossi to Scarborough and Tadman. Subsequently Scarborough and Tadman deposited the bill of lading with Walter Stericker, and agreed with him that he should hold the same as security for the payment of their said acceptance until they had sold the said linseed cake, or the ship should have arrived. On or about the 18th Feb. 1864, Scarborough and Tadman, one of the firm of Scarborough and Tadman, by falsely and fraudulently (as alleged by the apps.) representing to Walter Stericker that they had sold the linseed cake to a Mr. Croysdale, and should draw a bill on him for the price, and should therefore be enabled to pay for the said linseed cake to meet their acceptance for the price, obtained possession of the said bill of lading from Walter Stericker. Thereupon Scarborough and Tadman handed over the said bill of lading to the apps., who were the bankers of the said Scarborough and Tadman, as security for the balance due by them to the apps. When Scarborough and Tadman obtained possession of the bill of lading, they sold the same to the apps., Scarborough and Tadman being insolvent, which fact was well known to the apps. On the 7th March 1864 Scarborough and Tadman stopped payment.

The Marie Joseph, with her cargo, arrived at the port of Hull on the 5th April 1864, and the apps. lawfully claimed and received the said linseed cake at which time the same had not come into the possession of, nor been lawfully claimed by, any person.

The reply of the apps., among other things, denied that, when they received the bill of lading, they were aware or had any notice of the fraud of Scarborough and Tadman, or that Scarborough and Tadman stopped payment, or that they had any knowledge of the transaction.

Swabey for the resp.

D.—This is an appeal from a of the High Court of Admiralty d on behalf of the apps., the s of a bill of lading of certain a board a vessel called the Marie vessel and against the resp., the the vessel, pronouncing against d for, dismissing the resp. from aning the apps. in costs. The the suit is the right of the ship- ake to stop the same in transitu : circumstances:—In Feb. 1864 l Dreossi, of Bordeaux, through Stericker, sold to Messrs. Scar- n, of Hull, sixty tons of linseed er ton, payable by bill at three e of the bill of lading. On the ls were shipped on board the leaux by Maxwell and Dreossi, for the same was signed by the Maxwell and Dreossi indorsed order and assigns, and drew a bill of exchange for the price on Messrs. Scar- borough and Tadman, and sent the bill of lading and bill of exchange to their agent, Stericker. On the 16th Feb. Stericker took the bill of lading and the bill of exchange to Scarborough and Tadman, when the bill was accepted by Scarborough, and Stericker thereupon indorsed the bill of lading, and delivered it to Scarborough, together with a policy of insurance which had been effected upon the goods. A conversation then ensued between Stericker and Scarborough respecting the dealings of Scarborough and Tadman with a person named Moore, whose circumstances were supposed to be embarrassed, and Stericker asked Scarborough whether he had any objection to his holding the bill of lading. Scarborough told Stericker to take it, and delivered back the bill of lading to Stericker, who thereupon signed the following memorandum: "Hull, 16th Feb. 1864. Memorandum that I have received of Messrs. Scarborough and Tadman, of Hull, a bill of lading and policy of insurance for about sixty tons linseed cake, shipped Marie Joseph, dated at Bordeaux 11th Feb. 1864, and which I hold as security against their acceptance of Messrs. Maxwell and Dreossi's draft for 427*l*. 1*s*. 7*d*., due 14th May 1864, until the cakes are sold or vessel arrives.—Walter Stericker." On the 18th Feb. Tadman, the other partner in the firm of Scar- borough and Tadman, called upon Stericker and stated to him that his firm had sold the linseed cake to a Mr. Croysdale, who would accept a draft against the bill of lading. The linseed cake had not been sold to Croysdale, nor to any other person. Trusting to this misrepresentation, Stericker returned the bill of lading and the policy of insurance to Tadman. On the same day, after thus obtaining the bill of lading, in consequence of a message received from the apps., Messrs. Pease and Co., bankers in Hull, to whom Scarborough and Tadman were largely indebted, Tadman went to the bank, and Mr. Pease called his attention to the state of his account and to the amount of bills under discount, and asked him for security. Tadman thereupon indorsed the bill of lading in the name of his firm, and delivered it, together with the policy of insurance, to Mr. Pease, and gave Messrs. Pease and Co. an unsigned memo- randum authorising them to sell the linseed cake and to place the proceeds to the credit of Scar- borough and Tadman on account. Moore, in whose transactions Scarborough and Tadman were sup- posed to be involved, became bankrupt on the 4th March, and on the 7th March Scarborough and Tadman stopped payment. On the 5th March a telegram was sent from Maxwell and Dreossi to Stericker directing him to stop the delivery of the linseed cake, and on the 7th March he received from Maxwell and Dreossi a bill of lading indorsed to himself. The Marie Joseph arrived at Hull on the 5th April. The linseed cake was demanded on behalf of the apps. upon the bill of lading indorsed to them, but Stericker afterwards went on board and presented his bill of lading and obtained possession of the goods under an indemnity from Maxwell and Dreossi to the resp. Upon these facts the learned judge of the Court of Admiralty was of opinion that the bill of lading having been obtained from Stericker by the false representations and fraud of Tadman, and having been afterwards negotiated without the consent of Stericker or of his princi- pals, and contrary to the understanding between Stericker and Tadman, the fraudulent conduct of Tadman invalidated the indorsement to Pease and Co., and he accordingly pronounced against them. The question is one of nicety and difficulty, and, as was stated by the counsel in argument, no direct authority is to be found by which it can be decided. Principles, however, may be extracted from previous decisions, which will serve as guides to its right determination. A bill of lading for the delivery of goods to order and assigns is a negotiable instrument, which by indorsement and delivery passes the property in the goods to the indorsee, subject only to the right of an unpaid vendor to stop them in transitu. The indorsee may deprive the vendor of this right by indorsing the bill of lading for valuable consideration, although the goods are not paid for, or bills have been given for the price of them which are certain to be dishonoured, provided the indorsee for value has acted bonâ fide, and without notice. Although a bill of lading is a negotiable instrument, it is so only as a symbol of the goods named in it, and as was said by Lord Campbell in Gurney v. Behrend, 3 E. & B. 634: "Although the shipper may have indorsed in blank a bill of lading deliverable to his assigns, his right is not affected by an appropriation of it without his authority, and if it be stolen from him or transferred without his authority a subsequent bonâ fide transferee for value cannot make title under it as against the shipper of the goods." This dictum is very carefully confined in its terms to the original transfer of a bill of lading deliverable to the assigns of the shipper. In the cases which it supposes there could be no lawful assigns of the shipper, and consequently the bill of lading could have no existence as a negotiable instrument. But in the present case the shippers of the goods having obtained a bill of lading indorsed it to order and assigns, and forwarded it to Stericker for the express purpose of its being indorsed by him, and handed over to Scarborough and Tadman. By the indorsement and delivery to Scarborough and Tadman they acquired the complete property in the goods and control over the bill of lading, subject only to the right of Maxwell and Dreossi to stop in transitu as long as it remained in their hands. This is not denied by the resp., but his case is that Scarborough and Tadman having, after the indorsement and delivery of the bill of lading, returned it to Stericker to retain as a security for the payment of the bill of exchange accepted for the price of the goods, and having afterwards obtained it from him by a misrepresentation, they had no power to pass a title in it to Pease and Co., at least without being subject to the lien created by the deposit with Stericker, and consequently that the right to stop in transitu against Pease and Co., though bonâ fide indorsees for valuable consideration, still subsisted. There can be no doubt that although the vendors had parted with the property in the bill of lading by the indorsement to Scarborough and Tadman, they acquired a title to hold it by the terms of the agreement under which it was deposited with Stericker. These terms do not include any stipulation that the vendees should not so deal with the bill of lading as would in the event of their insolvency defeat the right to stop in transitu. It is not even stipulated that the vendors should hold the bill of lading till the sub-vendees should give them a bill of exchange or other security for payment. The bill of lading was not made subject to any new condition or limitation, but was merely deposited with the vendors till the arrival of the ship or the sale of the goods. Scarborough and Tadman had power to sell, not by reason of any authority arising out of the agreement, but by virtue of their ownership in the goods. The power to sell of course included a power to pledge. The vendors by keeping the bill of lading in their hands might have prevented Scarborough and Tadman from dealing with it. They chose to deliver it back to them, induced to do so indeed by the fraudulent representation of Tadman, but still consenting to their possession of it. The indorsees acquired no new title from the vendors by the fraud which Tadman practised, but merely obtained their own property and the means of effectually disposing of it. The vendors had not, strictly speaking, a lien, which means a right to retain property against the will of the owner of it, and which is lost when the possession is parted with. They had, by the agreement of the indorsees and owners, a right to hold the bill of lading as a security. As in the case of lien so in this case, as long as the bill of lading remained with the parties who had fraudulently obtained it, the vendors who had been cheated out of the possession might have reclaimed and recovered it. But the moment it passed into the hands of Pease and Co., to whom it was pledged and indorsed for valuable consideration without notice, the right of the vendors to follow it was taken away. This is a much stronger case than that put by Abbott, C.J. in Dyer v. Pearson, 3 B. & Cr. 42, of the real owner of goods who suffers another to have possession of his property and of those documents which are the evidence of property, being bound by a sale which he has thus enabled the other person to make; for here the person entitled to retain the possession of the instrument which represented the goods against the real owners, relinquished the possession of it to them, and enabled them to deal with the property in their true character of owners. In the case of Kingsford v. Merry, 11 Ex. 577, it was held that, "When a vendee obtains possession of a chattel with the intention by the vendor to transfer both the property and possession, although the vendee has committed a false and fraudulent misrepresentation in order to effect the contract or obtain the possession, the property vests in the vendee until the vendor has done some act to disaffirm the transaction, and the legal consequence is, that if before the disaffirmance the fraudulent vendee has transferred either the whole or a partial interest in the chattel to an innocent transferee, the title of such transferee is good against the vendor." Although this case was reversed in the Ex. Ch. (1 Hurlst. & Nor. 503), yet it was upon a ground which did not affect the rule of law above laid down, but made it inapplicable, because in the judgment of the court the relation of vendor and vendee did not exist between the owner of the goods and the fraudulent possessor. Here the possession was not only united to the previous ownership, with the consent (however obtained) of the person temporarily entitled to it, but transferred for the express purpose of giving to the owner absolute dominion over his own property. An ownership which was at the time perfect at law though voidable as to part, viz., the possession, cannot in principle be treated differently from an ownership voidable as to the whole, but in the interim protected by the interposition of a bonâ fide purchaser for valuable consideration. For these reasons their Lordships will humbly recommend to Her Majesty that the decree appealed from be reversed, with costs.

Cur. adv. vult.

—BLACKBURN, J.—In this case, tried before my brother Mellor, it appeared that the plaintiff, in lawfully passing over a ship then in the dock, under the charge of a ship-keeper, in reaching his own vessel which lay on the other side of the dock, in so doing he fell through an unsecured hatchway, and sustained considerable injury. The evidence, proper to be left to the jury, showed that the accident was occasioned by the negligence of the ship-keeper in having charge of the ship, over which it was known that the plaintiff might pass, in not keeping it reasonably safe; and the evidence was such as to make it a question for the jury whether the plaintiff had or had not himself contributed to the accident by the want of reasonable care on his part; but the only evidence to connect the defendant with those having charge of the ship was the production of the ship's register, by which it appeared that the defendant was the registered owner of the ship in question. It was objected that there was no evidence to fix the defendant, and my brother Mellor was of that opinion; but in order to avoid the expense of a new trial, he reserved leave to enter a nonsuit, and left to the jury the question whether there was negligence in the ship-keeper occasioning the accident, and whether the plaintiff could by due care have avoided the consequences of that negligence. Both of these questions the jury found in favour of the plaintiff. No question was left to the jury as to whether they thought that in fact the defendant was the employer of the ship-keeper, nor was my brother Mellor asked to leave that question to the jury. A rule nisi was obtained to enter a nonsuit on the ground that there was no evidence to fix the defendant, which was argued before my brothers Mellor and Lush and myself. I have come to the conclusion that the registry was evidence which would have justified the jury in finding that in fact the defendant employed the ship-keeper, if that question had been left to them, and consequently, that the rule to enter a nonsuit should be discharged; but under the circumstances, I think the defendant ought to be permitted, if he desires it, to have a new trial, costs to abide the event, in order to have the question of fact more distinctly raised and determined. I do not think that any liability attaches to the defendant merely as owner of the ship. The question I think is, whether he employed the ship-keeper as his servant. In all cases in which the owners of a ship are sought to be made liable, either in contract for necessities supplied on the order of the captain, or in cases of collision for the negligence of the crew, or as in the present case, for the negligence of the ship-keeper, I think that the question really is, whether the persons sought to be charged were the employers of the captain who made the contract, or the masters of the persons who were guilty of the negligence, and that the liability does not depend on the title to the ship. In cases of contract a further question sometimes arises, as to whether the shipowner may not have clothed the master with apparent authority, so as to be precluded from disputing his authority, but in cases of tort the question can only be, whether he in fact employed those actually guilty of negligence. But whilst agreeing that the ownership of the ship does not render the owners liable, either in contract or in tort, for the acts of the master and crew, or other persons in charge of the vessel, unless the owners are the employers of those persons, I think that the ownership is a very important piece of evidence, tending to show that the persons who are proved to be owners of the ship are, in fact, employers of those who have the custody of the ship. Ships are most commonly in the possession of their owners: and those who have the actual custody of the ship are most commonly in the employment of the owners, and consequently proof of ownership is evidence tending to prove that the persons proved to be the owners of the ship are employers of those having the actual custody of the ship, and the register being evidence to the title of the ship is, I think, evidence that the registered owners are in possession, and employ those having the actual custody. It is by no means conclusive. The ship may be demised (though that is very rarely the case) and the persons navigating her may be employed by the lessee, or by a person who has purchased her, but not yet paid the price, and consequently not had the ship conveyed to him, as was the case in Frost v. Oliver, 2 E. & B. 301; 22 L. J. 353, Q. B.; or, as is the most common case, they may be employed by one who is in fact a mortgagor in possession, though the mortgagee is registered as absolute owner. And when the ship is like the one now in question, not being navigated, but laid up in dock, there is the additional possibility that the ship-keeper may be the servant of the dock company, or the ship's broker, or any one else with whom the owners may have made an arrangement to keep his ship for him as a bailee of the ship. But those are all exceptional cases, and the facts lie so entirely in the knowledge of the deft., and may so easily be proved by him, that I think a jury would be fully warranted in acting on the prima facie inference that the persons having the actual custody of the ship are employed by the owners, unless some evidence to the contrary is given. The case in this respect in principle somewhat resembles those in which it has been held that evidence of possession of demised premises is sufficient proof that the person in possession is assignee of the lease, in the absence of any evidence of facts tending to show that he is in possession as sub-lessee, or otherwise (Doe v. Williams, 6 B. & C. 41); or the cases that establish that, though dealing with the goods of the deceased is quite consistent with the person who does so being agent for a lawful executor, or claiming the goods as his own, yet in the absence of anything to explain it, the fact is sufficient to charge the deft. as executor; "for the most obvious conclusion which strangers can form from his conduct is, that he hath a will of the deceased, wherein he is named executor, but hath not yet taken probate thereof:" (2 Bl. Com. 507.) If, instead of considering the case on principle merely, we look to the cases decided as to ships, I find none in which it has been held that the title to a ship is not some evidence that the owners were the employers of the person who acts as captain; and several which as it seems to me are authorities for saying that it is sufficient prima facie evidence that they are his employers. At one time it was a common idea that even if it was proved that the owners did not employ the captain, yet that the ownership of the ship conclusively made them liable to those who supplied necessities on the order of the captain. That, it is now established, was a mistake; the persons liable are those who really were the captain's principals when he made the contract, or who have precluded themselves from denying that they were so; but in all the cases on the subject there was evidence that the persons who were on the register as owners were not, in fact, employers of the captain. In Abbott on Shipping (5th edit. p. 18) Lord Tenterden states his view of the law thus: "The title to a ship may furnish evidence that repairs are made, or stores furnished under the authority and upon the credit of the legal owner, as, in fact, they generally are, but it does no more; and therefore, if it appear that they were made or furnished under the authority and upon the credit of another, the legal owner will not be answerable." In Jennings v. Griffiths, Ry. & M. 42. Lord Tenterden left the case to the jury, using expressions which (though not quite bearing out the statement in the marginal note) seem to me, when taken in conjunction with this passage, to show that, in Lord Tenterden's opinion, the title of the ship was evidence that the owners employed the captain, and so gave him authority to order necessities for them, though this evidence might be rebutted. This must be because he is in the control of their ship, and they can explain how that is if he is not their captain. The same principle applies where the person in control is not the captain, but one acting as ship's husband. That was the case in Fletcher v. Reid, R. & M. 202, and Cox v. Reid, R. & M. 199. In Fletcher v. Reid the plts. rested their case on an admission that necessary repairs to the extent of 540*l.* were done by them to the ship Asia, and the bill rendered to one Bulmer, and that defts. during the time when the repairs were done were registered owners; Lord Gifford, after objection, decided that this was sufficient to call on the defts. for an answer; the defts. failed in proving, what it subsequently appeared was the fact, that they were only mortgagees, Bulmer being, in fact, not their agent, but a mortgagor, and the plts. obtained a verdict. In Cox v. Reid (a similar action against the same defts.) they were provided with evidence that the transfer to them was only intended to be a mortgagee, though the then Registry Act made it operate in law as an absolute transfer; Best, C.J. told the jury that the owner of a ship is prima facie liable for repairs, but it was for them to say whether that presumption was not met by the facts of the case, and the defts. obtained a verdict. These were but Nisi Prius decisions, but no attempt was made to disturb either verdict. The whole law on this subject was discussed in the two cases of Frost v. Oliver, 2 E. & B. 301; 22 L. J. 353, Q. B.; Mitchison v. Oliver, 5 E. & B. 419; 25 L. J. 39, Q. B., and as these are the latest cases on the subject, and the latter was the decision of a court of error, it is important to see what really was decided in them. In Frost v. Oliver the question arose on a rule to set aside the verdict obtained by the plt. for misdirection in leaving the case to the jury at all, on the ground that there was no evidence on which the verdict could be supported, the Court having refused a rule as against the weight of evidence. The evidence, as the court then took it to be, is reported by Lord Campbell in the beginning of his judgment. The evidence on the trial of Mitchison v. Oliver came before the Court of Ex. Ch. on a bill of exceptions, and is set out in the beginning of the report of Mitchison v. Oliver, and was not quite so favourable to the plt. as that stated in Frost v. Oliver, though in substance not different. Lord Campbell based his judgment mainly on the ground that the facts were such that Oliver was precluded from denying that Thompson was his captain, even if the jury believed that, in fact, Thompson was not his captain; the decision of the Court of Error was, that in this he was wrong. Wightman, J., after stating that "the legal title to a ship will furnish prima facie evidence that repairs are made under the authority and for the benefit of the legal owner, but if it appear that they were made under the authority and for the benefit of another, the legal owner will not be answerable," proceeds to state, as the basis of his judgment, that there was in this case evidence of a holding out by the deft. of himself as the beneficial owner, and "to have held Thompson out to the world as his captain." The Court of Error decided that in Mitchison v. Oliver there was no evidence of any such holding forth as his captain, but they did not impugn the earlier part of his judgment. Crompton, J. did not base his judgment on this erroneous ground. He states the question to be whether there was "evidence of any authority on the part of the master to pledge the credit of the deft. by giving the general orders for the supply of the rigging in question." He says: "It does not follow from the ownership or interest in the ship not determining the question of liability, that it is not a material circumstance in ascertaining the question of credit and contract;" and he proceeds in a very able and instructive judgment to show that they did make a prima facie case, though liable to be rebutted, and then asks, "How is the prima facie case to be attested? Surely by proof of all the circumstances which the contract is proved to have been made by and the credit given to another, and not to the owner, and all the facts on the one side and other as to such contract and credit must be for the jury." He pretty plainly insinuates that in his opinion the verdict was against the weight of evidence, but that there was evidence for the jury to find, in fact, Thompson was acting by the plt.'s authority. This judgment was certainly not overruled in the Court of Error, and is, in my opinion, correct in point of law. Erle, J., who differed from a majority of the court, does not question that there was prima facie evidence of authority, but states, as the basis of his judgment, "I take it to be a general principle that, if direct evidence of the matter to be proved (here of the making the contract, and of the giving of authority for that purpose) is adduced and believed, the circumstantial evidence from which the matter to be proved might be inferred in the absence of direct evidence then becomes immaterial and irrelevant." This the Court of Error decided to be correct, and I think the only difference between Erle, J. and Crompton, J. was, that the latter thought the rule could not be made absolute in its then shape, because he questioned whether the rebutting evidence was believed could not be withdrawn from the jury, though, if the rule had been granted on the ground that the verdict was against the weight of evidence, he should have thought that there ought to be a new trial, because they did not believe it. In Mitchison v. Oliver the Court of Error had to decide on the exceptions taken to the summing up of Lord Campbell, as appearing on the bill of exceptions. One of those was that there was no evidence to go to the jury. As to this, Parke, B., in delivering the judgment of the court, says: "Lord Campbell desires the jury to consider whether, upon the evidence upon both sides, they were of opinion that the deft. had authorised the goods and work to be supplied and done on his credit, and the goods and work had been supplied and done on his credit. Thinking that as a detached part of the summing up affected by what went before, that is unexceptionable, for, no doubt, if the jury disbelieved the facts of the case that made for the deft., and drew the prima facie inference from the ownership and other facts, there was evidence on which they might find that Thompson was in fact master for the deft., and that being so, we cannot agree with the exceptions that there was no evidence to go to the jury." I do not think that I am entitled to rely upon this decision of the Court of Error, that the ownership alone would be evidence from which, whilst unexplained, the jury might draw a prima facie inference that the persons actually in the possession of the ship were employed by the owner, for the Court of Error may have proceeded on the other facts set out in the bill of exceptions, though, on examining the statement of the evidence in the bill of exceptions, I find very little more than that the owner was owner, and was, as such, in possession of the ship before the orders were given and the work was completed; but I think I am entitled to rely upon the authority of Crompton, J., and the cases he refers to as not impeached or shaken by the decision of the Court of Error. I therefore think that the registry was evidence from which, when unexplained, the jury might properly draw the inference that the owner employed the person actually in charge of the ship; but that it was only evidence quite capable of being explained or rebutted, and therefore the deft. may, if he so elects within a fortnight, have a new trial, costs to abide the event; otherwise I think the rule should be discharged. My brother Lush desires me to say that he agrees with this judgment. The rule will therefore, in conformity with the opinion of the majority, be discharged, unless the deft. elects, as mentioned, in which case the rule will be moulded accordingly.

MELLOR, J.—In this case the deft. is sought to be made responsible for an accident which happened to the plt. in lawfully crossing a ship called the Jarnia, lying in the Surrey dock, to get from another ship called the Moulsie, lying alongside, to the quay. It must be taken for granted, upon the finding of the jury, that the accident was occasioned by the negligence of the ship-keeper of the Jarnia, which ship was then, and had been for some time, laid up in the dock for the winter. The only evidence to fix the deft. with liability was the proof of the register in which he was described as owner. There being no other evidence, I was of opinion that the registry of ownership without more was insufficient for that purpose, but I left questions as to the fact of negligence and of contributory negligence to the jury, who found their verdict for the plt., and assessed the damages at 450/., and I thereupon reserved leave for the deft. to move to enter a nonsuit, in case the court should be of opinion that there was not sufficient evidence for me to leave to the jury to entitle them to find for the plt. A rule to set aside that verdict, and to enter a nonsuit pursuant to leave reserved, was obtained by Mr. Brett, and the question now arises whether the mere proof that the deft. was the registered owner of the ship is prima facie sufficient to fix him with liability for the negligence of the ship-keeper. I retained the opinion which I formed at the trial, viz., that such evidence alone was not enough to submit to the jury to support the allegation in the declaration that "the deft. negligently removed the hatches," whereby the accident complained of happened. In order to make the deft. liable, it was incumbent on the plt., upon whom the burden of proof rested, to show affirmatively that the ship-keeper was the deft.'s servant. This depends upon the ordinary principles of law applicable to the case of master and servant, and is not embarrassed by considerations arising out of the peculiar relation which the captain of a ship in general bears to the owner, and upon which the liability of the owner of a ship for repairs done to it, or for necessities supplied to it by the captain's orders, may depend. Even in that case it would appear to be incumbent upon the plt., who seeks to render an owner liable, to show affirmatively that the master who gave the orders was the master appointed by or sanctioned by the owner, as to make him, in the particular case, "his master" (Mitchison v. Oliver, 5 E. & B. 419); as was said by Erle, J., in Frost v. Oliver, 2 E. & B. 319: "The doctrine that the legal ownership of the ship is proof that the master has authority to contract for such owner has been repeatedly negatived." That it is a material circumstance as a step to proof is undoubted, and coupled with evidence that the repairs were done for the benefit of the ship, or the stores were supplied for its use, may in general be a sufficient prima facie case to call for evidence, by way of explanation or answer; but I apprehend that the present case differs materially from that. Here the registry is the only evidence, and I cannot conceive that the simple fact of ownership raises a presumption that the man in charge of the ship was the servant of the owner, or appointed by him. And unless there is a presumption of fact arising out of the mere ownership of the ship to that effect, the rule to enter a nonsuit ought to be made absolute. The ship was not in the course of navigation, and there was absolutely nothing to show that the owner ever came near to the ship, or knew that it was in the dock. Whether the ship was in the possession of the owner, or of a mortgagee, or of the dock authorities, or of a broker, or of any other person, did not appear. In the case of Mitchison v. Oliver, 5 E. & B. 445-8, Parke, B., in delivering the judgment of the Court of Ex. Ch., says, in remarking upon a passage of Lord Campbell's summing up, in which he had put it to the jury, whether, upon the evidence on both sides they were of opinion that the deft. had authorized the goods and work to be supplied and done on his credit, &c., proceeds as follows: "No doubt, if the jury disbelieved the parts of the case that made for the deft., and drew the prima facie inference from the ownership and other facts, there was evidence on which they might find that Thompson was, in fact, master for the deft." It appears to be clear, I think, that Parke, B. did not consider that the mere fact of ownership, without "the other facts," would have afforded even prima facie evidence that Thompson was the deft.'s master. The action was for ordinary repairs done to the ship, and for goods supplied to it upon the orders of the registered master; and there were other circumstances tending to raise an inference as to the liability of the deft.; but it never appears to have been contended by the counsel, or suggested by any of the judges, that the registry alone would have been sufficient proof that the captain was the captain of the owner, so as to bind him. However this may be in the case of repairs done to a ship or stores supplied to it for the apparent benefit of the owner, the same reason does not apply to the present case. I think it would be unduly shifting the burden of proof to call for an answer to the mere fact of ownership; and I cannot see why any presumption should be made which would dispense with the necessity of further proof. Possession may be presumptive evidence of title, but the converse does not necessarily hold, viz., that title is presumptive evidence of possession. It is obvious that in the case of things which are constantly the subject of demise, charter, mortgage, or the like, the presumption that the actual possession is in the owner cannot but be weak, and is not to be classed with those strong presumptions which shift the burden of proof from a plt. to a deft. There exists an exception to the general rule that a party who alleges a matter must prove it in cases in which the subject-matter of the allegation lies peculiarly within the knowledge of one of the parties. In this case there is no peculiar knowledge on the part of the deft. within the meaning of that maxim. In one sense, in almost every case, the deft. has peculiar knowledge affecting his relation to the act complained of, but that is not the knowledge referred to. Here the ship-keeper could have proved by whom he was appointed, and so have laid a good foundation for the plt.'s case, if appointed by him. Why should the burden of proof shift in such a state of things in order to compel a deft. to disprove that which it was incumbent upon the plt. to prove, and I am not aware of any case in which such evidence has been held sufficient, and I think that all experience at Nisi Prius is against it. For these reasons, I am of opinion that this rule should be made absolute, but as a majority of the court is of a different opinion, the rule will of course be discharged.

The deft. elected to take a rule for a new trial.

exceeded the expenses of transhipment, and the freight from Rio to Liverpool was received by the assured. The action was brought by the assured to recover the expenses of transhipment and forwarding. At the trial evidence was given to show that the warranty in the policy on which the question turned was not considered applicable to the circumstances. The warranty was free from particular average, from jettison, and unless the ship be stranded, sunk or burnt, neither of which happened. The evidence given was for the purpose of showing that the charges of transshipping and forwarding had been considered what was called technically particular charges, not as particular average so as to be within the warranty. The verdict passed for the plt. affirming the existence of the usage at the time when the policy was made, subject to leave reserved to the defts. to move to enter a verdict, which they accordingly did, and that rule was discussed last term before the Lord Chief Justice, my brothers Keating, Smith, and myself, when we took time to consider. At the sittings after term we discharged the rule, not stating our reasons, but promising to state them during this term, and that promise I am now about to fulfil. Many points were made upon the argument of this rule, upon one of which it is only necessary to pronounce an opinion. That turned upon the construction of the suing and labouring clause in the policy, and it may be considered under the following heads: First, whether the expenses incurred were of a character to be within the clause; secondly, whether the occasion upon which they were incurred was such as to be within it; thirdly, whether, if such, the application of the clause excluded by the warranty against particular average. As to the first question it was hardly disputed that the expenses incurred were of a character to be within the clause; without incurring them the subject-matter of the insurance could never have had any complete existence. They were incurred in order to earn it, and they presented so much labour beyond and besides the ordinary labour of the voyage rendered necessary for the salvation of the subject-matter of insurance by reason of a damage and loss within the scope of the policy, the immediate effect of which was that the subject-matter insured would also be lost, or rather would never come into existence, unless such labour was bestowed. As the goods lay at Rio no part of the chartered freight had accrued due and no freight even pro rata itineris could have been claimed by the shipowner. His only right in respect of chartered freight was to detain the goods for a reasonable time in order to send them on in another vessel to their destination, and then claim an amount equal to that of the chartered freight. In order to do so, labour must be used and expense incurred. It can make no difference whatever whether the shipowner happens to have at the port of distress a vessel of his own which he can employ in this service—in that case the labour of forwarding would be strictly that of himself or his servants—or whether he forwarded in the vessel of another upon payment for his labour and that of his servants; nor can it make any difference in the application of the clause whether, as here, the goods are in a port of large resort, where, by reason of the rate of freight, a forwarding vessel is easily procured, or whether the vessel becomes a wreck in an out-of-the-way place and by unusual enterprise and skill the master is enabled to communicate with a vessel either of his owner or of some other person, by which he forwards the cargo to its destination. The amount of labour is different in degree in the two cases, but in each it is a consequence of a peril insured against, it is incurred in preventing the destruction of the subject-matter, for which, in the event of its loss, the underwriters must be answerable. There is, in each case, a loss or misfortune threatening the safety of the subject-matter of the insurance, and by the operation of which, unless averted by labour, that subject-matter will be imperilled, and the underwriters may become liable. As to the second head, whether the occasion upon which the expenses were incurred was such as to be within the suing and labouring clause, this depends upon the true answer to the question so thoroughly discussed in the course of the argument, namely, whether the clause ought to be limited in construction to a case where the assured abandons, or may perchance abandon, so that the expense incurred is not only in respect of a subject-matter in which the underwriters are interested, but upon property which, by the abandonment, actually becomes or may become theirs; or whether it extends to every case in which the subject of insurance is exposed to loss or damage, for the consequences of which the underwriters would be answerable, in warding off which labour is expended. In the former construction the clause is inapplicable to the present case; in the latter it is applicable, and the assured is entitled to contribution. The question manifestly depends upon the construction of the language of the clause; and, quite apart from the proved usages, we think the latter is the true construction. The words of the ordinary suing and labouring clause (to which in this policy is super-added an express provision as to abandonment, upon which we need only say, in passing, that it does not alter the question in favour of the underwriters) are used in the same form as must have been in common use before 1783, when Emerigon published his great work on insurance, in which, amongst the various forms of the clause used at different periods, that of the London Policy then used is given (2 Emerigon, by Boulay Paty, 239); the words are quite general, and ought to be so construed, unless some good reason is given for restraining them, that in case of any loss or misfortune it shall be lawful to sue labour, and travel in and about the defence, safeguard, and recovery of the subject-matter, without prejudice to the insurance—not abandonment, as in the French Ordonnance hereinafter cited—the charges whereof the said company will bear in proportion to the sum hereby insured (not the amount saved, as in the French Ordonnance). Up to this point there is not a word about abandonment; and this is the whole of the usual clause. The meaning is obvious, that if an occasion should arise in which, by reason of a peril insured against, unusual labour or expense is rendered necessary to prevent a loss for which the underwriters would be answerable, and such labour and expense is incurred accordingly, the underwriters will contribute, not as part of the sum insured in case of loss or damage, because it may be that loss or damage for which they would be liable is averted by the labour bestowed, but as a contribution on their part as persons who have avoided detriment by the result in proportion to what they would have had to pay if such detriment had come to a head for want of timely care. Take for instance the case of a policy on goods warranted free of average under 5 per cent. wetted in a storm which drives the ship into a port of distress, where, by drying at an expense less than 5 per cent., the goods might be saved or damaged under 5 per cent., whilst if not dried they would decay and become damaged over 5 per cent. they existing in specie, so that freight would be payable, in this case there is no abandonment and may be no prospect of one, and yet it is manifestly the duty of the master to use all reasonable means to preserve the goods, and obviously for the interest of the underwriters to encourage him in the performance of that duty by contributing to the expense incurred. Not only the generality of the words, but also the subject-matter to which they relate here, points to the application of the clause to all cases in which the underwriter is saved from liability to loss, whether partial or total, and whether an abandonment does or may possibly take place or not. There remains to be considered, thirdly, whether the application of the suing or labouring clause is excluded in this particular case by the warranty against particular average, "warranted free from particular average, also from jettison, unless the ship be stranded, sunk, or burnt," and this depends upon whether the expression particular average in the context, and construed according to the golden rule by what goes before and follows in the policy, includes expenses which fall within the suing and labouring clause, so that in fact that suing and labouring clause is expunged by the warranty. This is a question the answer to which involves important consequences, because, if the warranty against particular average, or, to use a more accurate expression with the same meaning, the warranty against total loss, only excludes the operation of the suing and labouring clause, even where an impending total loss is averted by extraordinary exertion and expense, it must be because the word average has some fixed and definite meaning so rigid and unelastic that it cannot be modified or limited so as to apply to loss of or damage to the things insured (the sense in which it has been hitherto understood by average staters), but that it must needs also include contribution to any labour incurred in the defence and safeguard of the thing insured, so that even an express clause left standing in the policy without reference to such labour (the suing and labouring clause) must be rejected as inconsistent with the warranty. If this be so, it must equally be true of all memorandum goods which are warranted free from average under a certain percentage, and the operation of this would be so general, if not universal, that the suing and labouring clause would be confined to the cases excepted in the memorandum alone. Two results would follow, both novel in practice, and one at least very remarkable. The first would be unfavourable to the underwriters, because the memorandum was framed to protect the underwriters from frivolous demands in respect of small losses, which are most likely to have arisen from natural deterioration, or wear and tear. The exception of stranding tends to show that this was the scope of the memorandum, for it is the exception of such a loss as makes it probable that the deterioration of the goods, though under the percentage, was nevertheless not to be attributed to the perishable nature of the goods themselves. Accordingly the rule has been to pay for damage to memorandum articles only when it exceeds the specified percentage, and not to allow this percentage to be eked out by expenses falling within the suing and labouring clause. Thus, in the case of goods already put, of goods wetted by a storm, the amount of expense reasonably incurred in preserving the goods is, according to the present practice, contributed to under the suing and labouring clauses, however small in the result the loss or damage to the goods, and the loss of or damage to the goods is paid if it amounts to the stipulated percentage, but not otherwise; and the amount of expenses is not added in order to make up that percentage; thus the agreed percentage at 5 per cent., if the expense amount to 2 per cent. and the loss or damage to 3 per cent. only, the expenses are paid and not the average; but if we hold that the warranty excludes the application of the suing and labouring clause the whole must be paid, and the underwriters will be exposed to the very inconvenience which the memorandum has been supposed to obviate. Upon the other hand, if the expenses should be less than the percentage and the loss is thereby prevented, either altogether or to an extent less than the percentage, as if in the case put the expenses were 3 per cent. and the damages only 1 per cent., according to the present practice the underwriters would pay the expenses; but if we decide for the present defendants, the underwriters, although saved from loss, would be altogether exempt from contribution. In our view, however, we are not compelled to adopt so inconvenient and impracticable a conclusion. The word average, so far from being a term of art (except in so far as, according to the evidence, usage may have limited its meaning to loss or damage to the goods themselves), a word with a rigid unchanging signification necessarily including expenses in the defence or safeguard of the subject-matters insured, is a word used in a great variety of phrases as applicable to different subject-matter, and not with any fixed or settled application. It would be tedious to go through the various uses to which it is applied, and we need no more than refer to the instances cited in argument, and more especially to the very learned notes of Mr. Maclachlan, in Arnould on Insurance, 3rd edit. p. 739, which exhausts the subject as far as novelty is concerned. Amongst the various uses to which the word has been applied, no doubt that of small expense is one, as in the usual clause in a charter party. So in the case of insurance itself, expenses must often be taken into account in determining whether there has been a loss or not, but only because a thing is lost in insurance law which cannot be got back except at an expense equal to its value when recovered. The question here, however, is not as to the extension of which the term average is capable, but of the sense in which it ought to be understood in the particular context with which it is to be reconciled, and, if possible, read so as to have effect may be given to every provision in the instrument. Nor is it to be forgotten that the suing and labouring clause which, for the reasons already stated, specially provides for those cases, has been allowed to remain a part of the policy, and that a special provision as to a particular subject-matter is to be preferred to general language which might have governed in the absence of such a special provision: generalia specialibus derogant, specialia generalibus derogant. In our opinion, quite apart from usage, the true construction of the policy is reconciling and giving effect to all its provisions, as if the warranty against particular average does no more than limit the insurance to total loss of the freight by the perils insured against without reference to extraordinary labour or expense which may be incurred by the assured in preserving the freight from loss, or rather from never becoming due by reason of the operation of the perils insured against, and that the latter expenses are specially provided for by the suing and labouring clauses, and may be recovered thereunder. Much reliance was placed for the defendants upon two recent decisions which were said to have determined that there could be no liability under the suing and labouring clause when there was none under the policy: The Great Indian Peninsula Railway Company v. Sanderson, 1 B. & S. and in error, 2 B. & S.; and Booth v. Gair, 33 L. J. 99, C. P., the first of which cases was decided before and the other after the date of the present policy. Before these decisions the liability of the underwriters appears to have been universally admitted and acted upon even in the cases where the expenses were incurred to forward goods existing in specie at the port of distress, and warranted free from particular average, so that no liability could accrue to the underwriters by their not being forwarded. Probably the underwriters up to the time of the first of those decisions thought it so important to encourage honest efforts to preserve and forward the cargo, or otherwise to preserve the subject-matter of insurance, that they preferred paying in all unsuspecting cases without any inquiries as to whether the expenses had in the particular instance averted liability. In so doing they not only acted with liberality, but no doubt also best studied their own interests, and whilst they calculated the premium so as to include a remuneration for the extra liability which they were satisfied to incur, they probably found that the encouragement to fair dealing thereby afforded was their best security against the more serious losses that might rise from neglect of precautions of which the expense is thrown upon the assured. This practice, however, could not prevail to alter or enlarge the application of the suing and labouring clause, because, although usage may improve a meaning upon a word, such as average, it cannot alter the rules of construction, and in the cases referred to the decision and the sole decision was, that freight and other expenses of forwarding from a port of distress to the port of destination goods warranted free of particular average under circumstances in which the underwriters could not have been liable if the expense were not incurred, was not within the true intent and meaning of the suing and labouring clause, which in the context of a policy of insurance could only extend to suing and labouring by means of which the underwriters might obtain a benefit. In the Great Indian Peninsula Railway Company v. Saunders the goods were iron rails for Bombay, shipped to be paid for lost or not lost. They were insured with a warranty free of particular average unless the ship should be stranded, sunk, or burnt. The vessel on her way put into Plymouth, when she was a total loss, but she was not stranded, sunk, or burnt. The rails were saved and sent on in other vessels, and for the freight paid upon such forwarding the underwriters were held not to be liable; and Blackburn, J., in delivering the judgment of the court, carefully abstained from expressing an opinion upon the question, because it did not arise in that case, and he founded his judgment on the circumstance that the underwriters had not obtained any advantages. That judgment was affirmed in the Court of Ex. Ch. in the 2nd B. & S. Erle, C.J. also guarded himself against deciding that in a case such as the present the underwriters were not liable. That case was followed by Booth v. Gair, in which a similar question arose with respect to some bacon which was taken into a port of distress at Bermuda, and was there abandoned, so that there was no total loss. The bacon was landed in specie, and was not totally lost either constructively or otherwise. No expenses appear to have been incurred in saving the goods from a total loss, which was negatived; but certain expenses were incurred in the way of extra freight, transhipment, warehousing, and conveying, and cooperage, all of which were treated as expenses of forwarding the goods. It was further proved that it was the practice of underwriters on goods to pay such expenses under like circumstances under the name of particular charges. The judgment was for the underwriters upon the grounds stated by Erle, C.J., namely, that what the master did was in discharge of his duty in ordinary course, and there was no peril creating a risk of a total loss from which the underwriters were saved by the expenses in question. There were no other perils than such as are always attendant on the transit of goods by the voyage in question. No notice appears to have been taken of the practice of underwriters, for the reasons already mentioned, that although usage would give to the words "average" or "particular average," or "average" unless general, a conventional meaning, so as to make it include partial loss or damage of the subject-matter only, and not what are known as particular charges which fall within the suing and labouring clause; yet such usages could not control the construction of the policy, by which that clause must be limited in application to cases in which the underwriters might incur liability, and therefore might derive a benefit from the extraordinary exertion. That is the circumstance which distinguishes these cases from the present, that the usage of underwriters, already brought to the attention of the court in Booth v. Gair, could not affect the decision in that case. These decisions are therefore inapplicable to the present case, and, when examined, proved to be anything but authority for the defendants. Passages from Emerigon were cited by the defendants' counsel, and much relied upon, in which a contrary opinion is supposed to have been expressed to that upon which we found our judgment. In the first volume, page 600, of Boulay Paty's edition, treating of general and particular average, he says, "Les frais faits pour sauver la marchandise sont avaries simples pour le compte des propriétaires." In that passage he was treating of general average as between the owners of goods and the owners of the ship and freight, and he was not giving an opinion upon the construction of a policy, but he refers to the 17th chapter, sect. 7, for a discussion of the question of liability as between the insurer and the assured, either with or without a suing and labouring clause, in which the matter is thoroughly discussed, and which is the part of the work applicable to the present subject in which he throughout treats the question as one depending upon the very words of the suing and labouring clause. Nothing can make this more clear than a reference to his treatment of the question, "Si les frais de sauvetage excèdent la valeur des effets sauvés, cet excédant est-il à la charge des assureurs?" To which he answers: "Suivant les clauses insérées dans les formules de diverses places de commerce, les assureurs indépendamment des sommes par eux assurées, sont tenus de payer l'excédant des frais de sauvetage." He then sets out the form of the suing and labouring clause by Boulay Paty, used at Antwerp, Rouen, Nantes, and Bordeaux, and a similar one. He refers to a more ancient one, which is to be found in Loccenius, 981, by which the underwriters undertake for expenses incurred in the safeguard of the goods, even although no benefit should follow, and he remarks upon that, "Par ces formules les pourvoirs les plus libres sont donnés à l'assuré et à ses représentants afin de les inviter à travailler au sauvetage sans être arrêtés par la crainte d'en supporter eux-mêmes les frais; mais les assureurs, en souscrivant pareils pactes, contractent à l'aveugle un engagement dont les conséquences sont indéfinies." He then gives the London form under the head of forms of special claims against underwriters even to expenses beyond those from which they could derive any benefit. Nothing can be stronger to show to what Emerigon thought that suing and labouring clause belonged. Having given that, he proceeds to say that the Marseilles Policy (with which he was so familiar) contained nothing of the sort, and that an express authority to sue and labour was necessary in order to charge the Marseilles underwriters with the expenses. This view, as far as it bears upon the present argument, is in accordance with the view of the London average staters, and favours a distinction between loss and damage to the thing assured and expenses incurred in its protection, and to a separate provision for the latter. In fact, the key to the French authorities is to be found in the positive law of France upon the subject, by which, in the absence of express contract, contribution on the part of the underwriters was enforced in the cases of shipments stranding, and then only to the value of the property recovered for the underwriters. I need only refer to the Ordonnance de la Marine, clause 45, which is followed closely, though not exactly, by the present commercial Code of France, art. 382, each of which makes it the duty of the assured to labour and sue at the charge of the underwriter only in case of shipwreck or stranding. Read by the light of the Ordonnance, the views of Emerigon, so far from being opposed to, are in favour of the construction which we adopt. Hitherto we have only adverted in passing to the evidence, and the finding of the jury upon the understood meaning in the business of marine insurance of the phrase "particular average." If necessary we should have been prepared to hold that the evidence established such an understood meaning according to which particular average does not include particular charges, and to act upon such usage is equally sound with the express part of the contract. It is needless, however, to enlarge upon this part of the case, because, upon the facts proved and the true construction of the policy itself, we have, for the reasons already given, come to the conclusion that there was a danger of the total loss of the freight by reason of the loss of the ship by the perils insured against; that the measures taken by the plt. to avert the loss, and the expenses incurred thereon, were taken and incurred for the benefit of the underwriters in averting a loss for which they would have been liable, and so that they were within the suing and labouring clause; and that the underwriters are liable to contribute thereto. It is satisfactory, however, to think that, in arriving at this conclusion upon the meaning of the contract into which the defts. have entered, we are deciding also in accordance with the approved usages of commerce. The verdict for the plt. was therefore right, and these were the reasons why the rule to enter the verdict for the deft. was discharged.

KIDSTONE v. THE EMPIRE MARINE INSURANCE COMPANY.

THE SHOOTING STAR; JOHNSON v. CHAPMAN.

Average contribution—General and particular average.

In order to make a jettison of cargo the subject of a general average contribution, the facts must be established that there was a maritime peril; that the sacrifice made was to avert a danger common to the whole adventure, and that such sacrifice was voluntary.

A ship on a voyage from Quebec to London, laden with timber, was overtaken in a gale, and in order to enable the pumps to work—the working of them was impeded by the deck cargo getting adrift—the master threw such cargo overboard:

Held, that such jettison was made to avert a danger common to all the interests concerned, ship, freight, and cargo; and that the timber so jettisoned, not being at the time "wreck" within the received meaning of that word, and the sacrifice of it being voluntary, the loss accruing on the same must be held to be "general" average, and that all interests must contribute to make it good.

This suit came before the court in the form of a special case, as follows:—

The plts. are the owners of a ship named the Shooting Star; and the deft. is a merchant carrying on business in London under the name of E. H. Chapman and Company. On the 26th May 1863 a charter-party was executed by the plts. and the deft., to the effect that the Shooting Star was to proceed to Quebec, "and there load from the factors of the charterer (the deft.) a full and complete cargo of deals, including a deck load, one-half of the cargo to be floated deals at the bottom, and the remainder dry deals, and deal ends and staves as required by the master for broken stowage, not exceeding what the ship can reasonably stow and carry over and above her tackle, apparel, provisions, and furniture; and, being so laden, shall proceed to London, or so near thereunto as she can safely get, and deliver the same on being paid freight." In pursuance of this charter-party the Shooting Star proceeded to Quebec, and loaded there from the deft.'s factors a full and complete cargo of deals and stores, including a deck load, and, being so loaded, duly proceeded, in pursuance of the said charter-party, to London. During the voyage from Quebec to London certain portions of the deck load on board the Shooting Star were jettisoned, and the circumstances under which this took place were those stated in the protest, all the facts being taken as admitted, and to form part of the special case. All the goods loaded on board the Shooting Star at Quebec had been duly delivered to the deft., with the exception of those goods which had been jettisoned as aforesaid. The plts. contend that the loss of the goods so jettisoned is a particular average loss, in respect of which no contribution is due from them to the deft. The deft., on the other hand, contends that the said loss is a general average loss in respect of which contribution is payable by the plts. to the deft. It is admitted that hitherto has been the practice of average adjusters not to allow as general average the jettison of such portion of the deck load as is immediately before the jettison in a state of wreck, but this admission is to be taken without prejudice to the right of the deft. to contend that such practice cannot affect the result. The question for the opinion of the court is whether the deft. is, under the circumstances of the case, entitled to any contribution from the plts. in respect of the goods jettisoned as aforesaid.

The material facts are thus given in the protest:—On the 3rd Nov. 1863, the master of the Shooting Star appeared before a notary public, and, as such deponent, declared, "That the ship being tight, staunch, and strong, and well and sufficiently manned, and having received, and well and properly loaded and stowed away aboard of her at Quebec a cargo of deals and staves with the deck load and both properly secured for London, did, on the 5th Oct. set sail from Quebec. That on the 13th Oct. it blew a gale from the W.S.W., and the ship laboured and strained excessively, and though sail was reduced, she took so many seas on board, that her decks were continually flooded, and the deck load was broken adrift, whereupon the same was secured as well as possible. That at dusk of the same day she had made three feet of water in the well, which, though all hands worked at the pumps, had increased by midnight to ten feet. That on the following day the gale raged with unabated fury, accompanied by a tremendous heavy cross sea, which broke over the said ship in such immense bodies as to keep her deck continually inundated; and the said ship labouring and straining excessively, and sucking a great deal of water, and the deck load constantly breaking adrift, and having damaged one of the boats, the said deponent was compelled, for the safety and preservation of the said ship, her cargo, and of all on board, to throw part of her deck load overboard to prevent it doing further damage. That his ship nevertheless made bad weather of it till the gale abated, and at six p.m. the same day the pumps sucked, and the crew were sent below. That on the 20th of the same month she encountered another gale, and made very bad weather of it, shipping such immense bodies of water that her pumps were kept constantly going. That the next day she continued to make fearful weather of it, and at 2.30 a.m. shipped a very heavy sea on the port beam, which stove the long-boat in bits, split the whale-boat, and stove in the gig, knocking the port quarter away, and breaking the gunwales, and damaging a fourth boat, at the same me shifting the deck load against the pumps on both sides so that they could not be worked, and filling the cabin with water, and doing other considerable damage. That as soon as possible the deck load was secured as well as circumstances would permit, and the pumps set to work, after which the gale abated. That on the 23rd of the same month she encountered another strong gale, and suffered bitterly, which said gale, on the 25th of the same month, increased to a perfect hurricane, and being accompanied by a tremendous high and heavy sea, which broke over the said ship in such immense bodies as to flood her deck, her deck was again broken adrift, and knocked against the pumps on both sides; and the said appearer was compelled, in order that the crew might work the pumps, and to prevent damage to the bulwarks and pumps, and for the safety and preservation of the said ship, her cargo, and of all on board, to throw a further portion of her deck load overboard; and the said ship, shipping and making so much water, there being five feet six inches in the well, the pumps were of necessity kept going. That the following day the gale abated, and sail was made, the pumps being at all times carefully attended; and that finally the said ship arrived in safety at the port of London on the 2nd Nov." And lastly, the appearer declared that the loss and damage to the ship, her appurtenances and cargo, were solely and entirely owing to, and occasioned by, the gales.

July 10.—WILLES, J. delivered the judgment of the Court:—In pronouncing judgment for the deft. in this case—and for the deft. the judgment must be—the Court deems it right to mention, to any confusion should appear to be introduced into the law by its decision, that the Court does not mean to throw doubt upon the propriety of the practice of average staters in allowing for that which can properly be called "wreck." That appears to be a very general practice, and it is a practice which has found its way into the various treatises on the subject. The question is, what is "wreck?" In order to make it the subject of a general average contribution, two conditions must be fulfilled: first of all, there must be a common danger; it must be a maritime peril, and it must be common to the whole adventure, which would exclude some of the cases, which counsel very ingeniously put, of a subject-matter that had within itself the elements of destruction which developed themselves during the storm; as, for instance, cotton which was brought on board in a damp state bursting out into flame, and being thrown overboard: you cannot say there is in that case a common danger, but a peculiar danger from the fault of the person putting it on board. And then, secondly, there must be a sacrifice in the sense of intentional sacrifice. That is a second condition which must be fulfilled; and that seems to exclude all those cases in which the average staters ought to refuse to allow a contribution upon the ground of wreck. Certainly the reasoning is all consistent. All the writers in this country and abroad appear to be agreed that the question is, whether there is common danger, and whether there is a voluntary sacrifice. They are all agreed, it must be admitted, upon the application in practice of these rules. But there is one case upon which our average staters appear to be agreed—that is to say, if a mast were sprung, and part of it were to go overboard with a quantity of masts and sails attached to it, hanging on by a stay which must give way in a minute or so, whilst, in the meantime, by battering against the side of the vessel, it adds to the danger; and if the stays were cut to let it go at once, it would be very difficult to say that that was anything more than wreck. A lawyer could not lay down as a matter of pure law that all lumber cut loose is wreck. But what I say is, it was virtually lost, if not recoverable; if the act of cutting the rope was only hastening the moment at which it would be lost, you would properly call that wreck, and you would not say it was general average. The reason given is, because you cannot keep it. There is no intentional sacrifice in cutting it away. You must lose it; and the losing it a minute or two sooner can make all the difference of its doing great injury or not, but you cannot help losing it. But if, instead of cutting away what is virtually lost only, you cut a portion of what is still on board and safe, except for the common danger, for instance, a mast or bowsprit, for the purpose of facilitating the getting rid of the wreck, which is only incumbering the vessel, if you do that, you ought to receive average in respect of the portion you so cut away, because that you do sacrifice. It may be also exceedingly difficult, in some cases one can conceive it must be, for average staters consistently to apply the principles; but the principle appears to be clear that if the danger is common and the thing is voluntarily sacrificed, it is contributed for rateably. In this case there was a deck cargo; and the first observation would naturally arise upon its being a deck cargo, and upon the exception with regard to deck cargoes; but that is taken out of the case most effectually by reference to the charter-party. This is an action by the shipper of the cargo against the shipowner; and the charter-party contemplates a deck cargo. It is not suggested there is any statute to make a deck cargo illegal; therefore, it seems something more than custom to have deck cargoes. I think it was from Quebec; but it is not necessary to refer to any custom affecting the voyage, because according to the contract between the parties there was to be a deck cargo. Then immediately you find that the deck cargo is within the contemplation of the parties, you must deal with it as if shipping a deck cargo was lawful. When you have established that it is a deck cargo lawfully there by the contract of the parties, it becomes the subject of the rule of general average. Now, dealing with this case, and taking one of the jettisons, because, I presume, there was enough thrown overboard on each occasion to satisfy the plts.' claim if the deft. was liable to contribute; the question is, whether there was any liability for any jettison? If so, the amount is agreed on in the case. Therefore, I take only one of the jettisons, and take the one Mr. Cohen himself most insisted upon, that is, most addressed himself to in his argument, and which was most striking. The cargo appears to have broken away, appears to have got loose on deck; it was not washed overboard; it had not become valueless; it was not spoiled with the water; and if the weather had been fine it would have been restowed, and it might have come on and been just as valuable except getting a little wetting with salt water. It was in fact once restowed, or part of it, during the voyage, so that it clearly was not in a state of wreck, in the sense of having become lost property, which they could not recover, or make use of if they recovered it. Then there was this peculiarity about it being thrown overboard; it not only incumbered the working of the vessel, but it interfered with the pumps, which it was particularly necessary at that time to work. The persons on board the vessel naturally selected that part which was near the pumps as first to throw overboard, and no doubt they would throw over the rest if there was imminent danger of its getting loose and taking the same course as the first part. But the same sort of question might arise in various forms as to cargo stowed in the hold. For instance, if there were an exceedingly heavy part of the cargo below, and the vessel was labouring very much—when I say very heavy I mean heavy in the sense of great specific gravity—and working upon a particular part of the vessel it had strained the vessel, and so threatened to let in the water and sink her, if you took that and threw it overboard, in no other sense can it be said the cargo in question, or that part of the cargo so thrown overboard, to be more precise, was exposed to danger different from the rest of the cargo, except in that circumstance the circumstance that it was, by reason of its weight and position, the best thing to choose to throw overboard, and the thing which, in that sense, it was especially necessary to throw overboard for the benefit of the whole concern. Was the jettison in this case voluntary? was it to ward off a common danger? It is only necessary to look at the protest to find the answer. The danger was caused to all—both ship, and cargo, and crew—by the storm; and to save the whole adventure from that storm the timber was voluntarily thrown overboard, and it was not wrecked. In short, the special danger caused to and by the timber was only a circumstance of the common peril to which the whole adventure was exposed. For these reasons we think that our judgment ought to be for the debt.

HAUGHTON AND OTHERS v. THE EMPIRE MARINE INSURANCE COMPANY (LIMITED).

Marine policy—Construction of—Meaning of words "at and from"—"First arrival" in harbour—Commencement of risk.

A vessel of the pils., insured by a valued policy "lost or not lost, at and from Havana to Greenock," upon arriving in good safety inside the heads in the harbour of Havana, was towed, in charge of a pilot, up the harbour, and when just past the thick of the shipping above the city, and beyond the spot where her cargo was eventually discharged, and near the "Regis Shoal," she began to stir the mud up, whereupon, by order of the pilot, her anchor was let go, and she settled down on the anchor of another ship, and sustained the damage to recover which, under the policy, the present action was brought; and upon a rule to enter a non-suit or a verdict for the debt, it was *Held (a) (discharging the rule), that a marine policy is to be construed on the same principles as other contracts, and its language is to be taken in its plain and ordinary sense. The word "at" in the present policy must therefore be read in its ordinary and geographical sense, and the ship being insured "at" Havana was insured all the time she was there, the risk commencing and the policy attaching at the moment of her "first arrival" within the entrance of the harbour, as laid down by Lord Hardwick, C. J., in Motteux v. The London Assurance Company, 1 Atk. 545.*

All the limitation imposed by the law, as to the time of the commencement of the risk in such a case, is, that the ship should arrive at the port "at" which she is *insured in a state of sufficient seaworthiness to be enabled to lie there in reasonable security till properly required and equipped for her voyage. (See per Lord Ellenborough, C. J., in Parmenter v. Cordis, 1 Camp. 235.)*

Declaration on a valued policy of insurance is 3000*l.* on the ship Urgent, "lost or not lost at and from Havana to Greenock," whereby it was (inter alia) declared and agreed that the said ship should be and was warranted free from particular average below water, unless caused by injury to the stem or sternpost, or by fire, grounding, or contact with some substance other than water; and that ship and freight should be and were warranted free from average under 3 per cent., unless general, or the ship were stranded, or sunk, or burnt. Averment that the said ship, when at Havana as aforesaid, after commencement of and during the continuance of the said risk, sustained injury by perils insured against, such injury being caused by grounding and contact with some substance other than water within the true intent and meaning of the said policy in that behalf, and thereby sustained an average loss and damage exceeding 3 per cent. that is to say, to the amount of 1000*l.*

Averment of performance of all conditions, and Breach, neglect, and refusal of debts, to pay, according to the terms of the policy, and averment of damage to pils. by reason thereof.

Second count, for money payable and due on accounts stated. Claim 1000*l.*

Pleas:—1. To first count, that the said ship did not when at Havana, after the commencement during the continuance of the said risk, sustain injury by the perils insured against as alleged. 2. To the first count, that the said ship was not after the commencement and during the continuance of the said risk, stranded, sunk, or burnt within the meaning of the said policy; and that the said loss and damage in the said first count mentioned did not constitute a general average loss and amounted to less than 3 per cent. 3. To the first count, that pils. were not, nor any of them, interested in the said ship, as alleged. 4. To the residue of the declaration, never indebted. On which pleas issues were joined.

The action was brought by the pils., merchants of Liverpool, to recover 333*l.* 3*s.* 1*d.*, the sum found due from debts, under a pro forma average adjustment which the pils. had caused to be prepared by average adjusters of Liverpool, under the above policy, and at the trial before M. Smith, J. and a special jury, at the Liverpool Summer Assizes 1865, the debts did not dispute the accuracy of such adjustment, but contended that, at the time of the happening of the damage, the vessel was not covered by the policy, inasmuch as she had not then arrived "at" Havana, but was still on her voyage to that port.

The facts as they appeared from the evidence of the captain, which was taken vide supra under a judge's order before a commissioner at Liverpool on 8th April 1865, were as follows:—On the 5th May 1864, the Urgent arrived off the harbour of Havana, and as soon as she got inside the heads in the harbour the captain took a pilot and engaged a steaming tug to take her up to a spot where she could obtain clear anchorage. The ship was then towed up through the harbour past the thick of the shipping above the city, and beyond the spot where eventually her cargo was discharged. When past the thick of the shipping and near a spot called the "Regis Shoal," at the head of the harbour, the ship began to stir the mud up, but she never stopped and was not felt to take the ground. The pilot then gave orders to let go the anchor, and to the steaming tug to warp. The anchor was let go, but the steaming tug ging ahead, and the ship ran out some fifteen fathoms of chain. The hawser then broke and the ship being starboarded by order of the pilot, the ship swung round three or four points. The pilot then went on shore without giving any further orders, leaving the ship anchored as she was; and she lay till the next morning (May 6th), when the captain attempted to get her round head to land, but failed to do so, and subsequently on the same day he discovered that the cause of her not swinging round was that she had settled down on the anchor of another ship, which had caused her to sustain serious injury in the starboard after-run. He was on the following day, the 7th, at high water, dragged off and towed into deep water to a spot selected by the purchaser of the cargo, nearer the mouth of the harbour than the "Regla Shoal" was, and there her cargo was discharged, and she was afterwards taken into a dry dock where her injuries were repaired.

(a) In delivering his judgment in this case, Channell, B. stated that he was not aware whether Pollock, C. B. concurred with the judgments of Pigott, B. and himself, or not; and that Martin, B. not having heard the whole of the argument, would take no part in the judgment, which at any rate, his Lordship added, "is the judgment of the majority of the court."

The entry in the official log under date of 5th May merely stated the simple fact that "at 4 p.m. the pilot ran the ship aground on the Regla Shoal and left us."

The only question was whether, at the time that the ship received the injury, the policy had attached.

The verdict was entered for the plts. for 353*l*. 3*s*. 1*d*., subject to leave to the defts. to move to enter a nonsuit or a verdict for defts., the court to draw all necessary inferences, and a rule to that effect having been obtained in Michaelmas Term, on the ground that the policy never attached, the vessel not having arrived at Havana within the meaning of the policy.

Brett, Q. C. and Baylis now (Nov. 22) showed cause against it on behalf of the plts.—It was immaterial whether the injury occurred before or after the ship was finally and properly anchored, though the facts showed that it occurred after; the pilot had left her, and she was brought up swinging by her own anchor. The policy attached the moment the ship was within the natural and artificial entrance of the harbour, and she was then, in nautical phraseology, "at Havana." There was a difference between "off" and "at" a place. A ship when lying in the Sloyne was at Liverpool; a ship anchored in the river at Gravesend was at London, though she had not reached her ultimate place of destination, the London-docks. But a ship in the Dover-roads was "off" Dover, and not "at" it until she was within the entrance of the harbour. No doubt, in order for the policy to attach, the ship must be at the place in a seaworthy condition, and that was the case here; but in simply ascertaining whether in fact she were at the place, the second question of seaworthiness may for the moment be dismissed. Had she been insured on the outward voyage to Havana the policy would have covered her until she had been safely anchored for twenty-four hours. It was now decided that the home policy attached before the outward policy was at an end, the two policies thus overlapping each other. It was clear that here something was insured plus the home voyage, or it would have been "from" Havana only. [POLLOCK, C. B.—Has it not been decided that to be "at" a place the vessel must be there in safety; that the dangers of the voyage must be over and at an end?] In Arnould on Marine Insurance (3rd edit. by MacLachlan), p. 339, it was said to be now settled that where a ship was insured "at and from" a foreign port with a view to cover the home voyage, she must have once been at the outward port, the terminus a quo, "in good physical safety," before the homeward policy can attach; and Parneter v. Cousins, 3 Campb. 235, and Bell v. Bell, Ib. 475, were there cited as authorities for that proposition, and the ruling of Lord Ellenborough there had been upheld in banco. But it was enough if the ship, while at the terminus a quo, was in a condition "enabling her to lie there in reasonable security till properly repaired and equipped for her voyage:" (per Lord Ellenborough, C. J., in Parneter v. Cousins, ubi sup.) In policies like the present, in the words "at and from" a place, "first arrival" was implied, and always understood:" (per Lord Hardwicke, C. J. in Motteux and others v. The Governor and Company of the London Assurance Company, 1 Atk. 545.)

Patrick v. Ludlow, 3 Johnson's New York Cas. 10; Seamans v. Loaring, 1 Mason's Circuit Rep. 127 (per Story, J.);

Palmer v. Marshall, 8 Bing. 79; 1 L. J., N. S., 19, C. P.;

Smith v. Surridge, 4 Esp. N. P. C. 25; and 1 Phillips on Marine Insurance, 3rd edit. (Boston), sects. 932, 933, 934, were all authorities to the like effect. None of the cases gave a satisfactory definition of the meaning of the word "at." The court, therefore, must take it in its plain, popular, and geographical sense, and not complicate the case by adopting an unnatural, strained, and artificial interpretation of so clear and simple an expression.

Potter (with him E. James, Q. C.), contra, for the defts., contended that the ship was not at Havana within the meaning of the policy. If this had been an outward policy only it would have expired when the ship had been safely anchored for twenty-four hours, the voyage would then have been concluded and the underwriters discharged. But even admitting that there might be an overlapping of the two policies, there must be a time when the outward liability ceased, and surely the homeward liability must begin at that same time. The vessel could not be said to be at Havana, unless she were there, so that twenty-four hours afterwards the outward liability would cease; but here the outward liability remained until the ship had been twenty-four hours at the spot where her cargo was discharged. The letting go the anchor by order of the pilot was the necessary consequence of the momentary emergency, and was a temporary and not the final anchoring. It might be that it was not necessary to the homeward policy's attaching that the outward voyage should have expired, but it was necessary that such a time should have arrived that the outward underwriters could or might be discharged, and that time had not arrived here; in fact, the outward voyage must be at an end before the homeward voyage commenced. The ruling of Lord Tenterden, C. J., in Samuels v. The Royal Exchange Insurance Company, 8 B. & C. 119, showed that the word "London" might, for the purposes of the policy, be restricted to a particular dock there, and that a ship which had not arrived at her place of discharge had not been anchored for twenty-four hours in good safety at her destination, and to that effect was the case cited in Phillips on Marine Insurance, sect. 968. "At Havana" meant, therefore, at the place of discharge, the ultimate destination of the vessel.

Cur. adv. vult.

Feb. 26.—The following judgments were now delivered:

CHANNELL, B.—The question in this case is whether or not the policy had attached at the time when the damage occurred to the ship Urgent? The facts are before us on the notes and in the documents. In my opinion the ship was then at Havana, and consequently the policy had attached. The damage occurred "at Havana," speaking in a geographical sense, and there is nothing in my judgment to show that the parties, at the time the policy was underwritten, had any other meaning of the word "at" in contemplation. All the limitation which it seems has ever been imposed by the law, as to the time of the commencement of the risk in such a case as the present, is that the ship should arrive at the port "at" which she is insured in a state of sufficient repair or seaworthiness to be "enabled to lie there in reasonable security till properly repaired and equipped for her voyage: (Par-meter v. Cousins, ubi sup., and Bell v. Bell, ubi sup.), in the latter of which cases Lord Ellenborough's ruling at Nisi Prius was subsequently upheld by the court in banc. In the present case, however, there appears to be no doubt that the ship was really within the harbour in good safety, and that the loss occurred from a peril in the harbour, and in no way from any injuries that she had received before her arrival. The ship being insured while at Havana, is evidently (in the absence of any express provision to the contrary) insured all the time she is there, and therefore the risk commences, as was said by Lord Hardwicke in Motteux and others v. The London Assurance Company (ubi sup.), on her "first arrival" there. Unless, therefore, we can say that her "first arrival" at the port is when she casts anchor there, instead of when she enters the port, our judgment must be for the plts. In many cases the nature of the port may be such that the two events may be identical. There may be nothing to show the arrival of the vessel till she casts anchor. But here we have evidence as to the port of Havana, which is sufficient, in my judgment, to show that the arrival was before casting anchor. Mr. Potter has argued that the first arrival, which must no doubt be in good safety, must be identical with the mooring in good safety usually named in outward policies. But I think we cannot construe the terms of one contract by reference to those of another not referred to in it. And it is clear that there is no usage that the duration of the outward and homeward policies should not overlap, because the outward policy usually extends to twenty-four hours after the vessel is moored in good safety. During those twenty-four hours there is no question that there is a double insurance, and therefore I see no ground for saying that the parties contracted subject to any usage that such a policy would not attach until the previous one had determined. If they had wished to make such a condition it could easily have been done; or, if having in view any special dangers, as shoals, or the like, within the port of Havana, they had chosen to make the risk date from the vessel being moored in safety, they would have done so; but as it stands it is from her "first arrival," which, as a matter of fact, I think to be on her entering the port. My judgment is, therefore, for the plts. that the rule be discharged.

FIGOTT, B.—(After recapitulating the facts, his Lordship proceeded to deliver his judgment as follows):—The sole question in this case is, whether the policy had or had not attached at the moment when the mischief occurred? I am of opinion, in conjunction with my brother Channell, that it had. I agree with the plts.' counsel, and think that the language used by the parties ought to have a plain construction put upon it, and that as the ship had arrived, geographically speaking, within the harbour of Havana, and was in safety there before the injury was received, the risk had then commenced. A policy of insurance is to be construed by the same rules and on the same principles as other contracts, it being the duty of the court to collect the meaning of the parties by taking the language employed in a plain and ordinary sense, and not to speculate on some supposed meaning which the parties have not expressed. It was argued for the defts. that Havana being an outward port, as far as regards this vessel, the words "at and from" Havana must be construed to mean that the risk should commence when the ship had so far performed her outward voyage that nothing remained to determine the outward policy, but that the twenty-four hours after her arrival should expire, and that, so construed, this policy had not attached, inasmuch as the ship had not arrived at her place of discharge. But this, it seems to me, would be a very artificial mode of construing the policy in question, nor have we any safe guide to conduct us to it. With equal plausibility it might be argued that the risk "at and from" a port should not commence till the insurance "to" that port ceased, which is at the end of the twenty-four hours, and not at the commencement of them. The answer to both these arguments seems to be, that the construction of this contract cannot depend upon the contents of another and distinct contract which is wholly unconnected with it, and that the court is not called upon to know or assume that, in fact, any outward policy exists. This view is sanctioned by the authority of Lord Hardwicke in Motteux v. The London Assurance Company (ubi sup.), where his Lordship mentions a case tried before him at Guildhall, in which he says, "It was debated whether the words 'at and from' Bengal meant the first arrival of the ship at Bengal;" and he adds, "It was agreed the words 'first arrival' were implied, and always understood in policies." Now, there can be no question about the sense in which Lord Hardwicke uses the words "first arrival," viz., in contradistinction to her being moored in a particular place, or discharging her cargo. In Par-meter v. Cousins (ubi sup.) Lord Hardwicke's report of the above case is mentioned, and the learned reporter adds, "There seems no doubt that the rule laid down by Lord Hardwicke, qualified by the principal case (to which the note is appended), is to be considered as established law upon the subject." The qualification there alluded to is, that the ship shall be once in good safety at the port, a matter not in dispute in the present case. This doctrine, and the authority for it, are to be found in several of the text-books on insurance, and may be then taken to have been long considered as the meaning of those who so word their policies. In Arnould on Insurance, p. 28, s. 25, 2nd edit., it is the form recommended to be adopted for the advantage of the assured in protecting the ship from the moment of her arrival. I do not think it necessary to advert to the other question which has been raised, viz., whether, in fact, this ship had not anchored in the harbour before the damage was sustained, and at a place even farther within it than her place of ultimate discharge, and whether that would make any difference in the case. In my judgment the plts. are entitled to keep their verdict, and this rule, therefore, should be discharged.

Rule discharged.

insurance—Action for total loss of freight—Constructive total loss of ship and goods—Proper questions for the jury—Misdirection.

on a policy of insurance as for a total loss of freight to be earned in carrying a cargo of coals and from Rio to San Francisco. On the voyage the vessel received damage from heavy seas which compelled her to put into Monte Video, having previously, for the cargo's sake, thrown overboard some portion of her cargo and landed another portion at the Falkland Islands. On the ship's being surveyed at Monte Video, she was found to be incapable of pursuing the voyage with the cargo on board, and no other vessel could be procured to take the cargo on. The cost of warehouse receipts so great at Monte Video that in a few months it would have equalled the value of the cargo, owing to the town being in a state of siege and civil revolution, it was unsafe to land the cargo and leave it unwarehoused; under these circumstances the captain, being in want of money, sold the cargo and applied the proceeds to the ship's purposes, and then sent her back in ballast to Liverpool for repairs.

At the trial the learned judge left two questions to the jury: First, was there a constructive total loss of the ship? Secondly, was there a constructive total loss of the goods? The jury answered both questions in the affirmative and found a verdict generally for the defendants, upon a rule to set the verdict aside for misdirection on the part of the judge in telling the jury that these were the only questions for consideration, it was held that there was no misdirection, and that the two questions submitted to the jury were, under the circumstances, proper questions for the determination of the case.

It is held, nevertheless, that the question of total loss of freight would not, in every case of an action on a policy for a total loss of freight, be necessarily concluded by the decision of those two questions.

A rule is that to entitle the assured to recover upon a policy, the loss must be the direct and immediate consequence of the peril insured against, and not a remote one.

*This was an action on a policy of marine insurance to recover 1500*l.*, as for a total loss of freight, the freight insured being a freight to be earned by the ship Mary Sparks in carrying a cargo of coals and from Rio Janeiro to San Francisco; and the declaration, which was in the usual form in such cases, alleged that "whilst the said ship was proceeding on the said voyage, and during the command of the said risks so insured against, the said ship with the goods on board, and likewise the said freight which the plt. should otherwise have earned by the carrying of the said goods as aforesaid, were by the aforesaid perils of the sea wholly and totally lost, and all things happened, &c., to entitle plt. to recover from defts. as in respect of a total loss of the said insurance freight to the amount insured thereupon, and to be paid the said sum of 1500*l.* by defts. accordingly, and plt. claimed 2000*l."

*Plea, payment into court of 283*l.* 19*s.* 6*d.* as enough to satisfy plt.'s claim.*

At the trial before Lush, J., and a special jury, at the last Lancashire Spring Assizes, at Liverpool, the following appeared to be the facts of the case:—

The vessel in question, a ship-rigged vessel of 1000 tons register, set sail from Rio on her intended voyage to San Francisco on the 3rd July 1864, with a cargo consisting of 275 tons of pig iron and 375 tons of coal, and on her passage down the eastern *side of South America she encountered very heavy gales and seas, and received so much damage therefrom, and became so leaky, that when off Cape Horn the captain found it necessary to bear up for Port Stanley in the Falkland Islands, the nearest port of refuge. On the 20th Aug. it became necessary for the safety of the ship to ease her by throwing overboard twenty-six tons of the iron, and on 26th Aug. she came to an anchor off Port Stanley. While there a survey was had of the vessel, and in pursuance of the recommendation of the surveyors a further portion of the cargo of iron, amounting to fifty tons, was discharged and landed at Stanley; and the captain being unable to find a ship to take it on or carry it back to England, left it there in charge of the manager of the Falkland Islands Company, who consented to look after it, but without being in any way responsible for it. There were no graving docks, or other means of properly examining and repairing the vessel at Stanley, and so, after having her temporarily repaired in the best way that he could do there, and for which he expended from 120*l.* to 146*l.*, the captain again set sail on the 17th Sept. to prosecute his voyage to San Francisco. Encountering further bad weather, and the leak increasing, it was found impossible to proceed on the voyage with safety, and accordingly the vessel bore up for Monte Video, which port she reached on the 1st Oct., making water badly all the way. Upon arriving at Monte Video it was found that the place was in a state of siege, and a hostile army in the vicinity. The inhabitants were leaving the town, and the ships in the harbour were being withdrawn in order to get out of the reach of the enemy's guns. There were no means of properly repairing the vessel at Monte Video, and it was impossible for her in her leaky condition to carry the cargo farther, nor could any other vessel be procured to carry it on. Under these circumstances the captain deemed it right to discharge the crew and land the cargo and warehouse it. It was found that the cost of warehousing was so great that in a few months it would equal or exceed the value of the goods, and therefore, in Feb. 1865, the captain, who was in need of money, determined to sell the cargo, which he did, with the exception of some 300 tons of coal retained for ballast; and applied the proceeds to the ship's purposes. He then set sail in ballast for Liverpool, to be repaired, and that port, after a leaky voyage, was eventually reached. The estimated cost of repairing her at Liverpool varied from 1984*l.* to 2728*l.* To have taken her to Rio for repairs was impossible, that port being about the most expensive in the world. Money was paid into court to cover the loss of freight in respect of the portion of the cargo thrown overboard, and that which was landed at Falkland.*

The learned judge left two questions to the jury: first, was there a constructive total loss of the ship? secondly, was there a constructive total loss of the goods? The jury found for the defendants, that there was no constructive loss of the vessel, and no constructive loss of the cargo; and the verdict was thereupon entered generally for the defendants.

A rule was subsequently obtained by the plt. to set aside the verdict, and for a new trial, on the grounds, first, of misdirection on the part of the learned judge in telling the jury that the only question was whether there was a constructive total loss of ship or goods, and of further misdirection in telling them to exclude from their consideration any question of risk to the goods by being left at Monte Video in its then state, and further telling them (as to part of such goods) to exclude any question of the condition of such goods at Liverpool; secondly, of the improper rejection of evidence offered on the plt.'s part to show the dealings of underwriters on the ship, and of plt. with the ship, at the time of and consequent on its abandonment; and thirdly, of the verdict being against the weight of evidence; and against this rule,

Milward, Q. C. and Quinn, for defts., now showed cause.—The attention of the jury was directed to the imperishable character of the cargo—coal and iron; but the captain's evidence was that he sold the cargo, not for the purpose of saving it or the ship, but because he wanted money for the ship's use. It was said, contra, that the proper point was not left, but it was difficult to discover from the terms of the rule what that proper point was. The questions left were: was there a loss of the ship? was there a loss of goods? and on those two the case proceeded throughout. The question of loss of freight was involved in them, and a third question, which it was not sought to put to the jury, ought not now to be discussed. The terms in which the learned judge laid the case before the jury were precisely those in Philpott v. Strann in the C. P., 5 L. T. Rep. N. S. 183; 11 C. B., N. S., 270; 30 L. J. 358, C. P.; Phillips on Insurance, 3rd ed., sect. 1142. But it was now said there was a third question, viz., was the shipowner prevented by perils of the sea from earning freight? That was a wide general question, and was involved in the other two. If the shipowner chose not to repair or take his ship to some near port where she could have gone, then it was an abandonment, and he could not come on the underwriters. He exercised a discretion, and it was not a loss of freight from perils insured against. [BRAMWELL, B.—Suppose this had been a cargo of oranges or rice, and that it had not been damaged, but had been sold under the circumstances here, would that have been a total loss of goods?] If it were necessary to expend more on the cargo to get it away from Monte Video than its value, then there would be a total loss of freight at Monte Video. [CHANNELL, B.—The plt.'s point is, that the questions of total loss of ship and total loss of goods do not exhaust the question of total loss of freight.] In the way it was put at the trial by the learned judge it was submitted that it did. It was idle to put the third question suggested by the other side, as it was involved in those which were put. The ship, if it could not be repaired at Monte Video, should have been taken to Liverpool to be repaired, and then have returned to Monte Video and picked up her deposited cargo, and resumed and completed her voyage. The jury had found no constructive loss of either ship or goods, and therefore there could be no total loss of freight. The judge was not dissatisfied with the verdict. They cited Brett, Q. C., Mellish, Q. C., and C. Russell, for plts., contra, in support of their rule.—There were no means of repairing the ship at Monte Video, nor was it safe to leave the cargo there, and the cost of warehousing it would have exceeded its value, and no vessel could be found to take it on. Of necessity, therefore, the captain sold it for the ship's purposes. The shipowners might be debtors to the cargo owners. Even an improper sale by the captain would not alter the question as between owner and underwriters. What was not reasonable in a commercial and business sense, having regard to the interests of the owners of the ship and the goods, was not practicable. It was not a question of "prudent owner." If the act were done for the benefit of all concerned, then the voyage was at an end, and the freight prevented from being earned by perils of the seas. That point was settled by Blasco v. Fletcher, 9 L. T. Rep. N. S. 160; 11 C. B., N. S., 147; 32 L. J. 284, C. P., a case which showed what was the proper question to have been left here. The defts.' contention, that after repairing at Liverpool, the shipowner was bound to send her back to pick up the cargo and finish her voyage, and that the goods owner was to keep the goods there in the meantime, no matter at what cost, was absurd. Then, if there were no such obligation, it was clearly a total loss. If either the goods owner was entitled to send them on by another ship, or the shipowner was not bound to go back to resume the voyage, then, as a matter of common sense, the original freight was prevented from being earned. A constructive loss of the ship involved a loss of freight; and if the goods were properly sold the freight was lost, though the converse of those propositions did not necessarily follow. If perils of the sea (which were what were insured against) were the origin of the interruption of the voyage, it was immaterial what intervened: (Naylor and others v. Palmer and another; the Coolies case, 8 Ex. 78; 22 L. J. 829, Ex.) [MARTIN, B.—Surely, proxima non remota spectatur is the rule?] Yes, but it was a question, what was the proximate cause of taking it out of the owner's possession: (Louis v. The Universal Marine Insurance Company; the Cape Hatteras case, 8 L. T. Rep. N. S. 705; 11 L. J. 170, C. P.; 14 C. B., N. S., 259.) It was wrong to assume that the captain sold for want of money, nor did the fact that he wanted it prevent a total loss. One of three things must be done, either to sell the goods, or to send them on by another ship, or, as a dernier ressort, to sell them. No doubt the question of loss of goods and ship might be put so as to include the question now insisted on, but the learned judge put it so as to confine it to those two questions. The delay here was not unreasonable, and that question ought to have been submitted to the jury; the proper question for them being, whether by perils of the sea, having regard to delay, expense, and risk, it was not rendered impossible in a mercantile point of view for the freight to be earned by prosecuting the voyage insured against? Cur. adv. val.

June 11.—The judgment of the Court (Martin, Bramwell, Channell, and Pigott, BB.) was delivered as follows by MARTIN, B.—This case, which was very ably argued a few days ago, was a rule obtained to set aside the verdict for the defts., upon three grounds: the first was misdirection: the second was the rejection of evidence; and the third was that the verdict was against the evidence. With respect to the rejection of evidence, it seemed, without imputing any bad faith to any one, that the objection or rather the evidence was not pressed upon the learned judge in such a manner, and to such an could understand that it was insisted that it properly was not. But, on reference to the shorthand and the note of the learned judge, and judge himself, it seems clear to us that the counsel offering it afterwards to the jury for a new trial on the ground of its misdirection, we are of opinion that, under the circumstances of this case, there is no misdirection. We are very far from saying that, in an action on a policy of insurance for a total loss of freight, where, as in every case, the question of whether there was a total loss of the ship or a total loss of the freight is necessarily concluded by the evidence; indeed, we are of opinion that cases might be put where the answers to the questions might not be conclusive at all. There are two instances put in the course of the argument which it is useless to put here. We are of opinion that, under the circumstances of this case, the questions which were submitted to the jury were proper for the determination of the case. As we have stated, the action was on a policy of insurance for a total loss of freight. The freight was to be earned by the ship in carrying coal and iron, and the circumstances of the case show that the ship set sail from Rio; and on her arrival at the eastern side of South America she sustained considerable sea damage. Some of the cargo was lost overboard, and the loss of freight was paid into court. The ship was then taken into a port in the Falkland Islands, where a portion of the cargo was there put on shore, and the money has been paid into court in respect of the freight of it. The ship then continued her voyage, and met further bad weather, the result was she put back and came to anchor off Monte Video, in consequence of being detained by and by reason of the bad weather. Upon her arrival at Monte Video the cargo was this: the town was in a state of siege, a hostile army was in the neighbourhood, the vessels in the harbour were being withdrawn from the town in order to get out of reach of the enemy, and the town was expected to be fired on from the shore. The ship arrived in the month of January, and the captain thought it right to dismiss the cargo and warehouse it, and he remained at Monte Video till the February following, when he took the step of selling the cargo and receiving the money; and, without having any bad faith to the captain, or anything to his own statement he says, "I sold it on the 14th Feb.; I had tried to send it on; I received a certain sum of money;" and in another part of his evidence he says, "I sold it for the purpose of getting the money for the ship's use." This statement with respect to the sale of the cargo, and supposing that the matter had stood as it is, it is perfectly clear that there would be no evidence to go to the jury, upon what I have stated, that there was a total loss of the freight by the peril of the sea, because in the circumstances it was not brought about by a peril of the sea, but by a peril of the war. The rule is, that to entitle the assured to recover on a policy the loss must be the immediate consequence of the peril insured against, and not a remote one. Therefore, assuming there was nothing to the contrary, that I have stated, there would be no evidence to go to the jury of a total loss of the freight. Under those circumstances, Mr. Brett contended by reason of two circumstances which he stated, that there was a total loss of the freight, and that there was a constructive total loss of the ship, and if there was a constructive total loss of the ship, that that would involve a total loss of the freight insured. This was what Mr. Brett put forward as the first ground for making what occurred a total loss of freight; and the learned judge could do nothing else than leave the questions to the jury; he left all the questions to the jury whether or not the circumstances were such as to create a total loss of the ship; and the jury found they were not. Mr. Brett afterwards contended, secondly, that there was a total loss of goods, and he contended again, from what had occurred, that there was a total loss of the freight; and if he were right, it probably would be so. In my judgment, perhaps the learned judge might have been justified in withdrawing that question from the jury, and ruling, as a matter of law, that there was not a total loss of those goods. But I think there can be no objection to the judge, when the counsel states there may be a matter of law and an inference of fact, leaving it to the jury for the purpose, without himself ruling at once that there was no case to go to the jury. It seems that in this particular case, and under those circumstances, the judge did leave the proper question to the jury, assuming that this last question was a question for them at all. Therefore we are all of opinion that, under the circumstances of this case that were proved on the trial, the course taken by the judge was correct, and that there was no misdirection or any default in the mode in which he left the case to the jury. The third ground was that the verdict was against the evidence. The judge states that in his opinion the verdict was quite right, and I believe we all concur in the statement which he gives. We all concur with the learned judge in thinking that the verdict was right, and that there is no ground to set it aside on the ground stated. Therefore the rule will be discharged.

BRAMWELL, B.—I am of the same opinion. With respect to the two questions left to the jury, Lush, J. reports that he left the two questions made at the trial. He left the existence of those two grounds for the jury, and they negatived them. He did not say negatively to the jury or by implication that there could be such a total loss, but he put the only two views, on which it could have been contended that there had been, to the jury. If he would have been right in treating it as a total loss of the freight, I think there may be a fault in his summing up.

Brett, Q.C.—Will your Lordships in such a case give leave to appeal?

MARTIN, B.—Oh, no.

BRAMWELL, B.—There is great difficulty in giving you leave to appeal after the opinion of my brother Lush.

ERROR FROM THE COMMON PLEAS.

Monday, Feb. 5, 1866.

THE CITY OF DUBLIN STEAM-PACKET COMPANY
v. THOMPSON.

Ship and shipping—Register tonnage—Ships requiring propelling power—Allowance for engine-room—Power of commissioners to frame new tonnage rules—Rules ultra vires—Merchant Shipping Act 1854 (17 & 18 Vict. c. 104), ss, 23, 29.

Sect. 23 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1854 enacts that, in estimating the register tonnage of ships requiring propelling power, allowance shall be made for engine-room, and it divides such ships into two classes, prescribing certain allowances for each class, and laying down rules for the measurement of the engine-room. Sect. 29 entitles the Commissioners of Customs, with the sanction of the Treasury, from time to time to modify and alter the "tonnage rules" prescribed by the Act. The Commissioners of Customs did, in fact, with the sanction of the Treasury, in 1860, issue new tonnage rules, which abolished the distinction between the two classes of vessels, and laid down new uniform rules for the measurement of the engine-room in all ships :

Held, that these rules were laid down by the commissioners ultra vires, and that they had no power to abolish the distinction between the classes of vessels, or the allowances to be made to each class, but only to alter the tonnage rules respecting the mode of measuring the space actually occupied by the engine-room.

Error from the Court of C. P., which will be found fully set out in 12 L. T. Rep. N. S. 849.

R. P. Collier (Solicitor-General) (Giffard, Q. C., and C. Pollock with him), for the plt. in error, contended that the 23rd section of the Merchant Shipping Act 1854 was one entire rule in itself, and that the five paragraphs were simply sub-rules, and that the commissioners, in doing what they did, were only carrying out the intention of the Legislature.

Bovill, Q. C. (Watkin Williams and E. C. Browning with him), for the defts. in error, were not called on.

POLLOCK, C. B.—I am of opinion that the judgment of the court below must be affirmed. The real question is, whether the Commissioners of Customs, with the approval of the Board of Trade, may make such rules as they have made. When an Act of Parliament is passed which appears to give a power to any one to make an alteration in it, it should be looked at with great care, and although full effect should be given to its language, we should, nevertheless, be careful to guard ourselves against enabling a private body to make any alteration in a part of the statute which the Legislature did not intend should be altered. By sect. 29 the commissioners are empowered with the approval of the Board of Trade, to make such modifications as may from time to time become necessary in the tonnage rules. Sect. 23 directs that an allowance shall be made and that in certain cases a measurement shall be made according to "the following rules," of which there are five. Now the paragraphs A. and B. in the case do not come within these rules, and in altering the provisions of those paragraphs, the commissioners have acted ultra vires and consequently the judgment of the court below must be affirmed.

Judgment affirmed.

ADMIRALTY COURT (IRELAND)

Dublin, Friday, Feb. 8, 1866.

(Before KELLY, J.)

THE MARGARET v. THE TUSCAR

Ship's lights and rules of the road—Steamers and vessels on their fishing grounds.

First, although it is the duty of steamers and others to keep clear of fishing vessels on their fishing, yet this fact does not excuse the latter from observance of the 5th and sixth regulations Admiralty rules, which enact: 1. That sailing vessels under way or being towed shall carry the same as steamships under way with the exception of white masthead lights, which they shall not carry. 2. That whenever the green and red lights are to be fixed, then lights shall be kept on their respective sides of the vessel from the instant exhibition, and shall on the approach to any other vessel be exhibited on their respective sides in sufficient time to prevent collision, in a manner as to make them most visible, and so that the green light shall not be seen on the port side and the red light on the starboard side. To make these lights more certain and easy they shall be painted outside with the colour of the light respectively contain, and shall be provided with screens.

Secondly, in every case of collision, if it appears to the court that the violation of the Admiralty regulations as to lights has contributed to such collision, the vessel which has been guilty of that violation shall be held to be in fault, except it is shown to the satisfaction of the court that the circumstances of the case require a departure from the regulation necessary.

Dr. Townsend, Dr. Corrigan, and Dr. Boyd for the Margaret.

Dr. Todd and Dr. Eltrington for the Tuscar.

KELLY, J.—In this case the owner and of the Margaret, of Kingstown, a full-decker of 41 tons, has filed his petition against Tuscar, of Glasgow, a screw steamer of 50 tons, belonging to the Clyde Shipping Company, to recover the value of his vessel and her fish, estimated at a sum of 700*l.*, all of which was lost by the collision. The facts, as established by the evidence, are as follows:—On the morning of Thursday, the 14th Dec. last, between five o'clock, a fleet of trawlers, about forty in number, lay about half way between Howth and Malinbeg, waiting for daybreak to cast their nets. Some of them had lights, some none, and all were at least two or three miles off that part of the coast. The weather that morning has been variously described, the petitioner stating it to have been clear and starlight, with moonlight; the defendant stating it to be a dark soft morning, overcast towards the east, with a little clearing behind the wind, with a N.W. breeze. Truth may lie between these, but in the events it is beyond dispute that the moon was in her last quarter, and within four days of full, and that sunrise was not until eleven minutes past eight o'clock. There is also a difference of opinion as to the distance at which a vessel without lights could have been seen that morning, the petitioner asserting it to be a mile, the defendant stating it to be half a mile, the length only. Other portions of the evidence, however, may serve to test the accuracy of these respective statements. On the morning of the collision, a scattered fleet of trawlers, and about thirty in number, were to the S.W. of Lambay, was the Margaret, of Kingstown, the petitioner in this case. On

[IRELAND.]

THE MARGARET v. THE TUSCAR.

[IRELAND.]

Kingstown harbour about one hour before, with a nice sailing breeze, at a rate of four knots, and one of those in the fleet which had not any lights exhibited. Her crew, which consisted of six hands, immediately after clearing the harbour, was disposed of as follows: the skipper, with one man and a boy, below asleep; the only remaining hand, the liver, on deck at the helm. The evidence of the liver, the only witness to the earlier part, and the only witness to the entire of the matter now in question, is, that being at the helm at the time of leaving Kingstown until the collision, when he arrived at the fishing ground, he saw the three lights of the Tuscar between three and four miles off; he was steering east, the Tuscar at, and end on. He saw her change her course in half or a quarter of a mile off, and when on his starboard (Margaret's) port quarter, and port to go N.W., (Oliver) shouted to the crew below for the lantern, which it was the habit to keep below until required. The boy brought it up with a small red waxed candle in it, of about ten to the pound. It was about ten minutes before the collision, that it was there held by the boy over the trawler's bow, burning bright. In seven or eight minutes after the steamer again altered her course, and starboarded, opening her three lights. When the steamer changed her course a second time, he (Oliver) ordered the skipper to bring up the torch (afterwards called the flare-up), which was held over the port side of the Margaret, amidship for two or three minutes before the collision. The skipper shouted to him to bring it a-port, but no sooner was the helm up than the steamer, which had been coming on at a rapid pace, ran into the Margaret on the port side, and in a few minutes she went to the bottom. Now, this evidence—corroborated, as to the latter part, by the skipper and boy—if otherwise credible, supports the petition. But the depts. present a very different view of the case. All their witnesses, without exception, depose that between five and six that morning the steamer, on her voyage from Glasgow to Waterford, was on her proper course down the channel for the latter, viz., S.W. and S. $\frac{1}{2}$ S., and that one mile from Lambay, the master, second mate, with the look-out and man at the wheel on the bridge, when the master, observing the lights in the fleet of trawlers right ahead, ordered to starboard, so as to keep outside them, and to keep the vessel more to the southward, and the steamer was kept so accordingly for about ten minutes. Then, when all the lights were seen broad on her starboard beam, the master ordered the helm a-port, and brought the steamer up to her original course. She was then carrying a topsail, and going about ten knots. Nothing was seen ahead, and she continued on her course for about three or four minutes, when the collision occurred. About one minute before the collision the master and the look-out, with the two mates on the bridge, all at the same moment of time, saw a small light about half a point on their starboard bow, about their ship's length off. The master at once ordered hard a-starboard, and, jumping on the speaking trumpet, called down to the engine-room, "Stop her, back her full speed." But the order was scarce out of his mouth when, looking forward, he saw the steamer run right into the trawler, amidst ships on her port side, the trawler having been then seen when right under the steamer's bow. These two narratives as to the course and the changes of course of the steamer differ very materially; but there happily exist in the case certain facts by which the court, since it cannot reconcile the two, at all events, decide between them, namely, the admitted fact of that fleet of trawlers being on the fishing grounds; the undeniable duty thereby imposed upon the steamer to keep clear of them, the steamer being on her usual trip from Glasgow to Waterford; and, lastly, her course being for that trip southerly, and not westerly, and her log as well as evidence showing it to have been S.W. and half S. Reliance, therefore, can scarcely be placed upon Oliver's evidence, that she was steering west when he first made her out, for she at that time was undoubtedly on her course as the two changes in it observed by him, and but two changes, by admission of all parties, were made in it, took place after he had first seen her; nor can it be credited that the steamer, had she been on a westerly course, would have pursued it, as by so doing she would have been brought in among the trawl fleet, which it was her duty and her determination to avoid, and still less can it be reconciled that when on the Margaret's port quarter, she (the steamer) ported to go N.W., still more among them. But this latter statement is to be noticed for another reason, namely, that it was upon her so porting the boy was called to bring up the lantern, and to hold it over the Margaret's bows, which he did for seven or eight minutes. Now, the court cannot conceive any possible reason for such being done, as the natural consequence of that port helm was to bring the steamer altogether out of the way, and it did bring her out of the way of the trawler upwards of a mile according to the steamer's rate of going. Had the steamer been meeting or crossing the trawler's course, then, indeed, the light would have been necessary in order to avoid the chance of a collision. With such views the court cannot but prefer to credit the statement of the steamer on these points. But now the evidence moves forward to the actual crisis of these occurrences. Both parties agree that it was after the second of the two changes in the steamer's course—a change by the bye which the petitioner called starboarding, but which beyond all reasonable doubt was porting—the collision, which then became imminent, occurred. Both parties agree that it took place in about three minutes after that change. The steamer, by the admission of the petitioner, had her proper regulation lights all burning in accordance with the statute. The trawler, be it kept in recollection, a full-decked sailing vessel of 41 tons, confessedly had them not, in violation of the same statute. Now I come to the provisions of that statute which have been in this instance so totally disregarded, namely the 5th and 6th articles of the regulations for preventing collisions, issued in pursuance of the Merchant Shipping Amendment Act 1862. By an Order in Council of Jan. 1863, the 5th article makes it obligatory on sailing ships under way or being towed to carry the same lights as steamships under way, with the exception of the white masthead lights, which they are not to carry. The 6th article enacts, "that whenever the green and red lights cannot be fixed, these lights shall be kept upon deck on their respective sides of the vessel, ready for instant exhibition, and shall, on the approach of or to other vessels, be exhibited on their respective sides in sufficient time to prevent collision, in such manner as to make them most visible, and so that the green light shall not be seen on the port side, nor the red light on the starboard side." Taking for granted, then, that, from her small tonnage and her occupation as a fishing vessel, the trawler found it difficult or injurious to the handy working of the fishing gear, in compliance with the 5th article, to have her lights fixed, she has, at all events, violated the 6th one in not having kept the green and red lights on deck on the respective sides of the vessel, ready for instant exhibition. Now, in such cases the law has expressly enacted that in every case of collision, if it appears to the court by which such collision is tried that the violation of these regulations as to the lights have contributed to such collision, the ship which has been guilty of that violation shall be deemed to be in fault, except it be shown to the satisfaction of the court that the circumstances of the case made a departure from the regulation necessary. Now, the court, in the case before it, has diligently examined the evidence to ascertain if such justifying circumstances rendered any departure from the regulation on the part of the trawler necessary, and has found none, except a wholesale and a continued violation of the regulation in question on the part of the trawler could be surmised as such—in other words, that the illegal act of the many could justify the illegal act of the one. Such can never be tolerated by law, which requires obedience, and punishes its violation; for even in cases where no collision occurs it has made the carrying of any lights, except those in accordance with those regulations, a misdemeanor in the master or owner of the ship carrying such forbidden lights. In this case, where from its peculiar and disastrous circumstances—for life as well as property has been lost by the collision—perhaps two minute a detail has been gone into, the court will now conclude these observations with reading from the Juliana the emphatic exhortations in a case very similar to this of the eminent judge of the High Court of Admiralty in England. “I wish I could use any terms,” said that learned judge, “strong enough to induce those who navigate vessels round the coasts to believe that they must pay attention to this Act of Parliament. I regret that on so many occasions the court has seen how this statute has been disregarded. Many cases have been made to turn upon the omission to hoist the proper lights when another vessel has been seen approaching. Then arises the question whether this omission was or was not the occasion of the collision under consideration. On such questions it is often difficult to come to a safe conclusion; but there is one conclusion to which the court can come, namely, that the safeguard which the Legislature was intended to provide has been neglected. I do hope that this, amongst other instances, may be a warning to all those concerned in shipping matters that they must attend to the provisions of the Act of Parliament: for, if they do not, and their vessels are ever run down, they can neither recover in this court nor in any court whatever.” The case of the trawler, however, is that he did exhibit proper and sufficient lights. Accordingly, in support of that averment, his evidence is, that for the seven minutes subsequently to the first change in the steamer's course he exhibited over his port bow the lantern light, and that for the next three minutes that elapsed he exhibited the torch or ‘flare-up’ light. Now, it is to be observed that in the article in which he alleges the light exhibited during these last three eventful minutes, the torch or flare-up light only is stated to have been held up: and as to the lantern light stated in the evidence alone as exhibited, there are grave doubts in the mind of the court that it could then have been held up in any efficient manner, so as to have shed a light of any force or continuity. The defendants, alleging that there were no proper lights, or lights in proper time exhibited, deny that any light whatever was visible or seen by them until one minute before the collision, and when all their efforts to avoid it were unavailing, because too late. It is not contended by the petitioner that the flare-up (the fresh light brought up by the skipper) was exhibited until two or three minutes before the collision. But, as the skipper stated that when he then came on deck the steamer was one-quarter of a mile off, she must have traversed that space in one minute and a half, as her rate of speed was ten knots. It is evident that the flare-up was exhibited sooner than one minute and a half before the collision—too late to warn any other vessel of its vicinity. On the other hand, the trawler attributes the collision to the Tenar having slackened her pace, and to not having reversed, and to not having kept out of the way. But it is in proof that these latter measures attempted by the Tenar, and for the reasons were unsuccessful. Her speed, carrying a full cargo, was, it appears, ten knots. It is therefore a question for the assessor, whether it might not have been prudent, and if prudent then necessary, for her to have done so, since by having resumed her original course she drew more in shore, and so the chance of meeting some straggling vessel was increased. At the same time, every allowance must be made for the human element; the master of the Tenar manifested in other respects a prudent and careful character, and he had reasonable grounds for believing that he had left all the trawlers on a lee board boom, and safe astern. Upon a consideration of all the circumstances of the case, the court, having the concurrence of the learned assessors, is of opinion, first, that the violation of the Admiralty regulation by the Margaret contributed to the collision; secondly, that the violation by the Margaret was not exhibited sufficient time to prevent the collision, nor in any way as to make them most visible; thirdly, that the Tenar was justified in going at the speed of ten knots; fourthly, that the collision was solely caused by the Margaret's non-observance of the Admiralty regulations as to light, both as to position and manner of exhibition; and lastly, that the Tenar was solely to blame. The petition is therefore dismissed; but, as the owners of the Tenar did not press for costs, without costs.

(Before KELLY, J.)

THE IDA v. THE WASA OF NICOLAISTADT.Rules of the road—Construction of Admiralty regulations.

It is a general rule in the navigation of the sea, that there is nothing in the Admiralty rules of the road which will exonerate any ship or crew from the consequences of any neglect of precaution required by the ordinary position, or by the special circumstances of the case, and the Court of Admiralty will hold as liable which, insisting on her right under any rule of not giving way, makes no effort to avoid collision, where she could have done so had she given way.

Dr. Butt, Dr. Conner, and Barry appear for the Ida.Dr. Tonnard and Dr. Elrington for the Wasa.

KELLY, J., in giving judgment, said:—[The British barque Ida, of South Shields, and the Russian barque Wasa for damages for loss of that vessel, run down by the Wasa on the 29th July last. These two vessels, the Ida, twelve hands, and the Wasa, eighteen hands, had, as it chanced, been in from an early hour that morning becalmed in the channel of Tenedos, bound to Constantinople, with a fine working breeze from N.N.W., and the weather fine and clear. The Ida, of sailing, which was about equal, was, as the most unexceptionable witnesses, the

and it was about one hour after mid-day, when they were tacking between the island of Gadaro, lying on the port hand as they beat to windward, and the Yonkari Shoals, which lay on their starboard hand, off the mainland of Asia Minor, opposite to the island, and where the channel is but three-quarters of a mile over, the Ida on her port tack towards the mainland, and the Wasa on her starboard tack towards the island, both under all plain sail except jays, they met somewhere, being on the opposite tacks, between the island and mid-channel, and the Wasa striking the Ida went to the bottom a few minutes after in seven fathoms. These facts are undisputed. Let those which are in controversy now be considered; and in doing so a very important circumstance is to be borne in mind, namely, that the collision took place in the clear light of a midsummer day. The Ida's case is, that when she had come round on her port tack, about 150 yards N.E. of the east end of the island, which was as near as she could with prudence approach it on account of foul ground and a strong current running north to south, she was not under command, when the Wasa, although being at more than ample distance to have kept away, continued on her starboard tack, and, without adopting the slightest means of avoiding the Ida, ran into her. On the other hand, the Wasa insists that where the collision occurred was not within 150 yards, but at a quarter of a mile distance from the island, and not when the Ida was in stays, but after she had filled off, and was for some time under way on her port tack; and that the Ida meeting her end on luffed, attempting to go to windward, instead of keeping out of her way as she (the Ida) was bound to do, having the wind on her port side. Upon these opposing statements but one and the same question can arise for a decision between them, namely, was the Ida when struck by the Wasa under way or not? For, if under way, her case as a party solely entitled to damages is at an end, and different considerations might then arise as to whether both vessels were not in fault. A mass of conflicting and even incredible evidence produced to support each of these statements has more than usually impressed the court with the conviction that very few of the many who happen to be present on the occasion of any such occurrence possess either sufficient presence or perspicacity of mind to qualify them to be accurate observers, or that clearness of understanding and memory to be reliable narrators of it. Enough, however, can be gathered from indisputable circumstances to enable a sound conclusion to be arrived at. Now, the question as to whether the Ida was under way or not can be proved either by direct evidence on the point, or by the circumstantial evidence, particularly of where she went down, all the witnesses agreeing that the latter place was but two or three hundred yards E. and S. of the place where she was struck. Taking up the latter class of evidence first, what appears? The master of the Wasa says that he had her sails full when the Ida was up in the wind, and that in five or seven minutes after he met the Ida under way, nearly one-third channel over. Now, the master of the Ida, on cross-examination, says, that when going about his first order, "helm-a-lee," was three and a half or four minutes before his second order of "let go the haul," and that the second order was two minutes before the collision. Now, as the Wasa consumed from five to seven, say six minutes before she met the Ida, and as the Ida consumed the same six minutes in tacking, it is clear that the Ida must have been struck, not under way, but when occupied in the manœuvre of tacking, and therefore not under command. Now, it is admitted that the Ida went about for her port tack about 150 yards off the island, and the question, then, may be, was the Wasa able to reach to that place—say three-quarters of a mile from the Yonkari Shoals—where she went about in six minutes? That she was well able so to do is clear; Capt. Searle states that her speed then was seven knots an hour, and this speed will allow exactly six minutes for the three-quarters of a knot; so that these calculations make it very clear that the collision was at the place where the Ida was tacking before she was under command. Again, the master of the Ida says that his course was E. and N., and that when going off she fell on to E.S.E., and had come up about E. at the time of the collision. This statement, wonderfully borne out by the log of the Wasa, seems confirmed by it. That log had the following entry: "At one o'clock p.m. this day (the day of the collision) tacked off the Yonkari Shoal, and stood over for Gadaro Rock on starboard tack. About seven minutes after tacking met a barque on the port tack, which at that time appeared to be falling off a little, in accordance with the Admiralty rule that a ship on the port tack shall give way; but as she approached nearer she was luffed up in the wind, and, as it was impossible for us to fall off, ordered the sails to be hauled aback, but before the sails were got about the accident occurred—the ships struck each other." Bearing in mind the observations already made, that six or seven minutes would bring the Wasa to the ground where the Ida was in stays, and Searle's evidence that she was slow in coming round, it would seem as if the "falling off a little" and "the luffing-up" mentioned in the log were the very changes the Ida was undergoing in coming round to her course, and not her compliance with the Admiralty rule when there was no occasion, still less the violation of it, when, had she been acting under it, her own destruction would have been the most likely consequence. Again, the chief mate of the Wasa deposed that her bowsprit and jibboom had run in over the Ida's deck, between her main and fore masts; the vessels fast in each other for four minutes. And the second mate of the Wasa deposes that the Wasa afterwards backed out all clear, neither chafing her boom nor hurting her bowsprit. It is safely to be inferred from this circumstance that the Ida could not have been under way. Again, the log and evidence of witnesses state that the starboard anchor of the Wasa, hanging at the cathead when she was afterwards driven astern on the wreck of the Ida, hooked the maintop backway, breaking the maintop and foremast; yet the master of the Wasa, admitting that his bulwarks spread over his bows, denies that, when, as he stated, the collision commenced by his starboard bow bruising along the port bow of the Ida, some anchor, hanging in the same place, touched the Ida. Now, this denial, taken with the fact that the Wasa's stem was crushed in and not twisted, is sufficient to prove that the Wasa must have come stem on to the starboard side of the Ida, and therefore not have met her under way, end on, as stated. Now comes the direct evidence of independent witnesses, who were present in the channel of Tenedos at the very time of the occurrence, and who had been that morning beating up to windward, and also Capt. Searle of the Prairie Gem, and Capt. Denison of the Austria—British vessels. The former was standing on the poop, which was four feet above the deck of his ship, the Ida and the Wasa on his weather side, both then on the starboard tack to the island, the Ida about a quarter of a mile ahead of the Wasa, the latter in the wake of the Ida, he (Capt. Searle) being again in the wake of the Wasa and about one quarter of a mile distant on her lee quarter. This witness, thus situated, deposes that he saw the Ida going close over to the island, to within about 150 yards of it, hove in stays, fill on the port tack; that she had not gathered way upon her; and that before she got into command he saw the Wasa come up right under her lee, and run right into her between the two masts, and right about the centre on the starboard side. The Wasa had let go neither top-sails nor headsails, nor altered her course in the least, but went straight on till she struck her. The witness concludes by adding, that when the collision happened the Wasa was sailing, the Ida was stationary. The evidence of Capt. Denison, of the Austria is, that he, lying about one mile to windward, saw the Ida as she was tacking and hoving, left the deck, was recalled by his mate in two or three minutes, and then saw her beginning to sink, "sinking and sinking," as he expressed it, till she went down, about two or three hundred yards from where he saw her tacking, with her topmasts over water; and he says that she could not have gathered way on her in that two or three minutes he was off the deck; and in the month of September after, on his return voyage, he saw the topmast in the same place. This latter evidence supplied the circumstantial evidence of the Ida not having been in command when she was struck, and is further corroborated by that of Capt. Campbell, of the Balmoral, who saw the topmast in the place described in the month of October next after. The evidence of the master of the Wasa upon these points, namely, the place where the Ida was struck, and where she went down, must be passed over by the court as undeserving of its attention. Impressed, then, with the strongest conviction of the truth of the Ida's statement, the court find that there is one circumstance outside of it, yet of so strong a nature that it should be adverted to. The evidence of the man at the wheel of the Wasa is, that when the master of the Wasa saw the Ida just two minutes before the collision he gave him orders not to give way, he (the master) adverting to the rule of the road that a vessel with the wind on her port side was the vessel to give way; that the master repeated that order two or three times during those eventful two or three minutes; and that, added the witness, had the Wasa given way, and had sufficient room to do so, the collision would not have occurred. The Court adverts to this to warn masters that there is another and most continuing rule which says, that nothing in the Admiralty rules shall exonerate any ship, or owner, or master, or crew from the consequences of any neglect of any precaution which may be required by the ordinary practice of seamen, or by the special circumstances of the case, and that the Court of Admiralty has held that vessel to blame which, insisting on its right under an Admiralty rule of not giving way, had made no effort to prevent the collision which it thought was in her power, and which consequently it was her duty to have done. Looking at all the circumstances of the present case, and having carefully gone over the whole of the evidence with the assessors, the Court—agreeing with those gentlemen—is of opinion that the Ida was not under command at the time when she was struck by the Wasa; that the collision was attributable to the latter vessel obstinately persisting to keep her luff when a stroke or two of the weather helm would have prevented the occurrence; that, as the Wasa was under command, and the Ida powerless, the Wasa could easily have kept away, and did not do so; that, in fact, the Wasa was solely to blame; and that there must be a decree in favour of the Ida with costs.

The Court was assisted by Capt. Miller and Lieut. Crosby as assessors.

Re THE ISABELLA, OF GLASGOW.

Material men—Lien on ship for repairs and supplies.
Construction of statute 19 & 20 Vict. c. 97.

The 8th section of the 19 & 20 Vict. c. 97, is ~~referred~~ to the rights and remedies of persons having ~~been~~ for repairs done or supplies furnished to ships, ~~in~~ construed as a remedial enactment, intended to ~~enlarge~~ and not restrict those rights and remedies; ~~and~~ in order to secure these rights and remedies to ~~persons~~ who had claims as material men in all parts ~~of the~~ United Kingdom not being strictly English ports, ~~and~~ in the Channel Islands, the 8th section of the ~~19 & 20~~ Vict. c. 97, was passed declaring all ports ~~in~~ the United Kingdom and the Channel Islands ~~to be~~ ports, and thereby enlarging in favour of the ~~claimants~~ of claimants the jurisdiction of the Irish ~~Court of~~ Admiralty in England.

Where, on a petition by material men for the ~~sale~~ of a ship, it appears that the petitioners had agreed ~~to~~ to the agent of the owners of the ship for ~~payment~~ the petitioners put themselves out of court as ~~to~~ sole, and their claim is simply one of contract.

KELLY, J., in giving judgment in this case—~~and~~:—This is a petition on the part of Messrs. ~~Steele~~ and Brazil, as material men, against the steamer ~~ship~~ Isabella, of Glasgow, for repairs and ~~supplies~~ furnished to her by them in the course of ~~last~~ month, when lying in Kingstown harbour, and praying a decree of sale against her for the ~~payment~~ of their several demands. The proctor for the Isabella has appeared under protest, and on the part of her owner has exhibited a declinatory exception, setting forth two distinct grounds of objection to the jurisdiction of this court: the first, that according to the maritime law of this realm by which the High Court of Admiralty is bound, material men supplying necessities to a British ship in a home port acquire thereby no right or lien against such ship; the second, that if this court even had jurisdiction in such matter, it had none in respect of the matters alleged in the petition in the present case. In support of the first ground of objection, the case of the Neptune, 3 Knapp, P. C. C., was strongly insisted upon, and the arguments so successfully used against the lien were ingeniously adopted in the argument in the present case; nor could it well have been otherwise, as all the bearings on the subject had been exhausted in that argument and on that decision. That decision was simply that material men have no lien for supplies furnished in England on the proceeds remaining in the registry of the Court of Admiralty of a ship sold under its decree. Now that decision, confined most guardedly in its language to a case of supplies furnished in England, followed, but as a corollary, the prohibitions which nearly a century and a half earlier had been granted by the Courts of Common Law in England, restraining the High Court of Admiralty of that kingdom from entertaining suits in conformity with the doctrine of foreign mercantile law, by which it was held that material men had a lien on the ship itself—that decision basing itself on the reasoning of Lord Hardwicke in Buxton v. Snee, and using its language, namely, "If the body of the ship is not liable or hypothecated, how can the money arising by sale be affected or followed, the one being consequential of the other?" no new principle was enunciated, but it merely carried out what had been the ground of these prohibitions—namely, that the law of England had never adopted that doctrine of the civil or foreign maritime law as to contracts made in England, denying that material men had, in respect of such contracts, any lien upon the ship itself, and prohibiting those proceedings which could only be justified by the existence of such a lien. When, then, this court is asked to receive that decision as authority in the present case, it naturally looks to the antecedent and present state of the law on this subject in Ireland, and upon the very threshold of such investigation it finds that no prohibition has been ever granted with respect to this matter in this country, but in the year 1857 the very question, similar in all respects to the present one, was raised before this court, and very ably argued. That case was the Cinque Frères, of Brest. Referring to my notes of the judgment then given by me, I find that after declaring that it was beyond doubt that by the general maritime law material men had a lien upon the ship itself, I added as follows:—"But in Ireland, as in England, the law of nations, of which the lex mercatoria is a branch, is part of the common law only so far as it is unrestrained, or as it is modified by statutes, or by the municipal courts. Now, in Ireland, which did possess its independent legislature, and still possesses its independent municipal courts, the High Court of Admiralty (unlike as in England) has been permitted to exercise a jurisdiction, carrying out to a limited extent that principle of the lex mercatoria, namely, that a ship itself is liable to material men with this proviso, that she is a foreign, not a domestic ship. That jurisdiction no statute has been passed to alter, and no prohibition or appeal has been interposed to prevent. Influenced by such considerations, and supported by a long and unvarying course of practice, I hold myself bound to administer the law of the court as I find it, and am of opinion that I would not be justified in declining to exercise authority under it when legitimately appealed to." To these conclusions I still adhere, founded as they are upon the undeviating practice of the court for more than a century. Upon the uniform decisions of my predecessors upon this bench—and yet more upon the fact that that practice has neither been prohibited nor restrained—under such circumstances of difference, therefore, as a prohibited and an unprohibited jurisdiction, and also of the decision in the case of the Neptune being specially limited to supplies furnished in England, I feel justified in declining to be guided by that decision as an authority in the present case. But it has been further urged, that, admitting this practice, namely, that the ship is liable, provided she is a foreign, but not a domestic vessel, the Isabella, although hailing from Glasgow, is a domestic vessel, and therefore falling within the proviso, is not liable; and in support of that argument the 19 & 20 Vict. c. 97, is relied upon. Now, that statute in sect. 8 enacts as follows:—"That in relation to the rights and remedies of persons having claims for repairs done to, or supplies furnished to or for ships, every port within the United Kingdom, the islands of Man, Guernsey, Jersey, Alderney, Sark, and the islands adjacent, being part of the dominions of Her Majesty, shall be deemed a home port." The argument then is, that Glasgow, to which port the Isabella belongs, being, by force of the enactment, deemed a home port, the Isabella must be considered as a domestic ship, and therefore, not being liable for her repairs and supplies under the law as administered in this court, the persons having claims on those accounts must lose their rights and remedies against her. But the enactment in very terms relates to these rights and remedies in order to enlarge them and to abrogate them. It is a remedial enactment, and to be construed liberally, and by no force of construction can be wrested to so palpable a self-contradiction as the proposed interpretation of it in this argument discloses. It is very certain that the intendment of this enactment was as follows:—The English Court of Admiralty having by prohibition and appeal totally lost its jurisdiction in material suits, it was in a short time afterwards restored to it by statute as against foreign ships, and afterwards as against British colonial vessels; but the exercise of that jurisdiction was restrained to English or home ports. In order, then, to give rights and remedies to persons who had claims as material men in all the ports of the United Kingdom not being strictly English ports, and in the Channel Islands, the enactment referred to was passed, declaring all ports within the United Kingdom and the Channel Islands home ports, and thereby enlarging in favour of that class of claimants the jurisdiction of the Irish Court of Admiralty in England. For all these reasons, then, the court overrules the first ground upon which a declinatory exception is taken. The second ground, however—namely, that the court has no jurisdiction over the matter stated in the petition—must be allowed. The petitioners alleging formally that the repairs and supplies were furnished upon the credit of the ship, distinctly pleaded in their fourth and seventh articles that they had been in communication with the agents of the owner in Kingstown; that in consequence of that they had agreed to furnish the repairs and supplies, and that, in consequence of an order to that effect from the same agents, they had discontinued their services. One of the petitioners, Sheridan, in his leading affidavit, states that when he wanted payment the master told him to apply to those very agents. Now these allegations of the petitioners themselves appear, in the judgment of the court, to present an insuperable objection to this action being maintained by them, the contract which they seek to enforce as against the ship having been entered into by agreement with the agents of the owners, the result of communication with them, and upon their responsibility. The petition and its schedules are open to other peculiar observations, but those already made with reference to the agreement with the acknowledged agents of the owners and on land sufficiently show that it is the common case of contract, and that the Court of Admiralty cannot have cognisance of such a suit. This ground of exception, then, being held good, the Court dismisses this petition with costs.

Collision—Steam propeller and schooner look-out—Sudden tack of schooner.

Where a schooner, loaded with oysters, in order to get to her pier tacked without noticing an approaching steam-propeller, and was run into and sunk:

Held, that on the evidence, the schooner was so near the propeller when she tacked across her course that the latter had not time, though she immediately reversed her engine, to stop herself:

That it was good management under the circumstances for the steamer to endeavour to stop, although when her engine was reversed she could not sheer, rather than to have endeavoured to sheer either way by keeping on at risk of loss of life:

specially stationed on the forward part of the vessel, but inasmuch as it was made to appear that the schooner was seen as soon as she came in view, the absence of the look-out did not contribute to the collision:

That the schooner was in fault for thus tacking so near the steamer, and she must bear the loss.

These were two libels filed by the respective owners of the schooner Village Bride, and her cargo of oysters; the schooner having been sunk by the Saxonia on the 4th March 1865, in the Hudson River in the port of New York. The testimony in the case was very voluminous, some forty-four witnesses having been examined. The main facts of the collision sufficiently appear in the opinion of the court.

For the schooner, Bebe, Dean, and Dowling.

For the steamer, Burrett and Brinsmade.

BLINDECT, J.—Since the reception of the briefs of counsel I have taken time sufficient to enable me to go over all the testimony with care, and test by the evidence itself the correctness of each proposition advanced on either side; and though the case has been examined both by counsel and by me in many aspects, I am of the opinion that its decision must turn upon the determination of a single question of fact. The undisputed facts are these. About one p.m. the Saxonia, having left her berth at Hoboken, was moving down the Hudson River in a straight course southerly to sea, at a speed of from four to five knots an hour. She was in charge of a licensed pilot, who stood upon the bridge of the vessel directing her course, where also her master was stationed in the discharge of his duties. The tide was flood, with a full breeze from the westward or thereabouts. The weather was fair, and no vessels were in the way to interfere with her movements or obstruct her view. About the same time the schooner Village Bride, bound to Pier 43, on the east side of the river, with a load of oysters, came into the river from below, and in order to make her landing at Pier 43 adopted the following manœuvres:—First she ran up somewhat past Pier 43 under full sail, and then tacked and stood southerly some distance, when coming into the wind she lowered her foresail and stood northerly again under jib and mainsail until about opposite the pier, when she again came into the wind, lowered her mainsail, and then wore and stood towards her pier on an east course under jib alone. This last manœuvre brought her upon a course directly across the course of the Saxonia, then coming down the river, and while so proceeding she was struck by the Saxonia on her larboard side about twenty feet from her stern, and cut down so that she shortly sunk. All the movements of the schooner up to the time of the blow were below the Saxonia; and after the foresail was lowered the course of the schooner was to westward of the steamer. At the time of the blow, however, she had nearly passed the steamer's bows on her east course, and was moving at about right angles with the course of the steamer. These various manœuvres of the schooner are shown to be the ordinary and proper manœuvres preparatory to reaching a pier in such a state of wind and tide, and they were adopted without regard to the presence of the steamer, as no person on board the schooner saw the steamer until after the mainsail was lowered and the schooner headed to the east. Under such circumstances the rights and duties of the steamer are not doubtful. She was bound to see the schooner and her various movements. So long as the schooner was heading to the northward and to west of her, she was entitled to hold a course sufficiently to the east to pass her in safety. When the schooner changed her course to the east, it became the duty of the steamer to avoid her, if possible to do so, by sheering either to the west or east, or by stopping. The latter was the course adopted. The manifest weight of the evidence is, that when the schooner stood to the northward under mainsail and jib, she was nearly ahead of the steamer and bearing somewhat to westward; that then the wheel of the steamer was starboarded a little, but that after the schooner wore, as the witnesses say, and as the blow shows, no material change was made in the direction of the steamer. But whether the failure to attempt to sheer the steamer at this time was a fault, depends entirely upon the distance from her to the schooner at the time when the schooner wore, for the steamer was a propeller, and as is proved this class of vessels cannot be sheered with any certainty by the action of the rudder, when the screw is working backwards. She could, it appears, stop her headway in about 200 yards, and in view of the suddenness of the schooner's change of course, if the schooner was then within a short distance, I consider it obligatory upon the steamer to endeavour to stop, instead of, by keeping up her speed as would have been necessary, endeavouring to sheer sufficiently to avoid the schooner at the risk of loss of life in case of failure. If, on the contrary, the schooner did not wear within this short distance from the steamer, then the steamer could have stopped, or by keeping on have sheered enough to avoid her. The question decisive of the case then is, "What distance did the steamer pass over after the schooner wore?" The libellants say she went half a mile; the claimants say not exceeding 200 yards. Now, upon this question, the testimony of the pilot, master, mate, and others on board the steamer is very positive and clear, to the effect that the schooner wore but a short distance ahead of them, say, two ships' lengths, and so near, that although the engine of the steamer was at once stopped and reversed, there was not room to stop her headway before she reached the schooner: and this testimony I find confirmed by evidence given by witnesses produced by the libellants. Thus the master of the schooner testifies that when he first saw the steamer she was about abeam or half a point forward of his beam. McCarthy also, the hand from the schooner, says, that when the mainsail was lowered, he lowered the peak halliards, and then started forward to overhaul the chain; that when he reached midships he first saw the steamer, and she was then about abreast of him; Baker, the mate of the schooner, is positive in stating that when he saw the steamer her stem was pointing at the schooner. He also gives her bearing from him by compass as N.N.W. These statements of seamen as to the bearing of an approaching vessel are much more reliable than any estimates of time and distance; and they are inconsistent with the theory that the Saxonia was then any considerable distance from them. She must have been very close when abeam of them, otherwise they would have passed her bows in safety. Furthermore, the short distance which the testimony of the libellants shows the schooner to have passed after she wore, when taken in connection with her speed, shows clearly that when she wore she was close to the steamer. This distance is shown by many of the libellants' witnesses to have been not exceeding 100 yards. McCarthy who had only time to walk to midships before he saw the steamer abreast of him, says that after that the schooner ran but twenty-five to thirty yards before she was struck. Rufan, a witness who was on the deck, says the schooner went but sixty or seventy yards upon her east course. Decker says the same. Post says but twenty-five yards. In addition to these the testimony of the master and mate of the

THE OCEAN QUEEN.

[ADM.]

schooner, when examined, is found to sustain the position that the schooner did not run a distance of 100 yards before she was struck. This makes the change of course less than a minute and a half from the blow, and places the steamer at a distance of not exceeding 200 yards, for the speed of the schooner upon her east course was two and a half miles per hour, while the speed of the Saxonia before she slowed was five knots—the mate of the schooner says four knots—an hour. This speed of the schooner, as stated in both the libels, must be deemed conceded, notwithstanding many witnesses declared upon the trial that it was no more than one mile an hour. For the speed of their vessel was a material fact, which the libellants were bound to know and aver. It was averred at two and a half miles per hour, and the averment cannot now be disputed. While considering this point I deem it worthy of remark, as indicating an undue desire on the part of the libellants to strengthen their case, that both the libellants, who in their libels stated upon oath that their speed was two and a half miles per hour, when asked upon the stand, reduce the rate one-half, and one of them, Miller, declares, when asked, that he would not believe any man who swore the speed to be two and a half knots, although he had himself so sworn in his libel. The schooner was a good sailer. She was under a full jib in a strong and fair breeze, and there is every probability that the averment of the libels, made soon after the accident, is very nearly accurate. For the purposes of this hearing it must be taken as true. This corroborating proof of the nearness of the steamer, derived from the testimony produced by the libellants, has led me to the conclusion that upon this, the decisive point of the case, the weight of evidence is with the resps. There is indeed a numerous array of witnesses produced by the libellants, and some nineteen of them, I think, were located upon the pier or vessels near by. Most of these witnesses express the positive opinion that the steamer could have avoided the schooner with ease. None of them, however, have any practical acquaintance with the capacities of a propeller like the Saxonia. Most of them think she could have avoided the schooner by sheering, and their evidence amounts to little more than estimates of time and distance. Besides, the greater portion of these witnesses were oystermen waiting on the dock for the arrival of this schooner, and their estimates are quite likely to be affected somewhat by a clannish sympathy with the libellants. I have endeavoured to give to their testimony all the weight to which it is entitled, but I find it overborne by other evidence in the case. There remains but to notice two features of the case strongly commented on by the libellants. It is strenuously insisted in their behalf that the steamer should be held responsible for this loss because she was being navigated without a look-out, stationed forward, and charged with this especial duty. The neglect of the steamer in this respect is clearly proved, and it is a neglect which is inexcusable. She was moving in a great thoroughfare, and was bound to have had the look-out which the law requires. Absence of the proper look-out has endangered her defence in these actions and calls upon the court to scrutinise with care her movements, and the account she gives of them: but no rule of law requires that the absence of a look-out shall entail responsibility for a collision, where it is made clearly to appear that it did not conduce to the accident. In the present case, the steamer was moving in clear weather and broad daylight, a licensed pilot and her master were both upon her bridge in a position where they could see every approaching object. Both these persons testify in the most positive manner that they saw the schooner from the time she came in sight until the blow, and gave orders in reference to her movements which were a subject of conversation between them at the time. If these two persons did not see this schooner from the first, they have both been guilty of perjury, which I am unwilling to believe. Their statement is moreover greatly confirmed by the fact that both of them detail with accuracy all the various manœuvres of the schooner as they are proved by the crew of the schooner to have been performed. The omission to have a stationed look-out, grave and dangerous as it is, cannot then, in this case, be held to subject the steamer to the payment of the loss in question, for the reason that it satisfactorily appears that the schooner was seen at the earliest possible moment by competent persons in charge of the steamer. One other feature in the case, viz., that as the two vessels approached each other, the persons in charge of the steamer waved their hands to the schooner to starboard, is relied on by the libellants as showing that the steamer did not port, but was attempting to pass the schooner's bows. The circumstance certainly deserves attention, and if the Saxonia had been a side wheel steamer, might warrant the inference which the libellants seek to draw from it. But the Saxonia being a propeller, this action on the part of her master and pilot is entirely consistent with the theory that the schooner was waved to starboard her helm, because the propeller would not sheer while her screw was reversing, and the only way by which the collision could be avoided, in the close proximity of the two vessels, was for the schooner to sheer if she could. My conclusion therefore is, that this collision was not caused by an attempt on the part of the Saxonia to cross the schooner's bows when she might have passed under her stern, nor by a failure on the part of those in charge of her to see the schooner, at the earliest moment, but that it was occasioned by a sudden change of the schooner's course, which threw her across the course of the steamer, at a distance not sufficient to enable the steamer to avoid her by sheering or by stopping; and that this change in the schooner's course was made when it was, because the persons in charge of her were paying no attention to approaching vessels. Their right to cross the river to come in to their pier is unquestioned, but there was nothing to compel them to change when they did. If their mainsail had been lowered a very little sooner, or a very little later, they would have crossed to their pier without danger; and I cannot doubt but that the possibility of a collision would have been avoided, if any person on board the schooner had considered it necessary to notice what vessels were approaching, before they broke their northern tack and wore to east. The decrees must therefore be in favour of the resps., and the libels must be dismissed, with costs to be taxed.

SHIPMAN, J.—I think the exception is well taken. It is open to the objections stated by Story, J., in the case of the schooner Lively, 1 Gall. 314. Though that was not a case of damage by collision, it was a case of damage by another kind of tort. His remarks are therefore apt and to the point. To estimate the damages by what the cargo would have sold for if it had reached the port of destination, partakes in some measure of conjecture, and assumes that for certain which is after all contingent. The schooner in this case might never have reached her port of destination, even if she had not collided with the Ocean Queen. She was exposed to all the ordinary perils of navigation, collision, fire, and the numberless dangers which attend vessels on the sea. I understand the correct rule to be laid down by the Supreme Court of the United States in Smith v. Condry, 1 How. 35, which is the value of the goods at the place of shipment. To this should be added the expense of navigating the vessel to the place where the collision occurred, including also the lading of the cargo on board. On this amount the libellant is entitled to interest from the time of the collision.

MEYERSTEIN v. BARBER.

Bill of lading—Effect of delivery of after goods landed on sufferance wharf—Pledge of goods—Constructive possession—25 & 26 Vict. c. 63, s. 67.

A bill of lading remains in force and continues to represent the symbol of the goods, so that delivery of the bill of lading is equivalent to actual delivery of the goods, at least until there has been complete delivery of the goods to a person who claims under the bill of lading.

Goods were shipped in India under a bill of lading made out in three parts, and the consignor drew against the goods on the consignee in England, and discounted the drafts with the C. Bank in India, with whom he deposited the bill of lading as security. The bank in India transmitted the drafts and the bill of lading in the ordinary course, to their agents in London. The ship arrived in London on the 31st Jan., and on the 7th Feb. the goods were landed and deposited on a sufferance wharf, and a stop was put upon them by the master to secure his freight. On the 4th March the consignee gave the bank in London a cheque for the amount due to them, and obtained from them the bill of lading, and on the same day the plt., who was not aware that the ship had arrived, advanced 2500l. to the consignee, and received from him two parts of the bill of lading and the invoice. On the 6th March the defts., who were not aware of the advance by the plt., advanced 1500l. to the consignee, and received from him the third part of the bill of lading, and on the following day the consignee paid the freight and got the stop removed, upon which the defts. advanced 500l.

more. On the 11th March the defts. lodged their part of the bill of lading at the wharf, and on the 13th received warrants for the goods which they subsequently sold.

In an action by the plt. against the defts. in trover for the goods and for money had and received to recover the proceeds of the sale,

Held, that while the goods were deposited on the sufferance wharf with a stop upon them for freight, there had been no complete delivery under the bill of lading; that therefore the delivery of the bill of lading to the plt. was equivalent to an actual delivery of the goods, and that the plt. was entitled to succeed on both counts:

Semble, per Erle, C.J., that the plt. would have been entitled to succeed even if there had been no stop upon the goods for freight, provided they had been held by the wharfinger deliverable to the holder of the bill of lading.

Declaration. Common counts for money had and received, for interest, and on accounts stated. Second count, trover for cotton.

Pleas:—To the first count, never indebted; to the second count, not guilty, and that the goods were not the plt.'s; and issue thereon.

At the trial before Erle, C. J., at the sittings in London, after last Trinity Term, it appeared that the action was brought to recover the value of 277 bales of cotton under the following circumstances:

In Sept. 1864 De Souza, Commiade, and Co., of Madras, consigned to Azemar and Co., of London, for sale, 277 bales of cotton, shipped per Acastus. The bill of lading was drawn in three parts in the ordinary form, the cotton being thereby made deliverable to De Souza and Co., or their assigns. De Souza and Co. drew on Azemar and Co. four bills of exchange, viz., one for 3000l., due 12th Jan. 1865, one for 1000l., due 3rd March 1865, and two for 1000l. each, due the 22nd March 1865, which they sold and delivered, together with the bill of lading indorsed in blank, to the Chartered Mercantile Bank of India, who in due course transmitted them to their branch in London.

At the end of the year 1864 Azemar and Co. retired from business, and Abraham, their managing clerk, succeeded them under the style of Abraham and Co., and took over all their assets and liabilities. On the 11th Jan 1865, there having been a fall in cotton, Abraham through Azemar applied to De Souza, who was then in London, to assist him; and pursuant to arrangement between the parties Azemar and Co. drew on De Souza and Co. four bills for 1500l. each, payable in London on the 24th March 1865, which they indorsed to Abraham and Co., who discounted three of them with Smith, Payne, and Smith. Each of those bills contained in the body of them the words, "value in ourselves which place to account of cotton per Acastus as advised."

On the 31st Jan. 1865 the Acastus arrived in London, and Abraham entered the cotton and directed it to be taken to Cotton's bonded wharf where, on the 7th Feb., it was landed and warehoused in the name of Abraham, and a stop was put on it for freight by the master of the ship. On the 9th Feb. Abraham gave a sampling order to Barber and Co., the defts., who on the following day obtained samples from the wharf and reported on the cotton to Abraham. Abraham then applied to them to advance 4000l. against the cotton, and they offered to advance 2000l., which Abraham declined.

On the same day, the 11th Feb., Abraham indorsed and delivered De Souza's fourth acceptance for 1500l. to the plt., who accepted two bills for 1500l. each on receiving a letter from Abraham giving him a lien on cotton per Acastus and other goods, which it was stated would be handed to him when realized. These bills were paid by the plt. when they came to maturity. On the 4th March Abraham, having paid Asmer's acceptances, received from the Chartered Mercantile Bank the bill of lading, one part of which he indorsed and handed to the plt. with the invoice. The plt. then gave him his cheque for 2500*l.* and requested him to send him the second part of the bill of lading, which was accordingly sent to him on the 6th or 7th March. At that time the plt. was not aware that the Acutus had arrived, he made no inquiries on the subject, and did not ascertain the fact till the 11th March.

On the 6th March Abraham applied to the defts. to advance 2000*l.* on the cotton per Acutus; they advanced 1500*l.*, and received from Abraham the third part of the bill of lading, and on the following day, Abraham having in the mean time paid the freight and got the stop taken off, they advanced 500*l.* more.

On the 11th March the defts. lodged their part of the bill of lading at the wharf, and on the 13th received warrants for the 277 bales of cotton which they had previously sold on the 9th and 10th March.

It appeared that the plt., on the 11th March, ascertained that the cotton was transferred to the defts., but at that time he was under the impression that the defts.' advance was prior to his own, and he therefore applied to Abraham for further security, and it was not till the 25th July that he ascertained that the advances made by the defts. were subsequent to his own, upon which, after some correspondence, he commenced this action.

On these facts a verdict was entered for the plt. by consent for 2019*l.* and interest. If the court should think fit, with leave to the defts. to move.

Brett, Q. C. in this term obtained a rule calling on the plt. to show cause why the verdict should not be set aside and a verdict entered for the defts., or why the verdict should not be reduced by such a sum as the court should direct, on the grounds that, as against the defts., the plt. was not entitled to the goods or their proceeds; that there was no valid prior indorsement of any bill of lading to the plt.; that the bills of lading ceased to have effect as negotiable bills of lading on the landing and warehousing of the goods in Abraham's name; that the property in the goods never was in the plt.; that neither the plt. nor any other person had any right to or lien on the goods as against the defts.; that it never was agreed between Abraham and the plt. that the property in the goods, or any lien on the goods, should pass to the plt.; that the property in the goods passed to the defts. on the transfer of the goods into their name by the wharfinger, the depositary; that the defts. were pledgees, with possession and power of sale; and that the plt.'s rights, if any, were mere equities invalid against the defts., or were for breach of contract by Abraham; that no interest was payable, the court to draw inferences of fact, and counsel to agree to the facts, and the same to be settled in case of difference by the Lord Chief Justice.

Edward James, Q. C. and Sir G. Henynan, Q. C. now showed cause.—The money was advanced on the security of the goods, and the fact of their not being on board the ship cannot make any difference. By sect. 4 of the 11 & 12 Vict. c. xviii., which is an Act for the regulation of suttance wharves in the port of London, it is enacted that all goods landed on a public suttance wharf, and lodged with the wharfinger, shall be subject to the same lien for freight as such goods were subject to whilst on board the ship, and before the landing thereof; and the wharfinger is required to detain the goods till the freight is paid. Therefore it is submitted that when goods are landed on a suttance wharf, and a stop is put on them for freight, they are in the same position as if they were on board the ship. The contract of the carrier is to carry and deliver pursuant to the bill of lading, and the wharfinger who holds the goods would be bound to deliver them to the true owner of the bill of lading on payment of freight. There was as clear a mortgage to the plt. as could be conceived, and the only question is if the defts., who made an advance on a bill of lading, which so far as Abraham was concerned was worthless, as he had parted with his interest in the goods, can claim to hold the goods against a prior mortgage, there being no improper laches on the part of the plt. The plt. was not aware that the goods had arrived, and he gave it as his experience that the captain always retained one part of the bill of lading, so that when he asked for the second part he thought he had obtained all the parts that were in the possession of Abraham. I rest my argument on the broad principle that, Abraham having no right to the property, the plt. in the absence of any fraud was entitled to follow it into any hand into which it might come. The contention on the other side is very much like the argument for the defts. in Short v. Simpson, 13 L. T. Rep. N. B. 674. [WILLIS, J.—Not exactly the same, as there there was a wrong. The real question in this case is, can a man pledge goods lying in a dock without taking out a dock warrant?] The goods being under a stop for freight, it is just the same as if the shipowner had them in his possession, and till he has parted with the possession, the bill of lading continues to be the symbol of the goods, and delivery of the bill of lading passes the property. If that is so, and the property passed to the plt., nothing can divest it afterwards, and it is submitted that all that was necessary was an intention on the part of Abraham to pass the property: (Foley v. Denny, 7 Ex. 581.) They also contended that the plt. was entitled to interest, as interest had been allowed by the parties on former accounts, from which it might be inferred that interest was to be allowed in this transaction.

Brett, Q. C. and J. Brown, Q. C. in support of the rule.—The plt. must, to support the count in trover, make out that the cotton was his property, and that he was entitled to the possession of it, though on the money counts the question of property only would arise. The first question is, was the document made use of on the 4th March made use of as a bill of lading and with the ordinary incidents of a bill of lading? I submit that the contract of the 4th March was not a contract of sale, and the parties did not intend to pass the property in the goods, but they intended to create a complete and valid pledge, which they did not succeed in doing according to law. There can be no valid pledge of chattels unless possession is given, and here there was merely an inchoate pledge which the defts. completed by obtaining possession. While goods are at sea they may be pledged by handing over the bill of lading, but the reason for that is, that that is the only possession that can be given, and when the reason ceases possession cannot be given by the bill of lading any more than by any other ordinary document: (Blackburn on the Contract of Sale, 297.) Here the contract of carriage was at an end, as the master of the ship had given all the delivery he was called upon to give, i.e., to deliver at one of these wharves as permitted by the Act of Parliament. The shipowner retains his lien for freight, but he can never get the goods back from the wharfinger. If the goods were burnt while on the wharf, the shipowner would not be liable on the bill of lading, as the goods would be lost by a peril of the sea. The general Act as to these wharves is the 11 & 12 Vict. c. 63, ss. 67, et seq., and the effect of that

MEYERSTEIN v. BARBER.

[C. P.]

statute is, that the goods do not remain in the possession of the shipowner, but of the wharfinger, who is obliged to hold them till the freight and rent are paid, but the shipowner could not get them back. The bill of lading had ceased to be a negotiable instrument; a bill of exchange paid at maturity is no longer negotiable, and one is a contract to deliver goods, the other to pay money: (Allan v. Gripper, 2 Cr. & J. 218.) Then I submit that these were only inchoate pledges, and that the defts., who completed his, is entitled to hold the goods as against the plt., who did not. It cannot be said that there was a sale to the plt. on the 4th March, as he only advanced 2500*l.* on goods worth 8000*l.* It was the ordinary contract of pledge, and the plt. got a good equitable right as against Abraham, but nothing more. You cannot mortgage chattels unless you give up possession of the goods. [WILLES, J.—You must not take that as settled. I have a strong impression that we held the other way. I do not know if that was so, but it would not be a monstrous decision.] It is submitted that there can be no pledge of goods by the law of England, unless possession is given:

Langton v. Waring, 18 C. B. N. S., 315; and
The Tigress, 32 L. J. 97, Adm.

Nov. 24.—ERLE, C. J.—In this case a rule has been granted to show cause why the verdict for the plt. should not be set aside and the verdict entered for the defts. On the argument of that rule the question appears to me to be resolved into this, whether the pledge of the bill of lading of cotton, pledged to secure the advance made by Mr. Meyerstein on the 4th March, was a valid pledge. There is no doubt that, if the cotton had been afloat, the obtaining an advance upon the deposit of the bill of lading would have been just as valid as if it had been obtained on a deposit of the actual cotton. While the cotton is afloat, it is common knowledge—and I should not think of citing authorities to prove it—that the bill of lading represents the cotton, and the delivery of the bill of lading operates in exactly the same manner as the delivery of the cotton itself would do after the ship has arrived. Then, in this case, the money having been obtained and the bill of lading having been delivered, the contest on the part of the defts., who afterwards obtained possession of this cotton, is that the delivery of the bill of lading did not operate as a delivery of the cotton because the bill of lading was spent, and had ceased to have any operation as a bill of lading. And it is contended that this is so, because the ship had arrived at the port of destination, and had landed the cargo upon a wharf, to which I shall presently allude in describing the history of this cotton. The powerful argument of Mr. Brett, and the learned argument of the other learned counsel for the defts., have been founded on the assumption that, the cargo being landed, the bill of lading was altogether an inoperative instrument, and that the pledge of the chattel without delivery of possession was not a complete pledge. The same chattel was said to have been pledged to the defts., and it was argued that that pledge, though equally inoperative, justified the defts. in taking possession, which defeated the right of the plt. under the pledge of the bill of lading. Now, the history of the cotton disposes of the defts.' argument. The cotton was shipped in India for England. The shipper of the cotton drew against the cotton upon the consignee, and the bills of exchange were discounted by the Chartered Bank of India. The bill of lading was deposited, in the common course of mercantile transactions of that nature, with the bills of exchange, to secure payment of those bills of exchange at maturity. I call it a bill of lading, because I think the three parts constitute one bill, and nothing in my judgment turns on there having been three parts of the bill in India. Now there is no contest at all, for it is one of the most frequent and familiarly recurring transactions that can be, that the deposit of a bill of lading with the bank that discounted the bill of exchange operates as a pledge of the cotton. Nobody contended that it was a sale; it was a pledge. In case the bill of exchange was not paid, the Chartered Bank in India would have the right to indemnify themselves out of the proceeds of that cotton. The property in the cotton, subject to that pledge, was in De Souza, to whom, on the face of the bill of lading, it was to be delivered; and that property, which was in De Souza before the cotton arrived, passed to Abraham. At the time the cotton arrived in England, the state and history of it, as I call it, was that the Chartered Bank in India remitted to the Chartered Bank in London, their agents, the bills of exchange, with the bill of lading, to secure the payment of those bills of exchange, and subject to a pledge of the cotton by the deposit of that bill with the Chartered Bank, the property was in Abraham. The cotton arrived on the 4th Feb. in the following year, and Abraham came forward as owner of it, as he had a right to do, and made the entry at the Custom-house, and accompanied that entry with a note that it was to be taken to Cotton's wharf, a sufferance wharf. The course of business at the Custom-house was, that if the party interested in the cargo gave an intimation at the Custom-house of the sufferance wharf where the goods might be deposited, the Custom-house and the proprietors of that wharf, by intercommunication, passed the cargo from the Custom-house to the sufferance wharf; and the cotton in question did pass accordingly to Cotton's wharf, was put on shore at Cotton's wharf on the 7th Feb., and remained in the hands of the wharfingers at Cotton's wharf with a stop put upon it to secure the freight of the shipowner; and on the 4th March the cotton was at Cotton's wharf, subject to that stop, and subject to all the other rights that I have spoken of, by reason of the pledge of the bill of lading: Mr. Abraham had done what is said to be an act of ownership, and had called at Cotton's wharf and intimated that he had a claim to the cotton. He was permitted by the wharfinger to act in some respects as the owner so far as employing Mr. Barber, the deft. Both the plt. and the defts. were of the highest respectability, and the only question is, who is to lose by the fraud of Abraham? Abraham employed Barber the deft. as his broker to sell the cotton for him. He gave Barber the sampling order, which enabled him as broker to act in the way that was required to ascertain the value of the cotton, and between the 7th Feb., when it was landed, and the 4th March, the cotton had remained as I have described, landed, but not delivered according to the bill of lading. The responsibility of the shipowner as a carrier may have been at an end when he put that cotton on the wharf, and if it had been burned it might have been burned at the loss of the real owner; but it was put on the sufferance wharf, and in respect of that sufferance wharf there is an Act of Parliament which says that the goods at the sufferance wharf, with a stop upon them for freight, shall be in the same circumstances in some respects as to the rights of the parties as if the goods were still afloat. Abraham might do one of the acts of ownership that I have described, but if he attempted to claim the delivery of those goods, giving a delivery order to the wharfinger, without producing the bill of lading, as I read the evidence in this case, the wharfinger would not obey the delivery order, but the goods would be held until the bill of lading was produced. The goods are held at the sufferance wharf as if they were in the ship for the purpose of freeing the ship, but are not delivered according to the bill of lading, and are subject therefore in many respects to rights derived through the bill of lading. So stood the cotton on the 4th March, with the bill of lading pledged to the Chartered Bank of India to secure the payment of the drafts which they had discounted. On the 4th March Abraham went to Meyerstein, and asked for the advance of 2500*l.*, to enable him to take the bill of lading from the Chartered Bank. He got the bill of lading by a colourable cheque, and then obtained the money from Meyerstein to enable him to pay the cheque that he had advanced for that amount. The substance of the transaction, to my mind, is exactly the same as it would have been if the Chartered Bank had trusted Abraham with the bills pledged to them, and said to Abraham, "If you will get 2500*l.* on this bill and pay off our claim upon it, we authorise you to hand that bill over to the party who shall advance that money." Was the bill of lading spent (or whatever is the word the learned counsel may rely upon; defunct is the right one) at that time? It had been deposited in the hands of the Chartered Bank as a pledge when the cargo was afloat. In their hands it had never become in the least degree extinct. The treaty between Meyerstein and Abraham and the Chartered Bank was to get the living bill of lading, paying the sum that was upon it. The bill of lading was deposited with Meyerstein; Meyerstein advanced 2500*l.* upon it, and at the time when it passed from the hands of Abraham to the hands of Meyerstein, it was a living bill of lading. On what principle can it be said that it became an extinct bill of lading the moment it came into Meyerstein's hands? Meyerstein did not know whether the cotton was afloat or had arrived. But I do not found my judgment in the least on that. To my mind that bill of lading was the symbol of the cotton operating to govern the possession of that cotton at the time when Meyerstein received it from the hands of Abraham. That being so, the advance was made, and one contention is, that the pledge of the cotton to secure that 2500*l.* was a valid pledge, and that the possession of the chattel went to the pledgee. In my opinion, from the description I have given, the bill of lading did represent the symbol of the cotton, and the passing of the bill under these circumstances operated just as much as if the cotton had been taken bodily and handed over to the pledgee. The contention on the other side is, that the bill of lading being in three parts, and Abraham passing two of them to Meyerstein by fraud, and passing the third to Barber, it was merely an agreement to pledge cotton of which the actual possession was not given, and therefore it operated nothing; that Barber having come down to the wharf, and having got the goods transferred into his name, and made deliverable to his order on the 11th March, and under that process having obtained possession of the goods, of the two pledgees with an imperfect pledge, he became the one who had perfected his security. I think there is not the least foundation for that argument. The notion that the second mortgagee, by getting the legal estate, can get rid of the first mortgage appears to me to have no analogy and no bearing. I think the pledge to the plt. was valid, and if it was, the plt.'s rights have been violated by the debt, and he is answerable in trover, and upon the count for money had and received, for the proceeds of the goods that were sold. The powerful and lucid argument on the part of the defts. was ineffectual to my mind, because, as I say, the whole foundation lies in the fact that this bill of lading on the 4th March was an extinct thing, and would not enable the holder to get possession of the goods; and if the notion be established that a bill of lading (one of the most frequent securities to secure advances) could be extinguished as a security, because the ship had touched land, and put the cargo represented by that bill of lading ashore, and then that the holder of that bill of lading might pass it among the moneyed men of the port, and obtain large advances upon it, and then surprise the party who had made the advance by saying, "that bill of lading is an extinct piece of waste paper, because the cargo has been put on shore before the time I passed it to you," it is impossible to say to what extent such reasoning might not be pushed. But it is obvious that a wider door to enable parties to defraud by the semblance of security was never attempted to be opened. There is no authority for that. There is the most intense ill likely to result if such a claim is established. I have narrowed it to the particular circumstances of this case, because it is sufficient to authorise the plt. to have the judgment. I believe that the same law would apply if there had been no stop put on the goods for freight, if they had been held by the wharfinger deliverable to the holder of that bill of lading according to the custom of trade at the port where the goods were—I believe that would be the law; but, as I said before, I have not the least doubt under the circumstances of this case that the bill of lading was the symbol of the cargo, and, being delivered, operated as a delivery of the cargo would have done, and therefore that the plt. is entitled to keep his verdict.

WILLES, J.—I am of the same opinion, and I should have contented myself with saying that I concur in everything that the Lord Chief Justice has said; but I believe it is his wish that the court should deliver their opinions seriatim, as if we had given judgment yesterday upon the conclusion of the argument. Accordingly I will add my reasons to my Lord's, at the expense of rather detracting from the judgment instead of adding to it. The facts of the case have been already stated, and they may for the purposes of the judgment be shortly put thus:—that goods that had been effectually shipped under a bill of lading abroad had arrived at their port of destination, and had been landed and deposited at a warehouse where the master had put on a stop for freight; so that in fact the goods, although delivered under circumstances in which the master would not have been answerable for an accident happening to them, were not capable of being received and taken possession of by the consignee or holder of the bill of lading, without discharging the lien for freight. Therefore by that statement the warehouseman was at the lowest the common agent of the master of the vessel, and of the consignee; the agent for the consignee, on his producing the bill of lading, showing that he was entitled to the goods, and upon his paying the freight, to transfer the goods completely into his name; agent for the master not to transfer the goods into the name of the consignee, so that he should have control over them, and not, except at his peril, to give a warrant for them until the freight had been discharged. At this period, therefore, the bill of lading would not only, according to usage and for the satisfaction of the warehouse-keeper that he was delivering to the right party, be a symbol of possession, and therefore practically the key of the goods, but during that time it retained, so far as

MEYERSTEIN v. BARBER.

[C. P.]

the master was concerned, its complete operation as a bill of lading, because the delivery of the goods was not complete. To say that the delivery of the goods was complete would be perfectly contradictory, because to say the delivery is complete is to say that the person to whom the delivery was made has the goods; whereas the consignee in a case of this kind has not the goods until he does a new act to discharge the liability that has been incurred for him by the shipper of the goods in respect of payment of freight, which payment, and the liability thereto, as well as the right to the goods, is proved by the bill of lading. That being the state of things, if the consignee, before the delivery, or before any right to delivery, wants to deal with those goods, how is he to deal with them? In what manner is he to obtain money for those goods? With respect to a sale, of course he can very easily do so, because ever since the judgment of my Lord Wensleydale, when Parke, J., in Dixon v. Yates, 5 B. & Ad. 313, it has never been doubted that by the law of the land the sale of specific goods does pass the property in those goods, and that notwithstanding the cavil of the late very learned Serjt. Manning in the well-known note in 2 M. & R. p. 566. And with respect to a sale there can be no doubt, if these goods had been sold out and out to Mr. Meyerstein or anybody else on the 4th March, that the fraud Abraham committed as against Mr. Barber would have had the effect of taking in Mr. Barber, and of making him stand to the loss of his advances. I do not say that I am quite satisfied; it would be wrong to say that a pledge stands on the same footing, but I take notice of that in passing for the purpose of showing that all arguments founded upon the notion that this court is to take care and give a judgment which shall protect those who deal with fraudulent people are entirely out of the facts of the present case, and entirely out of the character of transactions of this description. I had better apply my mind to the facts of the case, and see what is their true bearing, and what conclusion I ought to arrive at in respect to the rights of the parties without considering what future cases may arise of persons who, so to speak, do not choose to use due vigilance, or who have the misfortune to be over-reached. This was not a sale; this was a mere pledge to Meyerstein; but one may observe again that if by the alteration of a word or two in the conversation this had been converted into a mortgage whereby the entire property in the goods had been conveyed to Meyerstein, with only an equity of redemption instead of a convertible interest, a subsequent fraud might have been committed. Now, in respect to a pledge, according to the law of this country, a mere contract to pledge even specific goods, and even although the money be advanced upon the faith of the contract, is not sufficient to carry the legal property in the goods; and I am quite satisfied by the argument, if my own opinion had not been so before, that such a transaction amounts to an authority only to take possession of the goods, and the other consequences so ably pointed out by the counsel for the defts. would follow. But in order to complete the pledge it is not necessary that there should be an absolute delivery of the goods pledged. It is decided in the case of Reeves v. Capper, 5 Bing. N. C. 136, and the other cases to which reference was made in the course of the argument, that it is sufficient by the law of this country that there should be a constructive delivery. It is not necessary that the goods should have passed actually from the hands of the pledgor to the hands of the pledgee. It is sufficient to pass the property in the goods, even though the goods remain in the hands of the pledgor, provided they do so by a contract between the pledgor and the pledgee, which makes the custody of the pledgor the custody of the pledgee as between the parties. That was the decision of this court in the case of Reeves v. Capper, where the master of a vessel pledged his chronometer, but continued, by an agreement with the person to whom the pledge was made, to have possession of it for the purposes of the voyage he was about to undertake, and having disposed of the chronometer to another person, the person who had advanced money upon it with the agreement that it should remain in the hands of the pledgor as agent for the pledgee was held entitled to recover it. In many cases symbolical delivery is sufficient; a symbolical delivery is equivalent to such a constructive delivery by contract as is sufficient to complete a pledge. If it were necessary that I should lay down as in a code all the series of circumstances in which it might be held that there was a symbolical delivery, I should have desired more time to consider it, and I should have liked to have considered the case of handing over the key of a warehouse, as to whether that was or was not a sufficient symbolical delivery, and whether that could be defeated by subsequently forging or abusing another key that would open the warehouse for the purpose of deceiving a second lender of money into advancing upon the supposed security. If that case were considered, it would be a case apart from the peculiar property that the law imparts for mercantile convenience to a bill of lading, which case stands to my mind on the footing of the present, because the lowest at which the plt.'s case can be stated here is, that he got that which, if he had produced it at the wharf, would have procured for him the goods which were mentioned therein. He had the bill of lading which, according to the evidence, including that of the defts, would, upon being produced at the docks, have induced the warehouse keeper to hold the goods for the behoof of the person who held that bill of lading. But I do not desire to consider that question at present; it may be worth considering when the facts raise it. There was another sort of delivery, to which the law has from very early times imparted a peculiar effect. There was a delivery by handing to Mr. Meyerstein the bill of lading representing the goods. Now, as my Lord did, I pass over the proposition, which is obvious, that the pledge of a bill of lading under ordinary circumstances does as completely vest the property of the pledgor in the depositary of the bill of lading as if the goods had been put in his warehouse under his control. I refer in passing to the case in 5 B. & A. as being the very case in which the question was considered and discussed, where it was held that a stoppage in transitu was defeated by such a transaction, subject to the pledgee of the bill of lading being bound to render an account to the vendor: (see Re Westzinthus and others, 5 B. & A. 817.) The question, therefore, is whether at the time the advance was made by Meyerstein on the 4th March, he did make an advance on a bill of lading? On the part of the debt., it is said that the paper on which he made the advance, although appearing to be a bill of lading, was in reality only a piece of waste-paper, which had been a bill of lading, and which, though extinct, bore still the semblance of what it was in its lifetime; and the question is whether that can be maintained. Putting it in plain English, it is whether the bill of lading ceases to have any operation after the goods are landed, even although they remain on the wharf on which they have been placed by the master as a security for the freight? Now I am of opinion that that is not the effect of such a transaction. On the contrary, I think that the bill of lading is in force, at least, so long as complete delivery has not taken place to any person claiming thereunder. I believe that that will be found to be

MEYERSTEIN v. BARBER.

[C. P.]

not only law, but also in accordance with the practice and the convenience of merchants. Now I will consider it as it was before the Act of 1862, or the Acts of which that is the modern representative, and at a period at which there was no Act allowing the master to warehouse at the risk of the consignee of the goods, or the holder of the bills of lading. What would have been the state of things if the master of the Acastus had arrived in the river, and had found nobody prepared to tender the freight for the goods? The condition of the master would have been, according to the law of this country, the same as that of any other carrier who arrives and finds there is no person to take delivery of the goods, which of course means to take delivery, paying freight against such delivery. What is his duty? His duty is to deal with the goods in a reasonable manner, and to deal with them in a reasonable manner involves the consideration of his own lien, which he may not be willing to give up, and according to our law he may keep the goods in the vessel, and upon demurrage, so long as he does not exceed a reasonable time. By the common law he might keep the goods in his vessel waiting for somebody to produce the bill of lading, and to tender him the freight for those goods. He might use his ship as a warehouse until he was applied to by the proper person to receive, and was asked to give them in a proper manner, namely, with a tender of the freight. Of course that was exceedingly inconvenient, and led often to disputes between shipowners and consignees. But the master had another course to pursue. Having obtained a new employment for his vessel, he would be unwilling that she should be used as a mere warehouse, and especially as the damages recovered for delay might be no sufficient compensation for the loss of the use of the vessel, which might be in an expensive port. The law gave him the alternative, if he thought fit, to land the goods and put them in a warehouse, giving notice to the consignee that he might take them if he thought proper upon paying the freight. That was a great inconvenience; as, although the liability of carriers would be got rid of, still the liability of warehousemen would remain; and it was inconvenient and unjust that the master should be obliged to abandon his lien upon the goods or to retain it with the chance of litigation belonging to his new capacity of warehouse-keeper by himself or his agent. Then we find that a series of Acts of Parliament have been passed for relieving the master from that difficulty; and the local Act that was referred to no doubt was handed up for the purpose of showing the progressive steps by which the Legislature arrived at the conclusion which is set forth in the section of the Act of the 25 & 26 Vict. In the first place, if an owner chooses to enter the goods at the Customhouse, and selects the wharf, the master puts them on that wharf, retaining only his lien for the freight, having his hands upon the goods through the agency of the law, and of the right which he would have against the wharfinger if he parted with them without getting the freight. In the event of no person entering the goods, what was to be done? The master was then allowed to enter the goods himself, and to land them, but in that case, by the section of the local Act, the goods were to be considered as in all respects in the same custody as if they remained on board the ship, for the master got rid of the cumber on board his ship, but he still might be exposed to the litigation that might follow him in his character of warehouseman. Lastly came the Act of 1862, the Act of the 25 & 26 Vict., which Act it is necessary to recite. It gives very large powers, and there are the same powers—powers similar, though not precisely in the same terms as those that are given to the master by a variety of foreign codes. The master then shall deliver the goods to the holder of the bill of lading. If there are a number of bills of lading the master must protect himself by interpleader, and the person who holds the first bill of lading for value is entitled to have the goods eventually, and in that case, as here, on the single holder of a bill of lading presenting himself, and not paying the freight, the master is entitled to secure himself by putting the goods into a warehouse, and then, if there is any dispute as to the freight, it is to be settled in the manner pointed out by the Act. If there is any delay in paying the freight, after a certain time, it is also to be settled in the manner pointed out by the Act, but so long as the freight is not paid, the master distinctly holds the goods for all purposes contemplated by the bill of lading. Now, to consider this question properly, you must first take the case of the master landing goods without the assistance of any Act of Parliament; landing the goods as at common law in the hands of the warehouseman, who is his warehouseman as in the case pointed out in the first section of the local Act, and who retains the goods for him as his agent until the freight is paid, and then delivers on production of the bill of lading. As to that case no question could arise. The bill of lading is in full life for all its purposes until it is produced and delivery made by the person who so is agent for the master. That person, for any benefit the master had, was not agent except for the mere purpose of securing him his freight. If that is so, let us come to the Act of Parliament. What was the object of the Act of Parliament? The Act of Parliament was dealing with the case of the shipowners and shippers and receivers of goods. It was not dealing with the effect of mercantile instruments. That subject had been under the consideration of the Legislature very recently in a former Act (18 & 19 Vict. c. 111), by which rights of action as well as property may be transferred in bills of lading. The Legislature seem to desire rather to extend the effect of a bill of lading than to cut it down. Are we to suppose that by this Act of Parliament, without any express provision for the case, or any necessary indication that it was the intent of the Act, the Legislature meant to destroy the operation of the rights of the holders of bills of lading, or to make bills of lading not capable of being dealt with or not operative at a period when they would have been before? That would be to read the Act of Parliament backwards. I entertain no doubt that the Act does not make any alteration in the rights of the parties, and I say it appears to me to be clear that the bill of lading is an operative instrument with the specific qualities of a bill of lading until there is a complete delivery thereunder, and there had not been a complete delivery thereunder in the present case. So far with respect to the law of this country. I feel almost ashamed of travelling out of the road, but Mr. Brown having mentioned yesterday on the authority of a very learned writer, Story, J., that the foreign law had been careful to guard against cases of this description, against cases of supposed danger which would follow from allowing persons to make pledges without an actual delivery of the goods, I thought it right to search a little in the direction which his argument indicated. If you turn to the passage in Story on Bailments (section 299), you will find he was not dealing with the present case, or anything like it, but after giving the text from one of the writers, he states to this effect, that where a person pledges goods by the Roman law the pledgee may thereupon deliver back the goods to the pledgor to be held as his servant as it were, because a man may be tenant of goods, and that does not destroy the right of the pledgee, but he says, in continental countries, provisions have been made to avoid the danger that might follow from this. I need hardly say the text by which those provisions have been made is, according to Reeres v. Copper, the text of our own law, and I need hardly say the observations of Story, J., taken with the text to which he refers, are not at all applicable to the present case. I have looked also to the French code. It appears to me to be very meagre on this subject. It says simply a bill of lading may make the goods deliverable to a third person, or to order, recognising the validity of a bill of lading, but containing no absolute provision on the subject: (Code de Commerce, liv. 2, tit. 7, s. 281.) The Spanish code, in section 802, contains an express provision besides the statement of what the bill of lading is to contain, that a bill of lading may be indorsed, and the indorsement may carry all rights with it. It seems to allow an indorsement of rights of action, as since the Act of the Queen, and I observe the great Spanish commercial lawyer, Don Gomez de la Serna, whose edition of the code I referred to, says that in this respect bills of lading are very much upon the same footing as bills of exchange. There is no provision there that a bill of lading shall cease to be operative at a given time, and there is a provision in both those codes for the master putting goods, as the French code calls it, en mains tierces, when the freight is not paid, to be kept for the security of the master. In the codes adopted by Prussia and other German States of the Zollverein, there are similar provisions, which code, as is well known, is very much more elaborate than the previous code, and exceeding care is taken there for the purpose of protecting both the master and the person who receives the goods, and I observe the right of the master is considered to stand on the same footing, whether the goods are kept back by the master for the freight, or deposited in other hands for the purpose of being kept, and I think, in article 651, there is an express provision for the case that has occurred here, for several persons getting several parts of a bill of lading, and the person who is first in time in getting the part of the bill of lading being also first in law; I observe that article 649 puts the case of the delivery of a bill of lading on the same footing precisely as the delivery of goods stated by my Lord. In every one of these codes, there is a provision for several, in the German for four, parts of a bill of lading being given to the master. In the absence of any fraud, it being admitted that Meyerstein advanced his money upon the security of a bill of lading, and that he was induced to take a bill of lading as being a valid and operative bill of lading at the time; that he had no notice of any circumstances to invalidate that bill of lading, and that its force was not spent, but it still retained its specific properties, which are imparted to a bill of lading by the law, I have no doubt he is entitled to succeed. I will add but one sentence to this judgment, because it contains that which is the motive in my mind for arriving at it. The bill of lading was allowed this peculiar effect in consequence of the difficulty of an actual delivery of goods which were the subject of a maritime adventure. By usage and by law, the delivery of a bill of lading came to be taken for the delivery of the goods, because of the difficulty of the delivery of the goods themselves. So long as that difficulty exists by reason of the incidents of the adventure, so long does the reason apply. In this case the goods could not have been transferred by actual transfer during the voyage, and the freight not having been paid, there could have been no actual transfer of them by Abraham. The goods were in precisely the same state, so far as the reason for holding the bill of lading for the goods is concerned, while they were under the stop for freight as while they were on the vessel and during the voyage. I think, therefore, certainly, having thought over this case with the interest and anxiety that one ought to apply to a transaction affecting so many others of a similar kind, I cannot accede to such a doctrine, which to me I own is novel, as the doctrine advanced for the defendants. Therefore, I concur that the judgment should be for the plaintiffs.

KEATING, J.—I am entirely of the same opinion; and after the judgment pronounced by my Lord and my brother Willes, it is unnecessary that I should do more than state in a very few words the way in which the case strikes my mind. Mr. Brett, in his very able argument, made the foundation of his proposition that the object of the bill of lading being to accomplish the delivery of the goods, when the object had been accomplished, the bill of lading ceased to exist as a bill of lading; and then he contended that in the present case, the goods having been removed from the ship to the sufferance wharf, and their being held by the wharfinger as deliverable on payment of freight, that was the accomplishment of the bill of lading, and the bill of lading then ceased to be a bill of lading. I did not understand him to deny all the operations of the bill of lading, but he contended that it ceased to be a bill of lading, and in truth became nothing more than a mere delivery order, and, being such a delivery order, it was transferred to the plaintiffs. Meyerstein as a deposit for the advance made by him to Abraham, and that it could have no effect whatever as a transfer of the property, but at the most could only place in his hands a document which if used might obtain for him the delivery of the goods. Now, it is obvious that the whole force of that argument rests on the supposition that upon the 4th March, when Meyerstein advanced his money, the bill of lading which was deposited in his hands had ceased to operate as a bill of lading, and that because the goods had been completely delivered. Now I entirely agree with my Lord and my brother Willes, and for the reasons which they have stated, and I do not intend to repeat their reasons for the opinion that on the 4th March there had been no complete delivery of these goods, and I adopt the way in which my brother Willes has put it, as a safe guide to what may be considered a complete delivery, such as was insisted on by Mr. Brett. There can be no complete delivery of the goods until they have been delivered to a person having a right under the bill of lading to obtain those goods. Now here it is admitted, and it is clear, that on the 4th March those goods were held by the wharfinger subject to the stop for freight. They never had been delivered under that bill of lading to any person whatever, consequently there never had been any complete delivery. That being so, the foundation of the argument, and the very able argument, used on the part of the defendants, fails, and the plaintiffs are entitled to retain his verdict.

WILLES, J. stated that interest would be allowed from the time the money was received to the present time.

LEWIS AND OTHERS v. MCKEE.

Bill of lading—Indorsement of to third party by original consignee while goods are in transitu—Indorsement accepted and acted upon by shipowner—Transfer of liability for freight thereby—18 & 19 Vict. c. 111—Action for freight—Pleading—Demurrer.

In an action for freight by the shipowners against deft., the original consignee of goods under a bill of lading, a plea, which stated that before the ship arrived at the port of call, the deft. indorsed the said bill of lading to W. and K. in the following terms: "Deliver to W. and K., or order, looking to them for all freight, dead freight, and demurrage without recourse to us," and that plts. accepted the said indorsement and delivered the goods in pursuance thereof to W. and K. as the persons entitled to the said goods, and not to the deft., was Held, on demurrer, to be a good plea and to constitute a defence to the action.

If the consignee under a bill of lading, while the goods are yet in transitu, indorses the bill and gives notice thereof to the party entitled to the freight, and upon the indorsement he states in express terms that the owner of the freight, the party who may be ultimately entitled thereto, is to look to other persons for payment of it, and that indorsement is accepted and acted upon without objection or qualification on the part of the owner of the freight, that of itself, in point of law, constitutes a transfer of the liability, and a defence to any subsequent action.

Declaration.—First count:

That after 14th Aug. 1865, one Jas. Brown delivered to plts. certain goods, to wit, &c., to be by plts. carried and conveyed in a certain ship of plts., then in the port of L., from L. to O. or F., in the United Kingdom, for orders under a certain bill of lading, signed for the same by the master of the said ship, as agent for plts., and to be delivered as ordered (the act of God, &c., excepted) unto deft., or to his assigns, on his or their paying freight for the said goods as per charter-party, with primage and average accustomed; and that thereupon and by reason thereof, the property in the said goods passed to deft.; and that by the charter-party referred to in the first bill of lading, freight is made payable in cash at certain rates therein specified, and that all conditions, &c., necessary to entitle plts. to have the freight, primage, and average paid by deft. according to the terms of the said bill of lading and charter-party, and to sue deft. for nonpayment thereof, yet deft. made default in payment; and although he paid plts. a portion of the said freight, primage, and average, yet he made default in paying plts. the residue of the said freight, &c., amounting to 67*l.* 13*s.* 6*d.*, whereby (allegation of loss to plts.)

Second count:

That on 24th Nov. 1865, plts. being owners of a certain ship, &c., then at L. and bound for C. or F., in the United Kingdom, certain goods, to wit, &c., were shipped in good order, &c., by one J. B., as agent for S. and Co., in and upon the said ship, whereof J. E. was master, to be delivered in like good order, &c., at the aforesaid port as ordered (the act of God, &c., excepted), unto deft. or to his assigns, on his or their paying freight for the said goods in cash at the rate, &c., with primage and average accustomed. And that, in consideration that plts., at request of deft., would deliver to deft. as such assignee, and would suffer him to take the said goods without the said plts. being first paid the said freight, primage, and average, deft. promised plts. that he would, within a reasonable time after delivery to him of the said goods, pay to plts. freight for the carriage of the said goods after the rate aforesaid, with primage and average accustomed, less a certain sum, to wit, 26*l.* 10*s.* 3*d.*, to be deducted therefrom on account of advances, assurances, and stamps. And plts. did deliver to deft. as such consignee, and did suffer him to take the said goods without the said plts. being first paid the said freight, &c.

Averment of performance of all conditions, &c., necessary to entitle plts. to a performance of deft.'s promise, and to maintain this action for breach thereof; yet deft. made default in payment of the said freight, primage, and average, and although he *paid plts. a portion thereof, yet he made default in paying plts. the residue of the said freight, &c., amounting to (to wit) 67*l.* 10*s.* 3*d.

Third count: for money payable for freight, &c., for conveyance by plts., at deft.'s request, of goods in ships, and for care and attendance of plts. and their servants in and about the loading and unloading and delivery of the said goods, and on accounts stated.

Plea 3, to the first count:

That by the said charter-party it was provided that plts. should deliver the goods on being paid freight by the receivers of the cargo, and that before the said ship arrived at the port of call the deft. indorsed the said bill of lading to certain persons carrying on their business under the firm and style of "Messrs. Watney and Keane," and the said indorsement was in the words following, that is to say, "Deliver to Messrs. Watney and Keane, or order, looking to them for all freight, dead freight, and demurrage, without recourse to us." (Signed) "George B. McKee and Co.;" and plts. accepted the said indorsement, and delivered the goods in pursuance thereof to the said Messrs. W. and K., as the persons entitled to the said goods, and not to deft.

Demurrer and joinder in demurrer to the said plea.

There were other pleas, and issue was taken and joined on all of them.

Plts.' points:—1. That plea 3 does not expressly aver that the plts. exonerated deft. from his liability, or that there was a substituted liability of Messrs. Watney and Keane, and does not set forth facts operating as such exoneration or substitution of liability. 2. That the plea only answers part of the claim in the first count and contains no defence to that part of the claim which is for primage and average.

Deft.'s points:—1. That the plea sets forth facts operating as an exoneration or substitution of the liability of Messrs. Watney and Keane for that of deft. 2. That the answer contained in the plea to each part of the claim in the first count which applies to freight, is a defence also to that part of the action which is for primage and average. 3. That the case is governed by the case of Smurthwaite v. Wilkins, 31 L. J. 214, C. P.; 5 L. T. Rep. N. S. 842; 7 Ib. 65.

Karslake, Q. C. (with him C. P. Butt) for the plt. in support of the demurrer.—The first count is framed on sect. 1 of the Bills of Lading Act (18 & 19 Vict. c. 111), which followed the case of Thompson and another v. Dominy, 14 L. J., N. S., 320, Ex.; 14 M. & W.; in which it was held that a bill of lading was not negotiable like a bill of exchange. The declaration alleges that the property passed to the deft., and that allegation is admitted by the plea. The plea admits a right and true delivery of the cargo, and therefore prima facie shows a liability on deft. of which he cannot discharge himself without an express agreement between him and the plts., founded on good consideration. But the plea shows no such discharge, and carefully avoids saying that by the indorsement to Watney and Keane the property passed to any one at all. Deft. will rely on the case of Smurthwaite v. Wilkins in the C. P., 5 L. T. Rep. N. S. 842; 7 Ib. 65; 31 L. J. 214, C. P., as governing the present case, but the plea there differs from the present plea. Admitting that the property passed to Watney and Keane, still the plea is no answer to the declaration. It shows no satisfaction and discharge after breach, but simply the indorsement and acceptance. This limited indorsement, with an allegation that the plts. were parties to it, and agreed to take the onus of it, does not, so far as plts. are concerned, amount to a discharge of the deft.: (Abbott on Shipping, edit. of 1847, p. 416.) If a bill of lading be indorsed to a third person, he paying freight for the same, the shipper has still a claim for freight on the original consignee. The allegation is, that deft. being liable for freight indorsed to Watney and Keane; but if plts. choose to deliver without agreeing to discharge deft., his original liability remains. Watney and Keane are mere receivers, mere agents of deft. The master cannot be involved by the holder of the bill in disputes between the latter and the consignee. The object of the Bills of Lading Act, 18 & 19 Vict. c. 111, was to give the shipowner the double liability of the person with whom he contracted and the person in whom the property vested. Wegner v. Smith, 15 C. B. 285; 24 L. J. 25, C. P., gives the proper form for raising the question of liability. The plea is objectionable as stating facts which may or may not be a defence, but which are not put on the record in the form of a defence. A discharge from all liability might easily have been pleaded. He cited also

[Ex.]

LEWIS AND OTHERS v. MCKEE.

[Ex.]

Shepard v. De Barnades, 18 East, 543; Purves v. Wilkes (not reported), cited in Abbott on Shipping; and Donell v. Bedford, 5 B. & Ad. 621.

Watkin Williams, for the deft. contra, in support of the plea.—[He asked leave to amend the plea by adding a clause averring express exoneration of deft.'s liability by the pte., and excepting primage and average accustomed. (a)] It may be there is some awkwardness in raising the point in the way proposed by the present plea; but nevertheless the plea does, though it be somewhat informally, raise the question of the liability of a transferee of a bill of lading. The deft.'s liability is founded solely on the Bills of Lading Act. There is a fallacy in saying that the plea admits the deft.'s liability without showing any discharge. The deft. may dispose of the bill of lading; he may, in fact, never become liable at all. The pte. accepted the substituted liability of the transferee for the imperfect liability of the consignee, and chose to give up the goods on the special indorsement. The position of the intermediate consignee is the same as that of the indorsee in Swarthwaite v. Wilkins (ubi sup.). The plea is good as a denial of a condition precedent.

Karslake in reply.

KELLY, C. B.—This case has been very ably and concisely argued by counsel on both sides, but I am of opinion that it presents no question of real doubt for the consideration of the court. The action is brought against the original consignee of certain goods consigned to a port in Great Britain, under a bill of lading, and there can be no doubt that upon the facts stated in the declaration the deft. was originally, not at any time absolutely, but contingently, liable to the pte. for the freight of those goods; I say only contingently, because, as pointed out by Mr. Williams, many circumstances may have arisen which would have precluded the pte. from making any claim whatever against him in respect of such freight. But such being the state of the case, after the original consignment of the goods and during the voyage, the deft., the then consignee, indorsed the bill of lading to certain persons trading under the names of Watney and Keane, and notice of that indorsement was given to the pte. The plea then alleges what took place between the parties in these terms; this was the indorsement: "Deliver to Messrs. Watney and Keane, or order, looking to them for all freight, dead freight, and demurrage, without recourse to us.—G. B. McKee and Co." This was signed by the deft., and then there is an allegation that the pte. accepted the said indorsement, and delivered the goods in pursuance of their order to the said Messrs. Watney and Keane, as the persons entitled to the said goods, and not the deft. Now, I quite agree that as a statement only of certain facts which would have raised a question for the consideration of a jury, and upon which the judge would have been bound to take the verdict of the jury, the plea would have been insufficient; the plea must not be argumentative, it must not rest upon a state of facts upon which the jury may infer an agreement which, being made, would constitute a defence to the action. It is necessary that the defence should be stated in positive terms. But I am of opinion that, if the consignee of the goods under the bill of lading, while the goods are yet in transit, indorses the bill and gives notice of that indorsement to the owner of the ship, or the party, whoever he may be, entitled to the freight, and upon that indorsement he states in express terms that the owner of the freight, or the party who may be ultimately entitled to the freight, is to look to other persons for the payment of freight, and that indorsement is accepted and acted upon without objection and without any qualification on the part of the owner of the freight, that that of itself, in point of law, constitutes a transfer of the liability and a defence to any subsequent action. Under these circumstances, in my opinion, the plea contains a statement of facts which are themselves an answer to the action, and not merely evidence of that which would be an answer to the action if so found by a jury. I think, therefore, that the plea is good; that the demurrer to it cannot be sustained; and that the deft. is entitled to judgment.

BRANWELL, B.—I am of the same opinion, and I must say that I do not think any the worse of the plea because it states the actual facts rather than stating some conclusion of law which involves, first of all, proof of the existence of certain facts before a jury, and then the difficult question whether the conclusion of law has been correctly stated from them. It seems to me that these facts, as stated, furnish an answer to the action upon the grounds put by the Lord Chief Baron, and I will merely add this, that what has taken place is to my mind equivalent to the deft. having said, "Deliver to these persons upon these terms, or do not deliver to them at all." If that were so, the owners of the freight should have said, "We will not deliver at all; we do not choose to take their responsibility to your exclusion—that is to say, the responsibility of Messrs. Watney and Co. to the exclusion of you the deft." Then he would have had a right of action against the deft., as owner of the goods, for not receiving them, which it would have been his duty to do. It appears to me that, unless that reasoning were well founded, it would be a very mischievous thing, indeed; because, in what way is an owner of goods who desires to trust them to the care of a wharfinger, making him personally responsible for the freight, to do it, unless he adopt some such indorsement as this. It is always in the power of the shipowner to say, "I will not deliver upon these terms;" and the owner of the goods can say, "I will bring an action against you for not delivering the goods, and not allowing the proper person to receive them, you will be liable to demurrage and other consequences." If he choose to take such a nominee for receiving the goods, he must take him upon the terms upon which he is nominated, and those are, in this case, no further responsibility to the deft. I think the deft. is entitled to our judgment.

CHANWELL, B.—I am also of opinion that the deft. is entitled to our judgment. The question is, not whether the plea might not have been pleaded differently, but whether the facts stated on the plea afford a sufficient answer to the pte.'s claim for freight. It would not, perhaps, be sufficient that the facts should be such as would justify or admit of the opinion that the pte. had assumed their claim for freight against the defts.; the question is, whether the facts are such as to require that conclusion; and I am of opinion that they are. The plts. might have refused to act upon this order. I do not say what would have been the state of things if they had done so; but if the plea shows that they delivered upon the faith of this special indorsement, I think the case is clear to show that they renounced their claim for freight against the defts. I do not repeat the terms of the indorsement, which my Lord Chief Baron has read from the pleadings; but the plea goes on to say, that the plts. accepted the said indorsement, and delivered the goods, in pursuance of their order, to the said Messrs. Watney and Keane, as the persons entitled to the said goods, and not the defts.; therefore the plea excludes, in point of language, any notion that there was a delivery to persons simply as agents of the defts.

(a) Leave to amend the plea accordingly was given.

FARNWORTH v. HYDE.

[Ex. Ch.]

FIGOTT, B.—I am of the same opinion. If the facts might not be evidence of a substituted liability, I should quite agree that the plea would be bad; but it seems to me, in point of fact, that they show a good substituted liability.

ERROR FROM THE COMMON PLEAS.

June 17 and Nov. 29, 1866.

FARNWORTH v. HYDE.

Marine insurance—Total or partial loss—Sale of cargo.

In an action against the underwriters of a policy on a cargo of timber from Quebec to Liverpool, it was proved that the ship was frozen up in the St. Lawrence at the beginning of winter, and in the spring was, under the advice of competent navigators, sold, it being considered that her expense of repairs and forwarding would be greater than the value when repaired. No notice of abandonment was given, and the news of the loss and the sale arrived at the same time.

In reckoning these expenses the freight from Quebec to Liverpool was included.

The jury found the sale justifiable, and a verdict was entered for the plts. as for a total loss.

The Court of C. P., on a rule to enter a nonsuit, held (Byles, J. dissentiente), that there was evidence to show that the probable loss during the operation of saving and forwarding would have absorbed the surplus profit, and that the verdict for a total loss ought to stand even without notice of abandonment.

In estimating the value of the cargo if it had arrived at its destination, Liverpool, the original bill of lading freight, 1556*l.*, was deducted, and if this deduction had not been made, there would have been a margin of 1700*l.* profit.

This point was not brought to the attention of the court below, but was suggested by Blackburn, J. in the Ex. Ch.:

Held, by the Court of Error, that the original bill of lading freight ought not to have been deducted in considering the value of the cargo if it had arrived at its destination; and that the plts., to establish a total loss, must have proved a probable loss of cargo to the amount of the bill of lading freight, 1556*l.*, besides the expenses in saving and forwarding; and that, consequently, the rule to set aside the verdict as for a total loss must be made absolute.

The Court affirmed the doctrine of Rosetto v. Gurney, 11 C. B. 176, but left the question of the necessity of notice of abandonment untouched.

The action was tried at Liverpool before Pigott, B., and a verdict was found for the plts. for a total loss, with leave to defts. to move.

The defts. obtained a rule which was discharged. Against this rule they appealed.

The case was argued in the Court of Ex. Ch., at the sittings in June last, by Mellish, Q. C. (Brett, Q. C. and C. Russell with him) for the plts.; and by

T. Jones (E. James, Q. C. with him) for the defts.

The following judgment was delivered on Nov. 29:

CHANNELL, B.—This case was argued in error after last Trinity Term before Pollock, C. B., my brother Blackburn, my brother Mellor, my brother Pigott, my brother Stree, and myself, and I am now to deliver the judgment of all the judges who heard the argument, except that of Pollock, C. B.:—This was an action on a marine policy of insurance on goods from Quebec to Liverpool. The declaration claimed a total loss. The defts. paid into court as for a partial loss of 23 per cent., and the plts. claimed damages ultra. From the statement in this case it appears that the vessel, with the insured cargo of deals on board, was wrecked in the autumn in the St. Lawrence; that she lay there all the winter; and in the spring was sold by auction, when the hull was bought for 450*l.* and the cargo for 750*l.*, by the same purchaser. The purchaser succeeded, without much difficulty or expense, in getting them off together, and bringing them safely together to Quebec, where the cargo was sold by him for more than double the price given for it. The purchase of the hull, however, taken by itself, was a losing speculation. There was evidence that the cargo could not have been saved in this manner unless the hull had been purchased also; and that there were some unexpected accidents of weather and tide, which facilitated the getting off of the ship, and saving of the cargo by the purchaser; and it was contended on the part of the plts. that the owners of the goods were not bound to purchase the hull, and that the jury should look at the state of the matters as the hull and cargo lay when they were sold, and that the sale was justifiable if, as matters then stood, it would not have been practicable to save the cargo and send it on to its destination without purchasing the hull. In order to support this view of the case, they gave evidence that the value of the cargo, if it had been sent on, and arrived in Liverpool, would have been 4300*l.*, which, deducting the bill of lading freight, of 1556*l.*, would leave a net value of 2744*l.* They also gave in evidence a calculation that, in order to send it on from the place where it lay in peril in the wrecked vessel, it would be necessary to land it, then raft it to a vessel brought down for the purpose and reload as weather permitted: and they made out an estimate of these expenses as follows:—The cost of landing it, 850*l.*; to raft it to another vessel and reload it, 700*l.*; increased freight of 1556*l.*, freight having risen between the date of the original shipment and of the opening of the navigation, to a river where another vessel would have been chartered, 296*l.*, additional freight, which would have been charged for lying off to take the cargo from where it was stored, instead of loading it at Quebec, 700*l.*; total, 2046*l.*; and evidence was given that besides all these expenses there would probably have been a loss by depreciation, which was erroneously estimated by the witnesses—the highest estimate being 12 per cent. on the Liverpool value, or 515*l.*, which, if added to the 2046*l.*, would bring up the expenditure to 2561*l.* They also gave evidence that in the ordinary state of the weather there would be risk of loss of some portion of the cargo during the operations of landing, rafting, and reshipping it, and that if the weather was unfavourable that risk would be greater. No notice of abandonment was given. On this state of the evidence, the judge asked the jury two questions: first, whether the sale of the ship was justifiable, which the jury answered in the affirmative, and on which finding no question is now raised; and secondly, whether it was right to sell the cargo, directing them that whether it was right to sell the cargo or not, would depend on whether the cargo could have been practically carried to its destination. And he meant the word practically to be understood in a mercantile sense, and that whether the cargo could be practically carried to its destination would depend, under all the circumstances, on whether the cost of bringing the cargo, added to the amount of the depreciation, would have left any appreciable margin of profit. The jury answered this questions in the affirmative, and the verdict was entered for a total loss, giving leave to the defts., as stated in paragraph 43, to move to enter a verdict for the defts. or a nonsuit, on the ground that there was no evidence of a total loss, and no evidence of a partial loss exceeding the sum paid into court, or to reduce the damages to the sum actually due as and for a partial loss. And it was at the same time agreed, if the court should be of opinion that the loss was not total, that the amount of the partial or average loss should, if necessary, be corrected by the court, or by an arbitrator to be agreed upon. A rule was obtained accordingly, which was, after argument, discharged by the majority of the Court of C. P., my brother Byles dissenting, from which decision this is an appeal. The first question to be determined therefore is, whether there was evidence on which the jury might reasonably find that the cargo could not be practically carried on to its destination. It is to be observed that, assuming the jury to have believed that the expenses would have been the maximum amount of which there was any evidence, namely, 2561*l.*, yet on the plts.' own figures there would have been a very considerable margin of profit. The plts.' counsel assumed that this margin of profit was the difference between the Liverpool value of the cargo after deducting the original freight, that is, on their own figures, 213*l.*, and they agreed that the jury might reasonably estimate that probable loss of cargo during the operations of landing, rafting, and reshipping, at an amount that would more than absorb this margin. By some oversight not explained to us, the defts.' counsel never called the attention of the Court of C. P., or of the Court of Ex. Ch., to the cardinal postulate of the plts.' counsel, that the original bill of lading freight, 1556*l.*, was to be deducted. The case was argued in the court below on the assumption that the only question was whether there was evidence to justify the jury in finding that the probable loss might have been so high as to absorb the 213*l.*, and the judges not having their attention called to the matter, which the counsel took for granted, considered it in that way only. The majority of the court taking it for granted that this was the proper question, thought that there was evidence on which the jury might find for the plts. to that extent. My brother Byles thought there was not. In this court the argument had proceeded a great way in the sittings after Easter Term, before it occurred to a member of the Court of Error, as then constituted, that we were not considering the real question, for that unless the Court of C. P. in Rosetto v. Gurney had laid down a wrong rule, the question was whether there was evidence that would justify the jury in finding a loss that would account for the difference between the Liverpool value, without deducting the original bill of lading freight of 1556*l.*, and consequently that the plts. ought to show that there was evidence to justify their finding a probable loss of cargo to the extent of more than 1769*l.* Mr. Mellish had the opportunity of preparing himself to meet this view of the case, and in the sittings after Trinity Term he was heard at length on this point before the Lord Chief Baron, my brother Blackburn, my brother Mellor, my brother Pigott, my brother Shee and myself, and we are all of opinion that where goods are, in consequence of a peril insured against, lying at a place different from their destination, damaged, but in such a state that they can at some cost be carried to their destination, the jury are to determine whether it is practically possible to carry them on. That is, according to the well-known exposition in Moss v. Smith, whether to do so will cost more than it is worth—and that in determining this the jury should take into account all the extra expenses consequent on the perils of the sea, such as drying, landing, warehousing, and reshipping the goods; but that they ought not to take into account the fact that if they are carried on in the original bottom, or by the original shipowner in a substituted bottom, they will have to pay the freight originally contracted to be paid, that being a charge to which the goods are liable when delivered, whether the perils of the sea affect them or not; and we also agree that Rosetto v. Gurney correctly decided that where the original bottom is disabled by the perils of the sea, so that the shipowner is not bound to carry the goods on, and he does not choose to do so, the jury are not to take into account the hull and the cost of transit from the place of distress to the place of destination, which must be incurred by the goods owner, if he carries them on, but only the excess of that cost above that which would have been incurred if no peril had intervened. To hold otherwise would be to enable the assured owner of goods to bring into account the whole of the freight whenever the cost of obtaining a substituted bottom exceeded the original cost, however small the excess may be. For in such a case the shipowner would never carry on the goods for the purpose of earning his original freight, though he might perhaps do so as agent of the shipowner, while no part of the freight could ever be charged when the cost fell short of the original freight, in which case the shipowner would forward them. This would be a very unsatisfactory state of the law, and we are of opinion that the case of Rosetto v. Gurney, which prevents that result, was correctly decided. Then, applying this to the facts of the present case, it becomes obvious that while it is doubtful whether there was evidence justifying the verdict if the jury had to deal with a margin of a little more than 3 per cent. of the value of the goods, there is clearly none justifying it when they had to deal with a margin of above 40 per cent. Mr. Mellish indeed said that there are cases in which a thing in extreme and imminent danger of immediate destruction may be justifiably sold, although in the event it turns out that it survives the peril to the great benefit of the purchaser; but there is not in this case any evidence of such a state of imminent and immediate peril as could justify a verdict for a total loss on this ground. We think, therefore, that the rule to set aside the verdict for a total loss must be made absolute. This renders it unnecessary to consider the question principally argued in the court below, as to the necessity of a notice of abandonment. On that point we leave the authority of the decision of the court below untouched, neither confirmed nor weakened by anything that has taken place in this court. On the remaining question, whether the partial loss does or does not exceed the amount paid into court, we are absolutely without materials for forming a judgment; the only course that seems practicable is that on which the parties seem to have agreed at Nisi Prius, namely, that an arbitrator should find the figures, and raise and state for the Court of C. P. any question of principle involved arising on his finding.

Judgment reversed.

ERROR FROM THE QUEEN'S BENCH.

Tuesday, Nov. 27, 1866.

(Before KELLY, C. B., WILLES, J., CHANNELL, B., BYLES, J., and PICOTT, B.)

THE TYNE IMPROVEMENT COMMISSIONERS v. THE GENERAL STEAM NAVIGATION COMPANY.

Ship—Pilot—Negligence—Liability of owner of vessel—Navigation of the Tyne—41 Geo. 3, c. lxxvi.—6 Geo. 4, c. 125, ss. 58, 89.

By a local Act relating to Newcastle-on-Tyne, the owners and masters of foreign ships coming into or departing from the Tyne are compelled to employ pilots, but British vessels are not so compelled. And by the general Act, 6 Geo. 4, c. 125, s. 58, a penalty is imposed on the masters of vessels piloted by other than duly licensed pilots within the limits in which such vessels should be required to be piloted by law; but sect. 89 provides that nothing in the Act shall alter or repeal any provision in any Act relating to pilots of any port or district in relation to which particular provision shall have been made by any Act:

Held, that the provision in the local Act is still in force, and that it is not compulsory to employ pilots for British ships navigating the Tyne.

Dodds v. Embleton, 9 Dow. & Ry. 27, confirmed.

This was an appeal from the judgment of the Court of Q. B., discharging a rule nisi to enter the verdict for the defendants.

Declaration for damage sustained by the plaintiffs, by reason of a vessel of the plaintiffs having been run down and injured by a vessel of the defendants.

The defendants pleaded, first, not guilty; secondly, that the damage complained of was occasioned by the fault or incapacity of a qualified pilot then acting in charge of the defendants' vessel under and in pursuance of the provisions of the Merchant Shipping Act 1854, within a district where the employment of such pilot was compulsory by law.

The plaintiffs took issue upon both pleas, and to the second plea also replied that the defendants' vessel at the time of the grievance was a vessel as to which the employment of a pilot was not compulsory by law.

The facts of the case were stated by Willes, J., before whom the case was tried, and made use of by the parties in the court below, and also for the purpose of the appeal.

The following is a copy of such case:—

This case was tried before me without a jury.

It was an action by the Tyne Commissioners against the owners of a screw steamer for running into one of the commissioner's dredging boats.

There were two questions: one of fact, whether the accident happened by the actionable negligence of the defendants' servants. This I decided in favour of the plaintiffs.

The other question was upon a plea of the Merchant Shipping Act, whether the defendants were exempt from liability because of what was done having been done under the orders of a qualified pilot. This I reserved.

It depends, as I understand it, upon whether the vessel was of such character as to have been bound (in the sense put upon that word by the authorities) to take a pilot.

I therefore only furnish so much of the evidence appearing upon my notes as touches that matter, viz.:

The defendants' steamer was a British sea-going vessel usually trading between London and Tonnin. She went upon the occasion in question in ballast to the Tyne with a view to get a cargo thence to London.

As she was going up the river, and before she had arrived at her berth, she cast anchor, swung up with the tide, which was flowing, and in doing so struck the bow of the dredger, which was going down the river at the time.

The casting anchor in order to swing round was not improper in itself, but it was wrong when done, because of the dredger so unwieldy being so near that striking her in swinging was practically inevitable.

The steamer was in charge of a qualified pilot duly licensed by the Trinity-house of Newcastle, and what was done was done by his orders and under his control.

The master and crew were not to blame, but the pilot, if anybody, for giving the orders.

I found for the plaintiffs damages 588*l*.

This verdict is subject to the opinion of the court upon the question of exemption by reason of having a pilot on board under the statutes.

The following are the material provisions of the Acts of Parliament applicable to the case.

By the 6 Geo. 4, c. 125, s. 55, the owner of any vessel is exempt from liability for any loss or damage caused to any person by the negligence of any licensed pilot acting in charge of such vessel under the provisions of the Act where and so long as such pilot shall be duly qualified to have charge of such vessel.

By sect. 58, masters of vessels allowing them to be piloted by any other than a licensed pilot, qualified to act within the limits in which the vessel is, are made liable to certain penalties.

By sect. 89:

Nothing in this Act contained shall extend to the taking away, abridging, defeating, impeaching, or interrupting of any grants, liberties, franchises, or privileges heretofore granted by any charters or Acts of Parliament to the pilots of (whether alien) the Trinity-house of Newcastle-upon-Tyne, or to give any authority to the corporation of Newcastle-upon-Tyne, within any ports or districts having separate jurisdictions to masters of pilotage under any Act of Parliament, or charter, or to alter or repeal any provisions contained in any Act or Acts of Parliament relating to pilots of any ports, or districts in relation to which particular provision shall have been made in any Acts as to the pilots or pilotage within the limits prescribed by any Act or Acts of Parliament relating to pilotage for such ports, or to the burthen of vessels navigating to or from such ports.

The 6 Geo. 4, c. 125, is repealed by the 17 & 18 Vict. c. 120, but by sect. 353 of 17 & 18 Vict. c. 104 (the Merchant Shipping Act 1854), subject to any alteration to be made by any pilotage authority in pursuance of the power theretofore given, the employment of pilots shall continue to be compulsory in all districts in which the same was by law compulsory immediately before the time when this Act comes into operation, and all exemptions from compulsory pilotage then existing within such districts shall also continue in force, and masters of unexempted vessels navigating within such districts without duly qualified pilots are subjected to certain penalties.

By sect. 6 of 6 Geo. 4, c. 86 (a local and personal Act relating to the duties of the Trinity-house, of Newcastle-upon-Tyne):

EX. CH.]

BATES v. HEWITT.

[NEW PRIZE.

The owners or masters of any foreign ship or vessel resorting to, or coming into, or departing from the said port of Newcastle, or of any of the creeks or members belonging thereto, shall, and they are hereby obliged and required respectively to receive, take on board, and employ in the pilotage and conducting such their ships or vessels, each pilot to be licensed as aforesaid, and in case of their neglect or refusal to receive and employ such pilots as aforesaid, they shall severally nevertheless answer and pay to the said master, pilot, and seamen the aforesaid pilotage duties, and the same shall be recoverable in the same manner as if such pilots had been actually received and employed provided always that nothing in this Act contained shall extend or shall be construed to extend to oblige or compel the masters or master of any British ship or other vessel to employ or make use of any pilot or pilots in piloting or conducting such ships or vessels if they shall not respectively be minded or desirous so to do.

A rule nisi having been obtained pursuant to the leave reserved to set aside the verdict for the pilots, and to enter a verdict for the defendants, the Court of Q. B. discharged the rule without argument, on the authority of Dodds v. Embledon, 9 Dow. & Ry. 27, and thereupon this appeal was brought.

S. Tample, Q. C. (T. Jones with him) for the defendants.—The question is, whether the employment of the pilot whose negligence caused the collision was obligatory on the part of the defendants. In the court below the judgment proceeded upon the authority of the case of Dodds v. Embledon, 9 Dow. & Ry. 27, and this appeal is brought to question that authority. In that case a pilot licensed by the Trinity-house of Newcastle-on-Tyne, under the 41 Geo. 3, c. lxxxvi. s. 6, was taken on board a ship by the master, and it was held that the master was not within the protection of the 6 Geo. 4, c. 125, s. 58, exempting them from liability for damage caused by incompetent pilots. It is now submitted that that case was wrongly decided. Sect. 58 of the 6 Geo. 4, c. 125 imposes a penalty upon any master of a ship for acting himself as a pilot, or employing any other person so to act than a pilot qualified to act as such within the limits where the employment is required. That is a provision of a general nature, and applicable here. The Merchant Shipping Act (17 & 18 Vict. c. 104) s. 353, enacts that the employment of pilots shall continue to be compulsory in all districts in which the same was by law compulsory immediately before that Act came into operation; and sect. 358 provides that no master or owner of any ship shall be liable for loss or damage occasioned by the fault or incapacity of any pilot where the employment of such pilot is compulsory by law. Such being the present state of the law, the employment of pilots in the Tyne is compulsory under the general provision in sect. 58 of the 6 Geo. 4, c. 125. There is nothing in the local Act, 41 Geo. 3, to prevent the application of that section. It is a significant fact that the case of Dodds v. Embledon is not noticed in Abbott on Shipping, and cannot be considered as one of much authority. Cases cited:

The Killarney, 1 Lush. Adm. Rep. 327;
Carruthers v. Spaldbottom, 4 M. & S. 77;
Maude & Pol. on Ship. 204, note v. (edit. 5).

E. James, Q. C. (Liddell, Q. C. and G. Bruce with him) was not called upon.

Kelly, C. B.—I am of opinion that the judgment of the court below must be affirmed. The question to be decided is, whether the master of the defendants' vessel was bound, under the 6 Geo. 4, c. 125, s. 58, to employ a duly licensed pilot under the circumstances stated in the case. The first Act which it is necessary to refer to is the local Act, 41 Geo. 3, c. lxxxvi., by which the Trinity-house of Newcastle-on-Tyne were empowered to appoint pilots to pilot vessels up and down the river Tyne, and into and out of the port of Newcastle-on-Tyne; and by sect. 6 of that Act it is expressly provided that vessels are to be navigated by those pilots, and that masters and owners of vessels are bound to employ those pilots. By the first part of that section the owners or masters of any foreign vessel coming into or departing from the Tyne are bound to employ those pilots. And then follows a proviso which, though negative in terms, operates affirmatively to exempt the owners or masters of British ships from the obligation of employing those pilots. That is a distinct provision that foreign vessels only are bound to employ such pilots. Then comes the general Act, the 6 Geo. 4, c. 125. It was contended that, by sect. 58 of that Act, it is compulsory on the owners and masters of all vessels, British and foreign, to employ licensed pilots within the limits for which pilots may be licensed to act. But sect. 89 of that Act enacts that nothing in that Act shall extend, or be construed to extend, to the taking away, abridging, defeating, impeaching, or interrupting of any grants, liberties, franchises, or privileges theretofore granted by any charters or Acts of Parliament to the pilots of (i.e. namely) the Trinity-house of Newcastle-on-Tyne. The question arises, therefore, whether the present case is within sect. 89 or not? This is not the first time the question has arisen. It came before the Court of Q. B. in 1826, when Lord Tenterden presided over that court. He was eminently conversant with this subject. And that Court decided that the case did not come within sect. 89, and that that section did not compel the owners and masters of British ships to employ pilots in the Tyne. It may be contended that sect. 58 of 6 Geo. 4, does not abridge or impeach the privileges of the pilots of Newcastle-upon-Tyne; but then the words in sect. 89, "or to alter or repeal any provisions in any Act of Parliament relating to facts for which particular provision has been made," seem to admit of no other construction but that put on them by the Court of Q. B. It would be impossible to hold it is compulsory upon British vessels to employ pilots in the Tyne without altering or repealing the provision of a local Act, which expressly provides that such pilotage shall not be compulsory. The cases cited in the course of the argument have no direct application, and independently of the case of Dodds v. Embledon we have no difficulty in deciding that sect. 58 of the 6 Geo. 4, c. 125, the effect of which is preserved by the 17 & 18 Vict. c. 104, s. 353, does not make it compulsory on the owners or masters of British vessels to employ pilots while navigating the river Tyne. The judgment of the court below will therefore be affirmed.

SITTINGS AT GUILDHALL.

(Before COCKBURN, C. J. and a Special Jury.)

BATES v. HEWITT.

Marine insurance—Concurrence of a material fact.

Knowledge on the part of an underwriter must not always be assumed because of the notoriety of a fact.

The identity of a vessel is very material with reference to liability to capture.

*The Georgia was the famous Confederate cruiser, and much talked of in Parliament and the press. An action brought on a policy on the ship for 10,000*l.* was met by a plea of concealment of the identity of the vessel insured with the cruiser in question. On the facts the jury held that the defendant did not know the fact, but that he might have known and had the means of knowledge. The point of law was reserved, whether this want of knowledge was equivalent to actual knowledge.*

[NISI PRIUS.]

BATES v. HEWITT.

[NISI PRIUS.]

This was an action on a marine policy of insurance; and the defence set up was a concealment from the underwriter of a material fact which increased the risk.

For the plt., Mellish, Q. C. and Potter.

For the deft., James, Q. C., Jones, Q. C., and Honyman, Q. C.

The plt. is a merchant at Liverpool, and the deft. is an underwriter at Lloyd's, and had underwritten the plt.'s screw steamer, formerly the Confederate war cruiser the Georgia, for 100*l*. The vessel had been purchased by plt. on the 8th Aug., and was insured for 22,000*l*., of which 10,000*l*. was underwritten in London. The vessel on putting to sea a few days after the purchase of her by plt. was captured on a voyage to Lisbon by a Federal man-of-war, and plt. claimed the insurance for an entire loss. The case had been tried at the Liverpool assizes, when the jury returned a verdict for the plt.; but subsequently a rule was obtained and made absolute for a new trial.

Plt. deposed that before purchasing the Georgia he applied to the collector of customs, and from the information he received, he purchased her and registered her as a British ship. He afterwards chartered her to carry the Portuguese mails from Lisbon and the Portuguese settlements on the West Coast of Africa. As she was the only Georgia screw steamer in the world, he did not think there could have been any mistake about her, and he gave all the information required as to her builder and condition, and the service she was to be employed in.

The evidence of the deft. was to the effect that he never for a moment suspected that the Georgia was the Confederate cruiser; but that he most probably considered her to be one of Messrs. Bradford's (plt.'s agents) regular line of steamers going up the Mediterranean. He however was not aware whether the Mediterranean boats touched at the Portuguese and Spanish ports or not; and he insured these boats for twelve months, whereas the insurance on the Georgia was only for six months at the rate of three guineas and a half per cent. He did not refer to Lloyd's register, but if he had, he should not have found the Georgia screw steamer there.

For the plt. it was contended that the present case was widely different from ordinary cases of concealment, the history of the Georgia being notorious to everybody, and all the circumstances connected with her having been discussed in Parliament, in the public prints, and in mercantile circles; the deft. ought to have known, and was bound to know, that the Georgia had been the Confederate war steamer. It was well known that she was built in the Clyde, and was originally called the Japan; that she had put into Liverpool, and was taken down to Birkenhead and dismantled, and then sold to an English merchant. Seeing that all these facts were so notorious, how could it be said that there had been concealed from the underwriters a material fact? If the deft. had carefully attended to the ship, he would have seen that he was insuring the Georgia free from seizure and capture, and that she was built in the Clyde. If he had referred to Lloyd's register, he would have learned that there was no such vessel as the Georgia, and this would have led him to know what she really was. If deft. had read the "slip" so carelessly as not to inform himself of its contents, he should not now be permitted to take advantage of his own negligence.

For the deft. it was urged that as a matter of fact he was ignorant that the vessel insured was the Confederate Georgia; that he considered her to be one of a number of vessels going to the Mediteranean whose names ended in "a;" and that it was the duty of the plt. to have made known to deft. the history of the vessel, and that having kept back this material information he had now no right to recover.

COCKBURN, C. J. told the jury that nothing was more important than the maintenance of that perfect good faith which was of the essence of insurance; and, no doubt, it was the duty of the assured to communicate every material fact as to the vessel to be insured, so as to enable the insurer to exercise his judgment as to whether he would accept the risk; and if so, at what rate of insurance. At the same time it was equally plain that the rule could not apply where the matter was within the common knowledge of both parties. It was admitted that the fact of the identity of the vessel was material with reference to her insurance; for, although if the ownership had been changed it might be that the capture by a belligerent would not be valid, still, on the other hand, as questions of international law were in a great degree unsettled, there could be no doubt that the identity of the vessel was very material with reference to the liability to capture. And there was no doubt that the identity of the vessel was not stated to the underwriters, though the name was mentioned. But it was said, in effect, that taking the "slip" communicating the name of the vessel, along with notorious facts, they either must have known or might have known if they had chosen to know, what the vessel was. The first question would be whether the deft. did, in fact, know it. He had positively sworn that it did not occur to him, and this was not lightly to be disbelieved. Still, it was insisted that, considering the notoriety which the name of the vessel had acquired through debates in Parliament and comments in the press, it was impossible but that he must have known it at the time, though he might since have forgotten it. Taking all the circumstances, it was for the jury to say whether they were satisfied that he did know it at the time of the insurance. But even if not satisfied of that, the plt. further contended that, supposing that he might have known it if he had exercised common care, that was sufficient. He would leave that question to the jury in order to enable him to reserve it for the court upon their finding, as one of law, although his own opinion was rather adverse to this view of the case, for he thought that it would be highly dangerous to allow the insured to speculate upon the degree of knowledge the underwriter might possibly acquire, and upon such speculation to dispense himself from the duty of giving full information of everything material as to the vessel. Still, he would leave to the jury whether, by reasonable care, the underwriter might have known the fact. The two questions, then, for the jury were, first, did the deft. know the fact; next, might he have known it by the exercise of common care? In other words, did he know it; or, if not, was it his own fault that he did not know it? In the former view they would certainly find for the plt., and upon the other view they would state their finding, in order that the question of law might be reserved for the court.

The Jury, after some time, said they were not satisfied that the deft. was aware of the fact that the Georgia was the Confederate steamer, but that he had sufficient means of identifying the ship at the time of the insurance.

His LORDSHIP then directed the verdict to be entered for the deft. with leave to plt. to move the court above.

THE HANNA.

[ADM.]

COURT OF ADMIRALTY.

Reported by HENRY F. PURCELL, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Tuesday, Dec. 4, 1866.

THE HANNA.

Compulsory pilotage—Norwegian and Swedish vessels exempt from, when coming through the North Channel and not carrying passengers.

A person to whom the master, without the owner's consent, gives a passage gratuitously, and who messes with him, but who, having had some experience at sea, undertakes in return to help in the working of the ship, is neither a passenger nor a seaman.

This barque had come into collision with the Britannia steam-tug off the Nore Sand on the 15th Sept. 1865. She was a Norwegian vessel on her way from Sundswald, in Sweden, to London. The cause was tried on the 16th Nov., when it appeared from the evidence that she had taken on board a duly licensed pilot to conduct her from Lowestoft to the port of London, and that she also had on board, besides the crew, a sort of nondescript person, who, though not a regular sailor, had occasionally been at sea, and who on the present occasion got a free passage from the master as an act of friendship without the owner's knowledge, but undertook in return to give whatever assistance he could on board the ship. He messed with the master.

The Court decided that the pilot of the Hanna was solely to blame.

It was then contended, on the part of the Britannia, that the employment of a pilot was not compulsory at the time and under the circumstances. This question was argued on the 23rd Nov.

Brett, Q. C. (Clarkson with him) for the defts.—The pilotage in this case was compulsory; the Hanna was a Norwegian vessel, not having a British register, coming from a northern port in the Baltic through the north passage, and having on board a passenger. The employment of a pilot, therefore, taken on board to navigate her into an English port was compulsory under sect. 376 of the Merchant Shipping Act, 17 & 18 Vict. c. 104, and the vessel could not come under the exemptions contained in sect. 379 of the same Act by reason of her carrying a passenger on board. Though in that section the word is used in the plural "passengers," still that must be construed to include the singular, under 13 & 14 Vict. c. 21, s. 4.

Dr. Deane, Q. C. (Vernon Lushington with him) contra.—The pilotage was not compulsory. There are two questions for the court. First, assuming that there was a passenger on board, did that fact make the employment of a pilot under the circumstances compulsory? Secondly, did this person on board the Hanna satisfy the meaning of the word passenger? First, the exemptions contained in the old Pilot Act, 6 Geo. 4, c. 125, s. 59, were continued by sect. 353 of the Merchant Shipping Act, 17 & 18 Vict. c. 104: (The Earl of Auckland, Lush. 177.) These exemptions were further extended by the Order in Council of Feb. 1854 (cited in Earl of Auckland), and within these exemptions the Hanna came, though carrying a passenger. There was, however, another ground on which exemption was claimed. About the time of the Act of Geo. 4, exempting traders to Norway, the Cattegat, Baltic, &c., there was a commercial treaty made between this country and Sweden, which was signed in London on the 18th March 1826 (Hertslet's Commercial Treaties, vol. 3, 434), the second and third paragraphs of which are as follows:

2nd Art.—British vessels entering or departing from the ports of the kingdoms of Sweden and Norway, and Swedish or Norwegian vessels entering or departing from the ports of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, shall not be subject to any other or higher ship duties or charges than are or shall be levied on national vessels entering or departing from such ports respectively.

3rd Art.—All goods, wares, and merchandise, whether the productions of the kingdoms of Sweden and Norway, or of any other country, which may be legally imported from any ports of the said kingdoms into the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland in British vessels, shall in like manner be permitted to be so imported directly in Swedish or Norwegian vessels, and all goods, wares, and merchandise, whether the production of any of the dominions of Her Britannic Majesty, or of any other country, which may be legally exported from the ports of the United Kingdom in British vessels, shall in like manner be permitted to be exported from the said ports in Swedish or Norwegian vessels. An exact reciprocity shall be observed in the ports of Sweden and Norway, so that all goods, wares, and merchandise, whether the production of the United Kingdom or of any other country, which may be legally imported from the ports of the United Kingdom into the ports of Sweden and Norway in Swedish and Norwegian vessels, shall in like manner be permitted to be so imported from the ports of the United Kingdom in British vessels, and all goods, wares, and merchandise, whether the production of any of the dominions of Her Britannic Majesty or of any other country, which may be legally exported from the ports of Sweden or Norway in Swedish or Norwegian vessels, shall in like manner be permitted to be exported from the said ports in British vessels.

Now compulsory pilotage was a charge from which Norway and Baltic traders with British registers were exempt under 6 Geo. 4, c. 125, s. 59. These two paragraphs of the treaty, therefore, brought Norwegian and Swedish vessels within the exemptions contained in that section, and those exemptions being continued by the Merchant Shipping Act, the Hanna was exempt. As to the second question, the definition of a passenger given in sect. 303 of the Merchant Shipping Act, as to passengers in steamships, applies here mutatis mutandis. This man must be considered as one of the crew; to be a passenger too he should be on board with consent of the owner; but in this case the master took him on board out of kindness, and he in return gave his services during the voyage.

Brett, Q. C. in reply.—The object of this Act is the preservation of life; the owners' consent is not necessary to invest a person with the character of a passenger. If the captain takes on board a person without this consent, is his life not to be cared for? By the Act the owner has his remedy against the captain. This man is said to be a seaman: did the sections of the Merchant Shipping Act, relative to seamen, apply to him? Could the captain punish him? This man must be held to be a passenger, and then, even had the captain or mate particular knowledge, the employment of a pilot was compulsory. Then, as to the exemptions under the statute, the obligation was imposed by sect. 376 of the Merchant Shipping Act, and was not removed by sect. 379. Sect. 353 did not apply at all; this case arose in the Trinity-house district, to which that section does not apply. Suppose, however, it did, still the Hanna was not exempt, either within the 6 Geo. 4, c. 125, s. 59, for that section only contemplated masters of British vessels having a particular knowledge; or under the Order in Council, because he was not coming up the South Channel. But a final exemption is stated to exist under a treaty, and this treaty was a convention of commerce between Great Britain and Sweden, providing that British vessels entering or departing from the ports of Sweden and Norway, and Swedish and Norwegian vessels entering or departing from the ports of the United Kingdom, shall not be liable to heavier charges than national vessels entering or leaving such ports. Suppose the case of a Norwegian vessel passing, but not entering, the treaty would not apply. This refers simply to port dues, and not to the payment of a pilot for services rendered. That which makes the pilotage compulsory is a penalty for not taking a pilot; that is entirely different from a due. Such a treaty cannot override an Act for the preservation of life, at the time, and under the circumstances, the employment of a pilot was compulsory or not.

The Court now gave judgment.—The owners of the Hanna are liable for the damage done, unless under the circumstances the pilotage of the Hanna was by law compulsory. The question then before the court at present is, was the pilotage compulsory? The burden of proof lies upon the defts., the owners of the Hanna. They rely upon the positive enactment of the 376th section of the Merchant Shipping Act, which is as follows:—"Subject to any alteration to be made by the Trinity-house, and to the exceptions hereinafter contained, the pilotage districts of the Trinity-house within which the employment of pilots is compulsory, are the London district and the Trinity-house outport districts as hereinafter defined;" this includes the district where the collision between the Hanna and the Britannia took place. "And the master of every ship navigating within any part of such districts, who after a qualified pilot has offered to take charge of such ships, either himself pilots such ships without possessing a certificate enabling him so to do, or employs an unqualified person to pilot her, shall for every such offence incur a penalty." From the effect however of this enactment, the plts. contend that the Hanna was exempted, and they specify two classes of exemptions, either of which they allege is sufficient; the one class of exemptions subsisting before the passing of the Merchant Shipping Act, and retained by that Act, the other created for the first time by the Merchant Shipping Act. To take the former class first, the 353rd section of the Merchant Shipping Act (passed when compulsory pilotage was general) provides that all exemptions from compulsory pilotage existing at the time when the Merchant Shipping Act came into operation should continue in force, and by the 59th section of 6 Geo. 4, c. 125, it was enacted that, "the master of any vessel trading to Norway, or to the Cattegat or Baltic, or round the North Cape, or into the White Sea on their inward or outward voyages, or of any constant trader inwards between Boulogne inclusive and the Baltic (all such ships and vessels having British registers and coming up by the North Channel, but not otherwise), might lawfully, without being subject to any of the penalties by this Act imposed, pilot his own vessel so long as he should pilot the same without the aid of an unlicensed pilot. Now that the exemptions contained in the above section of 6 Geo. 4, c. 125 were retained by the 353rd section of the Merchant Shipping Act is a point which has been decided by the Court of Q. B. in Reg. v. Stanton, 8 El. & Bl., and by the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council in the case of the Earl of Auckland, 1 Lush. These authorities I am bound to obey. The question then is, whether the exemption of the 59th section of 6 Geo. 4, c. 125, applies to the Hanna, and looking within the four corners of the section I am satisfied that the section does not apply, because the exemption is subject to the condition that the vessel should have a British register. But the plts. would escape from this difficulty by invoking a convention of commerce or navigation between this country and Sweden in March 1826, that is to say, a few months before the passing of 6 Geo. 4, c. 125. The plts. contended that compulsory pilotage was a charge within the meaning of the 2nd section of the convention, and consequently that notwithstanding anything in the 59th section of 6 Geo. 4, c. 125, Norwegian vessels could not be subject to compulsory pilotage where British vessels were exempt. This view seems to be untenable; the theory of the Legislature, whether right or wrong, must be taken to be that compulsory pilotage is not a charge upon vessels, but rather a regulation instituted for their benefit. Moreover, if the construction of the plts. were correct, the condition annexed in the 59th section of 6 Geo. 4, c. 125, that vessels to be exempted should have a British register, would be null and void, not only in the case of Norwegian vessels, but also in the case of vessels of the numerous countries with which Great Britain has a similar convention of navigation and commerce. I need not refer to the third section of the same treaty with Sweden; it simply prescribes free reciprocity of navigation in respect of exports and imports; it has, in my opinion, no bearing on the present case. The plts. then called the attention of the court to the extension which the 59th section of 6 Geo. 4, c. 125, received from the Order in Council of 18th Feb. 1854, a few months before the passing of the Merchant Shipping Act, and pointed out that in that order the condition that vessels to be exempted should have a British register is wanting; that order is in the following terms: "The masters of the undermentioned ships and vessels shall, subject to the provision contained in the 59th section 6 Geo. 4, c. 125, in respect of the employment of unlicensed persons, be exempted from compulsory pilotage, viz., of ships or vessels trading to Norway, or to the Cattegat or Baltic, or round the North Cape, or into the North Sea, when coming up by the South Channel; of ships and vessels trading to Boulogne (inclusive) and the Baltic on their outward passages and when coming up the south passage." Now, this Order in Council (the exemptions contained in which are, by virtue of the 353rd section of the Merchant Shipping Act as interpreted by the decision in the Earl of Auckland, equally in force with the exemptions contained in the 59th section of 6 Geo. 4, c. 125) does not directly apply to the Hanna, for the Hanna at the time of the collision was upon her inward passage and coming up the North Channel; but it was argued that the Order in Council having exempted vessels coming up from the Baltic by the South Channel, without rendering it necessary for them to have a British register, it would be an anomaly to hold that by virtue of the statute the same vessels, when coming up by the North Channel, should not be exempt, because they had no British register. To this argument I cannot accede. It would be easier for the court to acquiesce in such an anomaly, or to hold that the condition of a British register, as expressed in the statute, was understood in the Order in Council extending the exemption of that statute, than to hold that an express proviso of a statute had thus been tacitly repealed by implication in an Order in Council made in pursuance of the statute. It was also argued that any distinction in the matter of exemptions from compulsory pilotage between British and foreign vessels, is an irrational distinction, neither class being necessarily more or less in need of a pilot than the other from the more or less familiarity of the master with the waters within which the pilotage is compulsory, and a distinction which has been superseded by the sensible distinction adopted in the Merchant Shipping Act between vessels navigating in the waters of the port to which they belong, and vessels navigating in other waters. I admit the force of this argument, but it cannot weigh against the express words of the statute, 6 Geo. 4, c. 125, s. 59, requiring a British register. Any anomalies that may thus arise are due to the Merchant Shipping Act retaining, or having been interpreted to retain, exemptions previously existing under another system. I come then to the conclusion that the Hanna was not exempted from compulsory pilotage by the 59th section of 6 Geo. 4, c. 125, either taken alone or in connection with the convention with Sweden of 1826, or of the Order in Council of 18th Feb. 1834. I now pass to the other class of exemptions on which the plea relied, viz., those constituted by the 379th section of the Merchant Shipping Act itself which provides (inter cetera) that ships trading to any place in Europe north of Boulogne, when not carrying passengers, shall be exempt from compulsory pilotage in the London districts and in the Trinity-house outport districts. This exemption duly applies to the Hanna, provided she was not carrying passengers. The question then is reduced to this, whether she was carrying passengers. There was only one person on board on whom that character is attempted to be fixed. I will assume that to satisfy the statute it is not necessary that there should be more than one passenger. By the 4th section of the 13 & 14 Vict. c. 21 (the Act for shortening the language used in Acts of Parliament) the plural is to be deemed to include the singular unless the contrary is expressly provided, and in this statute there is no express provision to the contrary; but the question is, whether the person on board alleged to be a passenger is in the eye of the law a passenger. It appears that the man did not pay for his passage; that the master, being acquainted with his friends in Sweden, agreed to give him a passage to London gratuitously, on the understanding that the man, who had been to sea before, should do what he could to assist in the work of the ship. He manned in the cabin with the master. Now, the term "passenger" is not defined in the Merchant Shipping Act, except in the 308th section, where the definition is given only for specified purposes, viz., for the purpose in the provisions of the Act with respect to stowage and certificate of passenger steamships. As so defined, the term includes any person carried in a steamship other than the crew, the master, his family and servants. The word "seaman" is defined by the interpretation clause of the Merchant Shipping Act, and includes "every person (except masters, pilots, and apprentices duly registered) employed or engaged in any capacity on board any ship." Upon the whole I am satisfied that the person in question was not a passenger; in fact, he was a non-descript. In one respect he was a seaman, because, as he helped to work his passage, he might be said to have been employed or engaged in some capacity on board ship; on the other hand, as being a friend and messing with the captain without making any payment, he might seem to belong to the category of the family or servants of the master; but in any case he was not a passenger within the meaning of the statute. The result then is, that in my opinion the Hanna was, under the 379th section of the Merchant Shipping Act, exempted from compulsory pilotage, and consequently her owners are responsible for the damage she occasioned by her collision with the Britannia. I shall refer it to the registrar and merchants to estimate the damage in the usual manner; and I condemn the owners of the Hanna in the amount, together with the costs of the suit.

THE SONLOMSTEIN.

Pro rata freight—Influence of consent—Master's authority—Master's possessory lien.

Where a ship and cargo were salvaged, and, the ship being rendered valueless, the cargo was sold by order of the court on petition of the salvors, the owner of the ship is entitled to pro rata freight on a new inferential contract arising from the voluntary acceptance of the cargo at a port short of its destination.

If the owner of the cargo, though having notice, puts in no bail, and does not interfere till the proceeds are in the registry, there is inference of his consent to receive the cargo at a port short of its destination.

The master has authority to appoint an agent, both for ship and cargo, when there is no representative of the owner of the cargo.

The master has a possessory lien on the cargo for its share of general average expenses, but a ship agent has no such lien upon ship, freight, or cargo, nor a right of action is run against any of them.

In June 1865 the Sonloinstein had been chartered from her owners by Messrs. Bergman and Co., of Norder Calix, in Sweden, to take a cargo of deals to Bordeaux, sold by them to the Messrs. Vergier, of that place. The deals were duly shipped in August, the freight per tale being payable on delivery. Bills of lading were given to Messrs. Bergman, and by them indorsed for value to Messrs. Vergier, who it is not disputed were the owners of the cargo.

On the 2nd Oct. the vessel in the course of her voyage to Bordeaux struck on the Ower Sand in the North Sea, and was towed up by three English fishing-smacks into the pool of Great Grimsby in a disabled condition. On the 7th Oct. a salvage suit was instituted by the plea against the Sonloinstein, and the freight and cargo, and the vessel and cargo were arrested under the order of this court. The master at Great Grimsby employed Messrs. Deacon, Stewin, and Co., shipbrokers, of that port, to act as agents for the owner of the vessel, and to transact all that was necessary under the circumstances for the vessel and cargo. He also summoned from Yarmouth Mr. Butcher, agent in this kingdom for the Norwegian Lloyd's Assurance Association; and Mr. Butcher, for the benefit of all concerned, instructed Messrs. Deacon and Co., the proctors, to enter an appearance in this case on the part of the owners of the ship, and also on behalf of the owners of the cargo. Shortly afterwards, after having made a survey of the vessel, Mr. Butcher instructed Messrs. Deacon and Co. to write to Messrs. Vergier, the owners of the cargo, to inform them of the condition of both the ship and cargo, and to obtain their instructions with regard to the cargo. Meanwhile the cargo was discharged at Great Grimsby, the Sonloinstein was put into a graving-dock and surveyed on behalf of the owners and underwriters, and the result was that she was not found worth repairing. Accordingly on the 24th Oct. the master and crew abandoned her, and the master gave notice of such abandonment to the proprietors of the graving-dock. On the 14th Nov. the court, on the application of the plaintiffs, directed both vessel and cargo to be sold, but at the instance of Messrs. Deacon and Co., suspended the issue of the commission for three days. This delay was asked for in order that the owners of the cargo or their agents might be communicated with. It appears that though Messrs. Deacon and Co. had written several times to the Norwegian consul at Bordeaux to procure instructions from the owners of the cargo, no instructions had been received; Messrs. Deacon and Co. then telegraphed to the Norwegian consul at Bordeaux, informing him that the ship and cargo would be sold by the court unless bail were given, and begging him to telegraph instructions; no instructions, however, appeared to have arrived, and Deacon and Co. declined on their own responsibility to find bail for the cargo. The cargo was accordingly sold on the 16th Dec. The vessel was also put up for sale, but found no purchaser, and thereupon the salvors abandoned her to the proprietors of the graving-dock, the dock dues and wages been paid. On the 6th March in the present year the case came on for hearing, and the Court awarded to the salvors 300*l.* for their services, and directed that sum, together with the costs, to be paid out of the proceeds of the sale of the cargo. This was done. The defendants, the late owners of the cargo, subsequently claimed to have paid to them the balance remaining in the registry. Other claims, however, were made on the same balance, by the owners of the Sobloinstei, for pro rata freight, by Messrs. Donner and Co. for disbursements, and by Messrs. Deacon and Co. for their costs. These several claims were made by motion, and argued on Dec. 4.

Liability for shipowners.—The ship was abandoned and the cargo taken out by the master, and was in his hands when arrested by warrant of this court. This did not deprive him, nor did he part with his lien for freight, or his lien to earn freight. The value of the deals was vastly increased by their transport to England; there was a solid gain to the cargo, and is the ship to receive no return? We do not demand the full freight, though perhaps we are entitled to it, but limit our claim to about two-thirds. Freight pro rata goes on a measurement of distance. The Admiralty warrant was notice in law to the owner of the cargo to come in, and he does not deny in his affidavit notice in fact. So, as he did not come in, the cargo must be taken to be sold with his consent:

Cargo ex Galam, 2 Moo. P. C. Rep. N. 8.;
Shrimpe v. Fletcher, 14 C. B., N. S., 147, 178;
Baily v. Wood, Abbott on Shipping (9th ed.), 282.

Claim for owner of cargo.—Pro rata freight arises on a fresh contract to be drawn by inference: (MacLachlan, 406.) No inference can be drawn from Verger's affidavit that he consented to pay pro rata freight. The master abandoned his voyage, the owners of the cargo left it in the hands of the court. The balance has been paid in, and can it be said that by asking for their money they have consented to the delivery of the cargo at a place short of its destination—there has been no delivery of the goods at all? Cargo ex Galam is here inapplicable; in that case parties who may be said to have been claiming under the owners of the cargo prevented it going on to its destination. Here it was the act of strangers.

Liability in reply.—If the master abandons the voyage he loses all right to freight, but the abandonment of the ship does not preclude his right: (MacLachlan, 406.) There must be a distinct abandonment of the voyage. There is no evidence in this case that the master abandoned the voyage when the cargo went into the hands of the court. The master had a perfect right to wait: (Cargo ex Galam). His work might go for nothing unless he waited to see what the court would do. The salvor here in a sense may be said to claim under the owner of the cargo, in much the same manner as in the Cargo ex Galam, referred to by Mr. Clarkson, the holder of a bottomry bond was said so to claim. When the owner accepts the cargo short of its destination there is an inference of consent; if he accepts the proceeds there is the same inference. Before the Bills of Lading Act it was the universal rule of law that where a cargo was received under a bill of lading, that, though not necessarily raising a contract in law, is evidence from which a jury may infer a contract to pay freight in consideration of the captain giving up his lien on the goods.

Claim for the Messrs. Deacon.—The master had a right to appoint proctor for both ships and cargo; so laid down by Lord Stowell in the Gratiot, 3 Rob. Adm. Rep. 586, and referred to in Thierboom v. Chapman, 13 M. & W. 230-239. The salvors had no power to change proctors without permission of the court and having first paid their costs:

23 & 24 Vict. c. 37, s. 128;
Chitty's Practice, p. 91.

Liability for Messrs. Donner.—These charges are for the landing of the cargo and other expenses, and though the Messrs. Donner have no lien on the cargo, yet I appeal to the equitable jurisdiction of this court to order payment out of the fund in court, for the master has a possessory lien (Ex Galam; Scarf v. Tobin, 8 B. & A. 523), and my client a right of personal action against him. This application is brought to save all this circuitous action.

Clarkson contra.—This application is not by the master but by shipbrokers; their remedy is in another court.

The Court now gave judgment.—The claim of the owners of the Sobloinstei is a motion for the payment of pro rata freight for the carriage of the cargo as far as Great Grimsby. The defendants, Messrs. Verger and Co., deny that any freight has been earned. It has not been argued that in this respect the Norwegian law differs from the British law, whereby it is settled, first, that if the vessel becomes disabled at an intermediate port, the master is allowed a reasonable time within which to reship or tranship, so as to earn his freight; secondly, that the whole freight is payable if, by the default of the owner of the cargo, the master is prevented from forwarding the cargo from the intermediate port to its destination. I apprehend these propositions are elucidated by the case of the Gaim. Again, that no freight is payable if the owner of the cargo against his will is compelled to take the cargo at an intermediate port; fourthly, that to justify a claim for pro rata freight there must be a voluntary acceptance of the goods by the owner at an intermediate port in such a mode as to raise a fair inference that the further carriage of the goods was intentionally dispensed with. This proposition is mentioned in the case of Thierboom v. Chapman, 13 M. & W. 238. I must hold that Verger and Co. had notice that their cargo would be sold if not bailed; that they suffered it to be sold and must bear the consequences of their own laches. I think the conduct of the owners of the cargo amounts to a waiver by them to have their cargo carried from Great Grimsby to Bordeaux, and does raise an implied promise that they would pay pro rata freight when they took the cargo. In ascertaining this pro rata freight, the freight which the owners of the vessel had already received by way of advances from Messrs. Bergman at Neder Calix must be remembered, and there must also be a deduction on account of the salvage and the costs of the suit previous to this motion, which are a charge upon the freight as well as upon the cargo, and which on the present occasion have been defrayed entirely out of the cargo; the freight now allowed must contribute its proportionate share, which must be recouped to the cargo. The other claimants against the fund are Messrs. Deacon and Co. for their costs, and Messrs. Donner for their disbursements. The owners of the cargo repudiate both Messrs. Deacon and Messrs. Donner, and deny they ever employed them or authorised them to be employed. In my opinion, according to Lord Stowell's judgment in the Gratiot, the master was justified in appointing Messrs. Donner to act as agents for the cargo as well as for the ship. I think the owners of the cargo cannot be heard to say that Messrs. Deacon and Messrs. Donner were not justified in acting for the cargo. I think Messrs. Deacon and Co. are entitled to their costs as the brokers.

charge on the fund in court. Respecting so much of the claim of the Messrs. Donner and Co. as relates to necessities, I consider the court would be justified in directing it to be satisfied out of the sum awarded to the owners of the vessel as pro rata freight. With regard to the part of the claim of Messrs. Donner and Co. which refers to general average expenses, those expenses are attributable to ship, freight, and cargo in proportion; and, according to the authority of the Galam, I must hold that the master has a possessory lien upon the cargo to satisfy the proportion of general average expenses due from the cargo. The ship agent, by whom, in the first instance, these expenses may have been incurred, has no lien upon the ship's freight or cargo for these expenses, nor has he even a right of action in rem against any of them. The court therefore cannot direct, no matter how just such a course might be, that any portion of the proceeds now in court either the portion to be assigned to the owners of the vessels as pro rata freight, or the portion, if any, to which the owners of the cargo are entitled, should be paid over to Messrs. Donner and Co. in discharge of such of their disbursements as are in the nature of general average expenses. The court has no authority to order them to be paid to Messrs. Donner and Co. I must refer this matter to the registrar and merchants to ascertain the amount of pro rata freight in the manner before mentioned, to ascertain what portion of Messrs. Donner's charges may be considered as charges for necessities supplied to the ship. Messrs. Deacon must have their costs; Messrs. Donner their charges for necessities; the owners of the vessel their pro rata freight, less the claim of Messrs. Donner for necessities—that is to say, the necessities must come out of the freight and not out of the proceeds of the cargo. The residue will belong to the owners of the cargo, subject to the lien of the owners of the vessel for the share of general average expenses due from the cargo, which lien the court, according to the Galam, is bound to regard. Each party must bear his own costs except Messrs. Deacon, who have a right to add their costs to the amount of their claim.

Salvage—Steamboat—Costs.

Where a sloop, with her cargo of iron ore on deck, having got on a rock in a dangerous strait, was left by her crew, who went to the shore near by, and while they were there the vessel, by the action of the tide, came off the rock and drifted in the tide towards another dangerous rock, and while drifting was seen by those on a passenger steamer then landing a short distance away, which hastened out, and taking hold of her towed her to a place of safety, her crew reaching her just after the steamboat took hold of her:

Held, that this was clearly a case of salvage.

Considerations which affect the amount of salvage awarded.

300 dollars salvage, and costs allowed on a valuation of 3500 dollars.

This was a libel filed by Holmes, the master of the steamboat Sylvan Grove, in behalf of all parties interested, to recover salvage. The facts of the case sufficiently appear in the opinion of the court. It was claimed in behalf of the schooner that it was not a case of salvage, inasmuch as her crew could have unassisted towed her into a place of safety. The value of the schooner and her cargo was about 3500 dollars.

Haskett for resp.

BENEDICT, J.—The evidence in this case shows that on the morning of the 15th March last the sloop Joseph C. Griggs, laden to the extent of her capacity with iron ore on deck, in passing through Hell Gate, was driven upon Negro Head Rock. Her large anchor had been let go, in an effort to avoid the rock, but had failed to bring her to, and she grounded upon a falling tide. Her master and crew, anticipating, as the evidence clearly shows, that the sloop might keel over as the tide fell, removed their clothes, provisions, bedding, &c., to the boat, and in it betook themselves to the shore, intending, however, to watch the vessel, and attempt to save her in case she should come off under the action of the strong ebb tide. While thus abandoned for the time a strain came upon the chain of the large anchor, which tore up the windlass and freed the vessel from the anchor, and about the same time the current swept her off the rock. She began at once to drift down stream in the eddies which make rapidly from Negro Head Rock to the Bread and Cheese, a dangerous reef at the upper point of Blackwell's Island. While the sloop was on the rock her position had been observed by the persons on board the Sylvan Grove, a fast passenger steamboat engaged in making hourly trips between Peck-slip and Harlem, and her movement being seen while the steamboat was landing at Astoria, the landing was hastened and an extra man taken on board, and the steamboat started to rescue her. She was reached before she struck the Bread and Cheese, was at once boarded by some of the hands of the steamboat, and, lines being got, was towed out of danger and taken to Harlem Flats. The movement of the sloop from the rock had also been noticed by her crew, who, with the exception of her master—then absent in search of his owner—at once started out in their boat, but failed to reach the sloop until just as she began to move in tow of the steamboat. They then boarded her, and with her were taken to Harlem. The sloop sustained little or no injury while on the rock, and on being released from custody in this action proceeded on her voyage without repairs. These facts, which are not seriously questioned, present a clear case of salvage. The sloop when taken hold of by the steamboat had no one on board, and was drifting towards a dangerous shoal, where, if she had struck, the total loss of her cargo would have been almost certain and the vessel herself seriously injured if not destroyed. The testimony of the crew and others, greatly relied on by the claimant, to the effect that, in their opinion, the vessel would have been saved by her crew if the steamboat had not gone to her aid, although to be taken into account in fixing the amount of compensation as indicating the extent of the risk, does not take the case out of the rules applicable to cases of salvage. "A situation of actual apprehension, though not of actual danger, makes a case for salvage compensation:" (The Raikes, 1 Hagg. 247; The New Holland.) "Salvors," says Story, J., "are not to be driven out of court on the suggestion that if they had not touched a derelict ship, the latter might in some possible way have been saved from all calamity, and therefore the salvors have little or no merit:" (The Henry Eurbank, 1 Sumn. 401.) The case being, then, in my opinion, one for a salvage award, it remains to fix the amount. In during this I bear in mind that the whole doctrine of salvage rests upon considerations of public

I also take into consideration, on the one hand that the service in question was rendered timely; that it was performed by a steam-vessel; no steam-vessel was a passenger boat, at the time engaged in making a regular trip; that the vessel was one beset with dangers for sailing-vessels, steamboats of this class can often render 'ul and much-needed aid. On the other side, so that the steamboat was not detained so as to interfere with her next trip; that the service cost little labour or skill and no risk; that the vessel was near at hand, with a chance of being able without assistance to get their way into the true tide, and so to tow her up to the adjacent shore. How conditions like these have affected the decisions of Courts of Admiralty in awarding salvage, the cases, unnecessary to be cited here, will

As somewhat analogous to the present case, however, refer to the case of the Maryon (1847), where a brig had touched upon the Dutchman Bank, but shortly afterwards came off with loss of anchor, and then let anchor and hoisted a signal, and where the Court in awarding 300*l.* to a tug which went to her aid, said, "not only the present but the previous state of danger of the vessel rescued was considered." I also refer to the case of the Ocean, a schooner of 136 tons, which was towed off the shore in the Thames, where the Court awarded "in order to encourage steamers to assist when ashore in the Thames." (Shipping 1858.) After duly weighing, then, the considerations which the present case seems to present, my conclusion is that 300*l.* is the proper award to be made to these salvors, and I shall also award their costs, although, in view of the evidence to show that either under haste or a misapprehension on the part of the master of the boat, he caused the claim to be put in suit, it was in a fair way to be settled without suit, I might, were it not a case of salvage, be inclined to withhold them. But I find, on looking at the cases, that the considerations of public policy, which so largely affect every award of salvage, are overlooked in disposing of the question of costs.

Thus Dr. Lushington, in the case of the Edgar, 2 Mar. Law Cases, 220, when he dismissed the libel on the ground that no salvage had been performed, gave the libellants their costs "in order to recognize the meritoriousness of their intentions;" and in the case of the Countess of Arundell, 1 Mar. L. C. 154, the same learned Judge, when pronouncing in favour of a tender made by the salvors, declared the salvors to be entitled to costs. So, too, in the case of the Immaculate, a libel for salvage was dismissed without costs to the salvors, he cited, with approval, the words of Lord Stowell, that "if, as a general rule, sanctioned a decree (adverse to salvors) with it would discourage other salvors, a class of men not very able to comprehend these matters, and therefore would be likely to injure public interest." See also Coot's Pr p. 63. A decree must accordingly be entered in favour of the salvors for the sum of 300*l.*, and their costs to be taxed.

SCHMIDT v. BOYD (s)

Condition precedent.

To an action brought for the non-acceptance of a cargo of sugar, the defendant pleaded that his undertaking and promise were made and given subject to a proviso (which had not been complied with) that the sugars should be shipped in a first-class vessel:

Held, upon demurrer, that this was a condition precedent, the non-performance of which entitled the plaintiff to repudiate the contract.

The first count of the summons and plaint complained,

That heretofore in consideration that the plaintiff, at the request of the defendant, would purchase for the defendant, in parts beyond the sea, to wit, in Cuba, in the West Indies, certain goods, to wit, sugars, within certain limits as to quantity and price, and of a certain quality then specified by the defendant, and would ship the said goods for the defendant to a port of call, and for discharge to the United Kingdom, the defendant undertook and promised the plaintiff to accept the said goods on the arrival thereof in the United Kingdom, and to pay the freight for the carriage thereof from Cuba aforesaid, and to pay to the plaintiff all such moneys as the plaintiff should pay for the purchase of the said goods within the limits as to price as agreed on as aforesaid, together with the plaintiff's commission for and the usual and proper expenses to be incurred by them in and about the purchase and shipment of the said goods in manner aforesaid. And the plaintiff aver that pursuant to the defendant's said request, and relying on his said undertaking and promise, they did accordingly purchase for the defendant in Cuba aforesaid, certain sugar within the limits as to quantity and price, and of the quality so specified by the defendant as aforesaid. And the plaintiff then paid for the said sugar the price or sum of money as or for which they so purchased the same, and duly shipped the same for the defendant to a certain ship or vessel called S. P. Shaw, to a port of call and for discharge to the United Kingdom, and also incurred and paid diverse usual and proper expenses in and about the purchasing and shipment of the said sugar. And the said sugar afterwards duly arrived in the United Kingdom ready to be delivered to the defendant, of all which said premises the defendant had due notice, and the plaintiff were ready and willing and then offered to deliver the said sugar to the defendant, and all conditions were performed and fulfilled, and all things were done and happened, and all times elapsed necessary to enable the plaintiff to have the said sugar accepted by the defendant, and to be paid by the defendant the moneys so paid by the plaintiff for the purchase of the said sugar, together with the plaintiff's commission for and the usual and proper expenses incurred and paid by them in and about the purchasing and shipment of the said sugar as aforesaid. Yet the defendant, though he was thereto frequently requested, did not nor would accept the said sugar or any part thereof nor pay the freight for the carriage thereof from Cuba aforesaid, but wholly refused so to do, and did not or would pay to the plaintiff any part of the moneys paid by them for the purchase of the said sugar, or the plaintiff's commission for or the said expenses incurred and paid by them in and about the purchasing and shipment of the said sugar as aforesaid, but wholly refused so to do, whereby the plaintiff sustained great loss, and were obliged to sell and did sell the said sugar at a much lower price or sum of money than the price at which they had so purchased the same as aforesaid, and were also obliged to pay and did pay the said freight and diverse sums of money for insurance and expenses properly incurred in and about keeping the said sugar until so sold, and in and about such sale and incidental thereto, and in forwarding the said sugar to the purchasers thereof upon such sale, and by reason of the premises, the plaintiff were and are otherwise greatly injured, and they claim damages to the amount of 300*l.*

The second count complained,

That the defendant heretofore retained and employed the plaintiff, as the agents of the defendant, to purchase and ship for the defendant, to wit, in Cuba, in the West Indies, to one or two houses under general flag, one in 100 tons of sugar, say 200 to 250 tons, say 15 to 18 Dutch standard, at 5*h* 5*h* per cent of 185*h*, English cost and freight, other bounties 11 and 12 farthings, at proportionate rates, and 2*h* to 2*h* 10*h* cost and freight, to a port of call and for discharge in the United Kingdom, by first-class vessel or vessels with continental cargo of goods if profitable, at proportionate rates, upon the terms that the debt should accept the said sugars on the arrival thereof in the United Kingdom, and pay to the plea of such monies as the plea should pay for the purchase of the said sugars within the time aforesaid, and the said and proper expenses to be incurred by them in and about the purchasing and shipment thereof in manner aforesaid, together with the plea, commission for purchasing the same. And the plea ever that, as appears for the debt, they accordingly did purchase for the debt in Cuba aforesaid certain sugars in the quantities of the quantities, and within the time hereinbefore mentioned and as required by the debt as aforesaid. And the plea then paid for the said sugars the price or sum of money for which they purchased the same, and duly shipped the same in two bottoms under neutral flag that is to say a portion of the said sugars in a first-class ship or vessel called the A. F. Shaw and the remainder of the said sugars in a certain first-class ship or vessel called the Alto, as a part of call and for discharge in the United Kingdom, with authorized cargo or parts of proportionate rates. And the plea also incurred and paid divers usual and proper expenses in and about the purchasing and shipment of the said sugars in manner aforesaid. And the said sugars afterwards duly arrived in good order and condition in the said vessel respectively in a part in the United Kingdom, ready to be delivered to the debt, of all which and premises the debt had due notice. And the plea were ready and willing, and then offered to deliver the said sugars to the debt, and all conditions were performed and fulfilled, and all things were done and happened, and all things elapsed necessary to enable the plea to have the said sugars accepted by the debt, and to be paid by the debt the monies or paid by the plea, for the purchase of the said sugars, and the usual and proper expenses incurred and paid by the plea in and about the purchasing and shipment of the said sugars in manner aforesaid, together with the plea, commission for purchasing the same. And the plea say that the debt accepted and paid for that portion of said sugars which was shipped by the said vessel called the Alto, but although thereunto frequently requested, the debt did not nor would accept that portion of the said sugars which was shipped in the said vessel called the A. F. Shaw as aforesaid, or any part thereof, and did not would to the plea any part of the monies paid by them for the purchase of the same portion of the said sugars, or the plea, commission for the said expenses incurred and paid by them in and about the purchasing and shipment thereof as aforesaid, but wholly refused so to do, whereby the plea sustained great loss, and were obliged to sell and did sell, the same portions of the said sugars at a much lower price or sum of money than the price at which they had so purchased the same as aforesaid, and were also obliged to pay and did pay the freight thereof and divers sums of money for insurance and on prizes properly incurred in and about keeping the same portion of the said sugars until such sale and to and about such sale and incidental thereto, and in forwarding the same portion of said sugars to the purchasers thereof upon such sale, and by reason of the premises the plea were and are otherwise greatly injured, and they claim damages to the amount of £1000.

The third defence to the first count was as follows:

That the undertaking and promise of the debt to submit count mentioned were made and given under and subject to an express proviso and condition that the plea should and would ship the sugars in the said count mentioned by a first-class vessel or by first-class vessels, and ever as aforesaid, and the debt did not undertake or promise or alleged, and the debt avers that in breach of the aforesaid proviso and condition the plea did not ship the aforesaid sugars, or any part thereof, in a first-class vessel, or in first-class vessels, but on the contrary shipped the same and every part thereof in a certain vessel called the A. F. Shaw in the said count mentioned, which said vessel was not at the time of the said shipment by the plea, a first-class vessel, by reason whereof the debt, within a reasonable time in that behalf refused to accept the said sugars or pay for the same or for the freight, commission, or expenses in and about mentioned, as for the reasons aforesaid be lawfully might, which are the non-acceptance and non-payment to the said count complained of.

The fourth defence to the first count was as follows:

And by way of a fourth defence to the said first count the debt, by the like leave says that the sugars in the said count mentioned and purchased and shipped by the plea were not a clean the same as to quantity specified by the debt, as therein alleged, for the debt says that the quantity as specified by the debt as aforesaid, and so to be purchased and shipped by the plea, was a certain small quantity to wit, a quantity from 200 to 250 tons, and the debt avers that the quantity of the sugars which were purchased and shipped by the plea as in the said count mentioned was a certain very large and excessive quantity, much exceeding 250 tons, to wit, 550 tons, by reason whereof the debt refused to accept of pay for the said sugars, or to pay for the freight, commission, or expenses in and about mentioned, as for the reasons aforesaid be lawfully might, which are the non-acceptance and non-payment to the said count complained of.

To the second count the debt, pleaded, with others, the following defences:

1. And by way of a second defence to the said second count of the reasons and pleas, the debt, by leave of the court, says that the plea, in breach of their duty in that behalf did not ship the sugars in said count mentioned by first-class vessel or vessels, for the debt says that the plea shipped a large portion of the said sugars to wit, the Monrovia sugar in said count mentioned, in a certain vessel called the A. F. Shaw which was not then a first-class ship or vessel, and the debt, says that by reason of the aforesaid non-shipment and breach of duty of the plea, the debt within a reasonable time in that behalf refused to accept the said sugars as shipped as aforesaid from the plea, or to pay for the same, or to pay for the commission or expenses in the said count mentioned, which are the non-acceptance and non-payment thereof complained of, and the debt says that afterwards and before the acceptance of or payment for the portion of the said sugars which was shipped by the vessel called the Alto as in the said count mentioned, it was agreed by and between the plea and the debt, in consideration of the debt agreeing to accept and pay for the same portion of the said sugars, notwithstanding the aforesaid non-shipment and breach of duty of the plea, that the said sugars as shipped as aforesaid by the plea should be treated by the plea, and the debt, independently of the other portions of the said sugars shipped as aforesaid by the said A. F. Shaw, and the same were as treated accordingly and were accepted and paid for by the debt, with the consent of the plea, as an independent transaction, and without prejudice to the debt's right (if any) to refuse to accept the portion of the said sugars shipped as aforesaid by the said A. F. Shaw. 2. And by way of a third defence to the said second count the debt, by the like leave says that the sugars which were shipped by the plea in the vessel called the A. F. Shaw in the said count mentioned consisted wholly of Monrovia sugars, of which the debt had retained and employed the plea as to the said count mentioned, to purchase only a certain small quantity, to wit, 200 to 250 tons thereof (as in the said count mentioned), and ever as aforesaid the debt did not receive or employ the plea to accept to purchase Monrovia sugars, and the debt says that in breach of the said retainer and employment the plea purchased a certain large and excessive quantity of Monrovia sugars much exceeding the same, to wit, 550 tons, and shipped the same to the debt by the said vessel called the A. F. Shaw, by reason whereof the debt refused to accept the said Monrovia sugars as shipped in the A. F. Shaw, as aforesaid, or to pay to the plea the monies paid by the plea for the same or any commission or expenses concerned therewith, as for the reasons aforesaid be lawfully might, which are the non-acceptance and non-payment in the said count complained of, and the debt says that afterwards and before the acceptance of or payment for the portion of the said sugars which was shipped to the vessel called the Alto as in the said count mentioned, it was agreed by and between the plea and debt, in consideration of the debt agreeing to accept and pay for the same portions of the said sugars, notwithstanding the premises, that the said sugars as so aforesaid shipped by the plea should be treated by the plea, and the debt, independently of the other portions of the said sugars as shipped as aforesaid by the said A. F. Shaw, and the same were as treated accordingly and were accepted and paid for by the debt, with the consent of the plea, as an independent transaction, and without prejudice to the debt's right (if any) to refuse to accept the portion of the said sugars as shipped as aforesaid by the said A. F. Shaw. 3. And by way of a fourth defence to the said second count the debt, by the like leave says that after the retainer and employment of the plea by the debt in the said count mentioned, and before any breach thereof, it was mutually agreed by and between the plea and the debt that the aforesaid sugars and the Monrovia sugars in the said count mentioned should respectively be separately purchased and shipped by the plea for the debt, and should be separately paid for by the debt to the plea, and that the respective purchases and shipments thereof should be treated as separate, distinct, and independent transactions, and the debt says that thereafter the plea, in breach of their said retainer and employment, did not ship the Monrovia sugars aforesaid, being the sugars of which the non-acceptance by the debt is complained of in the said count, to the debt in a first-class ship or vessel, but shipped the same to a vessel called the A. F. Shaw which was not then a first-class vessel, by reason whereof the debt within a reasonable time in that behalf refused to accept the said Monrovia sugars as shipped to the A. F. Shaw as aforesaid, or pay for the same, or for commission or expenses concerned therewith, as be lawfully might, which are the non-acceptance and non-payment to the said count complained of. 4. And by way of a fifth defence to the said second count the debt, by the like leave, says that after the retainer and employment of the plea by the debt as in the said count mentioned, and before any breach thereof, it was mutually agreed by and between the plea and the debt, to manner and effect as in the last preceding defence is aforesaid, and the debt says that although be had retained and employed the plea to purchase and ship a certain small quantity to wit, 200 to 250 tons as in the said count mentioned, as to the said count mentioned, yet the plea, in breach of their said retainer and employment, purchased and shipped in the debt, to wit, to a vessel called the A. F. Shaw, a certain large and excessive quantity of the said Muscovado sugars, much exceeding 250 tons, to wit, 310 tons thereof, by reason whereof the deft. refused to accept the said Muscovado sugars so shipped as aforesaid, or to make any payment in respect thereof, which are the non-acceptance and nonpayment in the said second count complained of. And by way of a sixth defence to the said second count the deft., by the like leave, says that the sugars which the deft. refused to accept or make any payment in respect thereof were certain Muscovado sugars which purported to be shipped by the pta. in compliance with the deft.'s order to the pta. in said second count mentioned to ship from 200 to 250 tons good raffia Muscovado sugars at 77s per cwt., and the deft. says that the sugars which were accepted by the deft. as in said second count mentioned were certain clayed sugars which were shipped by the pta. in compliance with the deft.'s order to the pta. to ship from 200 to 250 tons clayed sugars, and which clayed sugars were all shipped on board the vessel called the Helo in said second count mentioned, and the deft. says that the said Muscovado sugars were all shipped on board the said vessel called the R. F. Shaw in said second count mentioned, and so portion thereof was shipped on board the Helo, and the deft. says that the said vessel called the R. F. Shaw in said count mentioned was not a first-class vessel as therein alleged, and the deft. for the said reason, within a reasonable time in that behalf refused to accept the said sugars shipped thereon by the pta. or make any payment on account thereof, which are the non-acceptance and nonpayment in the said count complained of.

The pta. obtained leave to reply and demur. The replications severally denied that the pleas demurred to were true in substance and fact. The pta. demurred to the third defence to the first count on the ground that what in the said defence was alleged to be an express proviso and condition was not a condition precedent, and because, having regard to the agreement between the pta. and the deft. in the said first count mentioned, it was immaterial for the purposes of this action whether the vessel called the R. F. Shaw in the said first count mentioned was a first-class vessel or not, and because the alleged breach did not go to the whole consideration for the deft.'s promise and undertaking, and was, if anything, a cause of action for the deft. against the pta., and not an answer to the cause of action in the said first count. To the fourth defence to the first count the pta. demurred, on the ground that it was not shown by the said defence that any substantial difficulty, or any expense, trouble, or risk was or would have been imposed on the deft. by the alleged circumstance that the quantity of sugars purchased and shipped by the pta. exceeded the quantity alleged to have been specified by the deft., and because the said alleged excess did not authorise the deft. to refuse the whole of the cargo, and refuse to make any payment to the pta., and because it was consistent with the said defence that the pta. were ready and willing and offered to deliver to the deft. the actual quantity alleged to have been specified by him, and that the deft. could have accepted that quantity without difficulty, expense, trouble, or risk. The pta. demurred to the other defences on similar grounds respectively, alleging in their demurrer to the second defence to the second count that the agreement in the said second count mentioned contained no condition precedent that the vessel in which the said sugars were to be so shipped should be a first-class vessel.

Andrews (with him Law, Q. C.) in support of the demurrer. First, that these sugars should be shipped in a first-class vessel was not a condition precedent. Secondly, the difference in the quantity does not excuse the deft. from accepting. Thirdly, the pta. did tender the deft. the very quantity of sugar contracted for. It is a long-established rule that where the nonperformance of an agreement on one side does not go to the whole of the other, then the remedy must be by cross-action in the nature of an action for damages: (Fraanklin v. Miller, 4 A. & E. 599.) It has been held that the court will look at a question of this kind in a common-sense view. A first-class vessel either means a vessel rated A 1 at Lloyd's, or it means a first-rate vessel in the sense in which we should speak of a first-rate horse. If the latter, a merchant in Havannah might think a vessel first-class which a merchant at home might not consider to be such. If it means a vessel classed as A 1 at Lloyd's, it might be that one morning, and the next morning it might be unclassified: (Stewers v. Curling, 3 Bing. N. C. 355.) It is not alleged here that any damage or what must occasion damage occurred. [MOWHAN, C.J.—Those are cases in which the party had received certain advantages which he could keep. Here the deft., by repudiating the contract, has received no benefit whatever.] There is a detriment to the one party here while the other goes entirely free. In the event of the market falling the deft. does get a benefit by having repudiated the contract. As to the defence of a different quantity of sugar, it amounts to this: that because the sugar came in company with sixty other tons of sugar, therefore the deft. refuses it. It is consistent with that defence that we offered the deft. the 250 tons. The deft. might as well say the sugar came along with rice or coffee. He should go on to show that some expense, some risk, or trouble was occasioned. [MOWHAN, C.J.—Where the party has accepted and retains the goods, he must show some damage or loss.] Rylands v. Whinney, 19 C. B. N. S. 351; Leng v. Green, 8 Ell. & Bl. 575, and 1 Ell. & E. 969, is distinguishable from the present case. It is a different thing if less than the quantity contracted for be sent: (Shannon v. Barlow, 15 Ir. C. L. R. 478.) As agent is not to act for his principal as a machine, but as a man having discretion: (Story on Agency.)

Macdonagh, Q. C. and Porter, for the deft., cited Bela v. Burness, 3 R. & B. 755;
Ollive v. Booker, 1 Ex. 474.

The warranty is a warranty that the vessel be A 1 at the time, not that she should continue to be so; and the meaning lies in this—that the rates of insurance are in the inverse ratio. The present case is stronger, as being not one of vendor and vendee, but one of principal and agent.

Law, Q. C. in reply, cited Hord v. Grace, 5 L. T. Rep. N. S. 360. The dictum in Bela v. Burness is confined to a particular class of cases.

The case was adjourned in order to admit of certain suggested amendments of the pleadings being made. The parties having failed to agree as to the amendments, the Court gave judgment on the demurrer.

May 28.—MOWHAN, C. J. said that both himself and Keogh, J. were clearly of opinion that this was a condition precedent, and that the other defences were good, and therefore there must be judgment for the deft.

CURRAW V. WOOD AND ANOTHER.

Liability of owners of ship for goods ordered by the master.

and an undertaking to pay given by the master, the value of the goods cannot be recovered from the owners of the ship.

Action for goods sold and delivered.

Plea, never indebted.

This action was brought to recover the value of certain clothes which plt. had supplied to the crew of a ship called the Edward Herbert, the property of the defts.

It appeared that the Edward Herbert had been out at sea for rather more than nine months, and that during the voyage the crew's stock of clothes had become very much exhausted. They had to call at Queenstown on the way home to receive orders as to their ultimate destination; and while they were there the plt. came on board. As the men were so badly off for clothes, the master of the ship gave orders to plt. to supply them to the crew (consisting of thirteen seamen), and told him that either he himself or the owners would remit the money as soon as they got to Liverpool, where the owners resided; and it appeared that at the same time the master had given a stamped written undertaking in his own name for the price of the clothes supplied. Plt. supplied the crew with clothes to the amount of 64*l.* 9*s.*; and he now sought to recover that sum from the owners of the Edward Herbert.

The master of the ship was called and gave evidence in support of the above. He also said that after they got to Liverpool he saw Mr. Coghill (who was the same as the defts.); that he showed him the seamen's wages book, in which there were entries about the clothes, and told him that the men had been supplied with the clothes that appeared against their names in the book. When the accounts were made out deductions were made for the clothes, and the seamen were paid their wages, less these deductions, and signed the receipts for them in full, in accordance with the provisions of the Merchant Shipping Act. He afterwards sent in an account of his own disbursements.

In cross-examination he stated that he never mentioned plt.'s name to Coghill before the men were paid off; that in the account of disbursements he had taken credit for the sums against the men's names for the clothes; and that he had given a note of hand or undertaking to the plt. for the amount of the clothes.

In re-examination he said, "I cannot say that I ever mentioned the name of the man who supplied the clothes to the men before they were paid off."

The undertaking of the master was called for and put in. It bore a penny stamp, and some doubt was expressed by the associate as to its being admissible as evidence without being stamped as a bill of exchange. His Lordship, after referring to the Acts, held that the penny stamp was sufficient to admit it as a promissory note.

This being the whole of plt.'s evidence,

C. Russell, for the defts., submitted that there was no case.

Aspinall, Q. C. (with him R. G. Williams) for the plt. submitted that there was some evidence to go to the jury on the count for goods sold and delivered. While the vessel was lying in Queenstown the master must be taken to be there as the captain, and as such he could do what the owners might afterwards ratify and make their own act, and so become themselves liable for it. The case was just the same as if, while in some foreign port, the crew had asked for wages and the master had advanced money to the men, in which case the owners would be liable to refund it to him. If the master makes a purchase for the crew and the owners take the benefit of that purchase, they are liable for it.

BRAMWELL, B.—I am of opinion that there is no evidence to go to the jury. The case seems to me to be very plain. The captain may be liable to the plt. for these goods, but I see no evidence to connect the defts. with them. The effect of these accounts seems to me to be this: "I have advanced so much money to the men, and I charge you with it." From these the defts. were well warranted in thinking that the captain was responsible to the plt., and were he to recover against them they would be paying for the clothes twice over. I am prepared either to nonsuit the plt. or to direct a verdict for defts.

Plt. elected to be nonsuited.

ADMIRALTY COURT.

Tuesday, May 1, 1866.

THE PHANTOM.

Salvage appeal—Inequitable agreement.

The court will set aside an agreement by salvors who about to perform a salvage service, if it be inequitable.

*An agreement to pay 8*s.* 6*d.* for salvage services when there is real danger is futile.*

This was an appeal from the decision of two justices at Lowestoft. The Phantom, a small vessel, worth about 700*l.*, had taken refuge in the harbour of Lowestoft, from a gale from the N.N.E. To escape the danger of collision with other vessels rushing in, the master of the Phantom hired the services of the apps., seven beachmen of Lowestoft, to tow her from the south to the north side of the harbour; while effecting this a brig came into collision with the Phantom, and the apps. encountered considerable danger from the falling masts and spars.

It was asserted on the part of the resp., but denied by the apps., that there was an agreement to perform the service for 8*s.* 6*d.*

The magistrates held, "That it was not a case of salvage at all, and had no ingredient of salvage in it—there was no danger, no great risk; it was true that there was a collision, but that had nothing to do with danger." They dismissed the case with costs against the applicants. From their decision the salvors now appealed.

Vernon Lushington for apps.

Clarkson for resp.

Dr. LUSHINGTON gave judgment as follows:—I have nothing to do with the constitution of the tribunal before which the case was originally brought. The Legislature, in their wisdom, thought fit to establish it, and to give jurisdiction to magistrates on salvage, and I presume always they do their best to discharge their duty; and I must go further, and say that it must never be the disposition of this court to reverse the judgment of the court below unless satisfied it is erroneous; but, at the same time, if satisfied it is erroneous, it should never scruple for one single moment to discharge its own duty. Let us look at the facts of the case. I will speak of the alleged agreement presently. It is admitted on all hands there was a gale of wind at the time; and it is admitted that a great many vessels endeavoured to enter the narrow harbour of Lowestoft in a state of safety; that they were coming in, to use an ordinary expression, well-manned.

to save the inclemency of the weather, and were in a state of considerable danger. The Phantom came in not only in consequence of the state of the weather, but also, as mentioned by her master, because she had broken her boom. In she came, and she was not in that part of the harbour in which it was considered consistent with safety to remain, and for this obvious reason, she was at the entrance of the harbour, on the south side, and if she had remained there she was exposed to the chance of coming in contact with the other vessels which were rushing in. Under these circumstances her master was desirous that she should be removed to another and safer berth; and the question is, whether the assistance which was rendered by the appa. partakes of the nature of salvage, and whether they are entitled to any reward, or whether they are excepted by the agreement of 8s. 6d. As far as I make out from the evidence, in the first instance they took a small rope, which was not sufficient for the purpose; but they afterwards took a larger rope, which I think is described as being a three-inch warp, for the purpose of effecting the object of removing the vessel to the place desired. At or about that time—the evidence is not specific—a collision happens, which has been commented upon, and it has been said for the resp. that, with reference to that collision, the boatmen had nothing to do with it; that it did not increase their labours or augment the difficulty they had to encounter; but I am of opinion that it is a very powerful reason to show the risk to which the vessel was exposed. The original reason why the vessel was moved—which was the danger from vessels entering the harbour, not anticipated danger, but that which took place—shows it was a matter of importance that the vessel should be moved from the place where she was to a place of greater safety. It appears to me that is perfectly clear. After the collision what occurred? They were employed by the master to cut away the bowsprit, which was damaged, and that being done, they completed their task. I believe that to be a fair statement of what actually was done, and all the occurrences of the case. I am of opinion that it is not necessary there should be absolute danger in order to constitute a salvage service; it is sufficient if there is a state of difficulty and reasonable apprehension. There might be danger of further difficulty occurring, and I think it is proved in this case, from the facts to which I have adverted, that it was a matter of importance for the vessel to be moved; that she was, while she lay where she did, in reasonable apprehension of danger, and that reasonable apprehension was fulfilled by the accident that occurred. Certainly it is not a service of any importance, but I cannot bring my mind to the conclusion that it is a service to be ignored altogether, more especially if it is consistent with truth; and I do not find it denied that other vessels there were in collision, and that masts and spars were falling on all sides, and that there was risk to the asserted salvors in the service performed. I think there was a risk of that description. Now, seeing the state of the facts, let us see what the judgment is, and whether I can adhere to it. The magistrates say, "We think this is not a case of salvage at all; there is not one single ingredient of salvage in it." I must take the liberty of differing from those gentlemen, for I think there was, and I think the removing of a vessel from apprehended danger and real danger does partake of the character of salvage service. They say, "The smack was not in a state of danger. She was in collision with another vessel it is true, but that has nothing to do with danger, nothing whatever." Well, we are in the habit of considering collisions, but it is the first case, in my apprehension, that has ever occurred since I have sat here in which a collision can be said to have nothing to do with danger. Whatever else happens it appears to me that, more or less, there is a certain degree of risk from collision. Then they say further, "There was no great risk in what you did." I do not know that it is necessary to constitute a salvage service that there should be great risk, but if persons perform a duty of this description and incur any risk at all, certainly that circumstance ought to be considered, and there ought to be remuneration. "Therefore we dismiss the case altogether," and they make the applicants pay the costs. Now, unless there was a valid agreement binding upon the parties, I certainly think it would be the duty of the court to overrule this judgment for the reasons I have shortly specified. Is it a valid agreement? It is this, that when the vessel first came in, and when the salvors came and offered their assistance, they inquired whether there was anything they could do, and the master answered, according to his own account, that though he was not very particular, still, says he, "I will take you and give you 8s. 6d." No doubt he swears that the agreement was for 8s. 6d. I will assume what he swears about the agreement is true. There is another matter in all agreements when salvors are going to perform a duty—whether the agreement is just and equitable; because, if it is not, however much it has been agreed upon by both parties, the court is in the habit of overruling such an agreement if it is unjust and inequitable. Looking at the storm, seeing the vessel came in in consequence of it, and was moved by reason of danger apprehended which proved to be real, I think the amount of 8s. 6d. utterly futile, and for these reasons I shall overrule the judgment. I think it is a service that requires a small sum of money, and I shall give 10*l*. and costs.

Wages and disbursements—Legal expenses and penalties.

Held, in a suit for wages and disbursements on an appeal from the registrar and merchants that the owners must pay the legal expenses incurred by the master in defending himself from a false charge brought as a consequence of the discharge of his duty.

And that when a master forfeits his recognisance to present on a charge of perjury, for the interest of his owners, they are liable for the amount.

This was a motion in the nature of an appeal on the part of the owner of the James Seddon from the report of the registrar and merchants, in a suit for wages and disbursements brought by R. C. Joffares, late master of that ship. It appeared that while at Bombay, he had refused their discharges to two of his men. He found it necessary to log one or both of them in consequence of bad conduct, whereupon they vowed vengeance. He ultimately discharged that at Coconato they then brought a charge of murder against him, accusing him of intentionally causing the death of a man who had fallen in and been drowned when working on a stage on the ship's side. After a full trial he was acquitted, and bound over under a penalty of 10*l*. to prosecute the men for perjury. However, before the trial, the vessel had her cargo on board, which was very valuable, and was ready to sail, and the agents and there urged the master to sail and collect his recognisance, which he did.

ADM.]

THE JAMES SEDDON.

[ADM.]

The registrar and merchants had allowed the master's expenses in defending himself from the charge, also the 10*l.* forfeit. To this decision the deft. now objected.

Brett, Q. C. (Butt with him) argued that these expenses were not on account of or for the benefit of the principal, and were not losses which directly and naturally followed from the execution of the agency.

Milward, Q. C. (Waddy with him), for the plt., contended that it was the master's duty to stick to the ship, and it was the owner's interest that he be enabled to do so. The master, in defending himself, executed a duty to his owners; he was necessary to bring the ship back. The claim for 10*l.* was made by the agents, who paid it. They had also paid the law expenses.

Dr. LUSHINGTON.—The sole question before the court is as to two items in the report of the registrar and merchants, and those items are substantially objected to on the ground that they were expenses incurred beyond the province of the master, and beyond the right which he could exercise as agent of the owners. With regard to the extent of the agency of a master in the employ of his owners, it would be next to impossible to come to anything like a definition; indeed, I believe absolutely impossible. There are certain broad limits with which we are all well acquainted, within which the owners would never be responsible for the acts of the master; acts done by the master in cases where he has not a shadow of authority to interfere; and cases also of misconduct, where it is abundantly clear, though grievous damage is done to others, yet the owners are not responsible. I remember a case which occurred in the Mersey, where the master of a tug, having been disappointed by a refusal of employment, absolutely went straight at the vessel in question and ran her down purposely. That case came before me, the owner of the vessel, which was an American, having sued in this court on account of the damage done. I was under the necessity of refusing to entertain the suit, because that which was done was an outrage committed, not in the performance of any duty whatever, but an act of vengeance in consequence of a disappointment. I apprehend that is the principle acted upon not only here, but in other courts, exactly on the same grounds. In the Gratitudine, which was a question of agency, Lord Stowell said the master is not the agent of the cargo, but circumstances may occur which necessarily impose upon him the duty of fulfilling the part of agent of the owner of the cargo. That I apprehend to be good sound law, good common sense, and generally for the benefit of the mercantile interests of the country. No one doubts it is a settled question of law that it is the duty of the master to enforce discipline, or that that is for the convenience and advantage of owners, and is for the protection of the mercantile interests of the country. Let us look at the facts. There had been some disputes on board this vessel, and there were two men whom the master had refused to discharge, and who manifestly entertained a spite against him, and took advantage, in consequence of that spite, of an accidental occurrence, where a man unfortunately lost his life overboard, to bring a charge of murder against the master. In the first instance, I apprehend that the causing these men to be censured and chastised for their insubordination was part of the bounden duty of the master; having fulfilled this duty, out of the performance of it comes manufactured a false charge. I differ entirely from the argument of Mr. Brett, that this is a remote and not a direct cause. The very cause which originated the charge against the master was the performance of his own duty in correcting these very men for their misconduct, and the false charge emanated instantly from it, and there were no intervening circumstances whatsoever which could cause it to be considered remote. Then the charge was made against him, and it takes the shape of a prosecution, as I understand it, for murder, and large expenses are incurred by the captain in defending himself against this false charge. What is that but defending himself against the consequences of the performance of his own duty, and which if he had not performed he would have been greatly to blame? For he would have been to blame if he had allowed any dereliction of duty from fear of the consequences to himself should any false charge be preferred against him. In the state of the commerce of this kingdom at present you must not look with too close an eye to what duties are discharged by masters on board vessels. When voyages now, out and home, comprehend sometimes two, three, and four years, and when the cargoes with which those ships are laden are 100,000*l.* or 200,000*l.*, you must not fetter your masters too closely; and I say that the expenses now objected to were actually incurred for the benefit and advantage of the owners themselves. For what would have been the consequence? The master must have been incarcerated; he would not have been protected in any way against the false evidence brought against him; and even the temporary absence of the master in those distant countries would have been attended with great disadvantage and serious inconvenience to the owners themselves. I entertain no doubt whatever of this. Far be it from me to say I would encourage a master in assuming to himself an authority the law does not confer upon him; but if I see the necessity of the case, the convenience of the case, and the discharge of duty, are all united in one transaction, it is also my duty to support a master that he may not incur any expenses individually on account of having so acted. I have no doubt whatever about this first item, and I rely upon the grounds I have taken in support of it. Now I come to the petty affair of 10*l.*, and I confess I am surprised, in a case like this of a valuable ship and cargo, that the time of the registrar and merchants, which is very valuable, should have been wasted in discussing this question, and at the arguments brought forward about the violation of the law and morality. The master entered into an arrangement for 10*l.* to appear to prosecute these men for perjury when his personal appearance to prosecute would have caused him delay nobody knows how many weeks or days with a cargo of 100,000*l.* It is really making a molehill into a mountain to say there was any violation of the laws of the country which by possibility could have stood between him and the interests of his owners, and more especially the interests of the owners supported as they were by the agents of those very owners. What has become of it all? The penalty is paid instead of the duty of prosecuting being fulfilled. I have no hesitation in affirming the judgment of the registrar and merchants; and I must add, it is not merely the judgment of the registrar on which I rely, but here are merchants of great skill and practical knowledge, who well know the interests of shipowners in this country, and who have given their fiat of approbation to these expenses; and I believe that among the shipowners in this country there will be found very few indeed who would quarrel with the allowance of the expenses in this report. I confirm the report with costs.

THE CARGO EX HONOR.

Alleged salvage service by agents—Tender in time—Costs.

Where it is difficult to draw a distinction between salvage and agency services, the court will under particular circumstances allow the claims for each to be combined.

But where a sum sufficient according to the merits of the case, whether it be salvage or agency, has been tendered before suit, the claims were dismissed with costs.

This was a cause of salvage instituted by Messrs. Dewdney and Collier, ship agents of Brixham, against the cargo lately of the brigantine Honor and the owners of the cargo, for services rendered in landing a cargo of flour from this vessel which had been stranded on the 10th Jan. 1866, in Brixham Bay. The cause was heard on the 10th July. The facts are fully set out in the judgment, given on July 31.

Brett, Q. C. and E. C. Clarkson for plts.

Milward, Q. C. and Vernon Lushington for defts.

DR. LUSHINGTON.—This is a salvage suit instituted by Messrs. Collier and Dewdney, ship agents at Brixham, against the cargo of the brigantine Honor. On the 10th Jan. in the present year, the Honor laden with a cargo of flour, was stranded in Brixham Bay, at the back of the breakwater. The crew all got ashore, but it was found impossible to get the vessel off. On the 12th the master went to the office of the plts., for what purpose—whether or not, as stated in the answer, to note his protest there—does not appear, for Mr. Collier, who was present on the occasion, was not placed in the witness-box; but of this there is no doubt, that, being at the office, the master requested the plts. to send down men, taking them off from other work on which they were engaged. Before the cargo could be touched the plts. entered into the usual bond with the Custom-house authorities. In the first instance there was some difficulty, and possibly some risk, in getting on board the vessel by means of a rope connecting the vessel and the shore; subsequently a staging was erected from the breakwater to the Honor, and this enabled the men to proceed with the work of unloading the cargo regularly, and I may say with safety. They worked with but little intermission for five consecutive days and nights, and received from the plts. payment at the rate generally of 5s. each per tide. At times the vessel rolled about, and on one occasion two men slipped overboard, but were at once rescued. Eventually the vessel became a wreck. The cargo was abandoned to the insurers, the Thames and Mersey Insurance Company (Limited); and on Monday the 15th Jan., that is, after part of the cargo had been got out, Mr. Touzel, of Liverpool, arrived at Brixham to act on their behalf, and the bills of lading were forwarded to him from the owner of the cargo. Various attempts were made in the first instance to have the cargo sold by private contract by Messrs. Collier and Dewdney, and also by a Mr. Smith, and it appears that a discussion arose between Messrs. Dewdney and Collier on one hand, and Mr. Smith on the other, as to whether Mr. Smith, in case he should effect the sale, should be obliged to give half his commission to Messrs. Dewdney and Collier. In this discussion Mr. Dewdney certainly took an active part on behalf of his firm. Eventually, no private offers having been made which were considered satisfactory, Mr. Touzel placed the cargo in the hands of Mr. Smith to sell by public auction, upon the condition to which Mr. Smith acceded, that he should give half his commission to Messrs. Collier and Dewdney. I should here mention that Mr. Collier has a separate business of public auctioneer, in which Mr. Dewdney, his partner in the ship agency business, has no share. Mr. Smith accordingly, on the 3rd Feb., conducted the sale, which produced 2200*l.* On the 5th, Messrs. Collier and Dewdney, as agents for the consignees and underwriters of the Honor's cargo, wrote to ask him for an account of the sale. On the same day Mr. Smith gave to Collier a cheque for 50*l.*, in favour of Messrs. Collier, Dewdney, and Vittery, and Collier gave him a receipt in full at the bottom of the account, which was furnished to him by Mr. Smith, and which was headed by the words "R. W. Smith having offered to give up one-half of the commission on the sale of flour ex Honor, on the Breakwater, Feb. 3, to Messrs. Vittery, Collier, and Dewdney." Mr. Vittery is the banker of the firm of the plts., and a relation to one of them. Why his name was mixed up in the transaction he himself could not explain, but Mr. Smith accounted for it by saying that it was not unusual for auctioneers to give a share of their commission to the persons introducing them to the business, and that, as it was at Mr. Vittery's office where the arrangements for the sale of the cargo had first been made, he inserted Mr. Vittery's name in the account, and in the cheque. Mr. Dewdney, in his examination, deposed that he had not received, and did not expect to receive, any part of this 50*l.*; and that he told Mr. Touzel that he had nothing to do with Mr. Collier's business as a public auctioneer. Mr. Collier himself, who, of course, could furnish a complete account of the transaction, was not called. Under these circumstances, and looking especially to what Mr. Dewdney had previously done respecting the commission from the then anticipated private auction, and to the fact that Mr. Collier had nothing whatever personally to do with conducting the public auction, I must hold that this 50*l.* was caused by Mr. Touzel to be paid as a bonus to the firm of Collier and Dewdney. The sale took place, as I have said, on Saturday, the 3rd Feb. Mr. Touzel had repeatedly asked the plts. for their account, but it was not delivered till the sale was actually going on, and therefore could not be examined at the time. But that it had been intended that the amount should be paid before the sale is clear from one of the conditions, which was, that each lot should be at the risk of the purchaser immediately after the sale, and was to be removed at his expense, and if not paid for and taken charge of before six o'clock in the afternoon of the day of sale, the vendor was to be at liberty to resell the same. Mr. Dewdney himself bid for some of the lots. After the sale was over, Mr. Touzel examined the account of the plts., which was as follows: "The consignees and owners of the cargo of flour of the brigantine Honor, debtors to Collier and Dewdney for disbursements and expenses on said cargo. 1866, January, paid labour discharging cargo, 104*l.* 8s. 6*d.*; Baxter, for rent of yard, 6*l.*; survey on cargo, 3*l.* 3s.; harbour dues, 15*l.* 15s. 7½*d.*; commission and expenses attending saving cargo, and advances, correspondences, and postages, 125*l.*; duty, 96*l.* 6s. 7*d.* Total, 350*l.* 13s. 8½*d.* Two of the items in this bill, viz., harbour dues, 15*l.* 15s. 7½*d.*, and duty, 96*l.* 6s. 7*d.*, were, together with an additional 2*l.* 0s. 4*d.* (demanded by the officers of the customs), in the first instance paid by the plts., but at the request of Mr. Touzel they withdrew their cheque, and he paid the money himself. The object of this was to save the commission that would be payable to the plts. for making the disbursement. Mr. Touzel was there, supplied with money for the express purpose of paying what was necessary, and therefore there was no need for him to employ another person. Mr. Dewdney, however, swears that his firm withdrew the cheque only upon the express promise of Mr. Tousel that he would pay the rest of their account as delivered. Mr. Tousel refused to pay the item of 125*l.* for commission and expenses attending saving cargo, and advances, correspondence, and postage. This commission was 5 per cent. upon the supposed value of the cargo. Mr. Tousel offered to pay the plta. the rest of their bill, and to pay the 125*l.* into the bank of Mr. Vitorry, but this offer was refused. On Tuesday, Feb. 6, the plta. wrote to Mr. Tousel to say that, unless their demand was satisfied, they would institute proceedings, and forthwith, according to Mr. Dewdney, they telegraph to London to arrest the cargo. On the same day Mr. Tousel went to Plymouth, and took legal advice, and on the following day, Wednesday the 7th, offered 150*l.* in gold. But the offer was refused, Mr. Dewdney saying, "All, or none." And on the same day, Wednesday the 7th, the plta. instituted this action for salvage, and they arrested the cargo in no less a sum than 1800*l.* Subsequently they released it upon bail to the amount of 1000*l.* The defts. have paid 150*l.* into court. With regard to the claim of the plta. to be considered salvors, it is clear that they were not volunteers in the matter, they were engaged by the master; and whether the master in so engaging them was acting for the owners of the cargo is quite immaterial. Nor did the plta. incur any personal risk, if, indeed, any serious risk was incurred by anybody. Until they instituted the present suit the plta. seem never to have made a claim as salvors. Both in their letter to Mr. Smith, calling upon him for an account of the sale, and in the account which they themselves submitted to the defts., they professed to be acting as agents for the consignees and owners of the cargo. It certainly would open the door to abuse if ship agents were encouraged first to send in charges in their character of ship agents, and then when those charges are disputed to turn round and assert themselves salvors. On the other hand it would be unjust that for extraordinary services the remuneration should be restricted to the ordinary commission allowed to ship agents, 5 per cent. upon disbursements. The truth is, that in cases like the present, where ship agents are employed to discharge a cargo from a vessel wrecked on a beach, it becomes a matter of nicety to draw the line between salvage and agency services. For this reason, the court, on previous occasions, has entertained similar applications to the present: The Favorita, 2 W. Rob. 255; The Purissima Concepcion, 3 W. Rob. 181. In the case of the Purissima Concepcion, the Court went very fully into the question, and I think it not necessary to occupy time in stating it with more particularity, but the result of it was this, that the court would allow a claim as agent and a claim as salvors to be united and combined under particular circumstances. If the court had not done that, and had attempted to draw the line in all cases where agency was claimed, assistance would have been refused, and it would have led to mischievous consequences. I shall not therefore refuse to consider the merits of the case. It turns out that the actual disbursements of the plta. were rather greater than they at first supposed, and amounted to 119*l.* 8*s.* 3*d.* The defts. have paid through Mr. Smith 50*l.*, and have paid into court 150*l.*, altogether 200*l.*, that is 80*l.* odd in excess of the disbursements of the plta. It seems to me that, looking at the character of the services performed and to the fact that the plta. incurred no personal risk, 80*l.* is sufficient remuneration to the plta., whether those services are considered to partake more of the character of salvage service or more of the character of agency services. The demand of 125*l.* made by the plta. is, in my opinion, exorbitant. My judgment was therefore for the defts., and, as they made a legal and sufficient tender in proper time to prevent the litigation, with costs.

BANDMAN AND OTHERS v. SOUZA AND OTHERS.

Shipment of goods—Damage by bad stowage—Liability.

A vessel, the Village Belle, went out to Oporto under a charter-party entered into between her master on behalf of the owners and a Mr. H., by which the master contracted at Oporto from the factors of the affrigher's full cargo of wine or other merchandise, and to carry the same to a safe port in the United Kingdom. The cargo was "to be brought to and taken from alongside the vessel at the merchant's risk and expense." The captain was "to sign bills of lading at any rate of freight without prejudice to the charterer." The ship was to be addressed to the charterer's agents at Oporto "on the usual terms." The ship accordingly proceeded to Oporto, consigned to the agents of the charterer. She was by them put up as a general ship, but without its being at all made known that the vessel was only charter. The plta. delivered their goods on board without any knowledge that the ship was not entirely at the disposal of the owners. Bills of lading for the goods in question were signed by the master in the usual form. The cargo was stowed by stowmen employed and paid by the charterer's agents, but the amount so paid by the latter was repaid to them by the master. The goods having been damaged by reason of improper stowage, the plta. brought their action against the defts. as owners of the vessel:

Held, that the plta. having delivered their goods to be carried in ignorance of the vessel being chartered, and having dealt with the master as clothed with the authority of a master to receive goods and give bills of lading on behalf of his owners, were entitled to look to the owners as responsible for the safe carriage of the goods.

This case was tried before Cockburn, C.J., at the sittings after Trinity Term 1864, at Guildhall, when a verdict was returned for the plta., with leave to the defts. to move to enter it for them. The action was brought against the owners of a vessel called the Village Belle, to recover damages for injuries done to goods in their transit to England in consequence of bad stowage.

A rule accordingly having been obtained to enter the verdict for the defts., Brett, Q. C. and Gresh showed cause.

Cur. adv. vult.

The facts and arguments sufficiently appear in the following judgment.

COCKBURN, C.J.—This is a case which was argued before my brothers Mellor and Stree and myself. The action is brought against the defts., who are the owners of the ship, the Village Belle, for bad stowage and loss occasioned by bad stowage to certain goods shipped in that vessel by the plta. The facts upon which the case turns are as follows:—The Village Belle went out to Oporto under a charter-party entered into between her master on behalf of the owners, and a Mr. Hodgson, by which the master contracted at Oporto from the factors of the affreighter a full cargo of wine, or other merchandise, and to carry the same to a safe port in the United Kingdom. Should the cargo consist of wine, the freight was to be 18s. per tun of 252 gallons. Should other goods than wine be shipped, the freight was to be at the same rate on the quantity of wine the vessel would have carried. The cargo was "to be brought to and taken from alongside the vessel at the merchant's risk and expense." The captain was "to sign bills of lading at any rate of freight, without prejudice to the charterer." The ship was "to be addressed to the charterer's agents at Oporto on the usual terms." The ship accordingly proceeded to Oporto consigned to the agents of the charterer. She was by them put up as a general ship, but without its being at all made known that the vessel was under charter. The plts. delivered their goods on board, without any knowledge that the ship was not entirely at the disposal of the owners; bills of lading for the goods in question were signed by the master in the usual form. The cargo was stowed by stevedores, employed and paid by the charterer's agents, but the amount so paid by the latter was repaid to them by the master. The goods having been damaged by reason of improper stowage, the plts. have brought their action against the defts. as owners of the vessel; and the question is, whether the defts. under the circumstances stated are liable. We are of opinion that they are liable, and that the action against them lies. On the argument it was contended on behalf of the defts. that, as the use of the ship had been made over to the charterer, Hodgson, and the ship had been put up as a general ship by his agents, and the bills of lading had been given by the captain in furtherance of a contract for freight of which the charterer was to have the benefit, the captain must be considered as having given the bills of lading as the agent of the charterer, and the contract as having been made with the latter and not with the defts., the owners of the vessel; and that consequently the charterer was alone responsible for the negligent stowing of the goods in question. It is unnecessary to decide whether the charterer would or would not have been liable if an action had, under these circumstances, been brought against him. Our judgment proceeds on a ground wholly irrespective of the question of the charterer's liability, and not inconsistent with it, namely, that the plts. having delivered their goods to be carried, in ignorance of the vessel being chartered, and having dealt with the master as clothed with the authority of a master to receive goods and give bills of lading on behalf of his owners, are entitled to look to the owners as responsible for the safe carriage of the goods. The result of the authorities from Parish v. Crawford, 2 Str. 1241 downwards, Abbott on Merchant Shipping, and more especially the case of Newberry v. Colvin, in 7 Bing. 190, in which the judgment of the Court of Ex. Ch., reversing the judgment of the Court of Q. B., was affirmed on appeal by the H. of L., established the position that, in construing a charter party with reference to the liability of the owners of the chartered ship, it is necessary to look at the charter-party to see whether it operates as a demise of the ship itself, to which the services of the master and the crew may or may not be superadded, or whether all that the charterer acquires by the terms of the instrument is the right to have his goods conveyed by the particular vessel, and, as subsidiary thereto, to have the use of the vessel and the services of the master and the crew. In the first case, the charterer becomes for the time the owner of the vessel; the master and crew become to all intents and purposes his servants, and through them the possession of the ship is in him. In the second, notwithstanding the temporary right of the charterer to have his goods loaded and conveyed in the vessel, the ownership remains in the original owners, and through the master and the crew, who continued to be their servants, the possession of the ship remains also in them. If the master, by the agreement of his owners and the charterer, acquires authority to sign bills of lading on behalf of the latter, he nevertheless remains in all other respects the servant of the owners; in other words, he retains that relation to his owners out of which, by the law merchant, arises the authority to sign bills of lading, by which the owners will be bound. It appears to us clear that the charter-party in the present instance falls under the second of the two classes referred to. There is here no demise of the ship itself, either expressed or implied. It amounts to no more than a grant to the charterer of the right to have his cargo brought home in the ship, while the ship itself continues, through the master and the crew, in the possession of the owners, the master and the crew remaining their servants. It is on this ground that our judgment is sustained. We think that so long as the relation of the owners and master continues, the latter, as regards the parties who ship goods in ignorance of any arrangement whereby the authority ordinarily incidental to that relation is affected, must be taken to have authority to bind his owners by giving bills of lading. We proceed upon the well-known principle that where a party allows another to appear before the world as his agent in any given capacity, he must be liable to any party who contracts with such apparent agent in a matter within the scope of such agency. The master of a vessel has by law authority to sign bills of lading on behalf of his owners. A person shipping goods on board a vessel, unaware that the vessel has been chartered to another, is warranted in assuming that the master is acting by virtue of his ordinary authority, and is therefore acting for his owners in signing bills of lading. It may be that, as between the owner, the master, and the charterer, the authority of the master is to sign bills of lading on behalf of the charterers only, and not of the owners. But, in our judgment, this altered state of the master's authority will not affect the liability of the owners, whose servant the master still remains, clothed with a character to which the authority to bind the owners by signing bills of lading attaches by virtue of his office. We think that, until the fact that his authority has been put an end to is brought to the knowledge of the shipper of goods, the latter has a right to look to the owner as the principal with whom the contract has been made. In Newberry v. Colvin, 7 Bing. 190, Tindal C. J., in delivering the judgment of the court, observes that the finding of the jury that the charter-party was not known to the shipper "negatives any inference that would otherwise have arisen that the master, by reason of his command of the vessel, was held out by the defts. as their agent in the conduct and management of the ship, as they knew the real situation and relative rights of the captain and the owners before they put their goods on board to be carried on that voyage." From this language it may be inferred that, had this material circumstance existed in that case, the decision might have differed, even though the Court there held that there had been a demise of the ship. In the case of the St. Cloud, in Browning and Lushington's Reports, which was recently before the Court of Admiralty, but which was not referred to on the argument before us, Dr. Lushington, a very high authority on such a matter, on a charter-party substantially the same as the present, and where the goods had been shipped in ignorance that the vessel was under charter, held the owners liable on bills of lading signed by the master. After referring as to the effect of the charter-party to Schuster v. McClellan, 7 El. & Bl. 723, he goes on to say: "But there is an important distinction in this case. The shipper is not proved to have had notice of the charter-party. Until he had such notice he would be justified in supposing that, in dealing with the master for the carriage of the goods, he was dealing with the owners' agent, for prima facie the master is the agent of the owners of the ship. I cannot think that it is consistent with justice, or according to the ordinary mercantile practice, that a shipper of goods on board a ship, put up in the usual way, should lose his right to sue the owner for damage on account of a charter of this description, of which he had no notice. I think the burden of proof must fall upon the shipowner claiming exemption from liability; he must show that the shipper had notice of the charter, and was aware that in making the contract the master was agent for the charterer." In this view we entirely concur, and hold the defts. to be liable. We attach no weight to the fact that the stevedores by whom the cargo was loaded were appointed by the charterer's agent. The stowage of goods, in the absence of any special agreement, forms part of the obligation which the carrier takes upon himself. It is a duty to be discharged by the master and crew. By this charter, the intervention of the stevedore is only made necessary in order to ascertain the quantity the ship would carry. There is nothing to release the master and crew from their responsibility in respect of the stowage. The stevedores were probably appointed by the charterer's agent for the convenience of the master, the agent being acquainted with the port, and knowing who were fit persons to be employed. The expense was ultimately defrayed by the master. At all events the plts. were no parties to the employment of the stevedores, and have a right to look to the owners for the proper stowage and safe conveyance of the goods. For these reasons we are of opinion that the rule to enter the verdict for the defts. must be discharged.

REIN v. LANE AND OTHERS.

Construction of statute—Stamp—Charter-party.

The 5 & 6 Vict. c. 79, imposed a duty of 5s. on every "charter-party, or any agreement or contract for the charter of any ship or vessel, or any memorandum, letter, or other writing between the captain, master, or owner of any ship or vessel and any other person for or relating to the freight or conveyance of any money, goods, or effects on board of such ship or vessel :"

Held, that by the words "or any memorandum, letter, or other writing," was meant any such document in the nature of or to the same effect as a charter-party, and therefore that a guarantee for the performance of a charter-party was not within the enactment.

Action by the plts. against the defts. upon the following guarantee:

14th July 1864.

Messrs Clarkson and Co.

In consideration of our having signed a charter-party upon the Indian, dated the 13th July 1864, from Rice Ports (account Royal and Co) to the United Kingdom or Cronstadt, as agents of Messrs. Pierre, Langlois, and Co., of Akyab, we hereby guarantee the due fulfilment of the same.

LANE, H and Co.

It appeared that Messrs. Clarkson and Co. were the brokers for the plts., the owners of the vessel called the Indian, and that the defts. were the brokers for the charterers, Messrs. Pierre and Co., and that the guarantee was given because the charterers were foreigners and unknown, and the plts. would not accept the charter without the guarantee of the defts. The original charter was put in evidence duly stamped with the 5s. stamp according to the 5 & 6 Vict. c. 79, the Act then in force. The non-fulfilment of the charter-party by Pierre and Co. was proved, and the guarantee of the defts., a distinct document stamped with the 6d. agreement stamp only, was then tendered in evidence, but objected to on the ground that the stamp was insufficient, and that it should have been stamped with a charter-party stamp. The objection was overruled, and the document was admitted. The verdict then passed for the plt. for 2900*l.*, the agreed damages.

A rule nisi having been obtained to enter a non-suit on the ground that the guarantee was improperly stamped,

Brett, Q. C. and Hannen showed cause.—The question turns upon the 5 & 6 Vict. c. 79, which imposes a duty of 5s. upon any "charter-party, or any agreement or contract for the charter of any ship or vessel, or any memorandum, letter, or other writing between the captain, master, or owner of any ship or vessel, and any other person, for or relating to the freight or conveyance of any money, goods, or effects on board of such ship or vessel." [LUSH, J. —In a case in which I was counsel, the same objection was taken, and Bramwell, B. ruled that the guarantee did not require a charter-party stamp. E. James.—The learned baron's decision was final, and his ruling could not be questioned.] The object of the statute was not to require such documents to be stamped with a charter-party stamp, when they are not intended as substitutes for a charter-party. The course of legislation on this subject shows that. The statutes

5 Will. & M. c. 21, s. 8;
9 & 10 Will. 3, c. 25, s. 87;
5 Geo. 3, c. 35, ss. 10, 11;
44 Geo. 3, c. 98, s. 2;
48 Geo. 3, c. 149;
55 Geo. 3, c. 184,

were referred to. Sect. 21 of 5 & 6 Vict. c. 79, also shows that the words in the statute mean any agreement, or contract, or memorandum, or letter, or other writing chargeable with duty as a charter-party. This guarantee is not chargeable with duty as a charter-party.

E. James, Q. C. and Watkin Williams in support of the rule.—A charter-party may be by parol, and if the charter-party in this case had been by parol, could it then have been contended that this guarantee was not liable to be stamped with the charter-party stamp? The words of the schedule of 5 & 6 Vict. c. 79, are quite general, and this guarantee relates to the fulfilment of the charter-party, and therefore to the freight. It was, in fact, the substantial contract on which the plts. relied, as they declined to accept the charter-party alone.

COCKBURN, C. J.—I am of opinion that this rule must be discharged. I agree that the terms in the schedule of the Act on which this question arises are ambiguous, and that they might be construed to apply to such an agreement as this, which in fact is not a charter-party, but only a guarantee that the charter-party shall be fulfilled. It is true that in one sense this document would come within the language of the schedule, but I should hesitate before I came to the conclusion that the Legislature ever intended such a consequence as would happen in this case. The intention of the Legislature was to prevent an evasion of the statute by the substitution for a charter-party of some document or instrument not within the technical meaning of that term. By mercantile usage an instrument framed in a certain form has come to be known as a charter-party, and it seems as if the Legislature in the schedule had contemplated an evasion of the statute by the substitution for the charter-party of some other kind of instrument or agreement, and therefore they put in additional words to meet such a case in order to render the attempt at substitution abortive. I do not think that after a charter-party has been entered into a subordinate agreement or instrument is subject to a second stamp as a charter-party. This view is confirmed by sect. 21 of 5 & 6 Vict. c. 79, to which our attention was drawn, and which shows that the Legislature meant by the additional words in the schedule any agreement or other instrument which should be of the same effect as a charter-party.

WILSON v. THE BANK OF VICTORIA.

BLACKBURN, J.—I am of the same opinion. A definition of what was meant by a charter-party requiring to be stamped, was first given in the 48 Geo. 3, and that meaning has been carried out through the subsequent statutes. The words of this schedule, taken in their most literal and extended sense, would apply to every letter written by the captain of a ship relating to the freight, but that could not be the meaning of the Legislature. What was intended by the Legislature was, that any letter or agreement in the nature of a charter-party, so as to be equivalent to one, should be stamped with the duty on a charter-party, so that the stamp duty should not be evaded. The present guarantee is a collateral agreement, and not within the intention of the Legislature.

LUSH, J.—I am of the same opinion. The words used in the schedule are words of definition only, and merely meant that on every document which has the effect of a charter-party, in whatever form it may be, whether by letter, memorandum, or agreement, or otherwise, the stamp-duty payable on a charter-party should be imposed. It was never intended to impose such a duty on every document which might happen to relate to a charter-party. If it were, I do not see why, if a person gave a bill of exchange for the freight, and some one else were to guarantee the payment of that bill, such guarantee would not require a charter-party stamp, as it would be in effect a guarantee of the freight. That would be a most improbable intention of the Legislature.

Rule discharged. (a)

WILSON v. THE BANK OF VICTORIA.

Shipping—General average.

An auxiliary screw sailing vessel was damaged and dismantled on a voyage, at a time when her stock of coal was exhausted. She put into port, and it was found that, to repair the sea damage and restore her sailing power, the cargo would have had to be landed and warehoused for some time, and the repairing expenses would have been very heavy, probably beyond the value of the ship, but by some temporary repairs the ship might be enabled to reach home by steam power. The latter course was adopted, and coal shipped at two ports during the remainder of the homeward voyage :

Held, that no part of this expenditure for coal was the subject of general average.

(a) The 28 & 29 Vict. c. 96, is the statute which now regulates the stamping of charter-parties, and that has fixed the duty at 6d.

This was an action to recover 189*l.* 4*s.* 11*d.*, for general average from the defts., under the circumstances stated sufficiently in the judgment.

The defts. paid 85*l.* into court, which was admitted to be sufficient if they were liable for particular average only.

At the trial before Mellor, J., at Liverpool, the verdict passed for the plt., with leave reserved to the defts. to enter a verdict for the defts. on a nonsuit.

A rule nisi having been obtained accordingly,

Milward, Q. C. and Baylis showed cause.—The ship having come into collision with an iceberg became dismantled and disabled from being used as a sailing vessel. She had gold to the value of 144,000*l.* on board, of which 30,000*l.* belonged to the defts. The ship put into Rio without coal, and to preserve ship and cargo, and accomplish the voyage to Liverpool, 1472*l.* was expended in coal at Rio and Fayal, of which sum 500*l.* only is charged as the subject of general average. Under these circumstances this must be regarded as an extraordinary expenditure for the preservation of ship and cargo, which the owners are entitled to recover as general average :

Birkley v. Presgrave, 1 East, 220 ;

Taylor v. Curtis, 2 Mar. 309 ;

Tudor's Lead. Cas. 74 ;

2 Arnould on Insurance, 770, 782, 788.

E. James, Q. C. and Mellish, Q. C.—The charge for coal was not an item for general average. It was a charge similar to that which would arise in the case of provisions running short on account of the protracted length of a voyage. The vessel was an auxiliary screw, and the freighters had a right as part of the contract to the use of steam as an auxiliary. There is no authority for such a claim.

Cur. adv. vult.

BLACKBURN, J.—This was an action to recover from the defts. contribution to general average from them as owners of a large quantity of gold, part of the cargo of the ship Royal Standard, on her voyage from Melbourne to England. The defts. paid money into court sufficient to cover the plt.'s claim, with the exception of one item, and the question for the court is, whether that item was such as to be properly included in the general average. The facts, as far as material to the present question, appeared at the trial to be as follows :—The Royal Standard was a large sailing vessel, furnished also with steam power and a screw. The screw was capable of being shipped on board when the vessel was sailing, and the quantity of coal which the vessel was capable of carrying was very inadequate for a steam voyage from Australia to England, so that it was obviously contemplated that the voyage was to be principally performed by means of the sailing power of the ship, the steam power being only to be used as auxiliary, which is indeed the common phrase in use to describe such vessels as clipper ships with auxiliary screw. She sailed from Melbourne with the deft.'s gold and other cargo on board, and on the voyage came into collision with an iceberg. The effect of this disaster was to dismast her and to injure her upper works on the starboard side, so that she could not when on the port tack bear any sail, and when on the starboard tack had not the means of making any quantity of sail, so that her sailing power might practically be said to be destroyed. By means, however, of her screw and her steam power she reached the port of Rio Janeiro in this state. It appeared that, in order to repair the sea damage so as to restore the sailing power of the vessel, it would have been necessary to land the cargo

PAYNTER AND OTHERS v. JAMES.

and warehouse it, and to detain the vessel at Rio for many months, and that the expenses of the repairs there would have been very heavy; so much so that it seems probable they would have exceeded the value of the ship when repaired; at all events, they would have cost many thousands of pounds more than if done in England. But it appeared that by making some slight temporary repairs which would not require that the cargo should be unloaded, and which in fact only caused a detention of three days, the vessel might be made fit to come home under steam. The master resolved to adopt this latter course, and there can be no doubt that in so doing he acted properly. In order to bring her home under steam it was necessary to purchase coal first at Rio and afterwards at Fayal. The value of the coal purchased and consumed in bringing her home was between 1400*l.* and 1500*l.*, and the question that arises is whether the whole or any part of that sum can properly be charged as general average, all the other items claimed by the plts. being covered by the money paid into court. When a vessel at a port of refuge requires repairs to prosecute her voyage, and for that purpose the cargo is unloaded, warehoused, and reshipped, the practice is to charge part of these expenses to the ship, part to the goods, part to the freight, part to general average, and part to the owners. Two average adjusters of great experience proved that, if the repairs had in fact been so done at Rio, a large proportion of the expenses would have been such as according to the practice would have been charged to general average; and they made out the adjustment, and the plts. claimed on the following principle: they said the money expended in buying coal was an expenditure to prevent the necessity of unshipping the cargo at Rio, and therefore ought to be charged against the same interests and in the same proportions as the expenditure which it prevented would have been charged. We wish to guard against being supposed to sanction the notion that in a case like this the shipowners could have charged the owners of the cargo with any part of the expenses of unshipping and warehousing the goods at Rio, supposing the master had under these circumstances adopted that course. Inasmuch as the master could by the expenditure of a comparatively small sum in temporary repairs and coals bring the ship and cargo safely home, it was his duty to do so; and though we do not decide a point which does not arise, we are not to be taken as deciding that his owners would not have been liable to the owners of the cargo if he had not taken this course. But, passing this by, we think that the expenses actually incurred must be apportioned according to the facts that actually happened, and that there is no legal principle on which they can be apportioned according to what might have been the facts if a different course had been pursued. No case or authority was cited to support the principle contended for, nor are we aware of any. If in any particular trade it has been found convenient to act on this principle, and that has been done to such an extent as to create a custom tacitly making it part of the contract that this shall be the principle applied, or if the parties to a charter-party stipulate that it shall be so, and by words of reference to the charter-party in the bills of lading and the policies of insurance make it part of the contract affecting every one, the case would be different; but as it is, the principle propounded is not, we think, tenable at law. The counsel for the plts. then argued that at all events the money paid for the coals was an extraordinary expenditure, and, as such, to be contributed for as general average; but we think this is not so. The shipowners, by their contract with the freighters, are bound to give the service of their crew and their ship, and to make all disbursements necessary for this purpose. In the case of such a vessel as this, which is equipped with an auxiliary screw, their contract includes the use of that screw, and, consequently, the disbursements necessary for fuel for the steam-engine. Now, the disaster which occurred in this case no doubt caused the engine to be used to a much greater extent than would generally occur on such a voyage, and so caused the disbursements for coals to be extraordinarily heavy, but it did not render it an extraordinary disbursement. The case is similar to that of an ordinary sailing vessel, in which, owing to disaster, the voyage is unusually protracted, and, consequently, the owner's disbursements for provisions, and for the wages of his crew, if they are paid by the month, are extraordinarily heavy. It is not similar to that of the master hiring extra hands to pump, when his crew are unable to keep the vessel afloat, or any other expenditure which is not only extraordinary in its amount, but is incurred to procure some service extraordinary in its nature. We think, therefore, that there is no right to charge this item to general average, and, consequently, that the rule to enter the verdict for the def. must be made absolute.

PAYNTER AND OTHERS v. JAMES.

Charter-party—Payment of freight—Time of—Freight payable "on" delivery.

*By the terms of a charter-party freight was payable "on right delivery of the cargo." In an action by the shipowners for freight, to which the def. pleaded that the plts. were not ready and willing to deliver:*

*Held, that the def. was not entitled to delivery before paying the freight; that the delivery and payment of freight must be simultaneous acts, and that if in point of fact they could not take place simultaneously, it must be shown that each party was ready and willing to perform his part of the contract.*

The first count of the declaration was on a charter-party, alleging that it was agreed that freight should be paid as follows: one-third in cash on arrival at Bristol, and the other two-thirds on right delivery of the cargo, by good and approved bills, payable in London at four months, or cash, deducting the usual interest at the option of the charterer; and that the def. elected to pay the second two-thirds in cash, deducting 2½ per cent. for four months. Breach, that all things were done and happened, and all times elapsed necessary to entitle the plts. to have the def. pay to them the said two-thirds, yet the def. did not pay the same, either in cash or bills.

Second count.—That it was agreed between the plts. and def. that the plts. should deliver to the def. certain goods on which certain freight was payable, and that the def. should pay the said freight, one-third in cash, and two-thirds in cash, with 2½ per cent. discount, and all things were done, &c.; yet the def. did not pay the two-thirds.

Third count.—For money payable for and in respect of the plts.' having delivered to the def. at his request certain goods whereon the plts. had a lien for freight, and thereby lost the said lien, and for freight of goods carried in the plts.' ship, and on accounts stated.

Fourth count.—That the said ship arrived at Bristol, &c., and all things were done and happened necessary to be done and to happen, and the def.

were ready and willing to do all things necessary to be done and to happen to have the deft. pay to them the said freight, and the deft. exercised the said option as to the mode in which the said two-thirds of the said freight should be paid, and elected not to pay the same by such good and approved bills in London as aforesaid, but to pay the same in cash deducting the usual interest, yet the deft. would not pay.

Fifth count.—That the deft. did not nor would exercise the said option, or pay the said two-thirds.

Pleas:—To the first and fourth counts, that the deft. did not exercise the said option as alleged. To the second count, non assumpsit. To the first, second, fourth, and fifth counts, that the plts. were not ready and willing to deliver the said cargo. To the third count, never indebted.

Replication taking issue.

At the trial before Pigott, B., at the last assizes for Glamorganshire, it appeared that the plts. were owners of the ship Nimrod, and the deft. was a merchant at Teignmouth. The action was brought for the balance of freight due under a charter-party for goods carried by the plts.' ship from Quebec to Bristol. By the terms of the charter-party payment of freight was to become due and be made as follows: "One-third to be paid cash on arrival, and the remainder on right delivery of the cargo by good and approved bills payable in London at four months following, or cash, deducting the usual interest, at charterer's option."

The vessel arrived at Bristol on the 17th Oct., the deft. being there at the time. The deft. paid the captain one-third of the freight in accordance with the terms of the charter-party, and agreed to pay the remainder in cash on being allowed interest at the rate of 7½ per cent. per annum. On the 21st Oct. the deft. received an application from the plts.' brokers for 600*l.* on account of freight, stating that a portion of the cargo had been delivered, and that they insisted on a portion of the balance of freight being paid before the whole of the cargo was discharged. To this the deft. replied on the 25th Oct. that he declined most positively to pay any more freight till the captain was in a position to settle it according to the terms of the charter-party. And on the same day he gave the captain notice that he had appointed Messrs. May and Hassell to receive the cargo, and that he should hold him responsible for any damage he might sustain by reason of the non-delivery. After some further correspondence the captain, on the 30th Oct., gave the deft. notice that he was willing and ready to deliver the cargo upon the deft. tendering him payment of freight according to the terms of the charter-party. In answer to this the deft. wrote that the captain was not entitled to any more freight till the cargo was delivered, and that he should decline to pay any more till the cargo was delivered according to the terms of the charter-party. The captain thereupon commenced discharging the cargo alongside the ship, but declined to deliver it till freight was paid, and on the 8th Nov. this action was commenced.

The question never went to the jury, but it was agreed that it should be taken that the jury found that the deft. exercised the option to pay cash, that the plts. were not ready and willing to deliver the cargo without cash, but that they were on being paid cash, and that they unloaded and rafted the timber ready for delivery. The verdict was entered for the plts., leave being reserved to the deft. to move; the court to have power to draw inferences of fact that a jury might draw not inconsistent with the above finding.

Bowen in Michaelmas Term obtained a rule to enter the verdict for the deft., on the ground that the deft. was under no obligation to pay the residue of the freight before the delivery of the cargo to him, and that the plts. were not ready or willing to deliver the cargo except on prepayment of freight, to which they were not entitled.

Giffard, Q. C. and Michael showed cause.—The question arises on the readiness and willingness to deliver, and that is determined by the finding of the jury. The contention on the other side is, that we were bound to give credit, but neither party was bound to trust the other. It is admitted that the plts. were not entitled to prepayment, but they were ready and willing to hand over the whole cargo on the freight being paid. The provision as to the deft.'s option to pay in cash or bills might be struck out of the charter-party, as the jury have found that he exercised his option and elected to pay in cash.

Bowen, G. B. Hughes, and Watkin Williams in support of the rule.—The plts. were bound to deliver in order that we might have an opportunity of inspecting the cargo and seeing that it was all right before we paid:

Muller v. Young, 25 L. J. 94, Q. B.;

Foster v. Colby, 28 L. J. 82, Ex.

The freight is payable on delivery of the cargo, that is immediately after delivery. Freight is not payable at common law till delivery is made:

MacLachlan on Shipping 365;

Richie v. Atkinson, 10 East, 295.

The deft. could exercise his option to pay in cash or bills at any time till payment was actually made, and he is not concluded by having said that he would pay in cash.

BOVILL, C. J.—We have felt some embarrassment on account of the terms of the rule, and on carefully looking at the findings of the jury, and after hearing Mr. Giffard, I cannot find that the point raised by the rule was made at the trial. We must look at the charter-party and the findings of the jury and place a construction, and a reasonable construction, upon each. No doubt the question intended to be raised was the meaning of the charter-party. The words are, "the freight to be paid one-third in cash on arrival at Bristol." There is no question as to the one-third, and the question as to the remainder arises on the following words: "and the other two-thirds on right delivery of the cargo by good and approved bills payable in London at four months or cash, deducting the usual interest, at the option of the charterer." That must be taken as "two-thirds on right delivery of the cargo, payment to be in cash," as the option had been exercised. Then what is "on right delivery of the cargo?" The contention at the trial was that the plts. were to be paid on delivery. Now the deft. has shifted his ground and contends that he was entitled to delivery before payment, and it is said that "on delivery" means that the delivery is a condition precedent to the payment, but the word "on" has received a construction in the case of Reg. v. Humphrey, 10 A. & E. 335, which my brother Willes has referred me to. The question there arose as to whether a declaration to be made "upon admission" to an office was to be made within a reasonable time after the admission, and the Court of Q. B. were of opinion that it was sufficient if the oath was taken after admission, but the case came before the Ex. Ch., and that Court says: "The words of the Act, 'upon his admission,' do not, as it appears to us, mean after the admission has taken place, but upon the occasion of or at the time of his admission . . . The word 'upon,' in different cases, may undoubtedly mean before the act done to which it relates, or simultaneously with the act done, or after the act done, according as reason and good sense require the interpretation with reference to the context and the subject-matter of the enactment." That is a very clear statement of the various meanings that may be put upon the word "on;" it may be before, at, or after, and we must look at the intention of the charter-party. Could it be the intention of the pte. that they should lose their lien? Could that be the construction of the charter-party? One would suppose that the two things should be done simultaneously, that the pte. should be paid at the time of delivery. If a man is ready to pay the freight he is entitled to the delivery, and he is not entitled to delivery if he is not ready. There is a case of Black v. Rose, 2 Moo. P. C. C., N. S., 277, to which my brother Willes has called my attention. The point there was very similar to the present case, and the Privy Council affirmed the judgment of the court below to the effect that the terms of the charter-party, that the freight should be paid on delivery, entitled the master to demand freight at the time of delivery, irrespective of the custom of the port of delivery. That seems to determine this question if authority were necessary. Neither party is entitled, the one to delivery without payment of freight, or the other to freight without delivery. That being so on the construction of the charter-party, it is said that the finding of the jury is ambiguous, and there is the same ambiguity as to the meaning of the word "on." I understand the finding to be, that the pte. were ready to deliver on being paid cash at the time of delivery. It was the deft. who was not ready to pay, and he insisted on having the cargo before he paid, the effect of which would have been, that the pte. would have lost their lien. The next point, that the pte. were not ready and willing to deliver the cargo except on prepayment of freight, is disposed of by what I have already said, and therefore I think the rule should be discharged.

WILSON v. JONES.

[EX. CH.]

WILLES, J.—Not having heard all the arguments, I take no part in the decision, but I agree so far as I have heard them.

M. SMITH, J.—I am of the same opinion. The question turns on the words of the charter-party: "One-third in cash on arrival at Bristol, and two-thirds on right delivery of the cargo by good and approved bills payable in London, or cash, at the option of the charterer." It was contended at the trial that the true meaning of this clause was, that the freighter was entitled to have entire delivery of the cargo, and that the shipowner was to part with his lien, making the delivery a condition precedent to the right to freight, and leaving to the shipowner nothing but his right of action. I think that is not the right construction, but that the payment of freight and the delivery were to be concurrent acts. There is no authority in favour of the contention of the deft. The case of Foster v. Colby, cited by Mr. Hughes, was a right decision, but it was on quite a different charter-party. The shipowner there had not stipulated that his lien should continue, and freight was to be paid two months after the ship was reported. Then it is said that the pte. were not ready to deliver, and that they demanded freight before they were ready to deliver. But it seems from the evidence and the finding of the jury that they were ready. I understand that there must be a concurrent readiness and willingness to deliver and to pay the freight, and when the case comes to the jury they must be satisfied that the one in default was ready to perform his part of the stipulations if the other was also. Here the pte. were both ready and willing to deliver, but the deft. was neither ready nor willing to pay the freight. Upon the whole, therefore, I think, that the pte. were ready and willing to perform their part of the contract, and that is sufficient to entitle them to maintain this action.

where the deft. was not ready. Pordage v. Cole, 1 Wms. Saund. 320, shows that where such acts as this are to be done, which in point of fact cannot be done concurrently, there must be a readiness and willingness on both sides.

WILSON v. JONES.

Marine insurance—Atlantic Telegraph Cable—Subject-matter insured—Perils insured against—Total loss.

The plt. being a shareholder in the Atlantic Telegraph Company, by a policy of insurance the material parts of which were as follows, caused himself to be insured: "Lost or not lost, at and from Ireland to Newfoundland, the risk to commence at and from and including the lading of the cable on board the Great Eastern, and to continue until the said cable be laid in one continuous length between Ireland and Newfoundland, and until 100 words shall have been transmitted from Ireland to Newfoundland and vice versa, the risk on this policy then to cease and determine, upon any kind of goods and merchandise, and also upon the body, &c., of the good ship or vessel called the Great Eastern." . . . The policy then went on: "The said ship, &c., goods, and merchandise, &c., for as much as concerns the assured by agreement between the assured and the assurers in this policy, are and shall be valued at 200L on the Atlantic Cable value, say, as twenty shares valued at 10L per share (and it is hereby agreed and understood that this policy, in addition to all perils and casualties herein specified, shall cover every risk and contingency attending the conveyance and successful laying of the cable from and including its lading on board the Great Eastern until 100 words be transmitted from Ireland to Newfoundland, and vice versa, and it is distinctly agreed and declared that the transmission of the said 100 words from Ireland to Newfoundland, and vice versa, shall be an essential condition of this policy). Touching the adventures and perils which we the assurers are contented to bear, and do take upon ourselves in this voyage, they are of the seas, &c., and of all other perils, losses, and misfortunes that have or shall come to the hurt, &c., of the said goods, &c., and ship, &c., or any part thereof, &c."

The Great Eastern had started with about 2300 miles of cable on board, and had laid from 1100 to 1200 miles, when a fault having been discovered, the cable had to be hauled in, and while this was being done, the weather being fair at the time, the strain proving too great, the cable parted and part went to the bottom. The Great Eastern then returned to port with the remainder:

Held (affirming the decision of the Court of Ex.) that the risk by which the loss occurred was a risk insured against by the policy, and that upon the true construction of the policy the insurance being on the expected profits of the adventure, there was a total loss.

This was an action by a shareholder in the Atlantic Telegraph Company, against an underwriter upon a policy of insurance.

The policy, the more material parts of which are given above, together with the pleadings and the facts of the case, is fully set out in 14 L. T. Rep. N. S. 65. The words inclosed in brackets were written in the margin of the policy, which was in fact an ordinary printed form of marine policy with blanks to be filled up, opposite to the clause "touching the adventures and perils, &c."

A verdict was entered for the plt. for the full amount claimed on the policy, leave being reserved to the deft. to move to enter the verdict for himself on the ground that the loss was not by the perils insured against, or, if any, only an average loss, and there was no evidence to show that it was higher than 8 per cent.

The Court of Ex. discharged a rule obtained accordingly by Brett, Q. C., and against this decision the deft. now appealed.

Brett, Q. C. (with him Cohen) for the app.—There are two questions; first, what is the subject-matter of the insurance: secondly, whether the loss was by a peril insured against. If the insurance is on the adventure it is a mere wager. [BLACKBURN, J.—A wager is when the party has no interest in the event.] At any rate apt words must be used in the description of such a subject-matter. The usual form of marine policy is used, and the sort of insurance suggested is not one which an underwriter would contemplate or be likely to enter into. Now here the plt. might very well intend to insure the cable as that upon the safety of which the success of the adventure depended. The cable is a part of the property of the company in which he is a shareholder, and he is therefore interested in it as being part of such property. The insurance is expressed to be "on the Atlantic Cable," and what follows is merely inserted to make the policy a valued instead of an open policy. The words describe the subject-matter, and then the interest which the plt. has in that subject-matter. The clause relating to the transmission of the hundred words simply defines the duration of the risk, and does not alter the subject-matter of insurance. If this be so, there is no total loss. [SMITH, J.—It is difficult to see what would be a total loss according to your contention.] Then has there been a loss by the perils insured against? The words in the margin must be read as following the printed words specifying the risks insured against, and then, according to the well-known rule, they must be construed as extending to risks only ejusdem generis. [BLACKBURN, J.—But that would be to give them no further meaning than the general words at the end of the printed clause, and so in fact no sense at all.] They may have a more extended sense than that, but they cannot include the incidents of an ordinary and successful voyage. Nothing here happened to cause the loss, but that which occurs on every ordinary voyage. This is like the case of a ship sinking in a perfectly calm sea: that would be no evidence of a loss by any peril against which the underwriters insured, but only of a loss through some defect in the ship itself. [WILLES, J.—I do not know that it can be said as a matter of law that in such a case the judge ought to direct a verdict for the defts.] The jury would not be justified in such a case in saying that there was a loss by the perils of the sea. But assuming that the loss here was by a peril insured against, how can it be a total loss? Looking at the case in either aspect, as one of insurance on the cable or one of insurance on the adventure, there is not a total loss. In the first case it is clear there was not. In the second case the adventure was not totally lost. Part of the cable remained, and the value of the shares was not totally gone. In fact, by what took place it was shown that the part of the cable that had sunk could be recovered. [BLACKBURN, J.—Is not that like the case of a capture, where there is a total loss at one time although a spes recuperandi remains, and if the ship be recaptured what was once a total becomes only an average loss?] From that instant the ultimate success of the adventure became morally certain. Then it was said that the insurance was on the success of the adventure on that voyage. That is nowhere stated in the policy. Surely it would be a construction leading to strange results. Suppose some trifling accident occurred which prevented the cable from transmitting messages for the time, but that the mischief could easily be remedied after the voyage, then, though the value of the shares would rise greatly, the underwriters would be liable to pay the full amount as though the whole adventure had totally failed. The contract would not then be one of indemnity, but like a mere wager that the cable would be successfully laid in a certain space of time, three months for instance, which would be lost if it was successfully laid within three months and a day. He cited

Temple, Q. C. (with him L. Temple), for the resp., was not called upon.

WILLES, J.—This is an appeal from a decision of the Court of Ex. discharging a rule to enter a verdict for the deft. in an action on a policy of insurance on the ground that the loss which occurred was not a loss by a peril of the sea, or any other peril insured against; and, secondly, that if it was it was not a total loss, and that there was no proof that the average loss was over 8 per cent. In deciding this case almost everything depends upon the construction of the policy, consisting in this case of written words superadded to an ordinary printed form, and this construction we must therefore now consider and decide upon. Now this was a policy of very unusual character, containing provisions for the insurance of an undertaking of a very novel and speculative description; an undertaking by which a joint-stock company sought to establish, for profit to themselves, a telegraph across the Atlantic, for which purpose it became necessary to lay down a cable at the bottom of the ocean for a distance of over 2000 miles. This was a project involving great risk and uncertainty, and until the cable was laid, the shares in the undertaking were, of course, of very questionable value, but it was expected, and no doubt with reasonable probability, seeing the great efforts that were made to carry out the project, that if success were attained, very large profits would be made. In this undertaking the plt. had shares. Now, it is most material to observe the character of his interest and position as the holder of these shares. The proposition, which was very properly assumed in the argument, and might be asserted without the necessity of referring to any authority, but which is the result of what has been decided in the highest tribunal, was this, namely, that the plt., in respect of his shares in this joint-stock company, had no immediate interest in the cable itself. The shareholders have an interest in the profits, but not in the property of the concern itself. Upon this principle is founded the decision that shares in a company are not within the Mortmain Act. So here we have a person who has an interest in the profits to be earned by the cable if laid, but not a direct interest in the cable, insuring the expected profits against perils which are expected to happen. We must read the policy with reference to that state of things and of law, with which men of business must be taken to be familiar. Let us then look at the language used to see what the plt. intended to insure. Was it his interest in the cable or in the profits to be made by the cable, if it should survive all contingencies and become successful, as it must be taken between these parties would have been the case if the hundred words were safely transmitted? That is the first question. Then if the language is plain as to the subject-matter insured, that is to say, that it is the interest of the plt., it will be plain that the insurance is upon the interest in the expected share of the profits itself, and not on the shares themselves, or the cable in any other sense than as connected therewith. It was, no doubt, in one sense an insurance on the cable, that is to say, affecting the cable. It is just like the case of an insurance of freight; that is an insurance affecting the ship; the two things are so connected that they cannot be severed except in cases where the freight is affected by the loss of goods. And then again it may be said that the insurance of freight is an insurance of goods; that is connected with goods, because if the goods are lost the insurers will be liable for the freight just as if the ship was lost. Now, except in this sense, when the words here used are looked at, it is plainly an insurance on the plt.'s interest in the profits of the undertaking or adventure. We shall have presently to determine whether that is the adventure as limited to the attempt to lay the cable on this occasion, or as extended to any other attempt. The first part of the description is as follows: "The said ship, &c., and merchandise, &c. for so much as concerns the assured by agreement between the assured and the assurers in this policy, are and shall be valued at 200*l.* on the Atlantic Cable." If that stood alone, that would not be a sufficient description of what we think the plt. intended to insure. Whether the plt. would have had a sufficient interest within the statute in that case, I do not wish to express an opinion, and I only mention the point lest, as it was mentioned, we might be thought to have overlooked it. The policy then goes on, "Value, say twenty shares, valued at 10*l.* per share." Thus, we have language qualifying the previous language, followed by a context plainly showing that the plt.'s interest in the profits to be derived from his shares was what was insured for; then follow, or, to be more strictly accurate, are inserted in the margin, these words in writing: "It is hereby agreed and understood that this policy, in addition to all perils and casualties herein specified, shall cover every risk and contingency attending the conveyance and successful laying of the cable from and including its lading on board the Great Eastern steamship until one hundred words be transmitted from Ireland to Newfoundland and vice versa"—words specially excluding an interpretation confined, as suggested in the argument, to perils of the seas, or perils included in the more general words at the end of the printed enumeration of perils insured against, and referring to the peculiar and especial perils and casualties to which this novel subject of insurance would be exposed. Then follow these words: "And it is distinctly agreed and declared that the transmission of the said one hundred words from Ireland to Newfoundland, and vice versa, shall be an essential condition of this policy." On looking to the subject-matter of insurance and those words it is impossible to avoid coming to the same conclusion as Martin, B. came to at the trial, and which was afterwards confirmed by the Court of Ex. Mr. Brett has argued against this conclusion. His argument at one time almost amounted to this: that if the court should put this construction upon the policy the result would be that the parties really entered into what was only a wager. Now, if by that is meant a wager such as would come within the 8 & 9 Vict. c. 109, I have no hesitation in rejecting that suggestion, because that Act certainly does not affect speculative contracts in which the parties have an interest, but only what are ordinarily known as wagers; that is to say, bets on future events, not indemnities against injury to an interest practically distinguished from wagers. Then it is said that this is an unusual kind of insurance, and the court ought not to come to the conclusion that the underwriters meant to insure profits so speculative and so unusual a subject of insurance. The answer is, that the only proper conclusion to be come to in respect of such considerations is to make quite sure that the language used has the novel effect attributed to it, but not to be deterred from giving effect to it if it has because this is a novel kind of insurance. A similar kind of argument was used in McSwiney v. The Royal Exchange Insurance Society, 18 L.J. 198, Q.B.; 14 Q.B. 634. That was a case of insurance of profits on goods. McSwiney had bought 6000 bags of rice in India, and sold them at a distant port, and insured the profits upon the rice. When the ship was at Madras ready to receive the 6000 bags, and 1200 had been put on board, she was blown out to sea and injured, so that the rice on board was spoiled, and the remainder had to be sent later in another ship. The plt.'s contract for sale of the rice could not be fulfilled, and the profits of it were lost. The underwriters settled the claim of the plt. so far as the loss of profit on the 1200 bales was concerned, but resisted any claim in respect of the special profits and the quantity not shipped. The argument used was that the profits in question were not sufficiently described in the policy, and also the subsidiary point was taken that the profits were only insured in respect of goods actually loaded. The judgment was for the plt. in the Q.B., and no one ever suggested that the policy was void from the special nature of the thing insured. That judgment was afterwards reversed in the Ex. Ch. on the ground that the language used was not sufficient to constitute an insurance upon the special profit, and against the risk in question. The judgment of Parke, B. ends thus: "If, indeed, it attached to the profit of those on shore, there has been no loss of that profit by perils of the seas, but only a retardation of the voyage for which the defts. are not responsible unless on a policy specially providing for such an event." The policy before us seems to have been drawn up by some skilful person, or in accordance with good advice, with especial reference to the perils peculiar to the matter insured. Now, this being an insurance upon the undertaking or adventure, it is proper to consider what that adventure was, the profits of which were thus insured. The language describing the voyage is as follows: "At and from and including the lading on board the Great Eastern steamship, and to continue until the said cable be laid in one continuous length between Ireland and Newfoundland, and until one hundred words shall have been transmitted from Ireland to Newfoundland and vice versa." The last part is considered so important that it is repeated again, and made an essential condition of the policy. The conclusion, then, that it appears reasonable to draw is, either that it was an insurance on the adventure, limited to the endeavour on that occasion to lay the cable, and then failure on that occasion would be a total loss, or that it must at least be imputed to the parties that their view when using the language they have done was, that unless the desired result was brought about on that occasion, it was to be taken that there was an end of the matter. That at least is the construction one would be inclined to put upon the words which say that the transmission of the 100 words shall be an essential condition of this policy. They thought that it was all up with the adventure unless the cable could then be so laid as to transmit the 100 words. I will now proceed to the second question. That was, whether

Ex. Ch.]

WILSON v. JONES.

[Ex. Ch.]

THE STEAMSHIP NEPTUNE.

[ADM.]

the loss was a loss by the perils of the sea; or, to speak more accurately, the perils insured against, or not. If the policy had only contained the ordinary printed language of a policy, we might have had to do what there is very little authority to assist us in doing, namely, to put a construction upon the ordinary general words at the end of the clause enumerating the risks, "all other perils, losses, or misfortunes that shall come to the hurt, detriment, or damage of the said goods, &c." This is not necessary, for the same reasons as have been already referred to. On reading the words inserted in the margin, and those describing the subject-matter of insurance and the duration of the risk, and looking to the words introduced which expressly provide that "this policy, in addition to all the perils and casualties herein specified, shall cover every risk and contingency attending on the conveyance and successful laying of the cable," until the specified number of words have been transmitted, it is quite clear that the parties have decided this very question for themselves, unless it should appear that in fact the peril by which the loss occurred is to be attributed to some inherent vice or other implied exception, if any, to the contract of insurance contained in the policy. It appears that the vessel set sail: the cable was laid down for a considerable length, and then one morning it was discovered that the current did not pass, and a portion of the cable had to be hauled back. While this was being done the cable parted, and the broken end fell into the sea. The weather is described in the ship's log at and about the time of the accident as fair with a light westerly wind. There is no suggestion of any mala fides. Attempts were made to recover the cable, but the grappling iron broke, and it was again lost. The adventure was then brought to an end and failed. Now we are not called upon to decide upon the facts; the only question is, whether there was any evidence to go to the jury, and it is impossible on these facts to conclude that there was no evidence upon which the jury might properly say that the loss happened by a contingency attending upon the "successful laying" of the cable. It is not suggested that the cable was itself defective. One may imagine that some kink may have formed in the part being drawn in which caused the cable to part. This suggestion I make only by way of argument, not professing to be practically acquainted with the details of the matter, but still it affords a sound argument enough to show that the learned judge could not have withdrawn the case from the jury. Then we come to the question whether there was a total loss. Now Mr. Brett well said, if the insurance was on the cable there was no total loss; but it is unnecessary to enter into that, because we have come to the conclusion on the construction of the policy that the insurance was not upon the cable, but upon the profits of the adventure, and that being so, there was either a total loss if, as I am inclined to think, the adventure was limited to the voyage, of the profits insured—that is, the profit to be made by laying the cable on that occasion—or there was as much a total loss by reason of the parting of the cable, according to the language of the agreement itself, as when a ship is totally lost by capture, though there are friendly ships of war about in such number as to make it not improbable that it may be recaptured. Whatever subsequent events might happen, the just conclusion, on the principles of insurance law and on the contract, is that the loss was presumably and conventionally total when the accident occurred. To conclude, therefore, the insurance was on the plt.'s interest valued at 200*l.*, on shares in an adventure by which it was sought to obtain profit by laying down a cable so as to transmit messages to and fro on that particular trial, or on the interest which he had in the adventure not limited to that occasion, but taking it to be assumed that all chance of ever succeeding would be gone if it were impossible to lay it on the occasion to which the insurance referred. Martin, B. appears to have put the entire argument shortly and well when he said that the insurance was on the adventure. We are for these reasons all of opinion that the decision of the court below must be affirmed.

BLACKBURN, J.—I am of the same opinion, and I would only add a few words to what has been already said on the subject. With respect to the proposition that this contract is a wager, I apprehend that this policy is a contract to indemnify against loss of some interest in the case of any of the perils insured against occurring. I do not know a better definition on this subject than that given by Lawrence, J. in the case of Barclay v. Cousins, 2 East, 544. Here the plt. was the owner of certain shares in this company; they were about to lay down a cable; if successful he would have been advantaged; but the event did not happen and he was the worse; consequently he was interested in the event, and therefore, if proper words be used to give a right to be indemnified, this is a perfectly good policy. Then have such words been used? If he had said that he insured the cable he would not have properly described his interest; if the ship, it would have been the same; but he has used the words which we now have to consider, and I will only say that, looking at his situation and these words, there seems to me no doubt that he meant to stipulate that if that interest which he had in respect of his shares was frustrated by the ordinary perils of the sea, or the "other perils" usually insured against, or the additional perils especially included in this insurance, he should be indemnified against such loss. The loss that really happened, if not one of the "other" perils, was certainly included by the words "every risk and contingency attending the conveyance and successful laying of the cable." Those words would have absolutely no sense at all unless they cover this risk. As to the second question, this loss is of his interest in having the cable laid on this voyage. That is totally lost. Looking at it in another, though I rather think not the correct way, his interest is in having it laid this or any other time; but though there may remain in this point of view a chance of ultimate success by which the underwriters would be entitled to benefit, I do not think the character of the loss is altered.

KEATING, MELLOR, SMITH, and LUSH, JJ. concurred:

UNITED STATES DISTRICT COURT— ADMIRALTY COURT.

Reported by R. D. BENEDICT, Proctor and Advocate.

EASTERN DISTRICT OF NEW YORK.

THE STEAMSHIP NEPTUNE.

Bill of lading—Damage to cargo—Perils of the seas—Proper stowage for coasting voyages—Stowage on deck.

Where goods were stowed on the main deck of a steamer, bulwarked entirely round and under cover of the upper deck, well stowed, except that they were not stanchioned down from the top and no bulkheads were built behind them, the voyage of the steamer being short, occupying but one night, though part of the way out at sea, and the goods were injured by a violent storm:

ADM.]

THE STEAMSHIP NEPTUNE.

[ADM.]

Held by the court, that these goods were stowed in compliance with the rule requiring them to be stowed under deck :

That steam-vessels making such short voyages, on which the speedy transit of goods is an object of moment to shippers as well as to shipowners, are not bound to exercise the same elaborate and dilatory precautions against the vicissitudes of the sea as on longer and more perilous voyages :

That these goods were stowed with reasonable care, skill, and prudence, considering the nature, extent, and usual perils of such a voyage :

That the proximate cause of the damage, therefore, was one of the dangers of the sea, against which the owners were not bound to provide further than they did.

On Nov. 22, 1865, the firm of Mixen, Whitmore, and Co. shipped on board the steamship Neptune, at Boston, twenty-nine casks of sperm oil. The vessel was bound to New York, and left Boston in the afternoon. She usually arrives at New York about seven o'clock next morning, going round Cape Cod and then through Long Island Sound. The oil was shipped under a bill of lading, containing the usual exception of the "dangers of the seas." About midnight, before she reached the Sound, she encountered a heavy blow and a violent cross sea, which lasted several hours, during which the oil broke loose and some of the casks were stove.

The shippers filed this libel to recover their damages, in which they alleged that the loss was chargeable to the carelessness of those in charge of the ship in improperly stowing the oil. This was denied by the owners of the ship, who alleged that the damage was occasioned by the dangers of the seas.

Smith for libellants, and Benedict, Tracy, and Benedict for the steamship.

SHIRMAN, J.—From the facts, which are uncontradicted, it will be seen at a glance that the main question to be determined is, whether this oil was well stowed so that the damage is chargeable to the danger of the sea. The evidence separates this question into two branches—first, whether the oil was put in the right place on the ship; and, second, whether it was properly secured in stowing. On both these points the testimony is very conflicting. It is familiar doctrine that the master and ship are responsible for the stowage of the cargo under deck, and that, if it is stowed on deck without the consent of the owner, and is lost or damaged in consequence, even by dangers of the seas excepted in the bill of lading, the carrier is responsible: (The Paragon, Ware R. 322.) This duty to stow under deck is deemed a condition of every bill of lading, whether expressed or not. Unless the liability is expressly excluded by the terms of the contract, it will always be deemed one of its provisions. This is a general rule of maritime law arising out of the general usage of the commercial world. Sometimes, however, a well-established uniform local custom, or usage of a particular trade, forms an exception to the general rule, and relieves the bill of lading of this implied condition. The doctrines pertaining to this subject were discussed by this court in the case of John H. Chubb et al. v. 7800 bushels of oats, June 1864, and it is believed, accurately stated. In the present case, evidence was gone into for the purpose of proving that such a custom existed in this trade between New York and Boston, but I do not think any such custom is involved here. The steamer Neptune is a large propeller, belonging to a well-known class of vessels which ply out of this port, with an upper or hurricane deck upon which no freight is carried—a main deck between decks where a very large part of the freight is stowed, and a hold floored off several feet above the keelson, where her engines, water, boilers, coal and engines and propeller shaft are placed, and where there is room for some freight. Her construction necessarily requires that a large quantity of freight should be carried on this main deck. It is built entirely round, and wholly under cover of the upper deck. Upon the degree of strength of the bulwarks and upper deck no question properly arises here. They appear to have been tight and sufficient. At all events no damage resulted to this oil from any defects in these parts of her structure. The right to carry freight on this main deck without violating any implied clause of the bill of lading, results, in the judgment of the court, not from a mere usage, but from the necessities of the trade. This vessel, as a freight-boat, for which she is principally designed, would be of little or no value without the use of this deck. This fact is known to all the world as a peculiarity of this and some other classes of steam-vessels, to shippers as well as shipowners; and the former, who seek for the more rapid transit of their goods than sailing vessels furnish, must be deemed to assent to such disposition and arrangement of the cargo as the peculiar construction of these steam vessels necessarily involves. But further, I am decidedly of the opinion that the stowage of a cargo on this main deck of a vessel so constructed is a compliance with the implied claim of a bill of lading requiring it to be stowed under deck. Any other view involves the doctrine that the owners of such ships are liable to shippers for damages to goods resulting from the dangers of the sea, provided that they are stowed on this deck. These vessels, then, must carry no more cargo than they can stow in that part of their holds not occupied with engines, water, coal, boilers and propeller shaft, or become insurers against all marine perils resulting from the violence of the wind and waves. I should require very strong and cogent reasons to bring me to a conclusion, the effect of which would require these vessels either to run with very light freights, or to assume responsibilities that in the end would involve this carrying trade by steam over this and similar routes in ruin, and probably lead to its extinction. If the doctrine contended for by the libellants is to prevail, a steamer like the Neptune might have her whole upper works swept off by a violent hurricane, and the main part of a full cargo carried overboard, and yet her owners be liable, provided the freight in the hold escaped destruction. By this peculiar construction of these and similar classes of steam-vessels, great capacity for carrying freight is combined with rapid transit, and this end as well to the benefit of the shipper and the commercial world generally as to the shipowner; for if steamers are to be allowed to carry no more freight than they can stow in their holds, without becoming absolute insurers against all perils of the sea, it is evident that this mode of transportation must be abandoned, or the rates of freight so much enhanced as to render it impracticable. The evidence in the present case shows that it is a common practice, as it must necessarily be, to stow oil and similar articles in this class of vessels on the main decks. This is proved by the claimant's witnesses, and by Capt. Fish, one of the witnesses for the libellants. The latter, who is master of a propeller plying between New Bedford and New York, testifies that he carries oil mostly in casks of all sizes, holding from one to ten barrels, and that he always stows on this deck when he has filled his hold; but, as already intimated, the court does not rest the right of the carrier on these circumstances.

to stow freight on this main deck on mere usage. It is grounded on the necessities of transportation by this class of vessels, which have to be constructed with reference to this mode of arranging the cargo, and to which shippers must be deemed to have consented. The conclusion is, that the placing of this oil on the deck where it was stowed was, of itself, no breach of duty or violation of any implied stipulation in the bill of lading. There is another feature of the evidence for the libellants, as to the propriety of putting this oil on the main deck, which requires to be noticed. Some of their witnesses say that, in their judgment, it should have been put below to correct the rolling of the ship; and Capt. Arnold, an intelligent shipmaster, testifies that the Neptune was not seaworthy, with the freight she had on deck and nothing in the hold. His experience, though very great, I infer from his testimony, has been confined to sailing vessels, and generally to long voyages at sea. Now the captain of the Neptune states that, with water, engines, boilers, coals, &c., his ship had 600 tons of ballast below, and that she had not more than 100 or 150 tons of freight on deck. The evidence on this point, as to the effect of putting this oil below, is conflicting, and I am not satisfied that stowing these twenty-nine casks there would have materially prevented or modified the rolling of the ship. The remaining question to be considered is, whether the oil was properly stowed where it was placed. The captain of the Neptune states that it was stowed under his superintendence, four casks in a tier, fourteen on one side of the engine-room and fifteen on the other. Lard in casks was placed between the oil and engine-house, on heads. The oil was dunnaged, bilge free, bung up, chime and chime, each cask chocked separately, and where the oil would not fill up, lard was put in and scantling between driven in thoroughly, so that it would not stave the head of the cask or work, and the scantling nailed to the bed and decks at the after tier. He states that he has had experience in stowing, and that this was well done. Upon the question of whether this was good stowage or not a number of experts were called on both sides. Their testimony is very conflicting. Those examined by the libellants do not agree in details as to what the stowage should have been. I think, however, that one of them, Captain Arnold, states accurately and clearly what the stowage was in fact, and what it might have been. He says: "I think that there is no difficulty in stowing a cargo so that it will stand the rolling of the sea, so long as you have the control of your vessel. I think that if this cargo had been properly stowed in port, there would have been no damage. The cargo was very well stowed with the exception that it was not stanchioned down. It should have been floored over the top and stanchioned down. The outer tiers should have been stanchioned from one deck to the other, so as to form a bulkhead. These stanchions should have been cleated down at each end. This should have been done, or the outer tier of chocks should have been spiked down so as to have held the casks." The testimony of this witness is in some particulars confirmed by Captain Story, who was also examined by the claimants, and who says that the dunnage was proper, but that the casks should have been stanchioned down. He says, however, that it is not usual to nail the chocks. As already stated, the libellants' experts do not agree as to all the details necessary to be observed in stowing such material as this oil. But I think that upon the whole evidence, it is clear that this oil was well stowed for any voyage, with the exception of flooring off and stanchioning down the casks from above, and stanchioning between the decks fore and aft of the outer tiers so as to form bulkheads. The first precaution would probably have kept the casks from being thrown out of their beds by the violent motions of the ship, and the latter would have kept them from rolling. Whether the jumping of the casks in their beds set any of them leaking, independently of their rolling about after they broke loose, does not appear, and therefore it cannot be determined with certainty whether bulkheads alone, of the kind suggested, would have secured them against all injury. The opinion of Captain Arnold (and I think it is the better one) appears to be that both precautions were necessary to prevent injury, under the circumstances. Now it is evident that these precautions are those required on the longest voyages and through the most tempestuous seas, where heavy gales are almost certain to be encountered before the port of destination is reached. They are such as would protect the cargo under any rolling of the ship, however violent, at least until her navigators should lose all control over her. The question here naturally arises, were they such precautions as are required by the exercise of ordinary skill and prudence, over the route on which the Neptune was running, and which was traversed in a single night? In other words, must vessels, and especially steam-vessels, on short, even daily trips, where the speedy transit of goods is an object of great moment to shippers as well as ship-owners, and which is eagerly sought to be obtained by both, and where to such celerity of transit prompt loading and unloading are indispensable, be held to the exercise of the same degree of skill and prudence, and the same dilatory and elaborate precautions against the vicissitudes of the sea, as on longer and more perilous voyages? In determining this question it is necessary to see what are understood, in the law, as excusable perils. It is now settled by a decided preponderance of authorities, that, while common carriers by sea, in the absence of a special contract, are subject to the same rigid liabilities as carriers on land, the term "dangers" or "perils of the seas" usually inserted in bills of lading operates as a limitation of these responsibilities to some extent. It is held, or rather assumed, in the case of Williams v. Grant, 1 Conn. R. 487, that the phrase "perils of the sea" includes no more than is comprehended by the "act of God." This is not now generally received as sound doctrine. "Perils of the sea" is now understood and held to have a broader scope than the term "act of God," and to include the natural accidents incident to the navigation of seas: (Johnson v. Friar, 4 Yerg. 41; Gordon v. Buchanan, 5 Yerg. 72, 82; Williams v. Branstons, 1 Murphy, 417; Plaisted v. The Boston and Kennebec Navigation Company, 27 Maine 182.) Mr. Justice Story declares, in the case of the schooner Reeside, 2 Sum. 571, that "The phrase 'dangers of the seas,' whether understood in its most limited sense, as importing only a loss by the natural accidents peculiar to that element, or whether understood in its more extended sense, as including inevitable accidents upon that element, must still, in either sense, be clearly understood to include only such losses as are of an extraordinary nature, or arise from some irresistible force or some overwhelming power, which cannot be guarded against by the ordinary exertions of human skill and prudence." Now the question immediately suggests itself: What is ordinary skill and prudence? Chancellor Kent, who is always very high authority, in his Commentaries, vol. 3, p. 217, says: "It is often a point difficult to determine, whether the disaster happened by a peril of the sea, or by unavoidable accident, or by the fault, negligence, or want of skill of the master. . . . What is an excusable peril depends a good deal upon usage, and the sense and practice of merchants, and it is a question of fact, to be settled by the circumstances peculiar to the case." The very terms "ordinary skill and prudence" used by Mr. Justice Story, and often repeated by other jurists, involve the idea that their meaning, when applied to any particular case, must be determined by the circumstances which characterize and surround that case. Skill and prudence, like diligence and negligence, are relative terms. "Diligence," says Chancellor Kent, "is a relative term, and it is evident that what would amount to the requisite at one time, in one situation, and under one set of circumstances, might not amount to it in another." (2 Kent's Com. 56.) "Negligence," says Baron Alderson, in Dyke v. Water Works, 36 Eng. L. & Eq. 584, "is either omitting to do something that a reasonable man would do, or the doing something which a reasonable man would not do." In the case already cited from Nott and McCord, it was held that whether a loss was caused by a "peril of the sea" or not, depended upon the fact of the existence or non-existence of negligence. The libel in the present case appears to have been framed upon this view of the law, and charges that the loss in question was owing to careless and improper stowage. Now, upon a careful review of the evidence, I am satisfied that this oil was stowed with reasonable care, skill, and prudence, considering the nature, extent, and usual perils of such a voyage, and therefore, that the proximate cause of the damage complained of in the libel was one of the dangers of the sea, against which the owners of the ship were not bound to provide further than they did. The libel is therefore dismissed, with costs.

Re MORTGAGES OF PRIDE OF WALES AND ANNIE LISLE.

Ship—Mortgage—Freight—Assignment—Notice to charterers—Bankruptcy.

A., a shipowner, mortgaged a ship, then on her road home, to B., and afterwards gave a written authority to C., to whom he was indebted, to receive the ship's freight. A., becoming bankrupt, his assignees, under an order in bankruptcy, sold the equity of redemption in the ship, and, after deducting the amount due to them, paid the balance into court under the Trustee Relief Act:

Held, that C.'s claim for freight could not be sustained, no notice of the assignment by A. having been given to the charterers or their agents.

Held, also, that it was not necessary that the mortgagees should admit the accuracy of the mortgagees' account, in order to entitle them to payment of the fund in court.

This was a petition by the assignees in bankruptcy of the estate and effects of David Jones, a shipowner, of Llanelli, Carmarthenshire, for payment out to them of a sum of £491. 14s. 3d. Consols, paid into court by the Marine Credit Company under the Trustee Relief Act. The main facts relating to this fund were as follows:—

On the 9th Sept. 1865 David Jones, in consideration of advances amounting to 10,000*l.* in all, executed mortgages to the Marine Credit Company of two ships, the Pride of Wales and the Annie Lisle, of which he was the owner, the Annie Lisle being then on her passage home from Montreal. On the 22nd Dec. in the same year, David Jones, being also indebted to one Thomas Saunders in a sum of upwards of 200*l.*, gave Saunders a written authority to receive all freight due to him as owner of the ship Annie Lisle, then on her passage home.

The document embodying this authority, which was signed by Jones, was presented by Saunders to Montgomery and Co., shipbrokers, acting for the owner, who acknowledged in writing its validity.

David Jones absconded in Jan. 1866, and on the 31st of the same month was adjudged a bankrupt, and the petitioners, Messrs. Jeremy and Evans, were appointed assignees. The Pride of Wales was wrecked in a gale, the mortgagees receiving the insurance money and obtaining the wreck. They obtained an order to sell the equity of redemption of the Annie Lisle, which they did. On the general balance of account between the Marine Credit Company and the bankrupt's estate, a balance of 750*l.* 18s. 3d., now represented by the fund in court, was found to be in the hands of the mortgagees, and as Saunders, as assignee of the freight of the Annie Lisle, claimed 225*l.* 16s. 8d. as the amount of such freight, and a second mortgagee claimed the surplus, and both claims were disputed by the bankrupt's assignees, the mortgagees paid the sum into court under the Trustee Relief Act. The assignees had obtained an order in bankruptcy to substantiate their claim to the fund in court, and accordingly presented this petition.

De Ger, Q. C. and Fischer, for the petitioners, submitted, with respect to the claim of Saunders for freight, that, subject to the right of the mortgagees, the freight was in the order and disposition of the bankrupt at the time of his absconding, which was the foundation of his bankruptcy. The document which, it was alleged, assigned the freight to Saunders, was not a valid assignment. No consideration was stated, nor was any notice given to the charterers. The second mortgage of the ship was not registered, and was void. They would not admit the correctness of the mortgagees' accounts.

Daly, for Saunders, maintained that the charterers were bound by the notice of the claim for freight, which had been given to Montgomery and Co., who were their agents. This petition was not the proper course by which to dispose of these conflicting claims, but a bill should have been filed.

Druce, Q. C., for the Marine Credit Company, the mortgagees, contended that the petitioners were not entitled to payment of the fund out of court, unless they admitted the correctness of the mortgagees' accounts.

Lisle v. Guthrie, 2 Bing. N. C. 706.

The VICE-CHANCELLOR stated briefly the facts upon which the questions in dispute turned as follows:—David Jones, a shipowner of Llanelli in Carmarthenshire, being indebted to one Thomas Saunders in a considerable sum of money, and being also the owner of a ship the Annie Lisle, then on her road homewards from Montreal, assigned to Saunders a document giving an authority to receive all freight due to the owner of the ship, the document being signed by Jones. This document was taken by Saunders to Montgomery and Co., shipbrokers acting as agents for the owner of the Annie Lisle, who acknowledged its validity, and indorsed it, and it is contended that this operated as a valid equitable assignment of the freight. The bankrupt's assignees now dispute this assignment, in the first place, on the ground that this was not the purport of the memorandum, which only purported to give an authority to receive the freight, and contained no intimation that it was for value, or that it was an equitable assignment. I am of opinion, however, that it is not necessary that it should be expressed to be for value, though one consideration cannot be shown to have been paid when the document states a different consideration; but it was competent to Mr. Saunders to show, and he has shown, that there was consideration, it being the forbearance of a debt. It appears to me also that there was a valid equitable assignment, giving to Saunders the right to receive the whole proceeds of the voyage. So far, therefore, as the first objection goes, that the memorandum was not a mortgage against Jones, I am of opinion that it was an equitable assignment of the freight, and a valid mortgage. It is then said that it only passed the outward-bound freight, but I think that the intention was to assign the homeward-bound freight also. The first two points, therefore, must be decided in favour of Mr. Saunders. The third question is the most important. It was necessary, in order to make the assignment valid as against the assignees, that notice should have been given to the charterers of the ship. The assignment being only valid as against the assignees if such notice had been given, it was essential that Saunders should show that he did what was necessary to take the freight out of the order and disposition of the bankrupt. There should have been notice to the charterers as to whom they were to pay the freight, and there is a total absence of evidence to show who the charterers were. Notice was given to Montgomery and Co., who were said to have been the agents for the charterers. At first I was in favour of Mr. Saunders on this point, but I have considered the matter, and am bound to conclude that Montgomery and Co. sustained no other character than that of agents for the shipowner, and were to receive the freight. It was important in one view that notice should be given to them, because they might have made advances on the credit of the freight, than which nothing could have been more common. But Saunders interposed their right to make any advance, and when he went to their office, Montgomery and Co. did not even know that they were to be agents in the matter, and there is nothing to show that they represented the charterers. No communication has been shown to have taken place between them and the charterers; they were agents of David Jones, the shipowner, to receive the freight, and whether they received it or not I am not told. They were not, therefore, agents of the charterers, and it follows that notice was given to the agents of a person not requiring it, as Jones, having himself created the equitable assignment, must have known of it, though it was important to prevent Montgomery and Co. from making advances to Jones. Reluctantly, therefore, because Mr. Saunders has acted very fairly, I must decide that he was bound to give notice to those who had to pay the money, and as he did not, the assignees are entitled, inasmuch as the freight remained in the order and disposition of the bankrupt. Mr. Druce contended that they, the mortgagees, having paid the money into court, the court cannot part with it on petition, unless the correctness of the mortgagees' accounts are admitted, and if the petitioners dispute these, they must establish their claim in a suit before they can take the fund out of court. But Wood, V. C., in Re Wright's Trusts, has decided that it is reasonable to hold that, whenever trustees pay money into court, they thereby admit the money to be due, and cannot raise a case against its being paid out. But Mr. Druce says they are not trustees, but are only mortgagees who had a balance in their hands.

THORBURN V. BARNES.

But what is the position of a mortgagee having received sufficient to satisfy principal, interest, and costs? He is a trustee of the balance, and is in the same position as any other trustee, and Mr. Druce is therefore precluded from setting up a defence against the payment of the money. The petitioners have established their title to the fund in court. The Marine Credit Company must have their costs.

COURT OF COMMON PLEAS.

Barristers-at-Law.

THORBURN V. BARNES.

Contract for cotton to arrive—Declaration of shipment by seller—Award—Arbitration—Misconduct—Pleadings.

A contract for the sale of cotton to arrive from India, March or April shipment, was made subject to the rules of the Liverpool Cotton Brokers' Association. By these rules the name of the ship is to be given to the buying broker within two calendar months after the date of the shipment named in the contract; a dispute arising out of the contract is to be referred to two members of the association, each party appointing one, or in default of appointment by one of the parties, the president is to nominate two arbitrators; there is a right of appeal against the award to the committee upon payment of a fee.

Notice of the shipment of the cotton was given to the buyer in the month of June, more than two months after it was actually shipped, but within that time of the end of April, which the seller alleged to be the meaning of the contract. The buyer refused to accept the cotton and appointed an arbitrator, but the seller declined to refer this question, alleging that it was not a dispute arising out of the contract. The president nominated two arbitrators, whose award against the seller was made within two hours of their nomination, no opportunity being given to either party to be heard.

Held, that a replication alleging the award to be void on account of these facts was no answer to a plea of the award in an action by the seller against the buyer for non-accepting.

This was an action upon a cotton contract, tried at the Liverpool Winter Assizes, before Blackburn, J. and a special jury. The agreement was on the terms of the printed rules of the Cotton Brokers' Association of Liverpool, of which those material to the case were set out in the pleadings.

The declaration stated,

That it was agreed by and between the said pit and the said deft. that the pit should sell to the deft. and the deft. should buy of the pit, certain cotton to arrive in Liverpool per ship or ships from Bombay on the terms of the printed rules of the Cotton Brokers' Association of Liverpool, as indorsed on the said agreement, to wit, 240 bales of cotton on the basis of 1s. 3½d. per lb. fair new merchants' Comrauwases, March or April shipment; no allowance to seller, in case of inferiority of quality, the cotton to be taken by the buyer as an allowance to be settled by arbitration in the usual manner. To be taken from the warehouse. And the pit says that, although before action he did and was ready and willing to do all things and all conditions precedent were performed, &c., yet the deft. broke the said agreement in this, that he did not nor would accept or receive the said cotton or any part thereof pursuant to the said agreement, nor pay for the same according to the terms of the said agreement or otherwise, but therein wholly made default, contrary to and in violation of the said agreement.

The second breach alleged was "that the deft. wholly and absolutely refused to accept or receive the said cotton or any part thereof."

The declaration also contained common counts for goods bargained and sold, goods sold and delivered, money paid, interest, and accounts stated.

The following are extracts from the printed rules endorsed on the agreement:

2. In all cases when the terms are by ship or ships, or for shipment before specified date, the name of the ship or ships, if from an East Indian port, must be given to the buying broker within two calendar months, or a month longer in the event of the non-arrival of the expected mail after the date of shipment named in the contract. In default the buyer shall have the option either of denouncing the contract immediately, or for as regards any undischarged number of bales, or of claiming the difference in price from the seller.

4. Where notice shall arrive by more than one vessel, each shipment shall be considered as constituting a separate contract, and there shall be a separate invoice for each shipment, and a separate arbitration if required.

7. In case of any dispute arising out of any contract, the matter to be referred to two members of the Cotton Brokers Association for settlement, each reference having power to call in a third member in case they shall deem it necessary. All applications for arbitration on either bought to arrive, shall be made within ten days of notice being received that the cotton is ready for delivery.

8. In the event, however, of one of the disputing parties appointing an arbitrator and the other refusing or neglecting to do so for three days after notice in writing of the appointment, or in case the arbitrator appointed shall not, within seven days after their appointment, agree to an award or appoint a third arbitrator, or after the appointment of such third arbitrator, in case of the death, refusal to act, or incapacity of any such three arbitrators, then upon application of either of the disputing parties, the question in dispute shall stand referred to two arbitrators to be nominated by the chairman of the association for the time being, or in case of his absence, illness, or interest in the matter in dispute, then by the deputy-chairman if not interested, and in case of the absence of the chairman and deputy-chairman, their illness or interest in the matter in dispute, then by the committee, and in case the two arbitrators so appointed, whether by the chairman, the deputy-chairman, or the committee, shall not, within seven days after their appointment, agree to an award or choose a third arbitrator, then the committee shall appoint a third arbitrator, and shall in the case of the death, refusal to act, or incapacity of any of such three arbitrators from time to time substitute a new arbitrator in the place of the arbitrator or arbitrators so dying, refusing, or incapacitated, the arbitrators in all cases to be members of the association.

9. No member of the committee having any interest in the matter of dispute shall vote on the question of the appointment of arbitrators, and no arbitrator having such interest shall be competent to sit on any arbitration, the award of any two arbitrators in writing signed by them, subject only to the right of appeal when mentioned, shall be conclusive and binding upon all disputing parties, both with respect to the matters in dispute, and all expenses of the reference and award.

10. In case either party shall be dissatisfied with the award, a right of appeal shall lie to the committee of the association, provided it be claimed before twelve o'clock on the day next after the day on which the objecting party shall have notice of the award, and provided also the app. fee to pay to the committee the sum of 10s. as a fee for the investigation, and an award signed by the chairman or in his absence by the deputy-chairman, and countersigned by the secretary, shall be deemed to be the award of the committee, and shall in all cases be final. For the purpose of enforcing any award by attachment or otherwise, these rules and any contract referring thereto, and the memorandum of the appointment of the arbitrators may be made a rule of any court of record.

These printed rules were set out in the third plea, and the defendants therein said:

That after the making of the said contract or agreement, the plaintiffs gave to the defendants a buying broker the name of the ship Das Atcham, from Bombay afloat, the same being an East Indian port, or the ship by and on board of which 316 of the 325 bales in the said contract mentioned were coming, and delivered the said 316 bales as against and to part performance of the said contract or agreement. And the defendants say that the said 316 bales of cotton so delivered or forwarded were shipped in the month of March, and were a March shipment, and that the plaintiffs did not give the name of the said ship to the defendants' buying broker within two calendar months next after the month of March, or the shipment of the said bales, although the expected mail did arrive. Wherefore the defendants refused to accept or receive the said 316 bales, and gave notice to the plaintiffs that he would not accept or take the same, and the defendants say that so far as relates to the first count of the declaration the plaintiffs are using in respect of such refusal by the defendants to accept or take the said 316 bales, and not otherwise.

By the fourth plea the defendants referred to the rules set out in the previous plea, and alleged the matters stated in that plea, but instead of admitting that he refused to accept or receive the 325 bales, he, in this plea, said,

That he contended and alleged that the said declaration was not a proper one, and by reason thereof he claimed to refuse to accept or receive the said bales, and to amend the said contract, so far as regarded the said 316 bales, and gave notice thereof to the plaintiffs, and a dispute thereupon having arisen between the plaintiffs and the defendants out of the said contract, he, the defendants, in pursuance of the said terms endorsed on the said contract appointed an arbitrator, and gave notice to the plaintiffs in writing of the said appointment, and the plaintiffs neglected to appoint another arbitrator for three days after the said notice, then, upon application of the defendants, the said question in dispute stood referred to two arbitrators, who were duly nominated by the chairman of the said association for the time being, according to the said terms, and the said arbitrators having taken upon themselves the said arbitration, afterwards did, according to the said terms, make and published their award in writing, signed by them, respecting the matters in dispute so referred to them, whereby they awarded and adjudged that the declaration of the said 316 bales so made by the plaintiffs was not a proper one, and that the defendants were entitled to amend the said contract so far as regarded the 316 bales, which said award remains and is unappealed against, and is of full force, and the defendants say that so far as relates to the first count of the declaration, the plaintiffs are using in respect of the refusal by the defendants to accept or take the said 316 bales, and not otherwise.

After joining issues,

For a further replication to the third plea, the plaintiffs said,

That the said agreement ended on in the first count of the declaration was made subject and was subject to a certain well-known usage and custom of the cotton trade of Liverpool, where the said agreement was made, according to which custom and usage the plaintiffs were, under the circumstances in the said third plea mentioned, bound by the said agreement to give the name of the said ship to the defendants' buying broker daily within two calendar months next after the month of April in the said agreement mentioned, and not before.

And, for a further replication to the fourth plea,

That the award in the said fourth plea mentioned was not an award duly and according to the said terms in the said rules contained made and published, and was not an award within the true intent and meaning of the said agreement and rules, by reason of the said arbitrators not having been duly nominated and appointed according to and within the true intent and meaning of the said rules.

And, for a further replication to the fourth plea,

That the award in the said fourth plea mentioned was not an award duly and according to the said terms in the said rules contained made and published, and was not an award within the true intent and meaning of the said agreement, by reason of the said award having been made before the said arbitrators were nominated according to and within the true intent and meaning of the said rules, and before they had taken upon themselves the said arbitration according to the said terms and meaning of the said rules.

And, for a further replication to the fourth plea, the plaintiffs, by way of equitable replication, repeated the facts which are stated in the last preceding replication, and said,

That they are respectively true, and that, in consequence of the premises, and of the plaintiffs agreeing with the defendants to move to set aside the said award, but to bring the said dispute in the fourth plea mentioned before the members of the Liverpool Cotton Brokers Association, the defendants agreed with the plaintiffs to throw up and abandon the award, and to renounce all benefit under the same, and the plaintiffs say that he did obtain, according to the said agreement, from moving to have the said award set aside as aforesaid, and that the same within which he could move to set aside the said award has now passed, and that the said dispute was brought, according to the said agreement, before the members of the said association, and that the defendants is contrary to the said agreement not pleading the said award, and thereby trying to derive benefit from the same, contrary to and in violation of the said agreement.

The defendants joined issues upon, and demurred to, all these replications.

The facts proved at the trial were as follows:—

The plaintiffs is a cotton broker at Liverpool and a member of the Liverpool Cotton Brokers Association; the defendants is a spinner who employed as his broker Mr. S. M. Bellay, another member of the association.

On the 10th March 1885 the 325 bales of cotton, which are the subject of dispute, were shipped on board the Das Atcham at Bombay, and on the 27th the ship sailed for Liverpool.

On the 7th April the contract mentioned in the first count of the declaration was made between the parties.

THORBURN v. BARNES.

[C. P.]

On the 21st June this letter was received by Mr. Bulley from the plt.; the letter was dated the same day:

We beg to give you notice of the 250 bales cotton sold you to arrive 7th April; 225 bales are coming by the Ann Millicent, and we shall give you the ship's name for the other 25 bales in a day or two.

On the 10th July Mr. Bulley wrote to the plt.:

I find that the Ann Millicent by which you declare 225 Oomrawattees cleared in the month of March, whilst your declaration is dated 21st June. I cannot, therefore, on the part of Mr. Thomas Barnes accept the declaration.

On the 31st July the Ann Millicent arrived, and the plt. gave notice of her arrival to Mr. Bulley by letter, and denied the deft.'s right to repudiate the contract and threatened legal proceedings.

On the 1st Aug. Mr. Bulley appointed Mr. J. C. Jones as his arbitrator under the seventh rule.

On the 2nd Aug. at a meeting of the association, a recommendation was unanimously carried to the effect that in contracts for arrival the ships conveying the cotton should be declared within the two months next succeeding the actual shipment or sailing of the cotton from an East Indian port.

On the 11th Aug. the plt. sent notice that the cotton was ready for delivery.

On the 15th Aug. Mr. Bulley gave the plt. notice that if he failed to nominate an arbitrator by the 17th an application would be made to the chairman of the association to appoint arbitrators under the 8th rule.

On the 20th Aug., in accordance with this notice, application was made on behalf of the deft. to the chairman, and all the documents were sent to him.

On the 21st Aug. the chairman informed both parties that he had appointed Mr. J. C. Jones and Mr. W. Durning to settle the matter in dispute.

On the 31st Aug. the chairman wrote another letter to both parties, in which he said that, as the plt. had objected to Mr. J. C. Jones, who had been chosen as arbitrator by the deft., he had nominated Mr. E. Habershon to act instead of him.

On the same day, and within two hours of the receipt of this letter by the plt., the following award was sent to both parties:

Arbitration on contract for 225 (part 250) bales Surat cotton, bought by Mr. Thomas Barnes from Messrs. Thomas Thorburn and Co., on the 7th April 1866.

We, the undersigned cotton brokers, having considered all the circumstances connected with the above case, do hereby decide that the declaration made on the 21st June is not a proper one, and consequently the buyer has the power to cancel this contract.

Liverpool, 31st Aug. 1866.

WM. DURNING.
E. HABERSHON.

On the 5th Sept. the plt. wrote to Mr. Bulley giving notice that he should sell the cotton at deft.'s risk, and Mr. Bulley answered that he should bring the affair before the association.

On the 7th Sept., at a weekly meeting of the Cotton Brokers' Association, it was unanimously resolved that Mr. Thorburn be respectfully and earnestly requested to leave the matter in dispute between him and Mr. Bulley to the decision of the committee.

On the 14th Sept., at the next weekly meeting, it was recommended by a large majority that the whole matter be reopened and left to the decision of two fresh arbitrators, with the understanding that they should call in a third.

On the 28th Sept., at another weekly meeting, it was resolved by a large majority that the whole matter be left to a fresh arbitration, and the final appeal be to the body at large of the association. Mr. Bulley declined to adopt this course.

On the 26th Oct., at another weekly meeting, an unsuccessful attempt was made to pass a resolution to the effect that the decision of the arbitrators was annulled by the vote of the 14th Sept.

On the 26th Oct. the plt. informed Mr. Bulley that the cotton was sold at a loss of 1022*l.* 16*s.* 8*d.* upon the contract price.

On the 7th Nov. this action was commenced.

The jury found a verdict for the deft., and the judge reserved leave to the plt. to move the court.

Brett, Q. C. obtained a rule nisi on the 14th Jan., calling upon the deft. to show cause why his verdict should not be set aside, and a verdict entered for the plt. for 1022*l.* 16*s.* 8*d.*, pursuant to leave reserved, on the grounds, first, that the declaration of the ship was in sufficient time; secondly, that the award was void, because not on a dispute within the rules, or because there was no power in the president to change the arbitration, or because the plt. had no notice of meeting and no opportunity of being heard; and why judgment should not be entered for the plt. on the fourth plea, notwithstanding the verdict found thereon for the deft.

Quain, Q. C. and R. G. Williams showed cause.—The first point taken by the plt. at the trial was that the time in which the ship was required to be declared was within two months of the last day upon which the shipment could be made. By the fourth of the indorsed rules, when cotton shall arrive by more than one vessel, each shipment shall be considered as constituting a separate contract. We must therefore consider the shipment of the 225 bales by itself, and as the seller chose the time of shipment he must be bound by the clear meaning of the words in the rule as to the time of the declaration. If this is not a dispute arising out of the contract, which was the next point taken, no question can be said to so arise. With regard to the power of the president to change the arbitrator, although it was the subject of one of the replications, it was not mentioned at the trial, and cannot therefore be now questioned. In the next place, the plt. denied the validity of the award on the ground that he had no notice of meeting, and no opportunity of being heard. As neither party appeared before the arbitrators, they were both in the same position. Besides a remedy is provided in the rules by means of an appeal to the committee in the case of a void award. Now there can be no doubt there was an award, although the plt. said in his cross-examination that he did not consider there had been. It has been laid down that the misconduct of the arbitrator can be no answer to an action upon an award, and several cases are mentioned as illustrations in note 8 to Veale v. Warner, 1 Wms. Saund. 327 a.; see also Whitmore v. Smith, 7 H. & N. 509. The present case is much stronger than Re Brook, 33 L. J. 246, C. P., in which, upon a motion to set aside an award on the ground that the parties were not heard, it was decided that the award was bad, notwithstanding proof that it was the mercantile usage. The only way to raise the question of the validity of the award before the court is by motion, and even by that means it could not be upset, unless the parties had availed themselves of the remedy provided in the rules. It was held in Grazebrook v. Davies, 5 B. & C. 534, that to an action on a bond for the performance of an award a plea that sufficient time was not allowed to hear the deft.'s witnesses was bad. Here the question raised in the replication is the same, viz., whether sufficient time was allowed.

Brett, Q. C. and C. Russell supported the rule.—This contract is for the sale of cotton to arrive; the seller may declare the cotton by any ship, provided the shipment took place in the months of March or April. The words of the second rule are, "the name of the ship must be given to the buying broker within two months after the date of the shipment named in the contract." The only date of shipment named in the contract is March or April; the declaration, therefore, may take place within two months of the end of April. The minutes of the association were made part of the evidence. By them it appears that, although no subsequent conclusion was arrived at, an appeal from the award was actually made in accordance with the rules. I read the words "in case of any dispute arising out of the contract" as meaning a dispute whether, as a question of fact, the contract was or was not fulfilled, and not a dispute concerning the interpretation of the words of the contract. As the second ground upon which we impeach the award was not mentioned at the trial, we will not refer to it; but on the third ground we submit that there was no award at all. Within two hours of the time when the plt. heard of the appointment of the arbitrators he received their award. This is certainly a question of misconduct, but it was so great as to be a miscarriage of justice; and by analogy with the law in the case of a foreign judgment, discussed in the note to the Duchess of Kingston's case, 2 Sm. L. C. 683, if an award or a judgment appears on the face of the proceedings to offend common reason and justice, or even to be grossly defective, it would not be conclusive. In the case of Buchanan v. Rucker, 9 East, 192, this rule was extended to a case where the defect did not appear on the face of the proceedings. [WILLES, J.—A judgment on an award without hearing would be unquestionably set aside; the only question is as to the remedy necessary to be adopted.] If the facts be such as to make a judgment void, it must be taken as if it never was made. Bruce v. Wint, 1 M. & G. 1, and the terms used by the court in Re Brook are very strong on this very defect. If this is a good objection, either in law or equity, according to the terms of the leave reserved, the plt. ought to have judgment, and if necessary an equitable replication can be added. The cases cited on the other side are distinguishable from this one.

WILLES, J.—This was an action for not accepting cotton which was shipped on the 19th March, on board the Ann Millicent, pursuant to a contract dated the 7th April 1866, according to the rules of the Liverpool Cotton Brokers' Association. It was agreed in the contract that the cotton should be a March or April shipment, and one of the rules indorsed on the back was to the effect that on sale of cotton to arrive, the ship should be declared within two calendar months of the date of shipment named in the contract. The declaration of the ship was made on the 21st June, which the plt. alleged was within two months after the date of shipment named in the contract; and the deft. alleged that it was more than two months from the date of the actual shipment. This was the original dispute between the parties. Before we recognise any necessity to decide this point, we must consider whether, as the deft. says, this has been decided under the seventh article of the association. The award was made, in fact, in pursuance of the rules on this very point in question, and the conclusion was adverse to the plt. Then the question arises as to whether it was valid. The first objection made was that the award was void, because, the dispute being whether the declaration was made within the time required, was not within the terms of the seventh rule—that is, it was not a dispute arising out of the contract, but rather it was a dispute upon the construction of the contract, and, as it is said, within the four corners of the contract. This seems to me to be a criticism not adapted to the language. I cannot accede to this interpretation of the words "out of;" I cannot distinguish between the contract itself and a breach in matters arising out of the contract. Secondly, it was said there was no power in the president to change the arbitrator. It was objected that Mr. Jones had been chosen arbitrator by the deft. at the inception of the dispute, and the president thereupon nominated some one else in his stead. It is enough to say that this point was not raised at the trial, and it is not reserved for our decision. Thirdly, it was alleged that there was no opportunity for the plt. to be heard, but within two hours after he had received notice of the appointment of the arbitrators the award was made. The deft.'s attorney had laid the materials for the decision before the president, but neither party was heard by the arbitrators. If this objection were raised in the course of proceedings at which it might be considered, I should probably hold that nothing which could be said would justify such an arbitration; but, in this particular case, I must first investigate the question whether the objection was raised in a form competent to be considered; that question is whether the validity of the award can be disputed by the pleadings, or only by a rule to set it aside. I think the latter is the only plan by which such a matter can be discussed. Doubtless the first principle in arbitrations, as in every judicial decision, is to hear both parties; but it is a sufficient remedy for this breach of the principle that such an award could be set aside by motion. It was argued by Mr. Brett that an analogy exists between an award and a foreign judgment; but there is this difference between the two: the arbitrator is appointed by contract between the parties, and they stipulate to abide by his decision; a judge is appointed by law. It is not unreasonable that a judgment of the former shall stand until it is overruled in the way formally provided for such a case. It cannot be set aside on plea, although it may be on motion. The allegation that the arbitrator has not sufficiently heard the parties is not a good plea to an award, and I can draw no distinction between an insufficient hearing and no opportunity to be heard. Neither reason nor the authorities can establish any other view of the matter. The rule ought therefore to be discharged on these grounds, which makes it unnecessary to express any opinion on the other points, unless the parties demand it.

KEATINGE, J.—I am of the same opinion that the award is binding, considering the time and the manner in which its validity has been impeached. Mr. Brett insisted that its decision was not within the terms of the submission, and he drew a distinction between the fulfilment of the contract and the terms of the contract. In order to give effect to this contention, it would be necessary for the parties first to agree upon the terms of the contract. Here mercantile men agreed to refer their dispute to mercantile men, and to imagine that the words meant to exclude the meaning of the contract cannot hold. The next ground was abandoned by Mr. Brett, and it was then said that the award was void because it was contrary to natural justice, in that the parties were not heard. I was first of opinion that the objection was a good one; but we are not called upon to say whether the plt. was bound by the arbitrator's decision, but whether he has raised the point in the right way. It seems to me that the authorities are against him. In Braddick v. Thompson, 8 East, 344, it was held, that partiality and improper conduct in an arbitrator in not hearing one side could not be pleaded in bar to an action on an award. In truth, unless there is misconduct on the part of the arbitrators, the award is good, and if there is misconduct the award can only be set aside by motion. In the judgment of the Ex. Ch., in Whitmore v. Smith, 7 H. & N. 519, it was said, "In truth, this objection (to an award on account of arbitrator's misconduct), assuming it to be well founded, is one of a sort which ought to be

And the defts. say that they were ready and willing to have all disputes which arose out of the said contract referred in manner provided by the said agreement, whereof the plt. had notice, but the plt. wholly refused to allow the matter of the dispute hereinbefore mentioned to be so referred and settled. Whereupon the defts. refused to allow the matter in the said first count in that behalf mentioned to be so referred and settled as therein mentioned.

The third plea was demurred to by the plt. for the reason, amongst others, that the defts. were not justified in repudiating the contract on the ground of the goods not being equal to the sample, but were only entitled under the contract to a fair allowance. As the plea showed no answer to the breach for not settling the allowance, it was bad as to part, and therefore as to the whole of it.

The fifth and seventh pleas were demurred to upon grounds which appear in the special case, and in the arguments.

The special case stated that the plt. and the defts. are merchants in London. In the summer of 1864 Messrs. De Souza and Co., correspondents of the plt. at Madras, shipped on board the ship Cheviot, under a bill of lading, in the following form:

Shipped in good order and well conditioned, by F. de Souza Cammide, and Co., in and upon the good ship called the Cheviot, whereof is master for this present voyage J. H. Henderson, and now riding at anchor in Madras roads, and bound for London, 201 bales of cotton, being marked and numbered as in the margin, and are to be delivered in the like good order, and well conditioned at the aforesaid port of London, the act of God, the Queen's enemies, fire, and all and every other dangers and accidents of the seas, rivers, and navigation of whatever nature and kind soever (save risks of boats so far as the ships are liable thereto) excepted, unto order. Freight for the said goods being payable on delivery at the rate of 3l. 10s. sterling per ton of fifty cubic feet noted in the margin, with primage and average accustomed. In witness whereof I, the master or purser of the said ship, have affixed my hand to three bills of lading, all of this tenor and date, the one of which three bills being accomplished, the other two to stand void.

Dated in Madras this thirty-first day of May 1864. Weight and contents unknown to.

There were no other bales of cotton marked ^DC _C on board the Cheviot but the 128 noted in the margin of this bill of lading. De Souza and Co. consigned the said cotton to the plt., and they duly advised him of such consignment. They also sent him a sample of cotton by the Overland mail, which sample consisted of a kind of cotton known in the London market as "long-stapled Salem cotton of fine quality." The sample was in a paper which was marked on the outside, ^DC _C 128 bales Western cotton per Cheviot.

Upon receipt of the sample the plt. took it to Messrs. Barber, Nephew, and Co., London, cotton brokers, with whom he had conversation concerning the sale of the cotton. Mr. Barber expressed his opinion that, notwithstanding what was written on the outside of the paper, the sample was long staple Salem, and not Western cotton.

The defts. subsequently applied to Mr. Barber for the purchase of some long staple Salem cotton for some correspondents of theirs, when Mr. Barber showed them the sample which the plt. had left with him, and told them he considered it to be the cotton they required. No mention was made by Mr. Barber, and no notice was taken by the defts. of the writing on the paper.

After communicating with their correspondents, the defts. authorised Messrs. Barber and Co. to purchase the cotton, and the latter filled up a printed form commonly used on the London market, and known as "The certified London contract," as follows; the words in italics are those inserted by the broker:

Certified London Contract.

London, 15th July 1864.

Sold by order and for account of Messrs. J. C. Azemar and Co., to Messrs. A. Casella and Co. the following cotton, viz, ^DC _C 128 bales at 25d. per lb., expected to arrive in London per Cheviot from Madras. The cotton guaranteed equal to sealed sample in our possession. Should the quality prove inferior to the guarantee a fair allowance to be made. Any slight variation in marks not to vitiate this contract. The cotton to be warehoused at seller's expense in one of the public docks or customary wharves. The buyer to pay a deposit of 12l. per bale, to be returned in the event of loss by fire on the second Saturday after the final day of landing in exchange for dock or wharf weight notes, and the remainder of the purchase-money at the expiration of the usual three months prompt, or on delivery of the warrants. Interest being allowed at the rate of 5 per cent for prepayment. The first and second class sea-damaged bales (if any) to be made merchantable and taken at 1s. 8d. per lb. less than the sound. The third and fourth class sea-damaged bales (if any) to be taken at a fair allowance. The cotton after landing to be at the risk of the seller (only to the amount of this contract value) until the prompt day or the delivery of the warrants or orders of delivery, whichever may first happen. Should the cotton, or any portion thereof, not arrive by the above-named vessel, from loss of vessel or other unavoidable causes, this contract for such portion to be void, but should the cotton be transhipped and arrive in London by other vessels this contract to hold good. In the event of any dispute arising out of this contract, the matter to be referred to two disinterested London cotton brokers for arbitration, buyer and seller each nominating one.

Brokerage $\frac{1}{2}$ per cent.

Guarantee $\frac{1}{2}$ per cent.

Barber, Nephew, and Co.

The eighth paragraph of the case stated:

"The Cheviot arrived in London on the 14th Oct. 1864 having on board several thousand bales of cotton, and amongst them the 128 bales shipped by De Souza as already mentioned, which were the only bales marked ^DC _C. The 128 bales were landed and warehoused by the plt. at Cotton's and Depôt Wharf, and weight notes were made out by the wharfingers in the ordinary way. The cotton had been previously examined by the wharfingers for the purpose of ascertaining which of the bales (if any) were sea-damaged, and of classifying same, and for the purpose of making them merchantable when necessary and possible. . . . None of the 128 bales in question contained any sea-damaged cotton."

"The landing of the cotton was completed on Wednesday, 26th Oct. 1864, and the deposit, amounting to 1556l., would have become payable on Saturday, 5th Nov. 1864, and the prompt would have expired on the 28th Jan. 1865. The wharfingers drew samples from the bulk in the ordinary way, which were shown to the defts. by Barber, Nephew, and Co. The defts. upon seeing the bulk samples, at once stated to Barber, Nephew, and Co., that they claimed to reject the cotton on the ground that it was not long staple Salem cotton, and that they required an arbitration on that point. The cotton was not long staple Salem, but was a particularly good sample of Western Madras. The cotton was therefore not in accordance with the sample. Western Madras cotton is inferior to long staple Salem, and requires machinery for its manufacture different to that which is used for long staple Salem, and the market price of Western Madras was at date of contract only 23d. per pound. The defts.' correspondents have refused to accept the cotton by the Cheviot in fulfilment of the defts.' sale to them, on the ground that it was not long staple Salem, and that they could not employ it for the manufacturing purpose for which they had bought it, and the defts. have lost their commission amounting to 80l. 12s. 3d."

Some correspondence took place between the parties soon after the landing of the cotton, and arbitrators were nominated for the settlement of the dispute; the plt. however instructed his arbitrator to consider only the allowance to be made for the difference in value between the sample and the bulk, and the defts. demanded arbitration upon this right to repudiate the contract. No settlement, therefore, was arrived at.

After the trial the brokers appointed decided that the difference in value between the sample and bulk was 8d. per pound.

The question reserved for the opinion of the court was whether the plt. under the circumstances of the case was entitled to maintain this action.

Honyman, Q. C. (with him Macleod) argued for the plt.—The arbitrator finds that cotton comes from various places, and that from each place there are various kinds, and that of each kind there are various qualities. From Madras come the two kinds of cotton which compose the sample and bulk in this case, called long-stapled Salem and Western. The plt. says that the defts. must take this cotton, subject to a reduction of price; the defts. say the sample and bulk are so different that they are justified in throwing up the contract. First, with regard to the effect of this contract. It was held in the case of Parsons v. Sexton, 4 C. B. 899, that upon the agreement to purchase a steam-engine described as “a certain fourteen-horse engine which our foreman has inspected,” there was a bargain for a specific engine; and after its erection, assuming there was a warranty as to its power, and that the warranty was broken, that was no answer to an action for the price, but only ground for a reduction, or the subject of a cross-action.” Upon the sale of specific goods, with a warranty that they are equal to sample, the vendee cannot, it seems by the case of Dawson v. Collis, 10 C. B. 523, refuse to receive them on the ground that they do not correspond with the sample, unless there be an express condition to that effect, but must resort to a cross-action, or rely on the non-correspondence with sample as a ground for reduction of damages. Upon the authority of these cases I submit that this was a bargain for specific goods, and that the property passed upon the making of the contract; it is not, therefore, in the power of the defts. to set up this defence against the action. Secondly, assuming that the cotton did not pass to the defts. before its arrival, the words “equal to sample” are a collateral warranty only. Lord Abinger said in his judgment in Chanter v. Hopkins, 4 M. & W. 404, “A warranty is an express or implied statement of something which the party undertakes shall be part of a contract; and though part of the contract, yet collateral to the express object of it.” And in the concluding paragraph of the judgment in Bannerman v. White, 10 C. B., N. S., 860, Erle, C. J. laid down that “the intention of the parties governs in the making and in the construction of all contracts. If the parties so intend, the sale may be absolute with a warranty superadded, or the sale may be conditional to be null if the warranty is broken.” The decision of the Ex. Ch. in Behn v. Burness, 3 B. & S. 751, was in respect only of policies of insurance and charter-parties; it was there held that the words “now in Amsterdam” amounted to a warranty or condition precedent to the contract. The principle of all these cases is, that the remedy for the breach of a collateral warranty is either by cross-action or by deduction from the price. What I contend for is, if this is a sale of specific cotton the property passed to the defts. immediately; but if not, this guarantee must be taken not as a condition precedent, but as a collateral warranty. It is maintained on the other side that “quality” does not mean “kind” or “species,” but “degree” or “variety of the same species;” but there is no authority for so limiting the interpretation of the word. The third plea, that the cotton is not equal to sample, is bad, for a special remedy is provided in the contract for this fact, if it occurs. The inferiority to the sealed sample might consist either of the degree of the same kind of cotton, or of a different quality, both of which can be remedied by an allowance. The warranty cannot mean differently with regard to kind and quality. I submit that “guarantee” is not a word of condition, but a word of contract, and the remedy of the deft. is either by cross-action or allowance upon arbitration. Some questions arise as to the measure of the defts.’ liability upon the facts mentioned in the special case. The contract price was 25d. per pound, and the brokers have fixed the difference between the value of the sample and bulk at 3d. per pound. The contract was made on the 15th July 1864, the deposit of 12l. per bale was payable on the 5th Nov., and this action was commenced on the 24th Nov. The contract was repudiated by the defts. on the 24th Oct., upon which day the price of the cotton was 15½d. per pound; the damages therefore should be the difference between 22d. and 15½d. per pound.

Brown, Q. C. (with him Hannen) for the defts.—The property does not pass by such a contract as this: (Logan v. Le Mesurier, 6 Moo. P. C. Cas. 116.) [The Court agreed to this, and stopped further argument on this point.] The plt. should have agreed to arbitration on all the points in dispute; but it is now for the court to say whether the defts. were right in refusing to accept the cotton. I submit, first, that the guarantee in this case was a condition precedent, the breach of which justified the defts. in cancelling the contract; secondly, that the allowance clause clearly applies to the quality only, and not to the kind of cotton. This was a sale with a warranty or condition: (Syers v. Jonas, 2 Ex. 111.) In what cases a breach of warranty gives a right to cancel a contract was considered and settled in Behn v. Burness, and in the note to Cutler v. Powell, which is quoted in the argument in that case. [WILLES, J.—We hold to the law laid down by Parke, B., in Syers v. Jonas, that an agreement that the bulk shall correspond with the sample authorises the purchaser to refuse to receive an article differing from the sample, if it has not been delivered, or the property has not passed by the bargain.] This is a contract for sale where the goods do not pass, and, unless there is something in the contract to the contrary, we were justified in refusing the goods. I say that the allowance clause applies only when the bulk differs in degree and not in kind from the sample. How could allowance be made, if the bulk were of a better quality and a more valuable kind than the sample? As the defts. could not use this cotton with their machinery, they would have been obliged to sell it at a loss. Some light may be thrown upon these clauses by the rule of law and equity concerning allowance in sales of realty. Dart’s Vend. & Pur. ch. 4, p. 111: “A condition of sale as to compensation for misdescription by the vendor cannot, it appears, be enforced upon a sale.” The different effects of a warranty upon the quality and kind of articles sold are clearly explained in the following cases:

Nichol v. Godts, 10 Ex. 191;

Wieler v. Schilizzi, 17 C. B. 619;

Josling v. Kingsford, 13 C. B., N. S., 447;

Gompertz v. Bartlett, 3 El. & B. 849.

(Stopped on the measure of liability.)

Honyman was heard in reply.

WILLES, J.—I am of opinion that our judgment ought to be for the defts. The action was on a contract for cotton to arrive by the ship Cheviot from Madras. Upon arrival the cotton was rejected by the defts., the purchasers, because it was not the same as the sample. The defts. maintained that the thing which the plt. attempted to make them take did not come within the terms of the contract, and refused arbitration, except on condition that their right to repudiate the purchase, as well as the difference in value, should be submitted to the arbitrators. The defendants are not answerable for the failure to arbitrate; they were not bound to refer less than the whole dispute. It is for us to decide whether the defendants are right in rejecting the cotton, or whether the plaintiff is right in maintaining that it was a case for an allowance. On the 15th July 1864, Barber, who was broker for both parties, sold 128 bales of cotton ^{DO} expected to arrive on board the Chester from Madras at 35s. per lb., and if the contract had stopped here, it would have been a description of specific goods, as was argued by Sir G. Honyman. The introductory paragraph fails to describe any particular kind of cotton, and any cotton from Madras on board that ship with this particular mark would have been within the contract under that description. The agreement then proceeds to describe the subject of the sale, "The cotton guaranteed equal to sealed sample in our possession." The sample turned out to consist of long staple Salem cotton. By a bargain for specific goods the property is vested in the buyer, and if the contract is not modified by what follows, the argument on the part of the plaintiff would hold, and the remedy would have been by cross-action on the warranty. But it cannot be successfully contended that this is a case in which the property passed by the contract. The only questions are, whether the words "equal to sealed sample" relate to the species of cotton, and whether the two cottons are of the same species, which latter point we have to decide upon the facts detailed in the eighth paragraph of the case. I entertain no doubt as to the first point; the contract cannot be extended to mean that the seller could force upon the buyer an article different to that which he intended to buy. The next sentence in the agreement is, "Should the quality prove inferior to the guarantee a fair allowance to be made," by which it was meant that the buyer should keep an article worse than the sample if it were of the same kind, and an allowance should be made to him. I do not see any similarity between cases of this kind and purchases of land, and I do not act upon the authorities concerning the latter. Let us see whether the contract ought to be construed to relate to the particular species of cotton contended for by the defendants. The first remarkable fact is the description of the sample itself; it was long staple Salem cotton, a well-known cotton from Madras; this is unquestionable; the question is, whether it was of the same species as the bulk, which was proved to be a fine sort of Western Madras. We have to determine whether fine Western can be considered the same kind of cotton as long staple Salem. In my opinion this would be a good question for the decision of a jury. But we must consider the argument of Mr. Brown, which is, that when a man agrees to buy long staple Salem cotton and gets instead Western cotton, the difference described in the eighth paragraph is essential to the validity of the contract, and that it was implied in the words of the contract that the cotton must be of the same kind as the sample. I am confirmed in my opinion that the defendants had a right to repudiate the contract, by the fact that, although the bulk was composed of the finest Western cotton, yet the cotton in the sample, which was not the finest description of long staple Salem, was worth 8d. a lb. more than the other. I am compelled therefore to hold that what was delivered was not of the same kind as that which was the subject of the sale.

AL. SMITH, J.—I am of the same opinion that our judgment should be for the defendants. The contract did not pass the property. If it depended upon the first sentence only the plaintiff might have been entitled to his claim; but the question arises whether the expression in the contract, that the bulk should be of the same description as the sample, is a condition or only a collateral warranty. I think there is an implied condition in this expression, and this would seem to justify the defendants in rescinding the contract. This, however, is qualified by what follows concerning the allowance to be made. The whole case turns upon the meaning of this clause. In order to discover whether the cotton was inferior to the sample we must examine the sample; there is no doubt that it consisted of long staple Salem cotton. It seems to me that the contract should be read as if it contained a description of the cotton in the bulk. It is clear that upon a contract so expressed in words, or as here referring to a sample, which is equivalent, the purchaser has a right to an article of the same sort or kind as that which is intended to purchase. The value of cotton depends upon the case with which it can be spun, and the material into which it can be made; the cotton in the bulk is known in the market to be of a different kind, and to require different machinery from the cotton in the sample. The same difference is kind would be illustrated by a purchaser's agreeing to buy spirit according to a sample of brandy, and the seller's delivering instead a quantity of rum. You want here a standard of comparison, for, as I infer, no quality of Western cotton could be exactly the same as any long staple Salem cotton. The contract meant only that if the bulk varied in quality from a sample of the same description the purchaser should keep the cotton at an allowance. The other breach, for not proceeding to reference, was given up by the counsel for the plaintiff, and it is clear that the defendants were justified in so doing.

WILLER, J. said:—So far as my brother Keating's views were formed by the part of the argument during which he was present, they were in favour of the defendants.

KAY v. WHEELER.

Bill of lading—Shipowner's responsibility—Damage done to cargo by rats.

A shipowner is responsible to the consignee for damage done by rats to the cargo shipped under a bill of lading with the usual exceptions, notwithstanding the fact that every possible precaution had been taken to clear the ship from vermin.

Laveroni v. Drury, 8 Ex. 160, affirmed by the Ex. Ch.

The following special case was stated without pleadings for the opinion of the Court of C. P. by the consent of the parties and by the order of Keating, J., dated the 31st Oct. 1865, pursuant to the 46th section of the C. L. P. A. 1833. Judgment was given for the plaintiff, and the defendants now appeal to the Court of Ex. Ch.

EX. CH.]

KAY D. WHEELER.

[EX. CH.]

The pils. are merchants in the city of London, and the defts. in the month of Nov. 1863 were, and are now, the owners of the vessel Victoria.

In Nov. 1863, Messrs. Wilson, Ritchie, and Co. shipped on board the Victoria at Colombo, for carriage to London, 412 bags of coffee, and the following bill of lading was signed for the same by the master of the ship:

Shipped in good order and well conditioned, by Wilson, Ritchie, and Co., in and upon the good ship called the Victoria, wharves in manner for the present voyage A. C. Fama, and now riding at anchor in these roads and bound for London:

B 127 Bags.
H 25 "

612 Bags.

Four hundred and twelve bags native coffee, being marked and numbered as to the marks, and are to be delivered in the like good order and well conditioned at the above-named port of London (the act of God, the Queen's enemies, fire, all and every other dangers and accidents of the sea, rivers and navigation, of whatever nature or kind soever, excepted), unto Messrs. Kay Pluley, and Co., or to their assignee, paying freight for the said goods as 11 lbs. per ton of short nett, with primings and charges as usual. In witness whereof the master or purser of the said ship hath affixed to three bills of lading all of this tenor and date, the one of which three bills being accomplished the other two to stand void.

Dated at Colombo, 25th Nov. 1863. Weight and contents unknown to A. C. Fama.

The pils. were the consignees named in the bill of lading, and the said coffee was consigned to them by the said Messrs. Wilson, Ritchie, and Co., so as to pass the property in the coffee to the pils.

The Victoria arrived in London in April 1864, and was unloaded at the West India Dock.

Upon the coffee being discharged it was discovered that a portion of the bags had been gnawed by rats during the voyage, and the contents partly eaten and damaged by them, and that the coffee was thereby depreciated in value to the amount of $71.

The pils. thereupon made a claim on the ship-owners for the damage done by rats.

The ship had on board during the time she was at and on leaving Colombo two cats and two mongooses, a species of Cingalese ferret, very destructive to rats, and also before leaving London for Ceylon a professed rat-killer was employed by the defts. to clear the ship of vermin, and he cleared the ship of rats, and every possible precaution was taken to keep rats out of the ship from the time she left until her return to London.

The pils. contend that the defts. are liable for the above damage to the coffee caused by the rats.

The defts., on the contrary, contend that they are not liable for the said damage, as every precaution had been taken by them to preserve the coffee from rats.

The court is to be at liberty to draw inferences of fact in the same way as a jury would be entitled to do.

The question for the opinion of the court is, whether the defts. are, under the above circumstances, liable for the said damage.

If the court shall be of opinion in the affirmative, then judgment shall be entered up for the pils. for $71, together with costs of suit.

If the court shall be of opinion in the negative, then judgment of non est proventus, with costs of defence, shall be entered for the defts.

Afterwards, on the 24th Jan. 1866, came here the parties aforesaid, and the court is of opinion that the defts. are, under the above circumstances, liable for the said damage. Therefore it is considered that the pils. do recover against the said defts. the sum of $71 and 32s. 17d. for their costs of suit.

The defts. say there is error in the above record and proceedings, and the pils. say that there is no error therein.

W. Williams argued for the defts.—This is an action by a merchant against a shipowner for damage done by rats to part of the cargo which was shipped for the merchant under a bill of lading, in which were the usual exceptions to the shipowner's responsibility, viz., "the act of God, the Queen's enemies, fire, all and every other dangers and accidents of the sea, rivers and navigation, of what nature or kind soever, excepted." To the action the defts. plead that they had two cats and two Cingalese mongooses on board the ship; and also that a professed rat-killer was employed in London before sailing to clear the ship from vermin; all possible precautions against injury by rats had therefore been taken by the defts. In Larson v. Drury, 8 Ex. 166, it was held that "the owner of a general ship is subject to the same responsibility for loss or damage of goods as a common carrier. Therefore where by the terms of a bill of lading, containing the usual exceptions, the owner undertook absolutely to deliver goods shipped on board his vessel, he was not excused by reason of the goods having been damaged by rats, notwithstanding he had kept cats on board, such damage not being within any of the exceptions in the bill of lading. I submit first, that the present case can be distinguished from Larson v. Drury, and if I fail to show a distinction, I shall ask this court to overrule that decision. I maintain that a shipowner is not a common carrier, at all events when his contract of carriage consists of a bill of lading. In Cayes v. Bernard, 1 Sm. L. C. 171, it is laid down that a shipowner may be a common carrier; but I say that, in order to be a common carrier, a man must not only carry for hire, but ply publicly and habitually between the same places, and he must be liable to an action for refusing to carry goods. My authority for this is Brid v. Dale, 3 M. & R. 80, which however is somewhat modified by Brett v. The Peninsular and Oriental Steamship Company, 6 C. B. 775. I shall next attempt to show that damage done by rats is, when proper precautions are taken, a peril of the sea and an exception to the shipowner's liability. The dangers and accidents of navigation are those which cannot be provided against; this is certainly an accident of that kind, for the damage happened notwithstanding the fact that all possible precautions had been taken. In the two cases mentioned in the argument of Larson v. Drury, viz., Dale v. Hall, 1 Wils. 261, and Hunter v. Potts, 4 Camp. 208, the injury was done by holes eaten by the rats through the bottom of the ship. Emerigon gives in Traité des Assurances, c. 12, s. 1 (1 Boulay Paty, 869), definitions of perils of the sea, and in the 4th section of the same chapter (p. 876), he maintains that a master is not responsible for damage caused by rats, if the cats which were on board have died during the voyage, provided that in the first part at which he touched he neglected no exertion to procure others: (see also Abbott on Shipping, 306, 9th edit.) It is said in 3 Kent's Commentaries, pt. 2, sec. 48, 576, 8th edit.: "It has even been a vexed question, whether damage done to a ship by rats was among the casualties comprehended under perils of the sea, and the authorities are much divided on the question. The better opinion would, however, seem to be that the insurer is not liable for this sort of damage, because it arises from the negligence of the common carrier, and it may be prevented by due care, and is within the control of human prudence and sagacity." As these reasons do not apply to this case, the conclusion derived from them cannot here be maintained. Damage by rats becomes an accident of navigation when it cannot be controlled by human prudence and sagacity.

Doegman, Q. C. appeared for the pils., but was not heard.

KELLY, C. B.—It is unnecessary for us to decide whether a shipowner is or is not liable as a common carrier. We need not, therefore, determine whether Lavaroni v. Drury is for all purposes within the common custom of the realm with regard to common carriers. In this case there is a special contract, upon which we have to decide whether the carrier is responsible for the injury done by rats to the goods consigned to his care. We find in the bill of lading that the goods were put on board in good order and well conditioned, and were to be delivered in the like good order and well conditioned at the port of London (the act of God, the Queen's enemies, fire, all and every other dangers and accidents of the seas, rivers, and navigation, of what nature or kind soever, excepted). Mr. Williams argues that this exception includes rats, and in support he cites Emerigon and the other cases mentioned in Lavaroni v. Drury. But the whole of the doctrine laid down upon the matter relates to a policy of assurance with which we are not now concerned, and it has nothing to do with a bill of lading. We have, therefore, only to look at the instrument before us, by which the deft. contracted to deliver the goods in the like good order to which they were shipped. We think the contract was broken; and, with all deference, and without overruling the authorities quoted, we are in favour of the pta.

KIDSTONE v. THE EMPIRE MARINE INSURANCE COMPANY.

Marine insurance—Policy on freight—Suing and labouring clause—Total loss—Transhipment of cargo—Liability of underwriters.

The charterers of a ship effected an insurance on freight, and the policy contained a warranty against particular average, with the usual suing and labouring clause. The ship, after sailing, was so greatly damaged that she was obliged to put into an intermediate port, where she became a total wreck. The cargo, however, was landed, warehoused, and afterwards shipped on board another vessel, and was forwarded in safety to its destination at an expense of about half the chartered freight; and the owners of the cargo paid the whole of the agreed freight.

The charterers brought an action against the underwriters of the policy for a total loss of freight, and also for the charges and expenses of conveying the cargo by the second ship:

Held, by the Court of Ex. Ch. (affirming the decision of the Court of C. P.), that, on the destruction of the ship and the landing of the cargo at the intermediate port, inasmuch as no freight pro rata itineris could be claimed under the law of England, a total loss of freight had arisen, and that the expense incurred in forwarding the goods by another ship was a particular charge within the true meaning of the suing and labouring clause in the policy, and not the conversion of a total loss into a partial loss, so as to bring the case within the warranty against particular average; and that this expense, having been incurred for the benefit of the defts. in order to protect them against a claim for a total loss of the freight, to which they would have otherwise been liable, was consequently recoverable under this clause in the policy:

Samble, if the owner of freight insured fails to earn it by any default of his own, he should be dismissed to recover it against the insurer.

Appeal from the decision of the Court of C. P., by which a rule of the defts. to set aside the pta.'s verdict upon leave reserved by Erie, C.J. was discharged. The case in the court below is reported in L. Rep., 1 C. P. 535; 15 L. T. Rep. N. S. 12.

Mellor, Q. C. (with him Coles) argued for the defts.—This is a question arising out of a policy of insurance on chartered freight. The pta. were the charterers and insurers, and the defts. were the underwriters. The chartered ship Sebastopol, on her voyage from the Chincha Islands to the United Kingdom with a cargo of guano, after coming round Cape Horn, put in distress into Rio, where it was found that the cost of repairing her would amount to more than the value of the ship. Upon which, the cargo was warehoused, and afterwards shipped on board the Coprica, and by her safely conveyed to its owners. The cost of the freight by the Coprica amounted to about half the chartered freight of the Sebastopol; the whole of the latter was paid by the owners of the cargo, and the pta. paid the freight by the Coprica. The pta. now claim from the underwriters the extra freight and charges to which they were put by the transhipment to the Coprica, alleging that they were incurred under the suing and labouring clause in preserving the subject-matter of the insurance from a total loss. The defts. answer that this was a partial loss of the freight, and that they are exempt from liability by reason of the warranty against particular average in the policy. There is no authority upon a case of this kind, as policies on freight, free from particular average, are unusual. The general law was laid down by Lord Denman in the case of Shipton v. Thornton, 9 A. & E. 814: "When goods are shipped under a bill of lading in a general ship which is prevented from completing the voyage in consequence of damage occasioned by tempest the master is at liberty, if he has an opportunity and thinks fit, to forward the goods by some other conveyance equally cheap to the place of destination; and if the goods arrive by such other conveyance, he is entitled on the freighter's obtaining the goods to the whole freight originally contracted for; even though by the second conveyance the goods are carried for less than the freight originally contracted for." In other countries freight is payable pro rata itineris, but by the law of England freight pro rata is payable only by agreement between the parties, as for instance if the agent of the owner takes charge of the cargo at the intermediate port, and the master gives it up. This is an insurance upon chartered freight; the ship is prevented from completing the voyage, but the freight is nevertheless earned. The first question is, was the original chartered freight wholly or partially lost? Now the freight cannot be said to have been wholly lost, when really it was wholly gained. If the loss of freight was partial, it comes within the exemption of the underwriters' liability as particular average; if however the loss was total, the expenses may be included within the suing and labouring clause. The court below have decided that there was a constructive total loss of freight at Rio, but I have to submit, by analogy to the definition of a partial loss of goods as laid down in Farmworth v. Hyde, 16 C. B. N. S., 885, and upon the cases there cited, this is in substance a partial loss of freight. The question whether there is a total loss of goods depends not upon whether they cannot be sold at the intermediate port, but whether they can only be sent on at a cost equal to or greater than their value, and it does not depend upon whether the master sent them on or not. There is no total loss if the master is able to send goods on at less cost than the original freight, but he is then entitled to recover for a partial loss, whether or not they are sent on. As with regard to Sebastopol, it is in the case the cargo can be sent on at less cost than the original freight, there is a partial loss whether the master sends on the cargo or sells it. The pils. are damaged only by half the freight from perils of the sea, and this can only be a partial loss. By 3 Phillips on Insurance, s. 1633, p. 233, 3rd edit.: "If the ship is rendered unnavigable, and cannot be repaired for the prosecution of the voyage, and another can be procured within a reasonable time and distance, and the master has means to procure such other at an expense materially less than the amount of the freight for the voyage, the underwriter on freight or profits is not liable to be prejudiced by the master's neglect to tranship any more than the underwriter upon the cargo, and the loss will be adjusted as if the cargo had been transhipped and forwarded; and will be partial or total, according to the amount of the loss;" (see Jordan v. Warren, Insurance Company; 1 Story's R. 342.) The effect of the judgment of the Court of C. P. is, that these expenses come within the suing and labouring clause, and that although there was no actual total loss, they were incurred in order to prevent a total loss. The proper construction of this clause was settled in The Great Indian Peninsula Railway Company v. Saunders, 1 B. & S. 41; and in error, 2 B. & S. 306; and in Booth v. Gair, 15 C. B., N. S., 291, by which I understand that the clause applies only if the subject-matter of the policy is in danger of being totally lost; and this is not in accordance with the judgment of the court below in this case. The following are further authorities that these charges arise from a particular average loss:

KIDSTONE v. THE EMPIRE MARINE INSURANCE COMPANY.

[EX. CH.]

Amerigon, Traité des Assurances, 12, s. 39 (edit. by Boulay Paty, vol. 1, p. 264):

Codes de Commerce, art. 237;

Arnould on Marine Insurance, p. 227;

3 Parsons on Insurance, 206; and 7 Id. c. 10, s. 4.

With regard to the evidence received at the trial concerning the usually accepted meaning of particular average, I apprehend that a clearly established law cannot be overruled by custom:

Edie v. East India Company, 1 Str. Wm. 21, 293;

Hall v. Jones, 4 R. & B. 500;

Stee v. Phipps, 9 C. B., N. S., 502.

E. James, Q. C. and Sir G. Hargrave, Q. C. appeared for the pils., but were not heard.

KELLY, C. B.—In this case, which was an action on a policy for freight, a question of great importance to the mercantile community has arisen, and has for the first time, at least in this country, received judicial decision in the Court of C. P., which decision is now under appeal before us, and which we are called on to affirm or to reverse. The facts are few and simple. The pils. chartered the ship Sebastopol from the Chiocha Islands to a port in Great Britain, and effected an insurance on freight for 3000*l.* by the policy in question, the freight being valued at 5000*l.*, and the policy contained a warranty against particular average, with the well-known suing and labouring clause as adopted in English insurances. The ship sailed from the Chiocha Islands, and on rounding Cape Horn became so greatly damaged that she afterwards put into the port of Rio, where she became a wreck, and may be deemed to have been totally lost. The cargo of guano was landed and warehoused, and was afterwards shipped on board a vessel called the Cyprios, chartered by the pils., and was forwarded in safety to its destined port in Great Britain at an expense for freight of 2467*l.* 11*s.* 10*d.* Under these circumstances the pils. brought this action with a count claiming for a total loss of freight, and another count for 1165*l.* 8*s.* 6*d.*, claimed under the suing and labouring clause, for the charges and expenses for conveying the cargo from Rio to this country. It was contended for the pils. that when the ship had become a wreck, and the cargo had been landed at Rio, when no freight could be claimed by the law of England pro rata iturris, that a total loss of freight had been incurred, and that inasmuch as the proportion of the homeward freight by the Cyprios was a charge incurred by preserving the subject-matters of insurance, and so relieving the defts., the underwriters, from their liability as for a total loss of freight, it was a charge within the suing and labouring clause which the pils. were entitled to recover. On the other hand it was insisted by the defts. that, inasmuch as the pils. were able to forward the goods to England by another vessel at an amount of freight substantially less than the entire freight as valued under the policy, a partial loss only, and not a total loss of freight, had been incurred, which the warranty against particular average precluded the pils. from recovering. It was argued that the master was bound under the circumstances that had occurred to forward the goods to England; that his ability to do so, and so to earn the whole of the freight, subject to the deduction of the cost of conveyance from Rio to this country, made the case one of partial and not of total loss, and so within the clause against particular average. We are of opinion, however, that upon the ship Sebastopol becoming a wreck at Rio, and the goods having been landed there, inasmuch as no freight pro rata iturris could be claimed, a total loss of freight had arisen, and that the expenses incurred in forwarding the goods to England by another ship were charged within the suing and labouring clause, having been incurred for the benefit of the underwriters, to protect them against a claim for a total loss of the freight, to which they would have been liable but for the incurring of these charges; and that consequently that amount is recoverable under the clause of the policy. The question raised by the defts., whether the owner was bound under those circumstances to forward the goods to England, is attended with some difficulty and uncertainty. It has been much considered, and in effect decided, in America. Parsons, vol. 7, c. 10, s. 4, lays it down, "that there is a total loss of freight when the ship and cargo are totally lost, or the vessel becomes wholly unnavigable, or is subject to a detention of such a character as to break up the voyage. It is said in some cases that if the loss of the ship be only constructively total, that is, made so by abandonment, the owner may abandon also the freight, and claim as for the total loss of it. But if, although the ship itself be wrecked and utterly lost, the master can reship and forward the goods by a reasonable endeavour and at a reasonable cost, we have seen that it is his duty to do so, and if he neglect this duty, the insurer is chargeable only in the same way and to the same extent as if the duty had been performed, and the loss may be partial or total, according to its amount when so adjusted." It appears in a note to Parsons, in a case reported in 9 Johnson, 19, where the vessel was lost at an intermediate port, but the goods remained and were seized by the Government, the underwriters were exempted from loss by seizure in port. It was held that, if the goods could have been sent on but for the seizure, the defts. were not liable, and Kent, C. J. said: "The point is, whether it be a good defence in any case to an action on a policy for freight, that the shipowner refuses or neglects to forward the goods by another vessel when he had it in his power. We have not met with any decided case on this point; but it appears to be reasonable and consistent with the principles of the contract that the insurer should in such case be discharged." This, however, has never been held to be law in this country; but it might be admitted that it is not unreasonable that if the owner of a vessel, when

THE INNISFALLEN.

[Adm.]

sured fails to earn it by any default of his own, he should be disentitled to recover it against the insurer. But it is unnecessary to decide this point, for whether or not a shipowner or charterer be under a legal obligation to forward the cargo by another ship to its destined port, it is still open to him, if he think fit, to forward them in fact, and so earn the entire freight; and we think, under a policy like this, he is entitled to claim the costs which he does incur under the suing and labouring clause, where such a clause is to be found in the policy, on the ground that he has thereby preserved the subject-matter of the insurance from total loss, to which the underwriter otherwise would have been liable under the policy. It would seem, too, that the rule of law which in this country entitles the shipowner to recover these charges under an insurance like this against the underwriters is in strict accordance with sound principles; for if the master knows where the ship has been lost and the cargo may be sent forward to its destined port, and its owner will be indemnified as to the costs he may incur in so forwarding the goods, he will have every inducement to save the property and complete his contract with the owner of the cargo; whereas, if the cost of the conveyance of the goods for the rest of the voyage (as would be the case where there is a warranty against particular average, if the argument of the deft. prevails) under such circumstances is to fall on his owner without recourse to the underwriter, he will be exposed to the temptation of evading the performance of what may at least be deemed a moral duty, and leave the cargo to its fate in a foreign port in which it may have been unshipped. We are of opinion, therefore, that, whether it be the duty or not of the master, under circumstances like these, to forward the cargo in another ship to its destined port, on the facts of the case now before us there was a total loss of the freight when the ship had become a wreck and the goods had been landed at Rio, and that the costs incurred by the master in shipping the goods by the Caprice and causing them to be conveyed to this country is a charge within the express terms of the suing and labouring clause, and that that amount, or the due proportion of it, is recoverable under that clause against the underwriters. The cases of the Great Indian Peninsula Railway Company v. Saunders, and Booth v. Gair, have been pressed on the attention of the court, as showing that a loss of this nature is a partial loss only, and cannot be recovered against the underwriter by reason of a warranty against particular average. But those were cases of insurance on goods, to which the pro rata doctrine has no application, and where the whole or a great portion of the goods still existing in specie it was impossible to hold that a total loss had arisen, and Blackburn, J. appears to have marked the distinction between the case of goods and that of freight, and forbore to intimate an opinion on the point we have now determined. But another case from the United States has been cited under the high authority of Story, J., where it is supposed to have been held that under circumstances like these there was a partial and not a total loss of the freight, and that the underwriters were not liable on the policy; but this case of Jordan v. The Warren Insurance Company, 1 Story, 342, has really no application to the case now before us. There the insurance was on freight from New Orleans to Havre; the ship was run aground and injured before it left the Mississippi, but returned to New Orleans, and after unshipping the cargo was completely repaired and reinstated, and might have taken the cargo on board again and completed the voyage to Havre, but the cargo having been much damaged was sold at New Orleans, under an arrangement between the parties, and the ship proceeded on another voyage, not to Havre but to England. Under those circumstances the shipowner, who claimed as upon a total loss of freight, was held entitled to recover only for a partial loss, that is to say, the loss of freight on the same part of the cargo which had been destroyed before it was relanded at New Orleans, and which therefore could never have carried freight at all by the completion of the voyage. No question was raised there concerning particular average, or the suing and labouring clause in the policy. That case therefore has no bearing on the present. But it may be remarked that where any claim to freight at all was treated as reasonable, it seems to be on the footing of a total loss reduced to a smaller amount by the expenses incurred for the benefit of the underwriters, and spoken of as salvage. It remains only to observe on the evidence given in this case, that the expenses incurred in preserving the subject-matter of insurance were designated as particular charges, and not as particular average. We think that this evidence in no wise controls or varies the language of the policy, and that it is admissible to show the mode in which expenses of this nature are treated by mercantile men. But this evidence, or the usage which it is supposed to prove, is in affirmance of the common law of England, which of itself defines the nature and character of these charges; and if it was rejected and struck out of the case altogether it would leave the question in the cause as it was before. We think, therefore, on the whole, upon the true construction of the policy, that on the destruction of the ship and the landing the cargo at Rio there was a total loss of the freight unless it could be averted by the forwarding of the cargo by another ship to Great Britain; that the forwarding the cargo by the Caprice was a particular charge within the true meaning of the suing and labouring clause, and not the conversion of a total loss into a partial loss, which would bring the case within the warranty against particular average, and that the due proportion of that particular charge, the charge being thus within the suing and labouring clause, and incurred for the benefit of the underwriters to preserve the subject-matter of the insurance and prevent the total loss, is recoverable under the policy in this action. The judgment of the Court of C. P. will therefore be affirmed.

THE INNISFALLEN.

Cause of restraint—Mortgages—Co-owner.

A mortgagee, not in possession of a vessel, under the 70th section of the Merchant Shipping Act of 1854, cannot maintain a cause of restraint.

In a transaction between alleged co-owners, the court will look behind the register, with a view to ascertain whether the real intention was to transfer the ownership, or to effect a mortgage.

Where an agreement is clearly proved and definite, that for some purposes a person is absolute owner, and for others mortgagee, the Court will recognise it.

Where a vessel was arrested in a cause of restraint by a person claiming to be owner, it being held that he was only mortgagee, the Court ordered the release of the vessel on the motion of a charterer.

Hughes, shipbroker, of Liverpool, for the release of the ship Innisfallen, of which he was charterer, and which had been arrested in a cause of restraint brought by Mr. Pile, of West Hartlepool, who claimed 32-64th shares in the vessel, against his co-owners for chartering the vessel without his consent. They put in no appearance.

The facts of the case were as follow:—In 1864 the Innisfallen was built by the firm of which the plt. is a partner, in their yard at West Hartlepool, for Messrs. Pirie and Co. At the time of her completion, in Oct. 1864, half of the entire purchase-money (23,750*l.*) remained unpaid. Under these circumstances, the plt.'s firm drew bills for the balance due to them upon Messrs. Pirie and Co. Messrs. Pirie and Co. accepted the bills, and also caused the plt. to be duly registered as owner of thirty-two sixty-fourth shares in the vessel, the plt.'s firm at the same time writing to Messrs. Pirie and Co. a letter in the following terms:

Liverpool, 26th Oct. 1864.

Messrs. William Pirie and Co.

We hold the 32-64th shares of the ship Innisfallen, registered in the name of our Mr. John Pile, as security against the bills drawn by us on your firm in payment of the said ship, and we hereby bind ourselves to re-transfer to your firm the said 32-64th shares of said ship on due payment by you of these drafts.

PILE, SPENCE, and Co.

The above facts were not disputed. The plt. further deposed that the agreement between his firm and Messrs. Pirie and Co. was, that one-half the vessel should be and continue the absolute property of his firm until the balance of the purchase-money was paid. That this arrangement was insisted upon by the plt.'s firm in lieu of a mortgage because they considered that, as actual part owner, the plt. would be able to exercise control over the movements of the vessel, which, as a mortgagee, he would not be entitled to exercise, and that on no other terms would the plt.'s firm have let the vessel go out of their actual possession. The case stood thus: There was an absolute transfer into the plt.'s name; a letter, which converted the transfer into a mortgage; an alleged verbal conversation, which re-converted it from a mortgage into a transfer, for some purposes. Of the bills so drawn by the plt.'s firm, some were met, others from time to time were renewed, and there is now still owing to the plt.'s firm 3000*l.* upon the renewed bills. Such bills are not yet due; but Messrs. Pirie and Co. have suspended payment. The vessel made one voyage, and arrived in London on the 19th March in the present year. Three days before, however, viz. on the 16th, the vessel was chartered without the consent of the plt. to the deft. for a voyage to Bombay. The charter-party appears to be made by Messrs. Pirie and Co. as owners, but the plt. swore that at that time Messrs. Pirie and Co. had ceased to be even part owners, having transferred their shares to other persons. The plt. on discovery of the charter-party, instituted, as part owner of the vessel, this action of restraint, to prevent her from proceeding to sea until security be given by the other co-owners to the extent of the plt.'s interest in her for her safe return to Liverpool, and he swears that he verily believes that if the vessel be allowed to go to sea there is great danger of the whole, or a large portion of the balance of the purchase-money being lost. The vessel was accordingly arrested. Neither Messrs. Pirie and Co., nor their alleged transferees, appeared; but the deft., who is the charterer, appeared to defend the action, and now moves the court to order the vessel to be released without bail, and to condemn the plt. in costs.

Cohen appeared for the charterer.

C. P. Butt, for the plt., took a preliminary objection that the charterer as such had no locus standi.

Dr. LUSHINGTON.—This was so under the old practice; but of late, those who are substantially interested I have allowed to appear.

Cohen.—The plt.'s interest is merely that of a mortgagee; if he were part owner a court of equity would not allow him to restrain the execution of a charter-party into which he had entered by his agents. Clearly he permitted Pirie and Co. to charter this vessel to the defts.; at all events Pirie and Co. had authority to make charter as ship's husband: (Abbott on Shipping, 1st ed. p. 72.) The court can look behind the register to ascertain the rights of the parties. If the plt. is to be treated as a mortgagee, he has no right to arrest the vessel in a cause of restraint. The learned counsel in the course of his argument cited

Gardner v. Cazenove, 1 Hurl. & N. 423;

Ward v. Beck, 32 L. J., N. S., 113, C. P.;

The Highlander, 2 W. Rob. 109;

Collins v. Lamport, 34 L. J., N. S., 196, Ch.; 11 L. T.

Rep. N. S. 497;

Rep. N. S. 550.

C. P. Butt.—This court will give no effect to the rights the charterer in this suit claims to exercise. In causes like this the court will only give effect to the legal title to shares in a ship. In Ward v. Beck, and other cases similar, the interests dealt with were those of parties over whom the court had no jurisdiction, but in a cause of restraint in a case of co-owners the court cannot give effect to the rights of persons who do not claim to be owners at all: (8th sect. Adm. Court Act, 29 Vict. c. 10.) The court will not treat Pile and the co-owners as mortgagee and mortgagors unless it can do justice between them as such. Pile could not sue as a mortgagee, for there was no registered mortgage; consequently he has his remedy as co-owner, or none at all. Collins v. Lamport is distinguishable; that case turned on the 70th section of the Merchant Shipping Act, 25 & 26 Vict. c. 63. The judgment of the L. C. was founded on the fact of the mortgagor, who made the charter, being the registered owner of the vessel. Here we have a converse case, the plt., who it is said is to be treated as a mortgagee, being the registered owner of thirty shares. The learned counsel referred in the course of his argument to

The Valiant, 1 W. Rob. Adm. Rep. 64;

The Sisters, 5 C. Rob. Adm. Rep. 155;

The Frances, 2 Dod. Adm. Rep. 420.

Cohen replied.

Dr. LUSHINGTON.—The deft. maintains, first, that the court may look behind the register with a view to ascertain whether the real intention of the parties was to transfer the absolute ownership, or merely to effect a mortgage, and that the result of such an examination in the present case would be to show that the plt. was intended to be a mortgagee only; secondly, that a mortgagee has no right to bring an action of restraint. The plt. disputes these positions. To take the last first. In the case of Collins v. Lamport, Lord Chancellor Westbury, on appeal, decided that under the 70th section of the Merchant Shipping Act 1854, so long as the mortgagee does not take possession of the ship, the mortgagor being the registered owner subject to the mortgage, retains all the rights and powers of ownership, and that his contracts with regard to the ship will be valid, provided his dealings do not materially impair the security of the mortgagee, and consequently where the mortgagor in possession had made a charter-party which was not shown to be in any way prejudicial to the sufficiency of the security, he held the mortgagee bound and restrained him from dealing with the ship in any manner which might interfere with or prevent the execution of the charter-party. I accede to this view of the statute, and hold that a mortgagee not in possession cannot maintain an action of restraint. I may add, that this was the practice of the court even before the Merchant Shipping Act: (The Highlander.) In the present instance there is no proof that the charter-party which had been entered into is an injurious one, or likely to affect the position of a mortgagee of a vessel. Then as to the first point, the cases of Gardner v. Cussons and Ward v. Beck, cited at the hearing, are conclusive that the right interpretation of the 86th section of the Merchant Shipping Act of 1854, and of the 3rd section of the Merchant Shipping Act Amendment Act of 1863, is, that the court is at liberty to look behind the register to the real character of the transaction, and to treat as a mortgage that which is on the face of it an absolute transfer, if it should appear that such was the intention of the parties. The question then remains, what was the intention of the parties in the present case? This is a question of fact. Looking to the documentary evidence alone, I could come to no other conclusion than that the plt. was a mere mortgagee. The letter which his firm wrote at the time to Messrs. Pirie and Co. states in so many words that the shares were held as a security, and were to be re-transferred on the due payment of the drafts; in short, converted the act of registration from a sale to a pledge. But then the plt. would superinduce a concurrent verbal agreement, which would have the effect of reconverting the pledge into an absolute transfer, at least for some purposes. The plt. swears that the arrangement was, that until the payment the vessel should continue the absolute property of his firm, and that the arrangement was insisted upon in lieu of a mortgage, in order that the plt. should, as actual part owner, exercise control over the movements of the vessel, to which, as a mortgagee, he would not be entitled. The result of the plt.'s contention would be, that he was not exactly an absolute owner, nor exactly a mortgagee, but that for some purposes he was an absolute owner, and for others a mortgagee. Now, without going the length of saying that the court would, in no case, recognise such an agreement, so involved, as it were, wheel within wheel, I shall hold that the court will not recognise it unless it is clearly proved, and definite and complete in all parts. In this respect, I think the decision in the case already adverted to, of Gardner v. Cussons, is to the point. In the present instance it cannot be said that, according to the plt.'s view, the relations of the parties were defined. Whether or not, as between himself and Messrs. Pirie and Co., the plt. accepted all, or some, or which, of the liabilities of part owner, or with which of the rights of a part owner Messrs. Pirie and Co. intend to invest the plt. as distinguished from those which the plt. thought he would acquire on registration—all this the plt. leaves uncertain. On the whole I am constrained to hold that the effect of the transaction was to constitute the plt. a mortgagee, and not a part owner. This being so, the court would not have been able to grant a restraint against the vessel at the plt.'s instance, even if the def. had had no locus standi to oppose the application. I must therefore grant the motion for the release of the vessel without bail; but, under the circumstances, I give no costs.

ADM.]

THE KASTROL.

[ADM.]

Motion granted.

THE KASTROL.

Taxation of costs in a mortgage suit—Items disallowed.

This court, following the practice of the Court of Chancery in the taxation of costs in a mortgage suit, will allow mortgagee's costs, not as between admiral and client, but as between party and party.

Where a decree had been obtained by mortgagee by consent for the sum claimed with "costs, charges, and expenses, properly incurred,"

The Court affirmed with costs the registrar's taxation, disallowing (1), charges by mortgagee's solicitors for attending to take particulars of other suits against the vessel to which their clients were not parties; (2), costs of futile negotiations between the several co-defendants, and to which the owners of the vessel were not parties; (3), costs of a conference at a stage of the suit when it is unusual to allow for a conference.

The steamship Kastrol had been sold in a bottomry suit. A cause of mortgage was instituted against the proceeds in the registry by Messrs. Morrison and Nash, the first mortgagees by transfer of the vessel. In this cause a decree by consent was made in favour of the mortgagees for the amount claimed, with the costs, charges, and expenses properly incurred by them as such. A motion was now made on the part of the mortgagees to review the taxation by the registrar. The facts of the case appear at length in the judgment.

Osborne Morgan in support of his motion.—The registrar has in these cases taxed the costs as between party and party. This is a wrong principle to go on in such cases. A mortgagee should not be out of pocket if he incurs no costs wastefully, and his costs, charges, and expenses are reasonable, and should be repaid all moneys which he has fairly expended or for which he is liable. The learned counsel referred to

Fisher on the Law of Mortgage, 561;
Armstrong v. Langley, 2 Vern. 545;
Lowes v. Hyde, 2 Vern. 185;
Dryden v. Frost, 8 M. & Cr. 670.

Clarke for the owners.—In this case the court will not review the registrar's taxation. This was a hostile suit by mortgagees to enforce their security, and they have no pretence to be entitled to other than costs as between party and party. The very terms of the decree "costs, charges, and expenses properly incurred," imply a discretion to the registrar as to what he should allow.

Osborne Morgan replied.

Dr. LEACHMAN delivered judgment.—There is no question that can come before the court which is so disagreeable as that of reviewing the taxation of costs, because it is manifestly clear that, for the greater part, it is impossible to find a clear principle whereon to proceed, and whether the charge be right or wrong depends upon a practice, and upon a practice with which the court cannot be familiar, and can only obtain information by applying to other sources. This is a motion for the court to review the taxation of the registrar. The vessel has been the subject of much litigation. Amongst other suits instituted against her are the following:—1864, September, No. 2337, by a bottomry bondholder, October, No. 2396, by the third mortgagees; November, No. 2414, by the second mortgagees. In these suits the first mortgagees were def. 1865, February, No. 2616, by the first mortgagees. The last cause, the one in which the first mortgagees were plt., is the one in which this motion is made. Besides these suits in the Admiralty ralty Court, in which the first mortgagees were plts. or defts., there were other suits to which they were not parties, and there was also a Chancery suit (Smith v. Morrish) instituted by the trustees for the creditors of the owners of the vessel in which the first and other mortgagees were defts. The vessel was sold in the suit of the bondholder, No. 2357, and the proceeds, amounting to 12,050*l.*, were paid into the registry. On the 8th Dec. 1865 a compromise of the suit (No. 2616, by the first mortgagees) was entered into between the solicitors for the various parties interested in the proceeds of the vessel, viz., the trustees for the creditors of the late owners, the third mortgagee, the second mortgagees, and the first mortgagees. This compromise was carried into effect by the decree of the court of the 12th Dec. following. By that decree the proceeds of the ship were condemned in a special sum of 5655*l.* 6*s.* 1*d.* for principal and interest due to the first mortgagees, and in costs, charges, and expenses properly incurred by them as mortgagees, including therein the costs incurred by the first mortgagees as defts. in the above-mentioned Chancery suit, and in the causes in this court, Nos. 2357, 2398, 2414, instituted respectively by the bondholders, the third mortgagee, and the second mortgagee. Subsequently the plts., the first mortgagees, brought in their several accounts of costs to the registry, consisting of, first, costs of first mortgagees as plts. in 2616; secondly, costs of first mortgagees as defts. in 2357; thirdly, costs of first mortgagees in 2398; fourthly, costs of first mortgagees as defts. in 2414; fifthly, costs of first mortgagees as defts. in Chancery suit; sixthly, a separate account of charges by Messrs. Davidson and Co., the solicitors for the first mortgagees. The fifth account was taxed by the master in Chancery to whom it was referred. The other accounts were taxed by the registrar, and it is to review his taxation of the first account and of the sixth account that the present motion is made by the plts. The chief ground of complaint by the plts. is, that their costs have not been taxed as between solicitor and client. On this question I have endeavoured to obtain from the most competent persons information, and I am informed that in a mortgage suit in the Court of Ch., the mortgagee's costs are always taxed as costs between party and party; and I cannot construe the provision in the decree which was made by consent, that the plts. should receive their costs, charges, and expenses properly incurred, to mean that their costs should be taxed as between solicitor and client. The exact meaning of that term "costs, charges, and expenses properly incurred," it is impossible to define beforehand. In a mortgage suit it would, I apprehend, consist of expenses incurred by the mortgagee in the protection of his security. Whether or not any expense has been properly or improperly incurred, must obviously depend upon the circumstances of each case. It is necessary, therefore, to go into further detail. With regard to the registrar's taxation of the bill of costs for this suit in which the first mortgagees were plts., three classes of items are specified by the plts. as having been improperly disallowed. The first class consists of charges by the plts.' solicitors for attending to take particulars of the other suits instituted in this court against the vessel—suits in which the first mortgagees were not parties. As to those, however, I am of opinion that they are covered by the fees allowed to the plts. for instituting their own suit. In point of fact, such inquiries as to other suits are a necessary preliminary to any plt. in order to enable him to shape his suit aright. But such an inquiry consists simply in a reference to the cause-book, for no person who has not appeared in a suit can claim to see the documents in that suit. The second class consists of certain negotiations that took place between the various incumbrancers of the fund. There are two reasons why these costs should not be considered as properly incurred, so as to be chargeable against the fund; one, that the negotiations led to nothing; the other, that the owners of the vessel (who would be entitled to the residue of the fund after paying off the incumbrances) were not parties to them. I quite agree, therefore, with the registrar, that it would be improper to saddle the fund with these costs. The third class were thus incurred: At the last moment the validity of the claim of the first mortgagees was disputed by the third mortgagee. The first mortgagees thereupon consulted their counsel as to whether they should get rid of the opposition of the third mortgagee by disputing his right to oppose on the ground that his mortgage had been obtained by fraud. I had some doubt as to that item, but upon further consideration I think the costs of this conference were rightly disallowed by the registrar on the ground that the conference was held at a stage of the suit when it is not usual to allow for a conference to be held. The registrar further disallowed most of the items in the bill No. 6. The bill seems to have been sent in by the plts. as an account of costs, charges, and expenses properly incurred, as distinct from the proper costs of the several suits. On examination it professes to contain many items of a kind already alluded to, viz., items for the costs of negotiations between the rival incumbrancers on the fund, which I have already held were properly disallowed by the registrar. It also includes items for consultations between the proctors and solicitors of the plts., for communication between the proctors and their clients, although charges in the other bills had been allowed for instructions; also items which are duplicates of charges made in the other bills and allowed. All these items the registrar, in my opinion, did right to disallow, and generally he seems to me in this taxation to have proceeded upon a correct principle, and to have exercised his discretion in a just manner. I shall therefore refuse the motion with costs.

Salvage service where the owners of the salving are charterers of the salved vessel—Pleading.

The owners of a salving vessel may claim remuneration for salvage services from the owners of a salved vessel though they themselves be the charterers of the salved vessel.

But where in such case the effect of the charter-party is for the time to divest the owners completely of the possession and control of the vessel and transfer it to the charterer, no claim for salvage service will be allowed.

On a motion by salvors plts. in objection to portions of defts.' answer which averred the fact that the owners of the salving and charterers of the salved vessel were the same persons, and that hence no salvage was due, the Court ordered that the part denying plts.' claim should be struck out, but the other articles objected to be retained, for they might affect the quantum of salvage.

ADM.]

THE COLLIER.

[ADM.]

A cause of salvage had been instituted against this vessel, her cargo and freight, by the Brighton Railway Company, the owners, and the master and crew of the steamship Lyons. On the 31st Oct., as appeared by the petition, the Lyons on a voyage from Newhaven to Dieppe fell in with the Collier in a disabled state, and with some difficulty safely towed her into Newhaven.

Dr. Deane, Q. C., moved in this cause that certain portions of the defts.' answer should be struck out; the effect of these was, that the Collier, at the time of the salvage service, was under a charter-party to plts., and was engaged in their regular packet service between Littlehampton and Honfleur, and that the cargo and passengers were being carried by the plts. for their own benefit, and the freight and passage money belonged to them; that those on board the Collier signalled the Lyons, aware that she belonged to the London, Brighton, and South Coast Railway Company, and believing it to be for the best interest of the company that the Lyons should assist her, the Lyons hove down to her assistance, and the master of the Collier requested the Lyons to tow her with them to Dieppe, those on board the Lyons knowing that she was in the service of the same owners, the company; and by reason of these premises that neither the owners nor the master and crew of the Lyons were entitled to salvage remuneration for their services. In support of the motion he cited the judgment of Lord Stowell in

The Waterloo, 2 Dods. 433.

E. C. Clarkson, contra, argued that the Lyons was bound to take the Collier in tow, the master and crew of the salving vessel being in the service of the charterers of the salved vessel, and referred to

The Maria Jane, 14 Jur. 857.

Dr. Deane, Q. C. replied.

Dr. LUSHINGTON now delivered judgment.—This is a case of salvage by the master, owners, and crew of the Lyons against this vessel, the Collier, her cargo and freight. A petition has been given in, and an answer filed on behalf of the owners of the Collier and of the owners of her cargo. The plts. now object to the admission of the 2nd, 3rd, 4th, and 12th articles of the answer—articles the effect of which is to aver, that though the services rendered by the Lyons may have been of the nature of salvage service, yet that no salvage is due because the owners of the Lyons and the charterers of the Collier are the same persons, viz., the London, Brighton, and South Coast Railway Company. It appears that at the time the salvage service was rendered the Collier was under a charter-party to the railway company. The terms, so far as are material to the present motion, were, that the Collier was let for the sole use of the charterers for the space of three months; that the captain should use all dispatch in prosecuting the voyage, and that the crew should render all possible assistance with the vessel's boat, and in loading and discharging the vessel, consistent with their other duties; that the owners (not the charterers) should find ship's stores and pay crew's wages; that all derelicts and salvages should be for owners' and charterers' benefit in moieties to each after settling with the crew; that the owners should appoint their own captain and engineer, who, with all the crew, should be under the control of the superintendent and agent of the charterers; and should any occasion arise for appointing a new captain, officers, and crew, the appointment was to be made jointly by the charterers' superintendent, and the owners. The Lyons, as I have said, belonged to and was in the employ of the railway company. The defts. in support of their articles to which objection is made, relied on the case of the Maria Jane as a case where a claim for salvage against a ship was rejected although salvage services had been rendered, because the ships rendering the services belonged to the person who was the charterer of the vessel receiving those services. But in that case the effect of the charter-party was to divest the owners of the possession and control of the vessel, and to transfer the same for the time to the charterer, who was required to provide and pay for the master and crew. And it was on this ground—the ground of the charterer being in possession of the salved vessel—that the judgment proceeded. The Court held that the claim for salvage could not be maintained against the owners of the salved vessel by the charterer of that vessel in his other capacity as owner of the vessels rendering the salvage services, or by his servants on board those vessels. In the present case the circumstances are obviously different. The charterers of the Collier were not in possession: the owners paid the wages of the crew. The Maria Jane, therefore, is not a case in point. On the other hand, the plts. cited the case of the Waterloo. This was a claim of salvage preferred by the owners, officers, and crew of the Winchelsea, for services rendered to the Waterloo and her cargo. The Winchelsea at the time was chartered to the East India Company, but her commander, officers, and crew were appointed by her owners. The Waterloo and the bulk of her cargo were owned by the East India Company. Lord Stowell allowed the claim for salvage, having, in a very luminous judgment, discussed all the circumstances of that case. I think that the Maria Jane does not apply to the present case, and that the principles laid down in the Waterloo govern it. The argument against a claim for salvage is founded on the supposition that the salvor is claiming in substance for the salving his own property which, certainly, is against reason. There is no place for such an argument here, as the owners of the Collier are not owners of the Lyons. The Collier is chartered to the Brighton Company, but the owners of the Collier are not divested of possession, as was substantially the case in the Maria Jane. These questions are not without difficulty, for distinctions might be taken between the owners of the salving ship and the crew, in reference to the cargo. Again, I am not prepared to say that there may not be such a connection between two ships which, though it would not bar a claim for salvage, might affect the quantum. I shall order the 12th article to be struck out which denies that any salvage whatever was due, but not the three first articles, which, though the facts therein detailed, if proved, would not bar a claim for salvage, might possibly affect the quantum. I think it right to be upon my guard, because no doubt the amount and quantum of a salvage service may be affected by particular circumstances, though the claim for salvage is not barred. I speak for instance where fishing vessels render assistance to each other, and matters of that description. That is the view the court holds.

THE TROUBADOUR.

THE TROUBADOUR.

Necessaries—Mortgage—Pleading.

In a cause of necessaries the transferee of a mortgage, though in possession of a ship when the necessaries are supplied, is not liable for them unless the master in ordering them was acting as his agent.

And where in an article of the reply by pta. to def't's answer it was left open whether the person in possession of the ship when the necessaries were supplied was the original mortgagee, or the def't., the transferee of the mortgage, the article was held bad on the ground of vagueness.

And an allegation that def't. was in possession at the date of the supply, and was responsible for the master's orders, and personally liable for the supplies, is not a good reply to the def't.'s answer claiming to be a mortgagee prior to the date of supply.

A cause had been instituted against this vessel, which belonged to Wexford, in Ireland, for necessaries supplied her between June 1865 and March 1866, while at Liverpool. The petition merely stated that the necessaries were supplied on the master's orders. The def't., Mr. E. F. Sichel, entered an appearance and filed an answer to the effect that, in April 1863, the vessel was mortgaged to one Gustave Sichel, that this was subsequently assigned in Dec. 1864, and vested in the def't.; that the necessaries were ordered by Gustave Sichel or his agent solely on the personal credit of Gustave Sichel, and not on that of the def't. or the owners. The answer further alleged that, even though the averments of the petition were true, the def't.'s claim as transferee of the mortgage should have priority over the claim of the pta. for necessaries supplied.

The second article of the pta.'s reply stated that at the time the necessaries were supplied, the persons entitled as mortgagees under the mortgage set forth in the first article of the said answer to the principal money and interest thereby secured had entered into and were in possession as such mortgagees, and that the vessel thenceforth, until after the institution of the suit, remained in the possession of the persons from time to time entitled to the principal and interest secured by the said mortgage as mortgagees in possession of the said ship, and therefore the pta. are entitled in priority over the claim of the def't. as mortgagees of the said ship.

On the 18th Nov. a motion was made to reject the second article of the pta.'s reply.

Galen in support of the motion.—When the supplies were furnished the pta. acquired a lien in the ship; this lien was subject to the mortgage. This case differs from the Pacific (Brow. & Lush. 348) only in this point, that in this case the mortgagees were in possession when the necessaries were supplied, but there is nothing to show that they expressly or impliedly undertook to pay for them. The question is, to whom was the credit given? There is no statement that the master had authority from the mortgagees to order these necessaries, and if he had none, the mortgagees are not liable. If the credit was given to the ship, it was to the ship subject to the mortgage; if credit was given to the mortgagees, then they were liable:

The Saladin, Lush. 348.

E. C. Clarkson, contra, argued that, as the necessaries were supplied while the mortgagee was in possession, he was liable as if he had been owner, and referred to

The Parle, Swab. 353;

Johnson v. Vernon, 1 H. Bl. 114;

De Meuse v. Gibson, 1 J. & H. 79-84.

Dr. LUSHINGTON.—I am of opinion that the second article of the reply should be rejected, and for the reasons stated in Mr. Cohen's argument. In the first place, the article as it stands leaves it open whether the person in possession of the vessel at the time of the supply was the original mortgagee or the def't., who was the transferee of the mortgagee. The pta. cannot call upon the court to supply the defect of his reply by reference to the def't.'s answer; the dates mentioned in which might seem to show that if, as alleged in the reply, the person entitled to the mortgage-money was in possession, that person was the def't. And besides, the reply seems to speak of a series of persons successively becoming entitled, and successively being in possession. This vagueness of the reply as to who was in possession, the original mortgagee or the def't., constitutes a serious defect, because, supposing the original mortgagee to be meant, the allegation would be immaterial, for until suit brought the necessary man would have no claim on the vessel (The Pacific); and a mere personal liability of the original mortgagee would not pass to the def't. by virtue of a transfer of the mortgage. If this were the only ground of objection I should require the reply to be reformed. In the second place, it would not be enough to allege that the def't., as transferee of the mortgage, was in possession at the date of the supply for the mortgage in possession. I am of opinion he would not be liable for necessaries supplied to the ship unless the master, in ordering the necessaries, was acting as the agent of such mortgagee: (Hibbs v. Ross, L. Rep. 1 Q. B. 534; Frost v. Oliver, 2 Ell. & Bl. 301; Mitchison v. Oliver, 5 Ell. & Bl. 419). Reformation of the reply in this respect also would be necessary. In the third place, even an allegation that the def't. was in possession of the vessel at the date of the supply, was responsible for the orders given by the master, and personally liable for the supplies, would in my opinion not be a good reply to the answer of the def't., who claims to be a mortgagee prior to the date of the supply. The case of The Pacific decides that a necessary man has until institution of suit no claim upon a vessel owned, I will say, by A., and consequently that a claim arising upon institution of suit is subject to the existing mortgage of B. I cannot see that this order of priority should be reversed because, through B. having been in possession at the date of the supplies, A. and B. are practically one and the same person. The opposite would complicate the law of mortgage. I come to this conclusion after due consideration of the Jonathan Goodhue, Swab. 534. I therefore reject the second article of the reply.

Second article rejected.

There were two other suits instituted against this vessel in which the allegations in the answers were to the same effect as in the cause of necessaries—the one by B. Baker, an engineer, for repairs to the boilers of the vessel whilst lying at Liverpool in Feb. and March 1866; the other by McDonald and Co., shipwrights, for repairs while at Liverpool in Jan. 1865, and Feb. and March 1866. The second and third article of the replies to these answers were as follows:

2. The def't. at the several times mentioned in the petition was in possession of the said ship, and thereby the master of the said ship was implicitly authorised by the def't. to do all things necessary to keep the ship in a proper condition to earn freight, and for that purpose to order the necessary repairs in question, and to bind the ship for the same in priority to the def't.'s claim as alleged transferee of the mortgage.

3. Even if the def't. was not in possession of the said ship at the said times, the said Gustave Sichel in the first article of the petition mentioned, was then in possession of the said ship by and with the consent of the def't., and thereby the master of the said ship was implicitly authorised, &c.

The fourth article stated that the def't. impliedly authorised the mortgagee and the master to do all things necessary by allowing the mortgagor to remain in possession.

R. G. Williams for the plts.

Cohen for the defts.

Dr. Lushington.—The second and third articles of the replies in the other two suits instituted against the same vessel are open to this last objection, viz., that the necessaries man could not by institution of suit acquire against the ship a claim which should take priority over the claim of the mortgagee in possession, who had ordered those necessaries. I may also state that they are open to the lesser objection, that they do not allege that the master was actually authorised by the deft. to order the necessaries; they only allege that he was implicitly authorised by reason of the deft. being mortgagee in possession, and no such implication is raised by law. They are, however, not open to the objection that they leave it doubtful whether the person in possession was the deft., the transferee of the mortgage, or the original mortgagee, for they state that the deft. was in possession. I need not consider the fourth article of the replies, which would rest the priority of the plts.' claim over that of the deft. upon the alleged fact of Gustave Sichel having been in possession. It does not appear who Gustave Sichel was, except that previous to the supply of the necessaries he had been, and had ceased to be, a mortgagee of the vessel.

THE PHILIPPINE.

The 28 & 24 Vict. c. 127, s. 28—Costs.

This statute applies to solicitors practising in the Court of Admiralty.

Where, in a suit by a master against an owner for wages and disbursements, a sum of money was found to be due to him as master by the owner; but a counter claim being set up, the registrar took all the accounts between the parties, and reported that there was a balance due by the master for unpaid purchase-money for shares in the vessel; but the transfer of the shares had not been registered:

Held, that the solicitors who acted in the suit had preserved property of the plt. under the Act, and were entitled to their costs out of the master's shares, subject to the claim of the owner for the balance found to be due.

On the 15th Jan. V. Lushington moved, on the part of the Messrs. Howard, solicitors, that they should be declared entitled to a charge for the payment of their costs out of shares held in this vessel by her late master and for an order for such payment. They had originally appeared for the master in a suit by him against the owners for wages and disbursements. This was met by a counter claim against the master for the purchase-money of certain shares in the vessel. The shares had not been registered in his name, but they were bargained and sold, and he had an equitable right to them. The matter was referred to the registrar, who allowed the counter claim, and found that the master was indebted in the sum of 70*l.*, afterwards reduced by consent to 48*l.* 13*s.* 11*d.* to the owners.

V. Lushington, in support of the motion, cited 23 & 24 Vict. c. 127, and argued that in a wide sense the master's property might be said to have been preserved by the Messrs. Howard, as they had prevented his suffering any further undefinable loss.

Clarkson represented the owner.

V. Lushington objected to his being heard, having no locus standi, as appearing for a stranger to the suit.

The Learned Judge decided on hearing him.

Clarkson.—The 23 & 24 Vict. c. 127, does not apply to attorneys practising in this court; secondly, it gives a charge to a solicitor only in cases where property has been preserved through his instrumentality; and in this case, as the registrar's report showed, a balance against instead of for the plt., there was nothing for the statute to operate upon.

The Learned Judge reserved judgment, three questions remaining for consideration, viz., whether the 23 & 24 Vict. c. 127, applied to attorneys practising in the Court of Admiralty; secondly, the meaning of the word "preserved" in that Act; and thirdly, whether Mr. Clarkson had any locus standi in the case.

On the 22nd Jan. judgment was given.

Dr. Lushington.—It is of importance to inquire how it happened that the master instead of recovering any amount for his wages is by the report found to be indebted to the owners to the amount of 48*l.* At the reference was produced the agreement made between the deft. Young, the owner of the Philippine, and the plt. upon the occasion of the appointment of the plt. to be master of the vessel. The agreement was dated 25th March 1863. After reciting that the deft. Young was the owner of the Philippine subject to a certain mortgage, and that he had recently sold to the plt. four sixty-fourth shares in the vessel for 250*l.*, went on to provide that the deft. Young should be the managing owner of the vessel, receive freight, &c., and should account to the plt. for four sixty-fourth shares in her net earnings, and the plt. should bear four sixty-fourth shares in her losses, and four sixty-fourth shares in the expenses of her outfit, and that in case the deft. Young should pay off the said mortgage-debt, and the plt. should have paid off his share in the expenses of the outfit, the deft. Young should transfer to the plt. four sixty-fourth shares in the vessel. The registrar in taking the account took this agreement into consideration, being of opinion, as I understand, that it was obligatory on him to do so under the 191st section of the Merchant Shipping Act (which prescribes that "upon any right of set-off or counter claim being set up by an owner against a master's claim for wages, it should be lawful for the court to enter into and adjudicate upon all questions, and settle all accounts then arising or outstanding between the parties"). The result was that whilst 108*l.* 7*s.* 8*d.* was found due to the plt. upon the balance of his account as master, 178*l.* 11*s.* 1*d.* was found due from him on account of the purchase-money of the four sixty-fourth shares, and his proportion of the loss upon the first voyage, and the registrar accordingly reported that upon the whole 70*l.* 3*s.* 5*d.* was due from the plt. to the deft. This sum was, as I have stated afterwards, reduced by consent to 48*l.* 13*s.* 11*d.* I have stated the facts, as I believe them to have been, but I cannot abstain from saying that the matter is presented to the court is a most unsatisfactory condition. The registrar's report has not been filed, neither party having thought proper to take it up. The paper which has been furnished to the court purporting to be a copy of the report simply states that 70*l.* 3*s.* 5*d.* is the balance due from the plt., but that this balance has been arrived at in the way I have already mentioned, there is no evidence to show beyond that the same sum 70*l.* 3*s.* 5*d.* appears to be the balance of an account which I find among the papers and which purports to have been put in by an accountant; however, in arguing the motion before me, there was no dispute as to the facts. It was admitted also, as I understand, that the four sixty-fourth shares in the vessel had not been transferred to the plt., but that the plt. had an equitable right to have them transferred. This preliminary statement makes intelligible the present motion, which is that the plt.'s solicitors may have a charge upon the plt.'s interest in the ship for the amount of their taxed costs, charges, and expenses in the suit, and that an order may be made for payment of same out of plt.'s interest. The motion is made under the 28th section of the 23 & 24 Vict., c. 187, which is in the following terms: "In every case in which an attorney or solicitor shall be employed to prosecute or defend any suit, matter, or proceeding in any court of justice, it shall be lawful for the court or judge before whom any such suit, matter, or proceeding has been heard or shall be depending, to declare such attorney or solicitor entitled to a charge upon the property recovered or preserved, and upon such declaration being made, such attorney or solicitor shall have a charge upon, against, and a right of payment out of the property, of whatsoever nature, tenure, or kind the same may be, which shall have been recovered or preserved through the instrumentality of such attorney or solicitor for the taxed costs, charges, and expenses of, or in reference to, such suit, matter, or proceeding; and it shall be lawful for such court or judge to make such order or orders for taxation of and raising and payment of such costs, charges, and expenses, out of the said property, as to such court or judge shall appear just and proper." Mr. Clarkson was allowed to be heard on the part of the def't. Young, the legal owner of the whole ship. He first contended that the statute did not apply to the court. His argument, however, seems to me contrary to the plain words of the statute, "any court of justice." He contended secondly, that as the statute gives to the solicitor a charge only on the property recovered or preserved through his instrumentality, and as the suit, so far from preserving or recovering any of the plt.'s property, resulted in a balance being found by the registrar's report against the plt., there was nothing for the statute to operate upon. I am, however, of a different opinion. The plt. sued for his wages and disbursements as master, and the registrar found that on his account as master the plt. was entitled to 108*l.* 7*s.* 8*d.*, and though this balance in favour of the plt. was turned to a balance against him, upon the registrar taking other accounts, viz., in respect of purchase-money due from him for the shares of the vessel, and of his proportion of the loss upon the first voyage, yet the result of the suit to the plt. is, that he is entitled to a transfer of the four shares in the vessel, for a sum less by 108*l.* 7*s.* 8*d.*, than he would have been if this suit had never been instituted. I am of opinion, therefore, that the plt.'s solicitor has recovered or preserved for the plt. in this suit property to the value of 108*l.* 7*s.* 8*d.* and represented by or rather contained in his right to be made registered owner of four shares in the vessel, and that the plt.'s solicitor is entitled to a charge upon the plt.'s four shares for his costs, not exceeding the sum of 108*l.* 7*s.* 8*d.* This charge, however, is of course subject to the payment of the 48*l.* 15*s.* 11*d.*, which has been agreed to be due to the def't. With regard to the remainder of the motion, the court can make no such order as that prayed for, directing the payment of the solicitor's costs out of the plt.'s interest in the vessel. Before I can make any such order, I must have complete evidence of all the necessary facts of the case. At present, the evidence before the court is very insufficient.

[ADM.]

THE MARY, otherwise ALEXANDRA.

[ADM.]

Case of possession—Plt. not in the jurisdiction—Security.

In a case of possession where the plt. is not in the jurisdiction, by the practice of the court security for costs must be given, but not for damages, though the vessel be not released on bail.

On Tuesday, Feb. 26, Milward, Q. C. (Batt with him) moved, in a case instituted by the United States of America, against Mr. Prieoleau, the duly registered owner of the Mary, for the possession of that vessel; that the plt. be compelled to give security for costs, and also for damages, as the vessel had not been released on bail.

Milward, Q. C. in support of the motion.—It is the usual practice of this court to order security for costs where the plt. is out of the jurisdiction; à fortiori, it would be just to order security for damages in a case like this. At common law we get security for costs as a matter of course, and as no damage can there accrue, for we always retain the possession of our vessel, no security for damages is needed. In Chancery, again, in the case of an interim injunction, the court will only grant it on the condition of an undertaking to pay both costs and damages if the ultimate decision be adverse.

Dr. Twiss, Q. C. (Brett, Q. C. and Clarkson with him).—I am not aware of any cases of possession where this court has ordered the plt. to give security for damages. We do not object to give security for costs. In the case of The Peri, 11 W. R. 44; Pritchard's Adm. Dig. 427, which was a collision case by foreigners, and the British owner disputed the identity of his vessel, this Court refused to entertain an application that security should be given for damages. If the vessel turns out to be ours, we are entitled to damages as much as they are, and they, if they took her out, should give bail for damages and costs. They must give us security for damages if we give it them. In The Virginia, 8 Peter 539, security was ordered to be given by def'ts. for damages, costs, and interest in a possession suit.

Brett, Q. C.—In the case of an interim injunction there is this difference, that a decision of the court is obtained, which cannot be said in this case.

Milward, Q. C. in reply.—In the Peri no security for damage was required, because it was not the practice of the court in such cases to give damages to the successful party at all (The Evangelismos, Pritch. Digest, 427); hence the application was refused. In the cases of the Wasp, the Ariel, and the Bea, vessels also belonging to Mr. Prieoleau, this court, during the vacation, said that it would not hear the United States unless they gave security for both damages and costs.

J. Lushington (amicus curie).—In reference to these cases I may state that I made an application that they should stand over till term time; but the learned judge, being displeased that petitions had not been filed in compliance with the order of the court, refused to grant the application without the security for both damages and costs.

Dr. Lushington this day gave judgment as follows:—This is a case of possession by the United States. The defts. move that the plts. may give security for costs and damage. The plts. do not dispute that they are liable to give security so far as costs are concerned. The question is as to damage. On behalf of the defts. it is argued that, this being a cause of possession, in which by the practice of the court the vessel is not released on bail, damages must accrue to them from the institution of the cause—that is, supposing the cause to have been improperly instituted; that the reasons for requiring a plt. out of the jurisdiction to give security for costs apply a fortiori to his giving security for damages; and I was referred also to what was stated to be the practice of the Court of Ch. in granting injunctions. I do not deny that there is force in these arguments; but, on the other hand, it has not been the practice of this court to require from a plt. out of the jurisdiction security for damages: (D. H. Neri, Lushington, 543.) The only case to the contrary is a recent one decided in the vacation. I must decline to change in a particular case the settled practice of the court, and least of all in a case like the present, where there is no reason to suspect the solvency or good faith of the plts. I refuse, therefore, so much of the motion as refers to security for damages.

Salvage services within the Cinque Ports—25 & 26 Vict. c. 63, s. 49—Jurisdiction.

Where salvage services are rendered within the boundaries of the Cinque Ports, though the value of the property saved is under 1000l., this court still retains its concurrent jurisdiction with the Court of Admiralty of the Cinque Ports unaffected by the above section.

And a motion to dismiss a suit for salvage services within these boundaries brought in this court where the value of the property saved was about 500l. was dismissed with costs.

This was a motion, in a salvage suit, where the salvage services were rendered within the boundaries of the Cinque Ports, and the value of the property saved not quite 500l., that the suit should be dismissed, this not being the proper tribunal. The motion was made and the question argued on the 26th ult.

Cohen, in support of the motion.—Salvage suits where the value of property saved is under 1000l. are not to be heard in this court under the 49th section of the Merchant Shipping Amendment Act of 1862, but as this case arose within the jurisdiction of the Court of Admiralty of the Cinque Ports, the question arises whether this court has in this case concurrent jurisdiction with the court of the Cinque Ports. It was decided in the Maria Louisa, Sw. 67, that this court did retain its concurrent jurisdiction under the 460th section of the Merchant Shipping Act of 1854, and hence in cases arising within the boundaries of the Cinque Ports had still jurisdiction, though the value of the property saved was under 200l.; but my contention is, that under the 49th section of the Merchant Shipping Amendment Act 1862, this court no longer retains jurisdiction in cases where the value of the property is under 1000l., even though they arise within the boundaries of the Cinque Ports. The words in that section are general; they are, “all cases where the value of the property saved is under 1000l.” These words include the cases arising within the Cinque Ports, and hence the jurisdiction of this court is ousted. The costs of coming to this court are very heavy, and this court will be inclined to exclude a claim brought here where the property is small. The question here is not whether the jurisdiction of the Court of Admiralty of the Cinque Ports should be excluded, but whether the jurisdiction of this court is to be excluded in such cases.

Clarkson contra.—The 460th section of the Merchant Shipping Act has laid down that the jurisdiction of the Court of the Cinque Ports should exist as it always had done. The Maria Louisa decided the question of concurrent jurisdiction; hence this case, arising within the Cinque Ports, has a right to be brought here. The 49th section of the Amendment Act certainly extends the jurisdiction of justices, but can its terms be said to repeal the provision in the 460th section of the principal Act reserving the Cinque Port jurisdiction as it had been? By the 1st section of the Amendment Act it is to be construed with and as part of the Act of 1854, and hence the reservation to the Cinque Ports remains unchanged by it. In the 49th section the words “all cases” are explained further on, for it says, under the 2nd head, “such provision shall apply, whether the services have been rendered in the United Kingdom or not;” and in reference to this the words are thus used generally.

Cohen in reply.

Dr. LUSHINGTON this day gave judgment as follows:—This is a cause of salvage for services rendered within the boundaries of the Cinque Ports. The value of the property saved, as appears from the affidavits, is under 1000l.; indeed, does not amount to 500l. The defts., the owners of the ship and cargo, now move to be dismissed from the suit, on the ground that, under the circumstances, the court has no jurisdiction. The question depends upon the joint operation of the Merchant Shipping Acts. Previous to 1 & 2 Geo. 4, c. 76, in the case of salvage services rendered within the boundaries of the Cinque Ports, this court had concurrent jurisdiction with the Court of Admiralty of the Cinque Ports. The stat. 1 & 2 Geo. 4, c. 76, conferred a further jurisdiction upon commissioners appointed by the Lord Warden. In 1854, the Merchant Shipping Act was passed; and the repealing Act, which accompanied it, repealed the stat. 1 & 2 Geo. 4, c. 76, except certain sections which are expressly excepted, and which maintain the jurisdiction of the commissioners. The 460th section of the Merchant Shipping Act (which occurs in part 8 of the Act) commences by providing that disputes with respect to salvage “arising within the boundaries of the Cinque Ports shall be determined in the manner in which the same had been hitherto determined,” the effect of which is to leave concurrent jurisdiction in this court, and in the Court of Admiralty of the Cinque Ports, and the commissioners appointed by the Lord Warden, and so the Court held in the case of the Maria Louisa, Sw. 67. The same 460th section proceeded to give an exclusive jurisdiction to justices in case of any salvage dispute arising elsewhere (than within the boundaries of the Cinque Ports) in the United Kingdom, if the sum claimed did not exceed 200l. In 1862 the Merchant Shipping Amendment Act was passed, the 49th section of which is as follows: “The provisions contained in the 8th part of the principal Act for giving summary jurisdiction to two justices in salvage cases, and for preventing unnecessary appeal and litigation in such cases, shall be amended as follows (that is to say)—(1), such provisions shall extend to all cases in which the value of the property saved does not exceed 1000l. as well as to the cases provided for by the principal Act; (2), such provisions shall be held to apply whether the salvage service has been rendered within the limits of the United Kingdom or not." Now the court has held that, in the cases to which this section applies, the justices are invested with an exclusive jurisdiction. It is now contended on behalf of the defts., that the words of the section are quite general (which is true); that they apply to cases within the Cinque Ports, and therefore that the jurisdiction of this court is ousted. But if this reasoning is good, then—although different considerations of policy might apply—it would follow that the jurisdiction of the Court of Admiralty of the Cinque Ports, and the commissioners appointed by the Lord Warden, is ousted also. But this is clearly not so; for the sections of 1 & 2 Geo. 4, c. 76, left unrepealed by the Merchant Shipping (principal) Act are not to be found in the schedule of statutory provisions repealed by the Merchant Shipping Amendment Act. Moreover, I am satisfied that the general words used in the 49th section of the amending Act, namely, that the provisions shall extend to all cases in which the value of the property saved does not exceed 1000*l.*, and shall apply whether the salvage services have been rendered within the limits of the United Kingdom or not, refer to the latter part of the 460th section of the principal Act, in which provision had been made only for cases where the sum claimed did not exceed 200*l.*, and for cases occurring in the United Kingdom elsewhere than within the boundaries of the Cinque Ports, and does not refer to the earlier part of the 460th section, which provided that "disputes with respect to salvage arising within the boundaries of the Cinque Ports should be determined in the manner in which the same had previously been determined. I am of opinion, therefore, that the Merchant Shipping Amendment Act leaves untouched the concurrent jurisdiction of the court over salvage cases like the present, arising within the boundaries of the Cinque Ports; and this being so, I do not hold myself at liberty to entertain considerations of the policy of ousting the jurisdiction of this court in trifling cases. I refuse this motion with costs.

JUDICIAL COMMITTEE OF THE PRIVY COUNCIL.

Reported by JAMES PATERSON, Esq., of the Middle Temple, Barrister-at-Law.

Friday, March 8, 1867.

(Present—The Right Hon. Lord ROMILLY, Sir J. W. COLVILLE, and Sir R. T. KINDERSLEY.)

LONDON AND EDINBURGH SHIPPING COMPANY v.
EATON.

THE IONA.

Ship—Collision—Pilot—Evidence of negligence—Look-out—Contributory negligence.

Where the services of a pilot are compulsory, and he has charge of a vessel, and a collision occurs, caused by negligence, the owner cannot escape liability unless he can establish that the negligent act was exclusively that of the pilot. Hence, if there was no vigilant look-out kept by the crew, but they relied on the pilot, who did not see a barge ahead till it was too late to avoid collision, this is prima facie contributory negligence, which renders the owners liable.

This was a cause of damage brought against the London and Edinburgh Shipping Company, owners of the screw steamship Iona, by John Eaton, of Brentford, the owner of the sailing barge Emily Fanny.

At 8 p.m. on the 11th March 1866 the barge was in Blackwall Reach, in the river Thames, laden with sand, the tide nearly at high water, and a dead calm. The screw steamer was observed at a distance of a quarter of a mile steaming down at seven miles an hour, and went clear over the barge, cutting her in two.

The learned Judge of the Admiralty Court gave judgment to the effect that there was no proper look-out kept on board the Iona, and she ought to have seen the barge earlier and prevented the collision. The owners of the Iona appealed against that judgment.

Brett, Q. C. and Clarkson, for the app., contended that if any blame was to be attributed to anyone on board the Iona such blame was solely that of the pilot, and that the apps. were not liable for damage arising from his neglect or default. The barge was seen by the pilot in ample time for him to have taken proper measures and to have avoided the collision. The court below, therefore, was wrong in holding that it was material to consider whether there was any proper look-out kept by the crew of the steamer. The pilot from his elevated position was best able to see a craft ahead. In point of fact there was such look-out kept by the crew; but inasmuch as the steamer was bound to take a pilot, and this collision was caused exclusively by his negligence, the owners were not liable:

Merchant Shipping Act (17 & 18 Vict.), sect. 388:

Pilot Act (6 Geo. 4, c. 125), sect. 55.

Deane, Q.C. and V. Lushington, for the resps., contended that the court below was right, for it was well settled that under the sections of the Pilot and Merchant Shipping Acts, the owner, in order to escape liability, was bound to establish that the fault was that of the pilot exclusively, and that there was no contributory negligence on the part of the crew:

The Diana, 1 W. Rob. 135;

The Christiana, 7 Moo. P. C. 160;

The Schwalbe, 11 Moo. P. C. 250;

The Killarney, 6 L. T. Rep. N. S. 908.

Here it was substantially admitted that the look-out kept on board the steamer was lax, and the master had no right to expect the pilot, who had other duties, to take upon himself the office of searching for vessels ahead: the judgment, therefore, was right.

Lord ROMILLY.—This is an appeal from a decree of the High Court of Admiralty, pronounced on the 24th July 1866, in a cause of damage brought by the owner and crew of the sailing barge Emily Fanny (the present resps.), against the owners of the screw steamship Iona, arising from a collision which occurred in Blackwall Reach of the river Thames, on the 11th March 1866. At about eight o'clock in the morning of that day, and therefore in broad daylight, the barge, laden with sand, was coming up the river under sail and with two men pulling at the oars, and heading nearly north; the steamer (a newly built iron ship of 648 tons) was going down the river at the rate of six or seven miles an hour. The weather was nearly calm, what little wind there was being (as stated by the apps. in the preliminary act) from the southward and eastward. The state of the tide was "last quarter flood," that is, nearly high water, running up the river at the rate of about a knot an hour. The steamer was in charge of William George Allen, a licensed Trinity-house pilot, who was standing on the high bridge, his proper place, whence he gave his directions to the man at the wheel by waving his hand in the usual manner. The master of the steamer, Thomas Raison, was standing on the roof of the midships house, which forms a sort of lower bridge. The boatswain was stationed on the fore-castle to keep a look-out ahead. As the steamer was rounding Blackwall-point, she came stem on, against the port side of the barge, which immediately filled and sank. About these facts there is no controversy. The resps. instituted proceedings in the High Court of Admiralty against the apps. in a cause of damage; and by their petition, after stating the facts, alleged that the collision was entirely attributable to the improper navigation of the steamer, and to the negligence and default of those on board her. The apps., by their answer, alleged that whilst the course of the steamer was being shaped to round Blackwall-point, the barge was seen ahead, and rather on the starboard bow of the steamer, and at the distance of between 200 and 300 yards, apparently proceeding to the northward; that thereupon the helm of the steamer, which was then a-port, for the purpose of rounding Blackwall-point, was, by order of the pilot, put hard a-port, with a view to pass under the stern of the barge, but the tide took the steamer and prevented her from answering her helm; and although the engines were, by order of the pilot, eased, stopped and reversed, a collision could not be prevented, and the steamer, with her stem and port bow struck the barge on her port side, and notwithstanding that a fender was put over the side of the steamer, the barge sank. The answer also asserted that the collision, and the damages and losses consequent thereon, were not caused by or attributable to any improper navigation of the steamer, or to any negligence or default of those, or any of those, on board her, but was the result of inevitable accident. The answer further asserted that if the collision was in any way occasioned by any one on board the steamer, it was solely occasioned by the pilot, and they (the apps.) were not liable for any damage caused thereby. The cause came on to be heard on the 24th July last, before the learned judge of the High Court of Admiralty, assisted by two elder brethren of the Trinity-house. Four witnesses were called by the apps: Allen, the pilot; Raison, the master of the steamer; Edgar, the second engineer; and Williamson, the second officer, who was at the wheel, with two other men, when the collision occurred. They were examined virâ voce in court. The resps. called no witnesses. The learned judge, having pointed out to his two assessors the questions upon which their opinions were required, and after consultation with them, declared his opinion to be, that there was no proof that a proper look-out was kept on board the steamer; that she ought to have seen the barge earlier, and prevented the collision; and therefore he pronounced against the steamer, and condemned the owners thereof in damages and costs. From that decision the present appeal is brought by the owners of the steamer. In arguing this appeal, the apps., by their counsel, no longer contend that the collision was not occasioned by the negligence or default of any one on board the steamer, but was the result of inevitable accident. That point they abandon; and the only ground upon which they insist that the decision ought to be reversed is, that the collision was, as they allege, occasioned entirely by the default of the pilot, and that therefore the owners of the steamer are exempt from liability. This is the only point which their Lordships have now to consider. By the Merchant Shipping Act (17 & 18 Vict. c. 104), s. 388, it is enacted that no owner or master of any ship shall be answerable to any person whatever for any loss or damage occasioned by the fault or incapacity of any qualified pilot acting in charge of such ship within any district where the employment of such pilot is compulsory by law. An enactment substantially to the same effect, though expressed in different language, was contained in the Pilotage Act (6 Geo. 4, c. 125), s. 55. Now, in construing those Acts, it has been established as a principle, that, in order to entitle the owners to the benefit of the exemption from liability thereby provided, they must prove that the damage, for which it is sought to make them liable, was occasioned exclusively by the default of the pilot. It is not enough for them to prove that there was fault or negligence in the pilot—they must prove to the satisfaction of the court, which has to try the question, that there was no default whatever on the part of the officers and crew of their vessel, or any of them, which might have been in any degree conducive to the damage. This principle was very clearly laid down by Dr. Lushington in the case of the Diana, 1 W. Rob. 135, which was a case under the earlier of the two statutes. That learned judge there says: "To obtain the exemption from responsibility conferred by the Act, I think that the owners of the Diana should prove that the accident arose entirely from the fault of the pilot; that the exception under the Act ought to be construed strictly, and that if the accident was occasioned by the joint misconduct of the pilot and crew, I am bound to hold that the liability still attaches to the owners." The same principle was upheld and acted upon by this court in the case of the Christiana, 7 Moo. P. C. C. 160, which was also under the statute of Geo. 4; and in the case of the Schwalbe, 11 Moo. P. C. C. 250, under the Act of the Queen; and it has been treated as the established law in several other cases, both in this and in other courts. The question, therefore, which their Lordships have to determine, is simply this: Is it proved to their satisfaction that there was no default in any of the crew of the steamer, which may have conduced to the collision? And upon this question their Lordships, having fully considered the evidence, entirely concur in the opinion of the learned judge of the court below that it is not so proved; for it is not proved that a good look-out was kept on board the steamer. The importance of alleging and proving that a good look-out was kept was of course felt by the apps.; and accordingly in the second article of their answer to the petition in the court below, they expressly allege that "a good and vigilant look-out was being kept from on board her." Now what evidence do they adduce in support of that allegation? They prove that the boatswain was stationed on the fore-castle to keep a look-out; but they prove no more. Now what was the duty of the man thus stationed on the look-out? Surely his duty was to keep a vigilant look-out, and when he saw any craft ahead to report to the pilot. There was nothing to prevent the barge being seen from the steamer some time before they were within three hundred yards of each other, when the pilot first saw her. Although the apps., in the preliminary act, allege that the weather was hazy (contrary to the allegation of the resps. that it was clear), there is no evidence of the presence of any haze. Nor is it suggested that there were any other vessels in the way, or any other obstruction to a wide and distant view. Indeed, it is plain from a comparison of the evidence of the pilot and of the master, that the barge was actually seen by at least one individual on board the steamer (namely, the master) before the pilot saw her; for the pilot says that, for the purpose of rounding the point, and before he saw the barge, he had given an order to "slow" the engines, and had waved to port the helm, and that he afterwards saw the barge, distant about three hundred yards, and then waved to put the helm hard a-port; and the master says, that at the time when the pilot gave the first order to "slow," and the first order to port, he (the master) had already seen the barge, and that in fact he saw her as the steamer was passing the factory before she came to Blackwall-point; thus clearly showing that the master saw the barge before the pilot did. And if the master could see her, the boatswain on the fore-castle might have seen her, and ought to have seen her, and would have seen her if he had been keeping a vigilant look-out. Whether the man saw the barge or not, or whether he was or was not keeping any look-out at all, does not appear; but it is not suggested that he made any report whatever. The learned counsel for the appa. was therefore driven to the necessity of arguing that it was the pilot's duty to keep a look-out, which his elevated position on the high bridge well enabled him to do; and that it was unnecessary for the man stationed on the look-out to make any report, or indeed to keep a look-out at all. This argument cannot be admitted. Its admission would produce very mischievous consequences, and very much increase the risk of navigation. No doubt the pilot may, and probably in most cases does, see a craft ahead as soon as any one else on board; but his attention is necessarily directed, from time to time, to other matters relating to the navigation of the vessel under his charge, besides keeping a look-out; and on that account it may happen that he does not see an object ahead so soon as he ought to have been aware of it, in order to enable him to take measures to avoid it. Hence arises the necessity for having a man stationed on the fore-castle, with the special and sole duty of keeping a vigilant look-out, a necessity fully recognised on the part of those on board the steamer, by their stationing the boatswain on the fore-castle for that special purpose. And it is impossible to hold that the man so stationed was justified in neglecting to keep a look-out, on the ground that it is the duty of the pilot to keep a look-out. The only remaining question is, whether the failure of the look-out man to perform his duty did not conduce, or may not have conduced (for that is sufficient for the present purpose) to bring about the collision. Allen, the pilot, in his examination, says, that when he first saw the barge, she was distant about 300 yards. At the rate at which the steamer was going, six or seven miles an hour (say six and a half miles an hour), it would take only about a minute and a half to go over that space. He says, that as soon as he saw the barge he ordered the helm (which was already a-port to round the point) to be put hard a-port, which was immediately done; that the steamer at first answered to the helm, and payed off to starboard; but that when she came to the tide (which, it is obvious, from the very sharp and sudden bend of the river at that place, would be running somewhat across the channel of the river from the southern towards the northern shore), the tide took her on the starboard bow, and she ceased to obey the helm, and in consequence thereof she ran into the barge. The master's evidence corroborates this representation of the pilot. No doubt the pilot ought (as it was argued for the appa.) to have known that, in the then state of the tide, and at that part of the river, such would be the effect of the tide on the starboard bow. But there seems no reason for supposing that he did not know it; indeed, it does not require the knowledge or experience of a pilot to know, from the remarkable bend of the river round Blackwall-point, that such must be the effect of the tide in its then state. Now if the pilot had been earlier made aware of the position of the barge, he might have sooner put the helm hard a-port so as to avoid a collision, and we are bound to assume that he would have done so. As it was, he was not made aware of the position of the barge till he saw her only about 300 yards distant, when it was too late to prevent the collision. Thus the neglect of duty on the part of the look-out man not only might have been conducive to the disaster, but was in all probability the ultimate cause of it. Upon the whole case, their Lordships are of opinion that there was neglect of duty on the part of the look-out man; that this neglect of duty conduced to the collision; and that it was such default on the part of the crew of the steamer as to disentitle the owners to the benefit of that exemption from responsibility which the statute provides. They will therefore humbly advise Her Majesty to affirm the decision of the court below, and to dismiss this appeal with costs.

COURT OF APPEAL IN CHANCERY.

Reported by THOMAS BROOKSBANK and E. STEWART ROOME, Esqrs. Barristers-at-Law.

Dec. 8 and 10, 1866, and Jan. 26, 1867.

(Before the LORD CHANCELLOR (Chelmsford) and TURNER, L. J.)

HOOPER v. GUNN.

MACLELLAN v. GUNN.

Mortgage of vessel—American register—Purchase in England—Notice to purchaser—Title to ship—Inquiries—Loches.

Shipbuilders in the United States were in the habit of building vessels, mortgaging them to the plt. H. and others, and then sending them to England with a power of attorney to sell. The American law requires, in order to render valid a sale or mortgage of a ship, that it shall be recorded in the proper office of the port where the ship is registered, and does not require notice of the mortgage to be indorsed on the certificate of the ship's registry. H.'s mortgages were duly recorded, and in some cases the certificates were indorsed, but the evidence showed that as this had hindered a sale the practice was, with H.'s consent, not adhered to in the case of the ship E. E. This vessel was sent to England for sale in the usual way, and was there sold to G., but neither H., nor a subsequent mortgagee, the plt. M., was paid, and the builders having failed, two bills were filed to establish the mortgages against the purchaser:

Held, that the law of this country will recognise and give effect to rights acquired under the laws of foreign states, where it is not contrary to English law and policy to do so; but that the rights arising from the sale in England must be determined according to the law loci contractus; that accordingly the legal title to the ship was in the plt. H. at the time of the purchase; but that, by joining the builders in the intentional concealment of the mortgage, he had misled the purchaser, and his bill must be dismissed.

Turner, L. J. was very strongly inclined to think that in the purchase of a foreign ship an English purchaser ought not to rely merely on what the ship's papers may show, but that he is bound to make further inquiry into the title.

These were two appeals from decrees of Wood, V. C.; in the former suit the appeal being by the deft., and in the latter one by the plt. The hearing before his Honour is reported in 13 L. T. Rep. N. S. 187, and the facts are briefly these:—

Two brothers named Gardiner were shipbuilders at Boston, in the United States of America, and were in the habit of sending ships to England for sale, amongst which were the Lamington Waver, the Cashanger, the Leaping Water, and the Edward Everett. The plt. Hooper, a merchant at Boston, made advances to the Gardiners upon these ships built by them, to be repaid out of the purchase-moneys. The plt. in the second suit was the captain of the Edward Everett, and he advanced money upon her, which was also to be repaid out of the proceeds of sale. By an Act of Congress it is provided that no bill of sale, mortgage, &c., of any vessel of the United States shall be valid against any person other than the grantor or mortgagor, his heirs and devisees, and persons having actual notice, unless it be recorded in the office of the collector of customs where such vessel is registered or enrolled. In conformity with this Act all the mortgages were duly recorded; and in the case of the Laughing Water Hooper's mortgage was also indorsed upon the certificate of registry, but none of the other mortgages was so indorsed. The reason for this omission appeared to be, that such indorsement had proved an impediment to the sale of the Laughing Water. This vessel was sold in England in 1857, and Hooper's advances were paid out of the purchase-money. The Cashanger was burnt at sea; the Leaping Water was sold in England in 1860, and Hooper's mortgage was paid.

By a bill of sale dated the 9th May 1860, and recorded under the provisions of the Act of Congress, the Edward Everett was mortgaged to Hooper by Charles Gardiner, in whose name she was registered, to secure 25,000 dollars; and by a second bill of sale, dated the 30th May 1860, she was also mortgaged to Maclellan to secure 10,000 dollars. By a power of attorney, dated the same 30th May, Charles Gardiner empowered Maclellan to sell this vessel, and to receive the purchase-money; and on the same day he gave him instructions by letter to pay Hooper's mortgage out of the price. Maclellan, thus empowered, brought the ship to England, but was unable to sell her, and took her back to America. Next year she was again sent to England in charge of Maclellan, who still held the power of attorney and the letter of instructions. He arrived in London on the 7th Feb. 1861, and opened negotiations with the deft. Gumm for the sale of the ship. But a few days after his arrival in this country Henry Gardiner arrived, bringing with him another power of attorney from Charles Gardiner, dated the 22nd Jan. 1861, by which the earlier power was revoked, and Henry Gardiner was authorised to sell the vessel. He on the 1st April agreed orally to sell the ship to the deft. Gumm for 10,000/., and by bill of sale (30th May 1861) he conveyed the ship to him. Gumm, in Aug. 1861, registered the ship as an English vessel. Meanwhile Maclellan left England in April, and on reaching Boston informed Hooper of the sale to Gumm. Gumm paid his purchase-money to Henry Gardiner, who also returned to America in June, and soon afterwards the Gardiners became insolvent.

Hooper filed his bill in Aug. 1861, alleging his ignorance of the second power of attorney until after he heard of the sale; that he then at once instructed his agents here to enforce his security; that the deft. Gumm had not completed, and could not complete, his title to her, on account of the mortgages, and that he was throughout well aware that the ship was liable to be seized, and would be seized, by the mortgagees on her arrival in an American port. He alleged that the rights of all parties must be decided by American law, by which notice of the mortgage of a ship need not, and in fact could not, be indorsed on the certificate of registry, but that the mortgage became valid by being recorded as already mentioned. He charged that Gumm was bound to make inquiries as to incumbrances upon the ship, and that if he had done so the plt.'s rights must have been disclosed; and, further, that he was expressly informed of the mortgages of both the plts. by Henry Gardiner.

The bill prayed a declaration that Hooper was entitled to a first charge upon the vessel; and that she might be sold, and the purchase-money applied according to the priorities of the persons interested.

The second bill was filed in Sept. 1861, and its statements and the relief prayed were similar to those of the former bill.

Gumm, by his answer, relied upon Maclellan's bringing the ship to England the second time with the same power of attorney from Charles Gardiner as in the previous year. He then, in accordance with his instructions, was endeavouring to sell her, when Henry Gardiner arrived with the subsequent power of attorney, and instructed him to continue to seek a purchaser for the vessel; that while he was so engaged, Maclellan and Henry Gardiner were constantly at his office, and frequently discussed the matter, and that Maclellan was well aware that Henry Gardiner had the power of attorney referred to, and knew that his own authority was superseded. He then stated his own agreement to buy the vessel; that he paid the price (10,000/.) and possession of the ship was given to him; that there was no mention in the certificate, or other papers of the ship, of her being subject to any incumbrance; that he had no notice or knowledge whatever that she was subject to any incumbrance when he completed his purchase, and he then believed that she was not subject to any. He alleged that Maclellan was throughout aware of the negotiations and contract between him (Gumm) and Henry Gardiner, and of the payment of the purchase-money; but that Maclellan never informed him of his or of any other mortgage. He also stated his belief that Hooper was well aware of the existence of the latter power of attorney, and knew that Henry Gardiner came to England expecting to sell the ship; that the transfer to himself had never been registered, as transfers of American ships are not registered here, and transfers of American ships to persons not American citizens are not registered in the United States. He alleged that by American law, although notice of a mortgage of a ship need not be indorsed on the certificate of registry, yet that it may be so indorsed, and that it is the practice so to indorse it; and he submitted that he was not bound to make such inquiries as the bill charged that he ought to have made.

Wood, V. C. declared by his decree in the first suit that Hooper was entitled to the first charge upon the ship for his principal, interest, and costs of suits, and that, on Gumm's paying him the amount thereof within one month from the chief clerk's certificate finding what was the amount due, Hooper should convey the vessel to him, and in default of payment his Honour ordered a sale, and application of the purchase-moneys.

His Honour dismissed Maclellan's bill, but without costs. (See 13 L. T. Rep. N. S. 187.)

Mr. Gumm appealed against the former decree, and Mr. Maclellan against the latter.

The appeals were originally argued in June and July 1866, before the then Lords Justices; but Knight Bruce, L. J. having resigned before judgment, the cases were now reargued before the L. C. and Turner, L. J.; Cairns, L. J. having been engaged as counsel in the causes.

Sir Roundell Pabner, Q. C., and Dickinson, Q. C. supported Mr. Gumm's appeal.

The Attorney-General and Karlake, Q. C. resisted it on behalf of the plt. Hooper.

Kekewich was for the app. Maclellan.

Giffard, Q. C. and Druce, Q. C. appeared for the defts., the Gardiners.

Judgment was reserved until 26th Jan. when

The LORD CHANCELLOR said:—The question upon these two appeals is, whether the deft., a purchaser for valuable consideration of an American ship, called the Edward Everett, can claim the property against the respective plts., the first and second mortgagees. The ship was built at Boston, in America, and registered there on the 9th May 1860, in the name of Charles Gardiner. On the same day she was mortgaged by Gardiner to the plt. Hooper for 25,000 dols., equal to 6000/. The mortgage to Hooper was in pursuance of an agreement that upon the ship being built Hooper should advance upon her, and she should be sent to England for sale, and Hooper's mortgage be paid out of the purchase-money. Hooper had had prior transactions of a similar kind with Gardiner. By the American law, of which evidence was given, it is not necessary that the mortgage of a ship should be indorsed upon her register in order to give the mortgagee a legal title; and the title of a mortgagee is available against a subsequent purchaser, whether he has notice or not of the mortgage. Whether, notwithstanding that it is not required for the protection of a mortgage, it is customary to indorse mortgages upon the copies of register of American vessels, and whether, if no such indorsement appears, a purchaser in this country is justified in considering the ship to be free from incumbrances, are questions upon which there is conflicting evidence. [His Lordship referred to the evidence on this part of the case, and then proceeded:] It would appear from this evidence that, according to the experience of the witness, a clean register did not necessarily prove that the ship was free from incumbrances, but the assurance of the vendor to that effect was always required. As the Edward Everett was built expressly for sale in this country, and the plt. therefore advanced his money upon her knowing the object, and for the express purpose of furthering it, he may fairly be considered as being in the same situation as the vendor. His legal title to the ship would, of course, be determined by American law, but the contract for sale, and the effect of the intervention of the title of a bonâ fide purchaser for valuable consideration, must be governed by the law of England where the contract was made. The plt. Hooper being a party to the intended sale in this country, through which he was to obtain payment of his advances, may be presumed to have known that the probable consequence of the copy of the register containing no notice of his mortgage would be, that the ship might be purchased and the money paid to the agent for sale without any inquiry as to incumbrances. If therefore he chose to permit the register to appear without any indorsement of his mortgage upon it, he should have taken care that notice of his claim was given to a purchaser. But the absence of all notice of the mortgage upon the copy of the certificate of registry did not arise in this case from reliance upon the plt.'s title under the American law, nor from considering it unnecessary for the plt.'s protection, but the mortgage was advisedly kept off from the register for the purpose of facilitating the sale of the ship. In a previous transaction between Gardiner and the plt. Hooper with respect to a vessel called the Laughing Water (which transaction was precisely similar to that relating to the Edward Everett) difficulty and delay had arisen in the completion of the purchase in consequence of the mortgage to the plt. Hooper being indorsed upon the register. In order to prevent a similar obstruction to the sale in the case of the Edward Everett, it was agreed that Hooper's mortgage should not appear upon the certificate of registry. There was, therefore, an intentional concealment of the fact by the plt. Hooper, which, as against him, may be taken to amount to a representation that there were no incumbrances upon the ship, and he was therefore bound to take care to correct the impression which was intended to be conveyed by the appearance of the register by communicating the fact of his interest to a purchaser. Whether any such communication was made to the purchaser will be presently examined.

As I understand the case of the plt. Hooper, it is this: he says that the Edward Everett, on the 30th May 1860, was entrusted to the plt. Maclellan to take to England and sell, under a power of attorney from Gardiner. Maclellan at the same time received an authority from Gardiner instructing him, in the event of his selling the ship, to pay or remit to Messrs. Barings, of London, the sum of 6000/. to be placed by them to the credit of the plt. Hooper, and to be held subject to his order. Maclellan took the ship to England, but being unable to sell returned with her to Boston. In the following year Maclellan was again sent with the ship to England, having the same power of attorney and the same authority. But it appears to me to be the result of the evidence that Gardiner, without the knowledge of Hooper, revoked the power of attorney to Maclellan, and granted one to his brother Henry Gardiner, who arrived in England two days after Maclellan had arrived with the ship. Henry Gardiner immediately assumed the conduct of the sale, and sold the ship to the plt., and received the purchase-money without paying any portion of it to the plt. The plt. alleges that he has been defrauded by the Gardiners; that as long as he believed that Maclellan had an unrevoked power of attorney and authority to pay the amount of his advances to his credit, there was no occasion for him to interpose, and that he has not stood by or encouraged the deft. to deal with Henry Gardiner; even if the deft. is equally innocent with himself, his claim must prevail, though the deft. is a purchaser for value. In the view which I have taken of the case, it appears necessary to examine much of the evidence. The previous transactions between Gardiner and Hooper, in all of which Henry Gardiner was the agent, are immaterial, except so far as the circumstances connected with the Laughing Water led to the determination to keep all notice of the plt.'s mortgage from the certificate of registry of the Edward Everett. I am satisfied, notwithstanding the evidence of the Gardiners, that Hooper was left in ignorance of the revocation of the power to Maclellan, who was allowed by them to sail in the Edward Everett in order to blind the plt.'s eyes, and to make him believe that Maclellan held, and was intended to hold, an efficient power of attorney, while the Gardiners were scheming to supersede him and get the purchase-money of the ship into their own hands. Under these circumstances, I think the plt. might have stood upon his legal title, and that the deft. must have suffered the loss which has been occasioned by the fraud of the Gardiners, if the plt. had not intentionally permitted them to possess the means of making that fraud available. It is distinctly proved that the plt. agreed to allow the Gardiners to have a clean register of the ship in order that the sale might not be impeded. He, therefore, so far as the ship's documents were concerned, was a party to the concealment of his claim. Even if the evidence leaves it a matter of doubt whether the appearance which the register presented was in itself a proof that the ship was free from incumbrances, or that inquiry should have been made upon the subject, I am of opinion that in a case like the present, where the very object of the plt. was to keep the mortgage from the knowledge of persons dealing for the purchase of the ship, his legal title thus intentionally concealed ought not to prevail against a purchaser, unless it could be proved that the purchaser had in some manner distinct notice of it before his purchase, or before the payment of the whole of the purchase-money. No such notice, however, appears to have been given to the deft. He himself swears that he had no notice, and Maclellan, who tried to effect a sale in 1860, says that upon that occasion he deposited in the office of the deft. the power of attorney and letter of instructions to pay the 6000*l.* to Barings to the credit of the plt., and that he told the deft. that the plt. and he had large claims upon the ship. But in the following year, when the sale took place, it does not appear either from his affidavit or cross-examination, that he gave any notice at all of the plt.'s mortgage or of his own. Indeed, with respect to his own claim upon the ship, the V. C. felt himself obliged to hold upon the evidence that he had given no notice whatever, and said that, having misled the deft. into the belief that he was a person having no claim beyond the ship's charges, his case was exactly in the same position in which he should have thought Hooper's would have been if Hooper had known of the second power of attorney. His Honour seems here to assume the fact that the deft. had no notice of the plt.'s mortgage, for if he had the plt.'s knowledge of the second power of attorney would have been immaterial. I have already stated my opinion upon the evidence that the plt. had no knowledge of the power of attorney to Henry Gardiner, and his legal title would therefore have prevailed even against a purchaser for value, if it had not been for his intentional concealment of it. The appearance of the certificate of registry was calculated to lead purchasers to believe that the ship was free from incumbrances, and it appears to me that the plt. could not thus deal with his legal title, and at the same time render it available against a purchaser as if he had knowledge of it. In the competition between the parties, I think that the plt. has disabled himself from standing merely on his legal title, and that the claim of the deft. as a purchaser for value without notice must prevail. I am of opinion that in this case the decree of the V. C. must be reversed.

HOOPER v. GUMM. MACLELLAN v. GUMM.

[CHAN.]

The case of Maclellan is much weaker than that of Hooper, as he may be said literally to have stood by without the least assertion of his claim. I think that the decree of the V. C. in this case ought to be affirmed, and the appeal dismissed with costs.

Lord Justice TURNER said :—These appeals involve questions of much importance and of no inconsiderable difficulty. First, as to the appeal in Hooper's suit. Three points were mainly relied upon in its support: first, that the purchaser of a foreign ship is entitled to proceed in his purchase upon the footing of what may appear upon the ship's papers, and is not bound to make further inquiry into the title to the ship; secondly, that Hooper intentionally withheld notice of his mortgage, and assented to the sale of the ship being made by the Gardiners and under their title, and that this assent upon his part ought to be held binding upon him in favour of the app., the purchaser; and, thirdly, that Hooper, if he had not acquiesced in the purchase, had at all events so conducted himself as to disentitle him from impeaching it. On the part of Hooper, it was argued in support of the decree that he had the legal title to the ship, which could only be displaced by proof that he had authorised or sanctioned the sale, or had been guilty of conduct amounting to fraud with respect to it, and that no such case was proved against him; and further that the app. ought to be held or be taken to have had notice of the mortgage.

Some question was raised in the argument as to the law by which this case ought to be decided, though this point was not much gone into on either side; it was more fully discussed when the appeal was first argued before the late Lord Justice and myself, and it may, therefore, be right for me to say that, in my opinion, the law of this country ought to govern the decision of this case, for the purchase of the ship, on which the rights of the question depend, was made and completed here. In saying this, however, I must not be understood to mean that the shipping law of America is not to be regarded in deciding the case; on the contrary, I think that great regard must be paid to it. In order to determine what the rights of these parties now are, it must be ascertained what their rights were at the time when the purchase was made, and, in order to ascertain this, resort must be had to the American shipping law. The rights of the parties stood upon that law at the time when the purchase was made, and I apprehend that where rights are acquired under the laws of foreign states, the law of this country recognises and gives effect to those rights, unless it is contrary to the law and policy of this country to do so. There is nothing, so far as I am aware, opposed to the law of this country in the recognition of the rights of an American mortgagee in an American ship; and so far as the policy of this country is concerned, it is obvious that, unless the courts of this country recognise rights acquired under the laws of foreign states, these foreign states would not recognise rights acquired under our laws, and the consequence of this would be that no mortgagee of a British ship could with safety allow her to go to any foreign port under the control of the mortgagor, the owner; and all investments of money upon mortgages of ships would, to say the least, be rendered insecure. I take it, therefore, that in this point of view regard must be had to the American shipping law, and looking to the Registry Act of the United States, which the plts. have put in evidence, and to the opinions of the counsel in America upon the effect of that Act, no reasonable doubt can, I think, be entertained that, according to the law of America, the legal interest in this ship was at the time when the app. Gumm became the purchaser well and effectually vested in Hooper. This point must, therefore, be assumed in Hooper's favour. We come, then, to the question whether the purchaser of a foreign ship is entitled to proceed in his purchase upon the footing of what may appear upon the ship's papers, or is bound to make further inquiry into the title to the ship, a question certainly of great importance. In the view which I have ultimately taken of this case, it is not necessary for us to give any opinion upon this point, nor do I intend to give any final opinion upon it. I say no more than that, as at present advised, the purchaser is bound to make inquiry as to the title. A ship is not like an ordinary personal chattel; it does not pass by delivery, nor does the possession of it prove the title to it. There is no market overt for ships; the laws of the United States have provided the means of evidencing the title to them. In ordinary cases of purchases of property not purchased in market overt, the purchasers are bound to inquire into the title to the property purchased by them. They cannot shut their eyes and ears, and claim the benefit of want of notice, and if they think proper to buy without inquiring into the title of the persons from whom they buy, they must be held to be affected with notice of what would have appeared if the inquiry had been made. It is true that there is in this case strong evidence that, in the cases of purchases in this country of American ships, it has not been usual that inquiries into the title should be made; but this may well have arisen from the purchasers having felt that they were safe in relying upon the bona fides of the vendors. This, no doubt, would generally be the case, and it is only where there has been malu fides on the part of the vendors that the question of the obligation of the purchaser to inquire can arise. At all events, the course which has been pursued in purchases of property of this description cannot, I think, alter the law. In my opinion, then, this point must also be ruled in favour of the app. Hooper.

SCHOTSMANNS v. THE LANCASHIRE AND YORKSHIRE RAILWAY COMPANY.

The only material question which then remains is, whether Hooper ought to be held to have authorised the sale in question, or to have so acted with respect to it as to disentitle him from impeaching it; and I agree with the V. C. that this is the real question in the cause. Now the evidence quite satisfies me that Hooper intended that this ship should be sold by the Gardiners, and under their title, and without his mortgage being disclosed to the purchaser. In the case of the Laughing Water his mortgage had been indorsed on the certificate of registry, and in consequence of this indorsement difficulties arose with the purchaser and the completion of the purchase was long delayed. In order to prevent these difficulties and this delay arising in other cases, he had agreed that for the future his mortgages should not be indorsed upon the certificate of registry of the ships that should be mortgaged to him. He thus, as it seems to me, put it in the power of the Gardiners to sell to purchasers without notice of the mortgages, and to sell not under his title, but under their title. It cannot be said on his part, that he did this in reliance upon inquiries being made by the purchasers, which would disclose his mortgages, for the very object with which he did it was to avoid inquiries being made; and it cannot, of course, be said that he did it with intent to charge the purchasers, for this would be a fraud on his part, and I am far from thinking that any fraud was contemplated by him. Let us consider, then, the effect of what was then done by him. There is not only a deliberate intention of suppressing the mortgage, but a power given to the Gardiners to sell under their title, and not under his. I should feel great difficulty in holding that, after such conduct on his part, he could maintain any claim in equity against any purchaser from the Gardiners. But the case appears to me to stand yet higher against him. What was done by him amounts, I think, to an authority to the Gardiners to sell for themselves and for him. He, in effect, constituted the Gardiners his agents to sell the ship, and it was not attempted to be denied, nor could it be denied, that if he did this the bill in this suit could not be maintained. That he intended to authorise, and did authorise, the sale of the ship by the Gardiners is, I think, confirmed by the evidence in the cause; but it is plain from the evidence that he placed great trust and confidence in the Gardiners. The fact of his having received from them the moneys secured to him by his mortgages on the Laughing Water and the Leaping Water ought not, perhaps, to be relied upon against him, as it may be accounted for by the indorsement upon the certificate of registry in the former case, and by the power of attorney which was stated at the bar to have been given by him in the other. But there is this further fact—he had notice of this ship having been sold by the Gardiners to Gumm as early as the 1st May 1861, and it was not till the 18th June in that year, when the Gardiners were on the point of failing, that he began to raise any question as to the sale; having in the meantime left the purchaser to pay, as he in fact during that interval did pay, a considerable part of the purchase-money. It was said, however, on the part of Hooper, that assuming him to have authorised the sale by the Gardiners, he did so only if the sale was made under the power of attorney given to Maclellan; but I do not think that his case can, either in point of law or of fact, be maintained upon this ground. In point of law I do not think he could throw upon the purchaser from the Gardiners the obligation of inquiring into the circumstances under which the power of attorney to sell was given. It would be sufficient for the purchaser to be satisfied that it was given by the person who was authorised to sell; and in point of fact there is neither allegation nor proof that the plt. acted upon the faith of Maclellan's power of attorney being continued in force. The evidence, I think, proves the contrary. It may be, and I have little doubt but that fraud was practised by the Gardiners upon the app., but I cannot see my way to hold that the app. can be affected by that fraud. The question of acquiescence, upon which the app. also relied, is not, I think, of any weight, otherwise than as evidencing the plt.'s assent to the sale, and I do not therefore enter further into it. For the reasons which I have stated, my opinion is that this decree cannot be maintained, and that Hooper's bill ought to have been dismissed. But as there has certainly been a want of caution on the part of the app., I think it should have been dismissed without costs, and of course there will be no costs of the appeal. As to the other appeal by Maclellan, I think it suffices to say that the case against him is, in my opinion, stronger in some points than the case against Hooper, and that his bill was therefore properly dismissed. And for the same reasons as in the other case, I think that it was properly dismissed without costs. The order upon this appeal will therefore simply be, to dismiss the appeal without costs.

The LORD CHANCELLOR.—I think that the petition of appeal in Maclellan's case ought to be dismissed with costs.

SCHOTSMANNS v. THE LANCASHIRE AND YORKSHIRE RAILWAY COMPANY.

Stoppage in transitu—Unpaid vendor—Goods shipped in vessel of purchaser—Knowledge of vendor of ownership—Delivery—Jurisdiction of the Court of Ch.

C., a merchant at Goole, trading as F. and Co., bought flour of the plt., residing in France, which was to be shipped at Rouen. From that port there was a line of steamers running to Goole, which belonged to a firm of W., C., and Co., in which C. was a partner. C. directed that the flour should be shipped by one of these vessels, speaking of them as "our steamers," and mentioning one, the L., which was about to sail, in which there would be room. The L. was registered in the sole name of C., and she was advertised as a vessel trading between Rouen and Goole. The flour was shipped by her, and she took a general cargo in addition. The bills of lading were signed by the master, and made the flour deliverable to F. and Co., or assigns, he or they paying freight as per agreement. When the vessel arrived in the river Humber, the plt.'s agent served a notice on the master that the flour was the property of the plt., and was not to be delivered to F. and Co. without the plt.'s further order, and gave notice to the railway company, which had received a part of it, to warehouse it to his (the agent's) order :

Held, that although the agent was entitled to serve such a notice, and the notice itself was sufficient in form, yet the delivery of the goods on board the vessel was a complete delivery to C. himself, and there was no such middleman concerned as to render a stoppage in transitu possible. The master of the ship was merely the servant of the owner, and did not fill such a character :

Held, also (differing from the M. R.), that it would make no difference whether the L. was a ship trading generally, or was specially sent to receive the flour, as the vendor was aware that she was the property of the purchaser.

This Court has jurisdiction to entertain a bill of this kind, for the case depends on the ordinary principles regulating in equity the relations between mortgagor and mortgagee.

Semble, stoppage in transitu does not rescind the contract, but only gives or restores to the vendor a lien for the price.

This was an appeal by the defts., the Lancashire and Yorkshire Railway Company, against a decree of the M. R., declaring that the plt. Mr. Schotsmanns was entitled to a lien upon a cargo of flour for unpaid purchase-money, directing certain inquiries as to the amount due and otherwise, and ordering that the plt. should be at liberty to add his costs up to the hearing to his security.

The hearing of the cause before his Lordship is reported in 18 L. T. Rep. N. S. 733, and from that report and the judgments in the Court of Appeal the facts sufficiently appear.

Jessel, Q. C. and Bird supported the appeal on behalf of the company, and stated that there were several grounds upon which they relied, the principal one being that the shipment of the flour in question on board a vessel which the vendor knew to be the property of the purchaser was a complete delivery to him, and prevented the possibility of a stoppage in transitu. They accordingly referred upon this question to

They also contended that there was no jurisdiction in equity to support such a bill, citing in reference thereto

Baggallay, Q.C., Eddis, and C. P. Butt (of the Common Law Bar), for the plt., in support of the decree, were directed to address themselves to the question whether there had been a complete delivery of the flour to the purchaser by shipping it on board his vessel. If the vessel had been dispatched by the purchaser specially to receive the flour, then the shipping of the flour on board her would have been a complete delivery; but she was a general trader, plying regularly between the two ports; it was open to anybody to consign cargo by her. On this occasion she had a considerable freight in addition to the flour, and that she chanced to belong wholly or in part to the purchaser could not make the shipping of the flour by her a complete delivery. The M. R. had considered this as expressly decided in the case of Mitchell v. Ede, 11 Ad. & El. 888; in addition to which they relied on Jessel, Q.C. having replied, judgment was reserved until the 28th Jan., when

The LORD CHANCELLOR said:—This is an appeal from the decree of the M. R. in favour of the plts., who by their bill had claimed a right as against the defts. to stop certain goods in transitu under the following circumstances:—The plts. were Emile Schotsmanns, a merchant at Lille, and Geo. Gwyn Craig, his agent and correspondent in England. The defts. were the Lancashire and Yorkshire Railway Company. James Cunliffe, who carried on business at Goole, under the firm of James Fort and Co., and Harwood Walcot Banner, the assignee under Cunliffe's bankruptcy. In July 1864 the plt. Schotsmanns having entered into a contract to sell to Fort and Co. 1870 sacks of wheat flour, directed his agents, Messrs. Delafosse and Co., of Rouen, to purchase and ship the same, and Messrs. Delafosse and Co. accordingly, towards the end of Sept. 1864, shipped 1870 sacks of flour on board a vessel called the Londos, then at Rouen, and bound for Goole. Four bills of lading were signed by the master, making the flour deliverable to "Fort and Co., or assigns, he or they paying freight for the same at and after the rate of , as per agreement." Three of the bills were handed to Messrs. Delafosse, and the fourth was retained by the master. The Londos was one of several trading vessels belonging to the firm of Watson, Cunliffe, and Co., of which firm the deft. Cunliffe was a member. She was registered in the name of Cunliffe as sole owner, and was advertised as a vessel trading between the ports of Rouen and Goole. Besides the flour consigned to Fort and Co., the Londos had a general cargo belonging to other persons. On the 30th Sept., in consequence of reports that Fort and Co. were in embarrassed circumstances, Messrs. Delafosse indorsed one of the bills of lading in their possession with these words: "Do not deliver to Messrs. Fort and Co., but only to Emile Schotsmanns or his order," and forwarded it to Schotsmanns, who indorsed it to Craig his agent. The Londos arrived in the Humber on the 3rd Oct., and Craig served a notice on the master that Schotsmanns was owner of the flour, and discharged him from delivering it to Fort and Co., or to any other person, without Schotsmanns' order. He also on the same day produced to the master the bill of lading, and pointed out the indorsement thereon, and on the following day hearing that the flour was being received into the warehouses of the defts. the Lancashire and Yorkshire Railway Company, he gave notice to them to warehouse it to his order, which they declined to do. This bill was accordingly filed, praying that the plts. might be declared entitled to have the flour delivered up to them, or if not entitled, the plt. Schotsmanns might be declared entitled to a lien on the flour for the payment of the purchase-money, and that the defts. might be restrained by injunction from removing or parting with the flour. The cause was brought on upon the motion for a decree, when the M. R. by order declared that the plt. Schotsmanns was entitled to a lien for unpaid purchase-money and his costs of suit upon the cargo of flour or the produce, and directed certain inquiries in respect thereof.

Upon the argument of the appeal it was objected that, although stoppage in transitu is an equitable doctrine, it is not the proper subject of a bill in equity. But assuming that such a bill might be maintained, the deft.'s counsel urged several objections to the right of the plt. to stop in transitu, the principal one being that there was a complete delivery of the flour to the consignee at Rouen. We felt the force of this objection so strongly that we desired the plt.'s counsel to confine their argument to it, intimating to them that if necessary we would afterwards hear them on the other points raised on the part of the defts. Upon full consideration we are agreed that the case must be disposed of upon this ground alone. I think it right, however, to say that I entertain no doubt of the plts.' claim being the proper subject of a bill in equity.

It is of the essence of the doctrine of stoppage in transitu, as was most correctly and clearly stated by Lord Cranworth, when Rolfe, B., in the case of Gibson v. Carruthers, 8 M. & W. 328, "that during the transitus the goods should be in the custody of some third person intermediate between the seller who has parted with, and the buyer who has not yet acquired, actual possession." If the goods are actually delivered to an agent of the vendee employed by him to receive delivery, the vendor is divested of his right of stoppage in transitu. On the other hand, although there is an actual delivery to the vendee's agent, the vendor may annex terms to such delivery, and so prevent it from being absolute and irrevocable. In this case the goods were shipped on board the consignee's own ship, and delivered into the possession of his own servant, the master, who signed bills of lading making the goods deliverable to the consignee or assigns. There was therefore a delivery to the agent for his principal, and no control over the delivery was in terms reserved to the vendor. The possession of three out of the four bills of lading by the agent of the vendor was a fact of no importance. It gave him no authority over the delivery of the goods, nor any power to transfer the bills of lading themselves. Supposing the plt. to have been ignorant of the fact that the vessel in which he shipped his goods belonged to the consignee, a question might have arisen whether the delivery could properly be held to be complete. It would seem to be scarcely just to a person who had delivered goods to be carried to a consignee under the belief that he could exercise the ordinary right of an unpaid vendor over them to deprive him of that right, because he had ignorantly placed the goods on board the consignee's own vessel, and therefore must be taken to have made an absolute delivery of them. It is unnecessary, however, to dwell upon this point, because I think there is satisfactory evidence that the plt.'s agent knew that the vessel in question belonged to Cunliffe, the consignee named in the bill of lading as Fort and Co.

The plt. having, therefore, placed his goods in the Londos, with full knowledge that the consignee was the owner, can it be said that the delivery at Rouen was not absolute and complete? The authorities upon this subject appear to make no distinction between the case of the ship of the vendee being sent out expressly to receive the goods, and that of the goods being shipped without any previous arrangement for the purpose. In either case, the words of Parke, B. in Van Casteel v. Booker apply: "The delivery in the purchaser's own ship is a final delivery at the place of destination." If the vendor desires to protect himself under these circumstances he may restrain the effect of such delivery, and preserve his right of stoppage in transitu by taking bills of lading making the goods deliverable to his order or assigns. Not only was this precaution not taken in the present case, but the bill of lading, which is always made out by the direction, or at least with the assent, of the shipper, makes the goods deliverable to the consignee or assigns. The M. R. thought that the whole case was involved in the question whether the Londos was a ship trading generally, or was specially sent for the express purpose of receiving the flour. I cannot discover that this distinction has ever been made the ground of any previous decision. His Lordship thinks that it is to be found in the case of Mitchell v. Ede, 11 Ad. & Ell. 888, which he regards as having decided that a general ship "stands expressly in the same situation as a common carrier." But Mitchell v. Ede was, as was frequently observed in the course of the argument, not a case of stoppage in transitu, but a question whether, between two persons creditors of Mackenzie, a Jamaica planter, the property in certain sugars shipped by him on board one of the vessels of the defts. which were in the habit of being sent out with supplies to estates in Jamaica, and receiving consignments from the estates of Mackenzie and other planters in return, and of taking out and bringing home goods from different shippers, when offered, passed to the plt. or the defts. The bill of lading signed by the captain, made the sugar deliverable to the defts. or their assigns, but it was indorsed by Mackenzie, with a condition that it should be delivered to the defts. only on their giving security for the payment of certain bills of exchange. The bill of lading was never in the hands of the defts. Mackenzie being indebted to the plt. for advances made to him indorsed and delivered the bill of lading to the plt., and it was held that no property in the sugar passed to the defts. by the delivery into their ship under the above circumstances. It appears to me that this case was not decided upon the distinction between a general ship and one sent for the express purpose of receiving the sugar, for if it had been a question of stoppage in transitu upon a sale of the sugar to the defts., and it had been delivered into the defts.' own vessel sent out for the purpose, although the property in the goods would have passed, yet the effect of the delivery would have been restrained by the indorsement on the bill of lading and the right to stop in transitu would have been preserved. This appears to be established by the case of Turner v. The Trustees of the Liverpool Docks, 6 Ex. 543. The M. R. is reported to have said that if the bills of lading had been sent to Fort and Co. (that is to Mr. Cunliffe), he apprehended that "the right of stoppage in transitu would have been at an end as soon as he got the bills of lading. So also if delivered to his agent on board the vessel." I think there must be here some mistake in the report, because the mere possession of the bill of lading by the consignee or his agent will not in general prevent the right of stoppage in transitu. It will certainly enable the consignee, by indorsing it over, to deprive the vendor of this right, and the delivery of it in a certain form to the consignee or his agent may be part of a state of facts from which a complete delivery of the goods may be established. But by itself the mere possession of the bill of lading by a consignee or his agent will not prevent the exercise of the right of stoppage in transitu.

I have said that the question of the continuance or termination of the transitus is one which must be determined by the facts of each particular case. I have founded my opinion that there was a complete delivery of the flour at Rouen entirely upon the evidence. The consignee was the owner of the vessel on board of which the flour was shipped. The master was his servant, or agent. The vendor's agent, with a knowledge of these facts, delivered the flour to the consignee's agent to be conveyed to the consignee, and he assented to the bills of lading being made out for the delivery of the flour to the consignee or assigns. He placed no condition or restriction upon the delivery so as to leave the vendor any control from the moment the flour was shipped in the consignee's known ship under such a bill of lading. If the intention of a vendor has anything to do with this question these facts and circumstances are an undoubted indication of the intention that the possession as well as the property of the flour should pass to the consignee at the time of its shipment at Rouen. For these reasons, I think the order of the M. R. must be reversed, and the bill dismissed with costs.

SCHOTSMANNS v. THE LANCASHIRE AND YORKSHIRE RAILWAY COMPANY.

Lord Justice CAIRNS said:—The foundation of the title of the plts. in this case is, that the plt. Schotsmanns is the unpaid vendor of the flour mentioned in the bill, and that the plt. stopped this flour in its transitu to the purchaser Cunliffe, who had since become bankrupt. The Lancashire and Yorkshire Railway Company, who are the apps., among many objections which they take to the decree made by the M. R. in favour of the plts., contend that on the 3rd Oct. 1854, the time of this alleged stoppage, there was in fact no transitu, but that the flour had antecedently, namely on or before the 28th Sept., been delivered to the purchaser. There is no dispute as to the facts: Cunliffe, trading at Goole as J. Fort and Co., bought the flour in July 1864 of Schotsmanns. It was to be paid for by an acceptance due the 31st Oct. 1864, and it was to be shipped for Goole free on board at Rouen. There was a line of steam traders plying between Rouen and Goole, some of which belonged to Cunliffe, and others to Watson, a partner with Cunliffe in another firm of Watson, Cunliffe and Co. Schotsmanns, or his agent Delafosse, was directed by Cunliffe, by a letter of the 28th Aug. 1864, to ship the flour by this line of steamers, Cunliffe in the letter calling them "our steamers," and informing his correspondent that there would be room in the steamer of the 30th Sept. In this steamer, which was the Londos, belonging to Cunliffe, the flour was shipped by Delafosse, agent of Schotsmanns. Four bills of lading were signed by the master stating that the flour was shipped by Delafosse and making it deliverable to "J. Fort and Co." or assigns. One of these was retained by the master, and the other three were handed to Delafosse. The place in the bill of lading in which the rate of freight was intended to be specified was filled up "as per agreement;" but it is not suggested that this was otherwise than a mode of expressing that no freight would be payable on the property of the owner of the ship. On the 3rd Oct. the Londos arrived in the Humber, and a notice to stop in transitu was given on that day by the plt. Craig as agent for Schotsmanns. This notice was, in my opinion, sufficient in form if the right to stop in transitu existed. And there was, as I think, sufficient evidence of the authority of Craig to stop in transitu on behalf of Schotsmanns, and also of the insolvency at that time of Cunliffe.

The question is, did the right to stop in transitu exist? or, in other words, was the delivery on board the Londos a delivery to Cunliffe, the purchaser of the goods? The property in the goods, it is admitted, vested in Cunliffe on the contract of purchase and the appropriation of the goods. The goods were to be delivered on board at Rouen. The Londos was the ship of Cunliffe, and was indicated as such for the delivery of the goods. The master of the ship was his servant. No special contract was entered into by the master to carry the goods for or to deliver them to any person other than Cunliffe, the purchaser. In point of fact no contract of affreightment was entered into, for the person to sue on such a contract would be Cunliffe, in whom was vested the property in the goods, and the person to be sued would be the same Cunliffe as owner of the Londos. The essential feature of stoppage in transitu, as has been remarked in many cases, is that the goods should be at the time in the possession of a middleman, or of some person intervening between the vendor who has parted with, and the purchaser who has not yet received them. It was suggested here that the master of the ship was a person filling this character. But the master of the ship is a servant of the owner, and if the master would be liable because of the delivery of the goods to him, the same delivery of the goods to him would be a delivery to the owner, because delivery to the agent is delivery to the principal. In the absence therefore of direct authority to the contrary, I should be clearly of opinion that the flour in question had been delivered to Cunliffe at Rouen, and could not afterwards be stopped in transitu.

It was said, however, and this appears to have been the opinion of the M. R., that the case of Mitchell v. Ede, in 11 Ad. & El., determined that delivery on board a general ship like the Londos could not be a delivery to the purchaser through the owner of the ship. The case of Mitchell v. Ede was not a case of stoppage in transitu, or of vendor and purchaser. The question in it was, whether a Jamaica planter, who had promised to consign sugars to his London correspondent, to whom he was indebted, had by shipping sugars on board a general ship of this correspondent irrevocably appropriated them so as to pass the property, and debar himself from altering their destination? It was necessary therefore to ascertain quo animo was the delivery made, and the Court on a special case held that the circumstance of the ship being a general ship or a seeking ship, negatived the inference that the delivery was meant to pass the property. In that case the delivery to the owner of the ship was admitted, and the question was whether the property passed. Here it is admitted that the property had passed to the purchaser, and the question is, was there a delivery? The case of Mitchell v. Ede has, in my opinion, no application to the present.

I may add, that the case of Corvas-jee v. Thompson, 5 Moo. P. C. Cas. 165, which was not, I think, referred to in the argument in this case, is, if authority be wanted, strongly opposed to the right of the plts.

These observations, if well founded, would dispose of the present appeal. But I cannot avoid adverting to an argument very strongly urged by the apps., and on which we did not hear counsel for the plts. It was said that there was no jurisdiction in a court of equity to entertain a bill of this description, which was described as a bill calling on a court of equity to give effect to a stoppage in transitu, and filed by plts. alleging a legal title to chattels for which trover or detinue might be brought at law. And it was said that Lord Eldon, in Goodhart v. Lowe, 2 J. & W., had expressed an opinion that such a bill could not be maintained. The case of the plt. Schotsmanns, as I understand it, may thus be stated: He says he had sold the goods thereby transferring the property at law to Cunliffe, that by stoppage in transitu, alleged to be effectual, he has re-vested in himself a legal title to these goods; but that although he holds this title merely as security for the price of the goods, and is liable to be called on to surrender it on payment of the price, he is an incumbrancer only, or a person having what Lord Kenyon, in Hodgson v. Loy, 7 T. R. 440, described as a kind of equitable lien for the price of the goods, which lien or incumbrance he is entitled to realise, the account of what is due being at the same time taken; that the goods are in the meantime in the possession of one of the debts, who is a stakeholder or agent, holding them merely for the person who is the owner, subject to the lien; and that the goods require the protection of an injunction. I should be prepared to hold this case to be entirely within the province of this court, and depending on the ordinary principles which regulate in equity the relation of mortgagor and mortgagee, whether of real or personal pro-party, although for obvious reasons cases of this kind are more generally and more conveniently brought into a court of law. In Goodhart v. Lowe some goods had been shipped on board a general ship in the London Docks, and the plt., an unpaid vendor of the particular goods, applied to Lord Eldon for an injunction to restrain the sailing of the ship, and for a ne exeat against the master. The application was to stop the transit of the ship containing the goods of several persons upon a default of one, and it was to this view of the case that the general observations of Lord Eldon on a motion ex parte for an injunction are addressed. The bill in that case, at the original of which I have looked, was not framed as a bill of an unpaid vendor to realise a lien, or to take accounts. And it is, moreover, during the period since 1819, the date of that case, that the courts have more clearly shown a disposition to hold that stoppage in transit does not rescind the contract, in which case there would be no privity in a court of equity between the parties, but only gives or restores to the vendor a lien for the price. The foundation of the case of the plt. however having failed, the decrees of the M. R. must be reversed, and the bill dismissed with costs.

LEWIS (app.) v. JEWELL (resp.)

Seaman's wages—Desertion—Consular certificate of desertion abroad.

A seaman having remained ashore all night at a foreign port, the master went to the consul without any notice to the seaman and obtained his certificate, with an indorsement thereon that the seaman had deserted: (17 & 18 Vict. c. 104, s. 107.)

In a summary proceeding before justices in this country by the seaman to recover his wages, the consul's certificate was Held, not to be conclusive evidence of the fact of desertion.

Case stated under 20 & 21 Vict. c. 43.

The app., master of the British ship Flower, was summoned before the justices of the peace for the borough of Sunderland, in the county of Durham, on the 21st March 1866, under the Merchant Shipping Act 1854, sect. 188, by the resp. for a balance of wages amounting to 6*l.* 7*s.* 6*d.*

The resp. shipped as an able seaman on board the Flower in 1865 on a voyage from Sunderland to Alexandria and Taganrog and back at a rate of wages of 3*l.* per month.

After leaving Alexandria the vessel called at Constantinople on the 11th Aug., and on 12th Aug., in consequence of some difference arising out of the app. having found fault with the resp. whilst on duty at the wheel a few days before, the resp. requested leave to go on shore at Constantinople to make a complaint to the consul and endeavour to obtain his discharge, but the app. refused to allow him to go on shore for that purpose until the app. could accompany him.

On the 14th Aug. the resp., after packing up his clothes in expectation of his discharge, went on shore with the app. a distance of three miles from the ship when at anchor in the Bosphorus, but without taking his clothes with him, and after reaching the shore the app. discovered that he had not brought the ship's papers with him, and sent the resp. back to the ship in a shore boat for them. On his return they went before the consul, who refused to discharge the resp. After leaving the office of the consul, the app. and the resp. agreed that the latter should be discharged and leave the ship, and they went together to the shipping office to adjust the question of wages for that purpose, but the shipping master declined to act in the matter without the assent of the consul, who, upon being applied to, refused to assent, on the ground that if he did so he would have numerous similar applications.

On leaving the shipping office, the resp. alleges that he was directed by the app. to go to the wharf and wait there until the app. came to take him back to the ship, and that in consequence of such directions he did go to the wharf and remained there waiting for the app. till the afternoon, but the app. did not come for him as he had promised, and having no money to pay for a lodging he, the resp., slept on the wharf all night.

On the contrary, the app. alleges that he requested the resp. to accompany him back to the ship immediately upon leaving the shipping office, which the resp. declined to do, asking for a shilling or two to spend on shore, after which he would return to the ship, but the app. refused to advance him the money, and went back to the ship without him.

The resp. states, but unsupported by other evidence, that he went to the consul's office early next morning, 14th Aug., and reported himself, but could learn nothing of the app., and therefore waited about for him expecting him to come on shore again. He met him in the middle of the day and asked him what he was going to do with him, whereupon the app. replied to the effect that he did not now belong to the ship, and he had nothing further to do with him. In the meantime the app. appears to have made an entry in the ship's log-book to the effect that the resp. had deserted, and then proceeded on shore in the forenoon of the 14th Aug. and reported it to the consul and obtained from the consul, on the app.'s own statement and application, a certificate to that effect, the resp. not being present before the consul. On returning from the consul's office he met the resp. and made the observation before stated.

The app. returned to the ship the same night without the resp., taking with him another man in his place, and soon after midnight got the ship under weigh in tow of a tug-boat and proceeded to Taganrog, taking with him the resp.'s clothes, alleged to be worth 10*l.*, and ultimately returned to England, where he arrived for the time on the 25th Nov. last, being within six months next before the making of the complaint before justices.

The resp. after three days (having pawned his jacket for a maintenance) obtained another ship at 3*l.* a-month wages, the same as he had had on board the Flower, and which was admitted to be the current rate of wages at Constantinople at that time.

It was contended on the part of the app. that the question of the resp.'s desertion had been adjudicated upon by the British consul at Constantinople, whereby his wages and clothes had become forfeited, and therefore the magistrates at Sunderland had no jurisdiction; then that the entry in the official log and the consul's certificate were conclusive evidence of the fact of desertion.

On the part of the resp., it was contended that the proceeding before the consul being ex parte, and merely to protect the app. from the penalties under the provisions of the Merchant Shipping Act, could not amount to an adjudication, and that, although the entry in the official log and the consul's certificate might be admissible in evidence, they were not conclusive, and still left the fact of the desertion to be determined by the justices on the evidence before them.

BANNISTER v. BRESLAUER.

The justices being of opinion that the resp. had not in fact deserted, and had not intended to desert, and that their jurisdiction was not affected by the proceeding before the consul at Constantinople, made an order for part of the amount of the wages claimed after allowing certain deductions admitted to be due to the app. The app. thereupon applied for a case for the opinion of this court.

Shield for the resp.—The justices acted under sect. 186 of 17 & 18 Vict. c. 104, and found as a fact that the resp. had not deserted at Constantinople, and did not intend to do so, and they were not estopped from adjudicating by the consul's certificate with the indorsement thereon that the resp. had deserted.

C. Pollock, Q.C. for the app.—The consul acted under sect. 207 of the 17 & 18 Vict. c. 104, and he has power by the section to inquire into the allegation of desertion, and having done so and given his certificate it is conclusive of the fact of desertion, and the wages were therefore forfeited.

COCKBURN, C. J.—The consul's certificate obtained in the absence of the seaman was not conclusive evidence of the fact of desertion. That is a provision made for the protection of the master. In this case the justices had jurisdiction to inquire into the fact of desertion.

BANNISTER v. BRESLAUER.

Charter-party—Charterer's liability—Foreign consignees—Lien for demurrage.

In an action upon a charter-party by shipowners against charterers, agents of foreign consignees, for not loading with all dispatch, according to a clause in the charter-party, the defts. pleaded another clause to this effect, "the charterers' liability on this charter to cease when the cargo is shipped (provided the same is worth the freight on arrival at the port of discharge), the captain having an absolute lien on it for freight, dead freight, and demurrage, which he or owner shall be bound to exercise." The plea averred fulfilment of the proviso, and therefore deft.'s exemption from liability:

Held, upon demurrer to the plea, that this condition in the charter-party was a good answer to the action.

Declaration:

For that a charter-party was made and entered into by and between the plt. by one Thomas Clarkson, his agent in that behalf and therein described, the plt. being owner of the ship therein described, and the defts. therein described as Messrs. Breslau and Thomas, and which said charter-party was and is to the tenor following, that is to say:—Charter-party, London, 7th Aug. 1866. It is this day mutually agreed between Thomas Clarkson, of the good ship or vessel called the F. Edwards, of the measurement of 116 tons or thereabouts, now in the Thames, and Messrs. Breslau and Thomas, of London, merchants, that the said ship being tight, staunch, and strong, and every way fitted for the voyage, shall, with all convenient speed, sail and proceed to a safe berth in the Thames or dock clear of dues, or so near thereunto as she may safely get, and there load from the factors of the said freighter a full and complete cargo of coal tar pitch, in bulk not exceeding what she can reasonably stow and carry over and above her tackle, apparel, provisions, and furniture, and being so loaded shall therewith proceed to Antwerp, or so near thereunto as she may safely get, and deliver the same on being paid freight as follows:—Seven shillings per ton of 20cwts. delivered with half a guinea gratuity in full of all port charges and pilotage (the act of God, the Queen's enemies, fire, and all and every other dangers and accidents of the sea, rivers, and navigation of what nature and kind soever during the said voyage always excepted). The freight to be paid on the unloading and right delivery of the cargo in cash, to be loaded and discharged with all dispatch. The cargo to be brought to and taken from alongside the vessel at merchant's risk and expense. The ship shall be consigned to charterers' agent at port of discharge on customary terms, sufficient cash for ship's ordinary disbursement at port of loading; an account of freight to be advanced by the charterers subject to 5 per cent. and insurance. The charterers' liability on this charter to cease when the cargo is shipped (provided the same is worth the freight on arrival at the port of discharge), the captain having an absolute lien on it for freight, dead freight, and demurrage, which he or owner shall be bound to exercise. Penalty for non-performance of this agreement, estimated amount of freight. Should the pitch be weighed on board, captain to sign bills of lading for weight; 5 per cent. commission is due on the shipment of this charter-party on the amount of freight, primage, and demurrage, to Breslau and Thomas, to whom the vessel is to be addressed and reported at the Custom-house on her return to London, or their agents if to an "outport." And the said ship being tight, staunch, and strong, and every way fitted for the voyage, did, with all convenient speed, sail and proceed to the place agreed on by the said charter-party, and was there ready to load from the factors of the defts. the said agreed cargo, and did and performed all things, and all things happened and exist, and times elapsed to entitle the plt. to have the said agreed cargo loaded on board the said ship. Yet the defts. did not load the said ship with the said agreed cargo with all dispatch, or within a reasonable time, and wholly neglected so to do, and did not load the same, and kept and detained the said ship in and about the loading of the same as aforesaid for a long and unreasonable time, whereby the plt. during all that time was deprived of the use of the said ship, and incurred expense in keeping the same and maintaining the crew thereof.

Plea 3:

And for a third plea the defts. say that the said charter-party was made subject to certain terms or conditions, that is to say, upon the terms or conditions that the charterers' liability on the said charter-party was to cease when the cargo was shipped (provided the same was worth the freight on arrival at the port of discharge) the captain having an absolute lien on it for freight, dead freight, and demurrage, which he or owner should be bound to exercise; and the defts. say that the said cargo was shipped, and that the same was worth the said freight on arrival at the said port of discharge, and that thereupon the defts.' liability as charterers upon and under the said charter-party ceased.

There was a demurrer to this plea.

The following are the particulars of plt.'s claim indorsed on the writ:

1866.
17th Aug.	To 15 days demurrage of plt.'s vessel, the
To 1st Sept.	F. Edwards , in loading cargo of pitch by defts. as per charter-party, at 3s. per day..... £45

Keane, Q. C. for plt.—The plt. is a shipowner, and the defts. were charterers of a cargo by plt.'s ship, and agents of the consignees. The charter-party provides that the cargo is to be loaded and discharged with all dispatch; but the ship waited twenty-three days for the completion of the loading, and the owner has brought this action for fifteen days' demurrage, having allowed eight days as a reasonable time for loading. To this the defts. plead that their liability ceased, according to a clause in the charter-party, when the cargo was shipped. The first case to which I shall call attention is that of Oglesby v. Yglesias, E. B. & F. 930, in which the following provision in the memorandum for charter-party was held to exempt the deft. as agent for the freighter, from liability for demurrage at the port of discharge: "It is further agreed that, this charter being concluded by J. R. Yglesias for another party, the liability of the former in every respect, and as to all matters and things, as well before as after the shipping of the said cargo, shall cease as soon as they have shipped the cargo." The next case is Milvain v. Perez, 3 E. & E. 493, where the exempting clause was: "This charter being concluded by Messrs. Perez and Co. on behalf of another party, resident abroad, it is agreed that all liability of the former in every respect, and as to all matters and things, as well before and during as after the shipping of the said cargo, shall cease so soon as they have shipped the cargo; and further, that the vessel shall be cleared at the Custom-house by them." The contention on the other side is, that the words in the present charter-party have the same effect as those in each of the two cases I have cited; but they are merely "the charterers' liability on this charter to cease when the cargo is shipped." Besides, this case is distinguishable because, by the decision of the Ex. Ch. in Smith v. Sieveking, 5 E. & B. 589, there is no lien provided by this charter-party for this demurrage. In the case of Bromhead v. Johnassohn, argued before the Court of Ex. on the 16th Jan. last, not yet reported (see 42 L. T. Business of the Week, 253) it was held that this provision was no defence to an action for not shipping within a specified time.

BUCKLE v. KNOOP AND ANOTHER.

[Ex.

Brown, Q.C.—This provision is always introduced by the defts. into their foreign charter-parties on account of their being agents only, and their object is, as it was in the cases mentioned, to transfer the shipowner's remedy, in case of dispute, to their principals abroad. Our answer to the action is in effect that, from the shipping of the cargo, the plt. must look for recompence in all matters of complaint to the consignees at Antwerp. Smith v. Sieveking decided that the consignee, under a bill of lading, "paying for the said goods as per charter-party," had nothing to do with the provisions of the charter-party concerning demurrage. In Milvain v. Perez, (p. 500), Crompton, J. said: "If the argument for the plts. were well founded, the defts. would be liable for everything that occurred either before, during, or after the loading, if the loading was not in regular turn. But it is evident that the defts. were not to be in any way responsible, provided the loading took place under the contract, although the cargo might be shipped a day or two later than was regular." [BYLES, J.—Is it customary to pay demurrage before the ship sails? I believe not. The freight and demurrage are generally paid together. Here the captain has an absolute lien for freight, dead freight, and demurrage, which he or the owner shall be bound to exercise. The charterers undertake no more than to put the cargo on board.

Keane, in reply, referred to the case of Pearson v. Göschen, 17 C. B., N. S., 352; 10 L. T. Rep. N. S. 758, an action for freight and demurrage, in which Williams, J. said: "The words relied on (viz., master and owners to have an absolute lien for all freight, dead freight, demurrage, and other charges) in support of this claim are the printed words inserted in all these documents; and . . . if there are no special provisions they are not to be regarded. There are many words in most mercantile instruments which have no meaning at all if the contract in hand does not fit them."

BYLES, J.—I am of opinion that this is a good plea. It certainly does not contain so express a provision for the charterers' exemption after shipment as there was in each of the two cases of Oglesby v. Yglesias and Milvain v. Perez; but expressions similar to that in this charter-party intended to include demurrage before the sailing of the ship are not I believe unusual. In construing this stipulation literally, we are not therefore doing anything contrary to the custom of merchants. Here the cargo is to be loaded with all dispatch; this creates a liability on the deft.'s part to exercise dispatch in loading. By this plea the deft. does not dispute this, but he says that his liability ceased when the cargo was shipped, according to the express terms of the charter-party, provided the cargo, upon which the captain had a lien for such charges as this, is worth the freight at the port of discharge. This condition the plea goes on to aver was satisfied, and I think that the demurrage, for which the captain or owner is to exercise an absolute lien, includes delay in loading and unloading. This plea then is within the express condition of the charter-party, and is therefore good.

KEATING, J.—I am of the same opinion, and looking at this charter-party I think the plea was intended by both parties to be good. The words are certainly less expressive than those in the cases mentioned by Mr. Keane, but they are sufficient to make the condition clear, and also the proviso which has to be fulfilled. It was the general intention of the parties to have recourse to the charter-party to settle any question of liability, and we shall not be straining its language by holding that it exempts the defts. by this condition. I agree with the remarks of my brother Byles.

M. SMITH, J.—I am of the same opinion. We must arrive at the intention as well as we can from the words of the document. They might have been more specific, but the clause is sufficiently clear to exempt the charterers from liability after the ship was loaded, on condition that the cargo was worth the freight. The exemption is from liability on the charter-party; Mr. Keane says the charterers' liability does not comprehend this claim, which arose prior to the ship's sailing. It seems, however, to me that the liability includes demurrage at loading port as well as at discharging port. The cargo was to be loaded and discharged with all dispatch, and both are charterers' liabilities under the charter-party.

BUCKLE v. KNOOP AND ANOTHER.

Charter-party—Measurement of cargo at port of loading or of delivery—Calculation and payment of freight accordingly—Construction of charter-party—Custom of trade at Bombay—Admissibility of evidence of—Knowledge of.

By the terms of a charter-party between plt. and the defts., the plt.'s ship was to load a cargo of cotton at Bombay and proceed with and deliver the same at Liverpool, "on being paid freight as follows, viz., 75s. per ton of 50 cubic feet delivered." The ship was duly loaded at Bombay with the stipulated cargo, the measurement of which was, in accordance with the established custom there, ascertained by submitting the bales, immediately before shipping them, to powerful hydraulic pressure, whereby they were compressed into the smallest possible compass and, so compressed, occupied a space of from six to eight tons of fifty cubic feet each less than the entire capacity of the ship, but when unloaded at Liverpool, and released from the restraint of the hold, they expanded to an extent exceeding by some 180 tons the capacity of the ship to contain them. The plt. claimed to be paid freight on the measurement of the cotton as "delivered" at Liverpool, which the defts. resisted, contending that the payment was to be calculated on the measurement of the cargo at the port of shipment. Evidence was admitted at the trial of a custom in the Bombay trade to pay freight on measurement of the cargo at Bombay, ascertained as above mentioned, which custom was found by the jury to exist, but there was no direct proof that the plt. was cognisant of its existence:

[Ex.]

BUCKLE v. KNOOP AND ANOTHER.

[Ex.]

Held, first, that, upon the construction of the charter-party, and without reference to any question of usage, the amount payable for freight was to be ascertained by the measurement of the cotton at Bombay, the port of loading, and not at Liverpool, the port of delivery:

Secondly, that evidence of the custom was properly admitted. Parties entering into a contract relating to a particular trade must be assumed to be cognisant of all the usages connected with that trade.

Gibson v. Sturge, 10 Ex. 626; 24 L. J. 121, Ex.; and Coulthurst v. Sweet, L. Rep., 1 C. P. 649, discussed and distinguished.

The plt. in this action was a shipowner residing at Bristol, and the owner of the ship Gloucestershire, and the defts. were merchants at Manchester, carrying on business under the trading name of De Jersey and Co. The action was brought to recover the balance of freight of a cargo of cotton from Bombay to Liverpool, due to plt. under a charter-party of the ship Gloucestershire, made and dated at London, 18th Jan. 1864, and by which, so far as is material to this report, it was mutually agreed between the plt. and defts. that the said ship should forthwith proceed to Bombay and there load from the factors of the said affreighters a full and complete cargo of cotton and [or] wool . . . and being so loaded, shall therewith proceed to Liverpool, and deliver the same in any dock freighters may appoint on being paid freight as follows, viz., seventy-five shillings per ton of fifty cubic feet delivered for cotton and [or] wool, in full of all port-charges and pilotages (restraint of princes, &c.) The freight to be paid on unloading and right delivery of cargo (in the manner therein specified). . . . The captain to sign bills of lading, if requested, at any rate of freight, but at not less than chartered rate. without prejudice to this charter, and the owner to have an absolute lien on the cargo for all freight, dead-freight, and demurrage.

It was proved at the trial before Lush, J. and a special jury, at the last summer assizes at Liverpool, that the ship sailed to Bombay, where she was loaded by the defts.' factors with the stipulated cargo of cotton, and that, in conformity with the established custom in such cases at Bombay, the measurement of the cotton with reference to the capacity of the hold of the ship was ascertained by submitting the bales immediately before shipping them on board to powerful hydraulic pressure, whereby they were compressed into the smallest possible compass; and it appeared that on the present occasion the cotton when so compressed occupied a space of from six to eight tons of fifty cubic feet each less than the entire hold of the ship was capable of containing; and also that, when unloaded at Liverpool and released from the pressure and restraint of the hold, it expanded to such an extent that it attained a bulk exceeding, by some 180 tons, the capacity of the ship to contain it. The captain was requested by the defts.' Bombay agent to sign bills of lading, in which the freight was expressed to be "as per margin," and there the measurement of the cotton was stated to be made in the manner above mentioned; and this he in the first instance declined to do on account of the measurement stated therein, contending that the measurement was to take place under the special terms of the charter-party at the port of discharge, and not at Bombay, but ultimately he consented to sign them without prejudice to the owner's interests and rights.

The question at issue was as to the mode of calculation to be adopted, whether it was to be according to the defts.' calculation on the measurement at Bombay at the time of shipment, or, as plt. maintained it should be, on the measurement at the port of discharge upon the cargo being unloaded and delivered at Liverpool. If the plt. was right he was entitled to a sum beyond that which defts. upon their construction of the charter-party had paid him according to the Bombay measurement, and for that sum he had brought the present action. The custom in the Bombay trade to pay freight on measurement at Bombay, as above named, was found by the jury to exist, but there was no direct proof that the plt. was cognisant of its existence. The verdict was entered by direction for the defts., leave being reserved for the plt. to move to enter it for himself for 140l. 7s. 3d., the balance of freight so claimed by him as aforesaid on the ground that the freight was to be calculated on the measurement of the cargo as delivered at the port of discharge.

E. James, Q. C. accordingly in Michaelmas Term moved for and obtained a rule nisi to set aside the defts.' verdict, and to enter it for the plt. for 140l. 7s. 3d. on the above-named ground, also for a new trial on the ground that evidence of the usage had been improperly admitted, first, because it contradicted the terms of the charter-party; and, secondly, because it was not proved affirmatively that the plt. was aware of the alleged usage; and against that rule

Mellish, Q. C. and Potter, for the defts., now showed cause.—The Bombay measurement contended for by the defts. as the correct one actually represents the cubical contents which the bales occupied in the hold throughout the voyage, and which came to within six or seven tons of the ship's capacity, whereas by the plt.'s measurement the cargo would represent some 180 tons more than the ship could contain. The question turned on the meaning of the word "delivered" in the charter-party. That word had nothing to do with the measurement, but was inserted only to show that any cotton not delivered was not to be paid freight for. Even if there were no usage in the matter, the words "per ton of fifty cubic feet" must mean the space occupied in the hold by the cargo which the Bombay measurement accurately represents, and which the Liverpool measurement does not. The plt.'s witnesses proved that printed forms of charter-parties in the precise form of the present one, with the word "delivered" in them, had for years been used, and freight been invariably paid under them, according to the Bombay measurement. The word "delivered" meant only that freight was not to be paid for what was not delivered. On the other hand, no doubt, the learned judge, Lush, J., at the trial said, that in our construction the word "delivered" would be superfluous, as it would be implied by law, to which the answer is, that it is not unusual to find superfluous expressions in a mercantile instrument. Brokers stick to printed forms as if magic were in them, and will not use other words, for fear the courts should put some non-natural interpretation on them. It is not as if the document had been drawn by a lawyer, who would know what the law would and would not imply. Then as to the admissibility of evidence of usage. The usage proved extended to this particular form of charter, and not only to charters generally, and therefore it was binding. It will be said not so, for want of notice on plt.'s part; but the law assumes that a person entering upon a certain trade knows the custom of that trade, and that a shipowner trading to Bombay must know the usage of that port.

E. James, Q. C. and J. A. Russell, contra, for the plt. (the shipowner), supported their rule.—The construction that the defts. contend for is not the true and logical one, as it renders necessary the striking out from the contract of the material word "delivered," which makes it a different contract for

BUCKLE v. KNOOP AND ANOTHER.

[Ex.

the parties from that which they made for themselves. The court will look at the instrument and endeavour to ascertain its meaning, as if no evidence of usage had been given, although after it has been given it is difficult to prevent its importation into the case. In the absence of such evidence, can there be a doubt as to the right construction of the charter? The words "deliver," "delivered," and "delivery" occur in the charter-party three times in close connection, and without doubt in the first and third instances the words "deliver" and "delivery" mean ex necessitate at the port of discharge; and there is no reason either on the face of the document or otherwise for putting a different construction on the word "delivered." If more goods were delivered at the port of discharge than were apparently received at the port of lading, freight would be payable on the increased quantity at the port of discharge. That was settled by Gibson v. Sturge, 10 Ex. 626; 24 L. J. 121, Ex., in which the majority of the Court of Ex. (dissentiente Martin, B.) held, that the freight was payable on the measurement at the port of shipment. That case, no doubt, was commented on in the C. P., in the case of Coulthurst v. Sweet, L. Rep., 1 C. P. 649, in which there was the word "delivered," which did not occur in Gibson v. Sturge, thus showing that in a charter-party like the present that word makes all the difference. The shipper at the port of shipment of course endeavours to get as much on board as possible; but, even after leaving the press and before getting on board, it expands, and so the whole expansion does not, as is assumed by defts., take place in the interval between unloading and delivery. [KELLY, C. B.—You, in fact, claim freight for 178 tons more than the ship would actually hold.] The true principle of construction is to give effect to the words used, and not to treat any of them as surplusage. Here, not giving a different construction to the word "delivered" from that given to the words "deliver" and "delivery," in the same instrument, and not rejecting it as superfluous, it clearly means and shows the parties contemplated payment on the quantity upon delivery. If that be so, no usage or evidence of usage inconsistent with or varying or contradicting the charter can be admissible. And even where it is admissible it cannot prevail unless it be shown, which was not done here, that both parties to the contract were cognisant of the usage:

Kirchner and others v. Venus, 12 Moo. P. C. C. 361.

KELLY, C. B.—I am of opinion that the defts. are entitled to retain their verdict, and to the judgment of the court upon this rule. The first question depends upon the construction of a clause in the charter-party entered into between the plt. and the defts. The contract was for the conveyance of a cargo of cotton from Bombay to London or Liverpool, as the charterers might order on signing the bills of lading, at a certain freight which is thus provided for by the charter-party, which says that the master, on signing bills of lading, shall "deliver the same in any dock the freighters may appoint, on being paid freight as follows, viz., 75s. per ton of 50 cubic feet delivered." Now, I am of opinion that the true construction of that clause, supposing there is nothing to qualify the words of it, is that the amount of freight is to be calculated upon and determined by the quantity of cotton as measured and shipped at the port of loading, and not the quantity as delivered at the port of discharge. There can, I think, be no doubt, taking the words themselves, namely, that freight is to be paid at the rate of 75s. per ton of 50 cubic feet, that, if they stopped there, the payment would be upon the quantity as ascertained by measure at the port of loading. But then it is said, and especially on the authority of the recent case of Coulthurst v. Sweet, that the introduction here of the word "delivered" creates a difference, and that it clearly must mean that the cotton was to be measured and paid for according to its measurement upon its delivery at the port of discharge. To my mind, however, the contract is clear, that freight is to be paid upon the quantity measured and shipped at Bombay, and that the word "delivered" simply refers here to the actual quantity delivered at the port of discharge, and means no more than the word "deliver" in the previous part of the clause, "and deliver the same in any dock freighters may appoint," and is used merely to complete the sentence. I do not think the word can be struck out, because it has, I think, a reasonable meaning, although I by no means think it was at all necessary to the full effect of the contract. But it is not uncommon in mercantile contracts of this character to find expressions used which are wholly superfluous and unnecessary. Upon looking at the cases which have been cited in the course of the argument, we find, in the first place, the case of Gibson v. Sturge, 10 Ex. 626; 24 L. J. 121, Ex., which is a stronger case than the present one now before the court; for there the freight was held to be payable on the quantity of corn as shipped only, although the bulk of it had increased in size from various causes in the course of the voyage, and the shipowner there might naturally and justly have said: "I have conveyed a larger quantity of goods than you, the shipper, supposed were shipped, or than you imagined you were bound to pay freight upon, and I am entitled to a larger freight for the increased space so occupied." But in the present case the increase in bulk was not proved to have taken place during the voyage; and though my brother Martin differed from the rest of the court in Gibson v. Sturge, we must take that case as we find it, and consider it, as decided by the majority of the court, as an authority in favour of the defts. With regard to the other case of Coulthurst v. Sweet, L. Rep., 1 C. P. 649, it appears that, with reference to this very point, the words "nett weight delivered" were expressly introduced into the charter-party in that case, in order to avoid the very difficulty which occurred in Gibson v. Sturge, and on which Mr. James has relied, the freight being, in Coulthurst v. Sweet, expressed in the bills of lading to be payable at so much per ton "nett weight delivered," conclusively showing the intention of the parties that payment of the freight was to be made upon the actual weight of the cargo at the time and place of delivery. That case, therefore, is not, so far as it goes to the point, an authority against our decision in the present case. It appears that the quantity of cotton shipped in the present case, and on which it is admitted that freight is payable, amounts to within some seven or eight tons of the total quantity of cotton which the ship could by possibility contain, and that the larger quantity, upon which the plt. seeks to be paid freight, exceeds that total quantity by some 180 tons. Now, it seems to me, in the absence of express authority, and looking at the merits of the case as between the parties, that it would be inequitable to permit a claim to be sustained for freight upon a far larger quantity, not merely than was actually carried and delivered, but than the ship could have contained. Under these circumstances, therefore, I think that upon authority, and also upon principle and justice, the right construction of this particular clause in this charter-party is, that the amount payable for freight is to be ascertained by the measurement of the cotton at Bombay. Then, secondly, with regard to the evidence of the custom which was given at the trial. It has been argued before us to-day that it was not admissible in the present case, but I cannot accede to that proposition. I think, on the

[Ex.]

BURTON v. PINKERTON.

[Ex.]

contrary, that it was properly admitted. In mercantile contracts, when words are used that are capable of various interpretations, they must be construed by the meaning which is put upon them by mercantile men of experience conversant with the subject-matter. This course has been followed to such an extent as in some cases almost to contradict the natural meaning of the words used. But, in the present case, the evidence of the usage only gave effect to what, even without the aid of such usage, would seem to be the plain and natural construction of the contract, and as such it was clearly admissible. The decision of the Privy Council in the case of Kirchner v. Venus, 12 Moo. P. C. Cas. 361, shows merely that persons in Liverpool may well be supposed to be ignorant of rules that exist at Sydney, on the other side of the globe, and that in such a case they are not bound to be acquainted with them. But in this case the contract, which related to a matter connected with London, Liverpool, and Bombay, was entered into between merchants of London and Liverpool, who were cognisant, or must be assumed to have been cognisant, of the customs of the Bombay trade. Under these circumstances, I think evidence of usage, in proof of the ordinary interpretation put upon such a contract by parties in the constant habit of entering into similar contracts, was admissible, although there was not, as it was contended by Mr. James there should have been, affirmative proof first given that both parties had previously heard or were aware of the existence of the custom in question. I think that the jury were not only right, but bound, to presume knowledge on the part of all the parties to such a contract of all the usages connected with or bearing upon it. Therefore, upon all the above grounds, whether with respect to the terms of the contract itself, or the admissibility of the evidence of usage, I am of opinion that the defts. are entitled to retain their verdict, and that this rule should be discharged.

CHANNELL, B.—I also am of opinion that this rule should be discharged, and have but little to add to what has fallen from the Lord Chief Baron. Three questions have been submitted to us. I think that the construction of the charter-party contended for by Mr. Mellish is, without reference to any question of usage, the true one; and that on the authority of Gibson v. Sturge. I do not, I confess, feel at all pressed by the case of Coulthurst v. Sweet, which in my judgment by no means proves that the decision of the majority of the court in Gibson v. Sturge was wrong. As to the second point, I am of opinion that the evidence of usage was properly admitted. It was not offered to contradict, but to explain the contract, and I think that the case of Bottomley v. Forbes, 5 Bing. N. C. 121; 8 L. J., N. S., 85, C. P., is an authority showing its admissibility. But then it was objected, thirdly, that even if such evidence were admissible as a general rule, nevertheless it was improperly admitted in the present case, for the reason that it was not proved that both parties to the contract were aware of the existence of the usage, and the case of Kirchner v. Venus, in the Privy Council, was cited as an authority to that effect. Now this objection to my mind amounts only to saying, not that the evidence was inadmissible but, that it was incomplete for want of other evidence that the usage was known to both parties; being, in fact, an objection rather to the weight or value of the evidence than to its admissibility. The three points originally made are thus reduced in fact to two, namely, first, the construction of the contr. ct itself; and, secondly, whether the verdict can be set aside, and a new trial had on the ground of that evidence having been admitted. Upon the first question I concur entirely with the Lord Chief Baron. With respect to the second, it is to be observed that the rule in this case was obtained only on the ground of the improper reception of evidence, and therefore the verdict cannot be set aside upon this rule, because evidence was properly admitted which possibly was incomplete. But being of opinion that, although the evidence was admissible, yet that it was not at all necessary to the arriving at a true construction of the contract, its incompleteness could form no ground for a new trial, even had the rule been obtained in a different form.

PICOTT, B.—I am of the same opinion. I entertain not the least doubt with regard to the views expressed by my Lord Chief Baron and my brother Channell with regard to this contract, but I desire to rest my judgment upon the second ground that the evidence of usage was admissible, rather than upon the construction of the contract apart from that evidence. I am of opinion that such evidence was admissible here. The case of Bottomley v. Forbes, which has been referred to by my brother Channell, was very like the present case; and indeed in principle there is no difference between them. There was nothing said in this charter-party as to where the measurement was to be made. The parol evidence, both here and in Bottomley v. Forbes, was offered in explanation, and not in contradiction of the terms of the written contract.

BURTON v. PINKERTON.

Contract to employ as seaman—Ordinary voyage—Nature of voyage altered by declaration of war—Increase of risk—Illegality—Breach of contract—59 Geo. 3, c. 69.

The deft. agreed to employ the plt. on board a ship called the Thames, for a period not to exceed twelve months, on a voyage from London to Rio de Janeiro or any port or ports in North and South America, or certain other places specified by the contract, and back to a port of discharge in the United Kingdom or continent of Europe between the Elbe and Brest.

The vessel in question was let under a charter-party, which stipulated that the said vessel being intended for the service of the Peruvian Government, in case of her capture or loss, the charterers should pay to the owners a certain sum as her agreed value. She started from the Thames having on board coal, ammunition, and two launches, and being under the orders of a Peruvian on board. At this time the Peruvian Government was at peace with Spain, but soon after the departure of

(a) The defts. in this action, the charterers, brought a cross-action (Knoop and another v. Buckle) against the present plt., the shipowner, to recover money paid to him over and above the sum due for freight according to their calculation by the Bombay measurement, which action was tried at the same time and as one action with the present case, and a verdict was taken for the plts. (the charterers) for 592l. 8s. 9d., and leave was reserved to the shipowner, the deft., to move to reduce that amount to 64l. 18s. 9d., and a rule was accordingly obtained by E. James, Q. C., to that effect, and it was arranged that, inasmuch as the two cases depended entirely upon the same point, the decision on the argument of the rule in the one case should bind and decide the rule in the other. Consequently the last-mentioned rule obtained by the deft. (the charterer) in Knoop and another v. Buckle was also discharged.

the Thames, was declared between Peru and Spain, and the usual proclamation was issued by Her Majesty enjoining neutrality on English subjects. At Bristol the Thames was joined by a Peruvian steamer; she then proceeded along to Madeira, where she was joined again by the same steamer and another. After putting some coal on board one of the steamers, she went in company with both of them to St. Vincent, signals passing between them on the way. At St. Vincent the launches were put on board the rams, and the vessel then proceeded to Porto Bay, where the two rams arrived shortly afterwards, and the ammunition was put on board one of them. The Thames then proceeded to Rio and the two rams arrived there the next day. Two days afterwards one of them captured a Spanish brig and burnt her. The captain then announced his intention, acting under the orders of the Peruvian agent, to proceed to Callao, but the existence of her having then become notorious, the Thames refused to proceed any further in the Thames on the ground of the illegal and dangerous character of the voyage, and was left behind at Rio. Upon returning to England he brought an action for breach of the engagement under which he shipped:

Held, that by the breaking out of war such a voyage as that the vessel was engaged upon became, if not illegal, at least one of extraordinary risk, and not of an ordinary character, such as was contemplated by the terms of the Thames' engagement, and therefore that the further prosecution of it, and the failure to employ the Thames, on some other ordinary voyage within the terms of his engagement, was a breach of contract: (substantia Bramwell, B.)

Sensible, per Kelly, C. B., that proceeding on the voyage became illegal under the Foreign Enlistment Act (59 Geo. 3, c. 69).

The first count of the declaration stated,

That in the year 1864, the Thames, being the master of a foreign going British steamship registered in the port of London in England, to wit, a vessel called the Thames, by an agreement then made by and between the Thames and the defendant, to wit, the county of Middlesex, contained in a written and printed document which was made and signed by the Thames and the defendant, according to the Merchant Shipping Act 1864, retained and employed the Thames to serve on board the said ship as one of her crew for the voyage, and on the terms stated in the said document as follows:

Name of Ship.	Port of Registry.	Master's Name.
Thames .	London.	J. Parkinson.

The several persons whose names are hereto subscribed, and whose descriptions are contained below, and of whom twenty-two are engaged as sailors, hereby agree to serve on board the said ship in the several capacities expressed against their respective names on the voyage from London to Rio Janeiro, or any port or ports in North and South America, Northern and Southern Pacific and Atlantic Oceans, West Indies, Cape Colonias, Mediterranean, India, China, and Arabian seas, Australia, New Zealand, backwards and forwards if required, for a period not to exceed twelve months, and back to a final port of discharge in the United Kingdom or continent of Europe between the Thames and defendant, and the said crew agree to conduct themselves in an orderly, faithful, honest, and sober manner and to be at all times diligent in their respective duties, and to be obedient to the lawful commands of the said master, or of any person who shall lawfully command him, and of their superior officers, in everything relating to the said ship, and the stores and cargo thereof, whether on board, in boats, or on shore, in consideration of which services to be duly performed, the said master hereby agrees to pay to the said crew, as wages, the sums against their names respectively expressed, and to supply them with provisions according to the annexed scale. And the Thames and defendant respectively signed the said agreement, and the Thames in which, and the wages per calendar month at which the Thames was retained as aforesaid, were then respectively expressed in the said agreement against the name and signature of the Thames. And all conditions have been fulfilled necessary to entitle the Thames to recover in this action in respect of the money herein stated. Yet the defendant did not employ the Thames as aforesaid, and the Thames was employed and retained to serve by the defendant otherwise than according to the said agreement, and thereby the Thames lost the opportunity of earning wages, and was left at Rio de Janairo, and arrested and imprisoned there, and deprived of his clothes and tools, and was impeded in obtaining employment.

The second count set forth an agreement similar to that in the first, and alleged as a breach that the defendant did not employ the Thames according to the said agreement, but prevented the Thames from serving on board the said ship during part of the said voyage by sailing and departing with her from Rio de Janeiro aforesaid without the Thames. The third count was for falsely representing the voyage on which the ship was about to sail, and thereby inducing the Thames to enter into the agreement stated in the first count. The fourth and fifth counts were in trespass and trover for the taking away and conversion of the Thames' clothes and tools.

The defendant pleaded first and secondly, to the first count, denying the promise and the breach. Thirdly, to the second count, denying the promise. Fourthly, to the second count, that he was always ready and willing to employ the Thames according to the said agreement, but the Thames absented himself from the said ship and did not at any time offer to perform his duties in the same employment, but wholly refused so to do, or to be employed as aforesaid. Fifthly, to the second count, that after the said contract and before the alleged breach, the Thames misconducted himself by remaining absent from the said ship for a longer period than that for which he received leave, and going on shore without leave, and neglecting his duties in the said ship, and failing to perform the same, whereupon the defendant discharged the Thames from his service in the said ship, which was the alleged breach. Sixthly, to the second count, that after the making of the said agreement and before any breach thereof, the Thames deserted the said ship, and thereupon the defendant rescinded the said agreement and discharged the Thames. Seventhly, eighthly, and eleventhly, to the third, fourth, and fifth counts respectively, not guilty. Ninthly, to the fourth count, leave and licence. Tenthly and twelfthly, to the fourth and fifth counts, not possessed.

Upon these pleas issue was joined.

The trial took place on the 20th and 21st Feb. at Guildhall, before Kelly, C. B., when the facts appeared to be as follows:—The Thames was a mariner in the merchant service, and the defendant was the master of a steam-vessel called the Thames. The owners of the Thames, the British Colonial Steamship Company (Limited), by charter-party dated 20th Jan. 1864, agreed to let the ship to Messrs. Thomson, Bonar, and Co. for all lawful service and employment as per margin, such service not to exceed twelve calendar months; the charter provided (inter alia) that the said ship being properly equipped, &c., should proceed to such ports as might be directed by the charterers or their agent on board; and also that the said steamer being intended for the service of the Peruvian Government, if she should be burnt, captured, sunk, damaged, or driven on shore by any enemy of that Government, the charterers should pay the value of her (agreed to be £5,000) to the owners, or make good any such damages.

Upon the 25th Jan. the Thames was engaged by the defendant as one of the crew of the ship, and signed articles, the terms of which were those contained in the declaration.

The Thames went on board the ship in the Victoria-docks, and sailed in her to Rio de Janeiro, where he left her, refusing to proceed farther with her, on the ground that the further prosecution of the voyage had become illegal, and would expose him to extraordinary risks not contemplated by the agreement into which he had entered. The facts with reference to the voyage are so fully set out in the judgment of the court, that it is unnecessary to mention them here.

[K.]

BURTON v. PICKERTON.

[K.]

The learned judge at the trial ruled that there was no defence to the action; that the voyage on which the deft. sought to employ the plt. had become, by the breaking out of war, if not illegal, at least a voyage of a different character from that on which the plt., by his articles, had contracted to serve, and that the deft. had therefore broken the contract into which he had entered with the plt. He therefore directed the jury to find for the plt., reserving leave to the deft. to move to enter a non-suit or a verdict for himself, on the ground that the facts did not show any breach of contract on the part of the deft.

The damages given by the jury included a sum for the clothes, &c., of which the fourth and fifth counts alleged a taking and conversion, and also consequential damage in respect of the plt.'s having been imprisoned, when left at Rio, by the Peruvian authorities as a deserter, and the leave reserved included leave to move to enter the verdict for the deft. on the counts above mentioned, on the ground that there was no evidence to support them; and also to reduce the verdict, on the ground that the consequential damages were too remote. The deft.'s counsel, when making the motion referred to below, also moved for and obtained a rule nisi upon these points; but the facts and arguments with respect to that part of the case are omitted as immaterial to the present report.

The Solicitor-General (with him C. Pollock, Q. C. and Bonpas) now moved pursuant to the leave reserved, or for a new trial on the ground of misdirection.—This voyage was perfectly legal in its inception, for the war had not then broken out. The question then arises, whether upon the declaration of war it became illegal. A voyage for the purpose of carrying contraband of war to a port of one of the belligerents is perfectly legal; it no doubt subjects the ship to the possibility of seizure by the other belligerent in the exercise of his rights:

Ex parte Charman, re Grassbrook, 84 L. J., N. B., 17, Bank.; 12 L. T. Rep. N. S. 349;

[MARTIN, B.—The Thames was here really acting as tender to these men-of-war engaged in hostilities. KELLY, C. B.—And sailing under the orders of a Peruvian officer.] I contend that there is nothing illegal in what was done; it only subjects the vessel to the chance of seizure. Surely, if it is lawful for a neutral to carry goods contraband of war, such as ammunition, to the port of a belligerent, to be thence supplied to that belligerent's vessels of war, it is lawful to do what this vessel did. The voyage was not illegal under the Foreign Enlistment Act (59 Geo. 3, c. 69). The 7th section of that Act makes the fitting out a vessel with intent or in order that such vessel shall be employed in the service of any foreign prince, state, or potentate, penal. Now, here the Thames was fitted out in time of peace, and the inception of the voyage was legal. [BRAMWELL, B.—Is the actual existence of a war necessary to the operation of sect. 7? It is clear the section would not apply to the case of fitting out an armed vessel and selling it to a foreign prince in time of peace; it is quite clear that that is legal: (Hobbs v. Hemming, 17 C. B., N. S., 791; 12 L. T. Rep. N. S. 205.)

[KELLY, C. B.—The question is not so much whether the voyage was legal or not, as whether the extraordinary risks incidental to such a voyage were such as the plt. under his contract was bound to undergo.] The direction to the jury was based upon the illegality of the voyage. If the objects of the voyage might possibly be legal even after the commencement of hostilities—and there was, I contend, nothing to show that they were necessarily illegal—the presumption ought to be in favour of their legality. It was at least a question for the jury whether the objects of the voyage were illegal. Then with respect to the increased risk, that affords no reason for the seaman's refusing to proceed, if the voyage continues legal. There is nothing illegal in chartering a vessel to the Peruvian Government to carry ammunition, even in time of war. There is no evidence to show conclusively that the vessel was to engage in hostilities in concert with the Peruvian men-of-war, and though she was acting under the direction of a Peruvian officer it cannot be presumed that his orders would be illegal. Even if the increased risk entitled the plt. to refuse to serve any longer, it cannot entitle him to treat the captain's proceeding with the voyage as a breach of contract. To treat it as such would be equivalent to saying that the captain was bound to proceed to some other port; but the coal on board was the property of the Peruvian Government, and the ship was chartered to that Government. The captain was bound to continue the voyage if its purposes were, as I contend, legal. The utmost effect of the declaration of war would be to dissolve the contract and entitle the seamen to leave the ship.

Cur. adv. vult.

May 11.—KELLY, C. B. now delivered the judgment of himself, MARTIN, and PIGOTT, B.—A question of great public importance arises upon a motion made in this case by the Solicitor-General for a new trial, or to reduce the damages; and we have thought it right to consider the material facts with great attention, not by reason of any doubt entertained (at least on my part) as to the substantial merits of the case, but because it was thought possible that some question ought to have been left to the jury as to the real nature and character of the adventure, and the course actually adopted by the vessel in question as disclosed by the evidence in relation to the two steam-rams belonging to the Government, and engaged in hostilities against Spain. On Feb. 25, 1866, war was declared between Spain and Peru. On the 18th March there was a proclamation under the Foreign Enlistment Act to observe strict neutrality, and the declaration of war and the proclamation were both published in the Gazette. It is necessary that I should read the material portions of the evidence in order to make the case perfectly intelligible. The action was brought for a breach of contract in ceasing to employ the plt. as a mariner on board a ship on a voyage to any part of North or South America, or Australia, and, I think, some other parts of the world. The breach alleged was in substance that the deft. ceased to employ the plt. on any such voyage, but employed him upon another and different voyage, and that he sustained other damage. The evidence for the plt. was to this effect: "I am a mercantile mariner, and have been so since 1834. I went to the docks and saw the captain—I had sailed with him before. I asked him if he had engaged his hands. He said, 'No; he was then going about it.' I met him the next morning on board the Thames. He gave me a note to go to the shipping master and sign my articles. Nothing was said about the nature of the employment. He said probably the voyage would be about six months. On the 25th Jan. I went to the Sailors' Home in Well-street and signed articles. They were read to me. No one was with me. I went to the captain again, and he gave me a note for an advance. He gave me instructions to join the ship the next day on the 27th. On the 27th Jan. I went and joined at the Victoria-docks. She was taking in a cargo of coal and provisions. On the 31st Jan. the ship sailed and came to an anchor at Lobos. From there

Gravesend. We took in 130 casks of ammunition marked, 'Six charges for 300lb. gun, 45lb. of powder and shell.' We left the river. Two launches were taken on board in the docks. One was a steam launch, one not. The name Independanzia was on the launches. On the 2nd Feb. we left the river and proceeded to the Downs. On the 3rd Feb. we left the Downs and went down Channel to Portland, thence to Torbay, and from Torbay we went to Brest. On the 10th Feb. we arrived at Brest. We did not go into the harbour, but in a wind-bound bay. I went ashore several times with the captain. He was absent from the ship three or four days. Custom-house officers and authorities came on board and asked the chief mate where we came from and other questions. There were then three of the men who refused to go on, and wished to speak to the consul. The men tried to paint out the names of the launches by order of the officers. The Independanzia came to Brest shortly after we did. She went up the port among the French men-of-war. On the 22nd Feb. we left Brest. When we got under way a French man-of-war followed us. We lost sight of her at one p.m. When the French vessel was lost sight of we altered our course and made sail for Madeira. On the 27th Feb. we arrived at Madeira. The harbour-master came and spoke to the deft. and asked where we came from. We said, 'From London, in twenty-eight days.' He then asked what we had come here for. The captain said he came here for orders. He asked, 'Have you any sick on board?' We had a quarantine flag flying. They said they must put us three days in quarantine. On the 4th March the Huasca and the Independanzia arrived. We put 150 tons of coal on board the Independanzia. She lost her anchor. On the 7th March we finished coaling about twelve o'clock, and then got under way with the two rams altogether. Rockets for signals were put on board the rams. We heard of the declaration of war between Peru and Spain for the first time." I should observe here that, though that is the evidence of the plt., the mariner, the captain, who was afterwards called, said he had not actually heard of the declaration of war until after he had arrived at Rio. The declaration did in fact take place on the 25th Feb. 1866, and it formed the subject of a communication between the two departments of these Governments, and it afterwards, within a day or two, appeared in the Gazette. The evidence then goes on: "On the 12th March we arrived at St. Vincent. As we went signals passed between the rams. There were Peruvian officers on board. Borrás, a Peruvian, gave orders. These were about the rate of sailing. The Peruvian officers were said to be passengers. We found out afterwards that they were acting under the Peruvian Government. The Thames had a bright light at the peak, and I never saw such a light before. We discharged one boat and put it on board the Independanzia. We put the other launch over the ship's side to the Independanzia. We took on board two boats belonging to the Huasca. We went to Pedro Bay, twelve miles south-west of St. Vincent. The two rams arrived there soon after us. In Pedro Bay we put on board the ram 130 cases of ammunition. On the 31st March we arrived at Rio. On the 1st April the rams arrived at Rio. On the 3rd April a Spanish brig was brought in by one of the rams, and was afterwards taken out of the harbour by the Peruvian launch, and as we heard was burnt. The deft. said they might have given him some of the cordage before they burned her. On the 6th April when I saw all this I went away from the ship to an island four and a half miles from Rio with two of the crew. From there I went to Rio. I went to the British consul and made a complaint to him. I told him I thought I had got upon an illegal voyage. He said, 'Where are your articles?'

I said they contained nothing about supplying Peruvian rams with ammunition and stores. I asked him for a certificate that the voyage was legal, and I offered to pay him for a stamp. He said he was not going to be bothered with me. I asked him what protection I had if I went outside the harbour and was taken by a Spanish cruiser. He said, 'Come to me when the Spaniard takes you.' I said it would be too late then. Allen and Keefe were with me. I then applied to Captain Dunne, of the Megara, and told him what I had told the consul. He told us to go on board our ship and we should hear from him. I then returned to the Thames. Captain Dunne came on board. The captain was ashore. He spoke to the chief mate. Captain Dunne asked us if we had not seen the British consul since he had seen us? I said 'No.' He said to the chief mate, 'How came you not to allow them to go to the British consul?' Captain Dunne said we should have to go in the ship, but we should have justice sooner or later. On the 20th April I went again to the British consul, because on the 19th April the captain called us aft—the whole of the crew. He told the crew he was going to clear out at Callao on a private enterprise, and he would give us 1*l.* per month addition to our pay. If we refused the offer that day we should not get it the next. We did refuse; we were called out again in the evening. The captain said it was little use going ashore to the consul, for he would tell us, as he had told us, that it was a legal voyage, and we were bound to go on. On the 20th April I got leave with all hands to go ashore. I went to the consul again, and also to the English minister's. I repeated the complaint. The consul told me we were bound by the articles. At the British minister's we saw the secretary, and told him the nature of the voyage. He was of opinion that the voyage was legal, and turned us over to the consul. On the 21st April I was arrested by the Brazilian police. They took and locked us up, five of us at night. On the 28th April others of our ship were brought there and imprisoned. We remained imprisoned until the 2nd May. We wished to refer to the British minister, but were not permitted. We sent a note to the consul, and then we were released. A gentleman came from the consul, certifying that we were British subjects. We were told we might join the Brazilian army or navy, but we were to be released. On the 2nd May, when we were released, we went to look after the Thames, and she was gone. I remained at Rio till the 21st, and went to the consul, saying I was destitute, and got a certificate from the consul saying that I might embark in any ship. On the 21st May I got a passage to New York, working my way in the Gertrude. On the 7th June I went from New York to London in the William Penn, on wages." Therefore he got a passage from New York, by which he earned wages, and he reached London on the 23rd July. Then an estimate was made of 9*l.* 14*s.* for wages. He claimed 20*l.*, or something of the kind, for clothes which he left on board the Thames; and that concluded his evidence. Then he is cross-examined, and he says: "I have been thirty-two years a sailor. The last ship was the Virago, from June till October. I came from Nassau to Liverpool in the Caroline. I had a dispute with the owner of the Virago, on the ground of the voyage being illegal. Allen was with me in the Thames. He said the voyage was illegal; not till after we had been at Madeira. I never heard him called 'Lawyer Allen.' I signed articles the 25th, and not the 29th Jan. I saw the launches taken on board." Some attempt was made to show the plt. knew the illegal nature of the voyage. I then put to the counsel for the deft. whether he meant to say that the plt. had distinct notice of the nature of the adventure upon which this ship was to be engaged, because, if that was so, it might have the effect of making the contract altogether illegal, and then it might be held that the action was not maintainable; but the answer was (and there is no doubt that it was a true answer), that at the time when the plt. was engaged on board this ship, and the cargo was shipped in the Thames or in the dock, there having been no declaration of war before the voyage itself, any contract relating to that voyage was prima facie perfectly legal, and therefore I thought it immaterial to inquire what suspicion there might be if sooner or later this voyage which was legal in its inception became illegal. Then the evidence goes on thus: "I saw the launches taken on board. I did not make inquiries. I had no notion what sort of voyage I was going on. From the 23rd to the 29th it was not talked of—the kind of voyage we were going on—I did not talk about this at all. When at Brest I did not hear the captain had been charged with a breach of quarantine. I went ashore at Rio on the 5th, because I had to make complaint about the illegality of the voyage. I did not ask for leave. The chief mate told me I had been absent without leave. The 20th was a liberty day. I went ashore to look for redress. The deft. did not tell me after I had seen the consul that I had better go back to the ship. I saw the consul; then, the next morning, the 20th, the minister's secretary; never went to the Spanish consul or minister. Some of the men told me that the Spanish minister had told them, if they would leave the ship, he would take care of them and board them. I was taken up on the 21st and not liberated till the 2nd May. The consul did not tell me that I had deserted. On the 30th April I was taken before the magistrates, and they talked Portuguese, but I heard no charge. I never signed this letter, but Keefe wrote it and put my name to it." Then he is re-examined, and he says, "When the Thames sailed from London I had no knowledge of any ammunition or warlike stores being on board her, or of the purpose of the voyage." Then several of the crew were called, who more or less confirmed him, but on any point on which the evidence might be open to doubt I have made no report, because the ground upon which I pronounce the judgment in this case may be defined by the evidence given by the deft. Capt. Pinkerton. For the defence Capt. Pinkerton, the deft., was called, and he said: "I am captain of the Thames, which belongs to the British Colonial Steamship Company. It ordinarily trades to Canada. On the 20th Jan. it was chartered for this voyage, 'for all lawful services and employments as per margin, twelve months.' The steamer was intended for the Peruvian Government, and if damaged or burnt by enemy of war they valued it at 45,000/., to be paid by the charterers to the company. Burton, the plt., came to me and asked for a voyage, or rather I met him in the docks. On the 24th Jan. he signed his articles. On the 23rd Jan. he was on board in the Victoria-docks. On the 27th Jan. he was working on board. On the 31st we sailed. During the whole time they were taking coals and provisions on board. The gun carriage was taken on board about the 29th or 30th; the two launches on the 31st. At Gravesend we took on board 130 cases of powder and ammunition. Several joined at Gravesend; all the rest at the docks. When we went to Brest I went ashore to telegraph our arrival to the owners. I got into trouble about quarantine. There was no complaint of anything else. The Independanza left London three or four days before the Thames. I made a communication to some of the crew. Allen and Fuller were there. From Brest we went to Madeira, and thence to St. Vincent and Rio. The rams went with us from Madeira. On the 31st March we arrived at Rio. On the 5th April, ten a.m., hands came aft and wished to go ashore and see the consul, saying that the voyage was illegal. Permission was given to two, Allen and Keefe. The plt. went without leave. On the 5th and 6th April the plt. and others had leave to go to the consul. The Thames was lying at Coal Island, four miles from Rio. On the 14th April they again asked to go ashore. All wanted to go and see the consul and speak for themselves. All went and were told to go back to the ship. Thomas Hollocomb was acting consul. We met at the consul's; the consul asked, 'What do you want now?' They said the voyage was illegal, and they wished him to look into the matter. I said my crew had come aft and wished to see him as to the illegality of the voyage. They said the ship had carried ammunition and had transhipped it to a Peruvian man-of-war, and that she had also arrived. The launch and the provisions were supplied to the Peruvian man-of-war, and that in their opinion that was a breach of neutrality, and made the voyage illegal. I told the consul my destination was Callao, and told him I did not know what I was to do at Callao, but I was acting under the order of the charterer's agent on board, Borrás, the supercargo. He was a Peruvian: I did make him understand that I was to act in all respects under the direction of the rams belonging to the Peruvian Government. I had heard that a Spanish brig had been taken by the Peruvians, and was a prize. It was taken by one of the rams from the Spaniards; this might be about the 6th. This was the talk of the town, and the consul must have known it, but I did not tell him. I told the men I was going to Callao, and did not say anything about a private enterprise. They knew, and everybody knew, I was acting under orders from the rams. I told the men I would raise their wages if it was wages they wanted, but I did not say anything about 1/ per month. The 20th April was a liberty day for all to go ashore; all hands went; Burton amongst the others; Burton never came back; I saw him and others that day; I tried to persuade him to come on board. On the 21st all were absent without leave, and were so for several days afterwards. On the 25th I went to the consul and complained that the men were absent without leave. On the 25th there is an entry in the log that the plt. and others had deserted. The consul indorsed that the men were charged with desertion, and that he had made inquiries, and as far as he could learn the charge was true. On the 25th April the consul told me that the plt. and others were at St. Christopher, and were paid by the Spanish Government. The consul certified that he certified an engagement with new men, twelve or thirteen. I sailed on the 28th, and then had coals on board, but no munitions of war. Borrás ordered me to proceed to Maldonado Bay, in the river Plata, and there to await the arrival of the rams. In pursuance of that I sailed, and arrived at Maldonado Bay and waited till the rams arrived, four or five days afterwards. Then we went in company towards the Straits of Magellan. We knew before we left Rio that our destination was Callao. We stopped in Possession Bay. Then the rams took the coals from us. We went 100 miles farther, and then they ordered us not to proceed to the Pacific, but to go home." Then, in answer to some questions put by me, he says: "When at Brest and afterwards I knew that war was imminent between Spain and Peru. I did not learn that war had actually been declared until I had left Rio." Thus it appears upon the evidence, alike of the plt. and of the deft., that the ship took in a cargo of coals and provisions, together with 130 casks of ammunition and two launches, one of them a steam-launch, before proceeding out of the river.

BURTON v. PINKERTON.

[Ex.]

BURTON v. PINKERTON.

[Ex.]

After touching at some places on the English coast, she came into the harbour of Brest, and was there joined by the Independanza, one of the two rams belonging to the Peruvian Government. She then went to Madeira, where she was joined by the Independanza and the other ram, called the Huasca, and there put 150 tons of coal on board the Independanza. They then left Madeira in company with the two rams, and rockets for signals were put on board the rams. They next reached St. Vincent, signals passing between the rams and the Thames. At St. Vincent the second launch was put over the ship's side into the Independanza, and two boats belonging to the Huasca were taken on board the Thames. From thence they went to Pedro Bay, twelve miles south-west of St. Vincent, the two rams arriving shortly after the Thames, and there the Thames put on board one of the rams the 130 cases of ammunition. Thence they proceeded to Rio, where they arrived on the 31st March, the two rams arriving there the following day. Two days afterwards one of the rams sailed out of Rio and captured and brought in as a prize a Spanish brig, which they afterwards took out again and burned, upon which the deft. observed that they might have given him some of the cordage. This evidence was uncontradicted on the part of the deft., the master or commander of the Thames, who was himself examined as a witness, and who further gave in evidence the charter-party of the ship, from which it appeared that she was chartered for all lawful services and employments for twelve months; that she was intended for the Peruvian Government; and that if she should be damaged or burnt by any enemy of war, she was to be valued at 45,000*l.* to be paid by the charterers to the company. He further proved that the Independanza had left London three or four days before the Thames. He admitted that the plt. and the other seamen, after their arrival at Rio, insisted that the voyage had become illegal, and desired to go on shore; that he himself (Capt. Pinkerton) had told the consul that his destination was Callao, and that he was acting under orders of Borrás, the supercargo and agent of the Peruvian Government on board, and that it was understood that he was to act in all respects under the direction of the rams belonging to the Peruvian Government. He admitted that he knew of the capture of the Spanish brig by the Peruvians, and that it was the talk of the town and generally known. He also admitted that he had told the men he was going to Callao, and that he would raise their wages if they would go with him, though he denied that he had specified the advance of 1*l.* per month. I thought upon this evidence that the contract with the plt. was to employ him for twelve months on board this vessel free from any other charges than such as were incidental to a voyage for ordinary commercial purposes, and that war having broken out between Peru and Spain, two states in amity with this country, it was a breach of that contract to place the vessel under the orders of a Peruvian, who was directing and causing her to act in concert with two ships of war belonging to Peru, and engaged in actual hostilities against Spain, and so exposing the crew to the danger at any moment of the loss of their liberty or of their lives. It is possible that Borrás might have given no orders which would have put the ship in peril, but his orders might have been such as to expose her to an attack from a Spanish ship of war within an hour after she should have left the port of Rio, when she might have been fired into and sunk or captured, and the crew made prisoners of war. The plt. could not foresee what these orders or their consequences might be, but he might fairly infer from the mode in which the ship had been employed in aid of, and in concert with, the rams from the time when she had quitted Brest, that she would still be directed to accompany and to supply munitions of war; in fact, to be as she had been, a store ship to the two belligerent vessels. It is enough, in my opinion, that Borrás had power so to employ her. If this evidence raised any question of fact, it should have been left to the jury, but it appeared to me, and I am still of opinion, that the placing of the vessel at the disposal of and under the command of Borrás was in itself a breach of the contract. It is unnecessary to determine whether the employment of the vessel in the way thus proved was a violation of the 59 Geo. 3, c. 69. It is certainly against the spirit and intent of that Act of Parliament which recites that, "the engagement of His Majesty's subjects to serve in war in foreign service without His Majesty's licence (and the fitting out of vessels, &c.), may be prejudicial to and tend to endanger the peace and welfare of this kingdom." Then, by sect. 2, it is expressly enacted that, "if any natural-born subject of His Majesty shall, without such leave and licence, serve in and on board any ship or vessel used or intended to be used for any warlike purpose in the service of, or for, or under, or in aid of any foreign state, &c., or if any natural-born subject shall without such leave agree to go or shall go to any place beyond the seas with intent to serve in any warlike operation whatever, in the service of or under, or in aid of any foreign state, &c., as an officer, sailor, or mariner in any such ship or vessel, it shall be a misdemeanor; and, by sect. 9, offences committed out of the United Kingdom may be tried at Westminster. By the 7th section it is made an offence to fit out a ship to be used in aid of a belligerent as a store ship, but the offence must be committed within the British dominions. This ship was so fitted out in London, but before the declaration of war, and therefore the offence was incomplete. But it was actually used as a store ship after the declaration of war, and continued to be so used under the orders of Borrás after the plt. had quitted the ship and the ship had quitted Rio. If then it were necessary to decide the question I should hold that to serve on board a vessel used as a store ship in aid of a belligerent ship, the fitting out of which to be so used is an offence within the 7th section, is a serving on board a vessel for a warlike purpose in aid of a foreign state within the 2nd section. But if this were doubtful, I am of opinion that so to employ this vessel was a breach of that which I hold to be the contract with the plt., namely, to employ him and the rest of the crew for a specified period on board this vessel upon an ordinary commercial voyage. It is impossible not to see that by adventures like these this country has been brought to the very verge of war, first with the United States and then latterly with Spain; and I think that we ought not to permit a doubt to be entertained whether to encourage and employ the crew of a British ship in such an adventure is within the terms of a lawful contract like that which has been entered into between the deft. and the plt. I am therefore of opinion that there should be no rule in this case except as before intimated to the Solicitor-General, to reduce the damages in respect of the loss of clothes and the imprisonment of the plt.

BRAMWELL, B.—I confess I am not of that opinion. For I think the rule ought to have been granted. Not that I am prepared to say that I think the Lord Chief Baron was wrong at the trial, but I am not satisfied that he was right, and I have sufficient doubt about it to make me think that, instead of its being discussed without a rule being granted, it would have been better if it had been discussed after a rule had been granted. The difficulty I feel about it is this: I quite agree that if this vessel was intended to go on what they call a warlike voyage, that is, as a tender to, or consort of the rams, the men were entitled to say, "We engaged to go on a voyage of peace, and not to go on a voyage of war in the course of which we might be subject to be fired into and shot;" but the doubt I entertain is this, if all she was going to do was to carry contraband of war from port to port, and possibly have to run a blockade, I am not so clear that the plt. was entitled to say, "That is not a voyage I have undertaken to go, and unless you take me on some other, I am entitled to say you have discharged me." That is the doubt I have. I do not say that even then the plt. would not have been entitled to recover. He may have been, but I should like to have had it discussed. Now, as I understand, the direction to the jury was, "whichever view is correct, the plt. is entitled to your verdict." I say for that reason I am in doubt, because a jury ought not to be told to find a verdict for the plt., unless on any view of the admitted facts he is entitled to it. So I think there ought to have been a rule. I do not differ from any law that was laid down, but I want to be more advised upon it before I express an opinion. I am sure that no man can be more ready than I am to do anything to discourage this sort of business, which in my opinion has as little to do with legitimate commerce as smuggling has. But, for the reasons I have given, I should have been glad if a rule had been granted.

[ADM.]

[ADM.]

Rule refused.

COURT OF ADMIRALTY.

Reported by HENRY F. PURCELL, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Mortgage—24 Vict. c. 10, s. 11—25 & 26 Vict. c. 63, s. 8.

Where a suit has been brought to enforce a mortgage under the 24 Vict. c. 10, s. 11, and the ship has been arrested, the Court will, where no prejudice to third parties can arise, enforce the equities against the mortgagees, under the Merchant Shipping Act Amendment Act 1862.

C. was the registered owner of a ship subject to two mortgages, the first, dated Feb. 1, and made payable May 3, 1866, to the M. C. Company; the second to R., the deft.. To enable C. to discharge the debt of the M. C. Company, W. and S., the plts., advanced a sum of money, the deft. R. acting in the transaction as C.'s agent. The plts. W. and S. took as security a transfer of the first mortgage, and, as a supplemental security, made an indenture with C., which was executed on April 19, immediately after the execution of the transfer of the first mortgage; it had been further agreed that the deft. R.'s mortgage should be cancelled to give priority to this indenture of April 19, a re-mortgage to be made to him subsequently. R.'s mortgage was cancelled; but, instead of a re-mortgage, C. gave the deft. R. a bill of sale, thus constituting him the owner of the vessel. Plts. alleged this to be without their knowledge; but it appeared that they had sufficient opportunity of knowing it, and there was no fraudulent concealment of the fact. Under the indenture of April 19, 1866 the first payment was to be made to the plts. W. and S. on the 19th Oct. 1866, except in respect of a small sum to be advanced on a port mortgage; to secure this the ship's register was given up to W. and S. By a subsequent agreement, the plts. W. and S. procured a charter for the ship to take a cargo of iron from Middlesbrough to Alexandria; plts. W. and S. then gave up the ship's register, as under this agreement, dated 8th June 1866, plts. W. and S. were in the first instance to receive the freight, out of which the port mortgage and disbursements were to be paid. C. entered into this charter as owner. The vessel was taken to Middlesbrough. The plts. W. and S. claimed control over the vessel, and desired the master to take his orders from them, cautioning him against the deft. R. The deft. R. went down, took command of the vessel, and on the master demurring to obey an order of his dismissed him and appointed another. The plt. S. then went down and went on board with the late master. Eventually all parties went before a magistrate, who decided in favour of the deft. R., who proved himself to be the registered owner, to the alleged surprise of plts. A suit was brought in this court on the 25th June, plts. having on that day arrested the ship:

Held, that the court, having regard to the equities between the parties, would read the mortgage of which plts. were transferees, and the agreements as a whole, and though the mortgage money was payable under the original mortgage on May 3, yet, as under the indenture of April 19, the first payment was not to be made till Oct. 19, the plts. had no right to arrest the vessel under that mortgage; nor had they a right to arrest the vessel for disbursements, as under the agreement of June 8 the plts. were to pay themselves out of the freight when received; the suit therefore should be dismissed with costs.

And, as the plts. were in full possession of the facts, and must be held liable for the legal effect of their own acts, after giving due weight to the decision in the Evangelismos, Swob. 378, this was a case where damages should be awarded to the defts., the damages to be assessed in the usual way by the registrar and merchants.

This case, which occupied part of several days, concluded on the 2nd Feb. It was a suit brought under the Admiralty Court Act of 1861, to enforce a mortgage for 2090*l.* The facts are set out at length in the following judgment, delivered Feb. 19.

Brett, Q. C. and Pritchard for plts.

Cohen for defts.

Dr. LUSHINGTON.—The plts. are Messrs. Wulff and Smith, shipbrokers, in the city of London. The deft. Alex. Robinson describes himself as a shipowner. The deft. became the owner of this vessel, the Cathcart, in the month of Aug. 1865, by a bill of sale from a Mr. Rennie of Aberdeen; the purchase-money was 2250*l.* Half of this, according to the deft.'s account, was paid in cash, for the other half he gave his acceptance, to fall due on the 16th March 1866. As a security for the payment of the acceptance he gave to Mr. Rennie a mortgage on the ship, dated the 18th Sept. On the 1st Feb. 1866 the deft. paid off Mr. Rennie, by cash received from the Maritime Credit Company (Limited), and Mr. Rennie's mortgage was cancelled. The arrangement between the deft. and the Maritime Credit Company was this: the deft. gave them his acceptance of a bill of exchange for 1650*l.* to fall due on the 3rd May, whilst the company advanced to him that same sum (1650*l.*) less deductions for commission and interest to accrue up to the 3rd May, amounting together to 14*l.* 13*s.* 8*d.* The deft. also gave them a mortgage, which was dated the 1st Feb. 1866. It was a mortgage of the vessel only, not of freights or policies; it purported to secure not only the payment of the bill of exchange, but also the repayment of any further advances that might be made to the deft. by the company. However, as a matter of fact, no further advances were made. In turn the the mortgage was not a port mortgage, but it was so practically, for the company took possession of the register, without which the vessel could not be cleared outwards. This mortgage was registered on the 2nd Feb. The Maritime Credit Company were thus the first mortgagees of the vessel. On the 6th March the deft. by bill of sale transferred the vessel to Conte, a gentleman who, according to his own account, had been engaged in the Italian trade, subject of course to the mortgage of Feb. 1, and on the same day, March 6, Conte mortgaged his equity of redemption in the vessel to the deft. for 850*l*. On the 15th March this mortgage was registered. The result of these transactions was, that Conte was the registered owner subject to two mortgages, first, to the Maritime Credit Company for 1650*l*.; secondly, to the deft. for 850*l*. In April the first dealings of Conte and the deft. with the plts. commenced. It appears that there was some prospect of procuring a charter from Messrs. Livingstone for the vessel to go to Rangoon and Moulmein, but there was a difficulty with the Maritime Credit Company, who refused to part with the register so as to let the vessel go until the 1650*l*. had been paid. The deft. offered to the brother of the plt. Smith 50*l*., if he would find some person to advance the money to pay off the Maritime Credit Company. Mr. Smith then introduced the deft. to the plts., who up to that time were perfect strangers to the deft. and Conte. The plts. required to see Conte's references, and finding them satisfactory, entered into negotiations with the deft., who, as the plts. were informed by Conte, had authority to act for him (Conte), and to arrange the details and the chartering of the vessel. After some unsuccessful overtures the plts. sent to Conte the letter of April 17, containing the following offer :

4, Railway-place, Fenchurch-street,
17th April 1866.

G. Conte, Esq., care of Messrs. Smith Brothers and Co.

Dear Sir,—We are willing to advance you 1500*l*. on a clean mortgage of the Cathcart on the following conditions, viz :

That the balance of homeward freight due on ship's arrival in Great Britain be included in such mortgage.

That we insure the ship out and home for 3000*l*., and also the homeward freight, premiums on which are to be paid us in cash before the vessel sails, and the policies to remain in our hands.

That we have 2½ per cent. on the freights of this vessel until the mortgage be paid off, whether the charters be effected by us or not, and that she is to be reported by us or our agents. On her return to Great Britain, paying us ten guineas if from a long voyage, or five guineas if from a short one.

That we receive 10 per cent. interest per annum for the money lent in this mortgage, and an extra 2½ per cent. commission on 300*l*. of same.

That 750*l*. is to be paid back by you with all interest and commission thereon within six months from the date of mortgage and the balance within twelve months from same date.

That our solicitor draw up the mortgage at your expense, and that the same be executed and the money paid over in his presence.

150*l*. to be advanced on a port mortgage on demand, you paying us 2½ per cent. commission and interest at the rate of 10 per cent. per annum.—We are, dear Sir, yours truly,

WULFF and SMITH.

P. S.—It is agreed that the above-mentioned sum of 1650*l*. is to be employed in transferring the present mortgage of like amount and on the said ship Cathcart from the Maritime Credit to ourselves.

WULFF and SMITH.

I accept the above on behalf of the owner Mr. G. Conte, and for myself as second mortgagee. ALEXANDER ROBINSON.
17th April 1866.

I accept the above.

G. CONTE.

This letter of the plts. to Conte of the 17th April was the basis of all future arrangements, and it is important for the proper understanding of the subsequent course of events to consider its contents somewhat minutely. In the first place, it is clear that on this occasion both Conte and the deft. represented themselves to the plts. to be what they then actually were, namely, the one the registered owner of the vessel, the other the second mortgagee of the vessel, and acting as agent for the registered owner. In the second place, to compare the position which the Maritime Credit Company were holding with that which the plts. were about to adopt, the position of the Maritime Credit Company under the mortgage was this, they held what was substantially a port mortgage, their security was the security of the vessel alone, and the thing secured to them was the payment of the deft.'s acceptance for 1650*l*., without interest (that having been already deducted), on May 3rd. But by the arrangement about to be made with the plts., the mortgage to the plts. was to be a free one, at least to the extent of 1500*l*., together with divers commissions, premiums, &c., and this money was to be repaid, half at the expiration of six months after the new mortgage, and the other half at the expiration of a year. In addition the plts. were, if required, to advance 150*l*. upon a port mortgage. The first idea may have been, that the mortgage to the Maritime Credit Company should be cancelled, and that the whole of the agreement between the plts. and Conte should be embodied in a single new mortgage to the plts. But, as would appear from the postscript to the letter of April 17, and from an item in Mr. Billing's bill of costs, the course preferred was for the plts. to take a single transfer of the first mortgage, and in addition to take a supplementary security in order to give effect to the rest of the arrangement. But at this time the deft. was second mortgagee, and as such would of course rank behind the transferee of the first mortgage, but before the holder of any mortgage dated subsequently to his own. In order therefore to secure for the plts. complete priority over the deft., the plts.' solicitors thought it necessary to stipulate that the new mortgage to the plts. should be a clean mortgage. And accordingly it was verbally arranged between the parties that before the security to the plt. was executed the deft. should cancel his mortgage, it being of course understood that after the plt. had been so secured, his mortgage should be renewed. In pursuance of this arrangement the first step taken was for the plts.' solicitor, Mr. Billing, to prepare a draft for the new security to the plts., the indenture of April 17. The contents of this were as follows:—"The parties were Conte as mortgagor, and the plts. as mortgagees. The draft indenture (being intended for execution immediately after the execution of the transfer to the plts. of the first mortgage) recites as follows: The mortgage to the Maritime Credit Company. The sale to Conte. That Conte was the registered owner subject to the mortgage. That the plts. had consented to take an assignment of the mortgage after having the said sum of 1650*l*. secured by a transfer of the said mortgage, and also by the indenture which I am now stating. That the transfer to the plts. of the mortgage had been executed by indorsement. That the transfer had been made to secure to the plts. the repayment of the said sum of 1650*l*. and interest thereon at the rate of 10 per cent. and other money and commissions thereafter mentioned. That the vessel was about to be chartered. That it had been agreed that the vessel on her return voyage should be addressed to the mortgagees, and reported by them." The draft then contained a grant by Conte, first, of all freights "except such as might in the usual course of business be advanced to Conte under any charter-party;" and, secondly, of all policies on ship and freights. This was the security of the mortgagees. Then followed a covenant by Conte to pay, first, 150*l*., with interest, commission, &c., before the vessel left England, or rather the port of London; secondly, 750*l*., with interest, commission, &c., on 19th Oct. 1866. or on the return of the vessel; thirdly, 750*l*., with interest, commission, &c., on the 19th April 1867; fourthly, the legal cost of preparing the deed; fifthly, further advances that might be made by the plts. on money for which the plts. should become liable in respect of the vessel from time to time, on notice in writing for that purpose to be given to or left at the last known place of residence in England of Conte or his assigns. In default of payment of the 1650*l.*, or interest, or commission, or of any other debt or sum of money, commission, or interest intended to be secured by the indenture, on the days or times thereinbefore appointed for the payment thereof respectively, there was given to the plts. power without any further authority from Conte to take possession and sell the ship, and to appropriate the freights and policies. Under no other circumstances is authority given by this instrument to take possession and sell the ship. The plts. were further authorised to insure the vessel and freights in whatever sum they thought proper, and to charge thereupon the premiums and interest; and Conte covenanted that the plts. should act as agents for the vessel, and that the vessel should be addressed to them. On the 19th April, in order to execute the arrangement, there was a meeting of all the parties in the office of the plt., viz., the two plts., the deft. Conte, and Mr. Billing, the solicitor to the plts. Conte executed the indenture (the substance of which I have stated), and gave it to Mr. Billing; the deft. indorsed satisfaction upon his mortgage of March 6, and gave that also to Mr. Billing. Then Conte executed in favour of deft. another document, which Mr. Billing, supposing it (as he swears he did) to be a re-mortgage from Conte to the deft. in lieu of the cancelled mortgage of March 6, asked for and took possession of, and at the same time announced his intention of forwarding the plt.'s document (i. e. the transfer of the mortgage of Feb. 1 and the cancellation of the deft.'s mortgage of March 6) for registration to Aberdeen by the first post, and of forwarding deft.'s document—the one in question—by the succeeding post to the same place, likewise for registration. This document of the deft., however, was beyond all doubt not a mortgage, but a bill of sale to him from Conte. Before the meeting broke up Mr. Billing gave to the deft. the following receipt:

MEMORANDUM.

I have received from Mr. Robinson his bill of sale of the ship Cathcart to him to be registered as cancelled, and if the transaction be not carried out with Messrs. Wulff and Smith, then I undertake to redeliver the same to him.

JOHN BILLING.

3, Chapel-place, Poultry, 19th April 1866.

I confess the terms of this receipt are inexplicable to me. I am quite at a loss to say to which of the two documents that were given to Mr. Billing by the deft. at this interview this receipt of "bill of sale to deft. to be registered as cancelled" refers, whether to the mortgage of March 6, which certainly was to be registered as cancelled, or to the bill of sale from Conte, which as certainly was not to be registered as cancelled. But it is difficult to avoid the inference that the words "bill of sale" found their way into the receipt from the unquestionable fact that a bill of sale had been received by Mr. Billing on that occasion. This interview over, all those present, except plt. Smith, went on at once to the office of the Maritime Credit Company to complete the transaction there; Mr. Wulff paid to the secretary the 1650*l.*; the secretary executed the transfer to the plt. of the mortgage of the 1st Feb., delivered to the plt. Wulff the register of the vessel for the plt. to keep in right of his port mortgage for 150*l.*, and then, with the consent of the plt. Wulff and Mr. Billing, delivered back to the deft. his acceptance for 1650*l.* about to fall due. On May 3, Mr. Billing duly sent to Aberdeen for registration both the plts.' documents, viz., the transfer dated April 19 of the mortgage of Feb. 1, and also the cancellation of the mortgage of March 6, the registration of which was effected on April 21. Mr. Billing, however, did not send for registration the other documents which he had received from the deft.; I mean the bill of sale. He kept it in his possession for five days. On the 24th the deft. called upon him, and finding it not registered, said he would get it registered himself if Mr. Billing would give it up to him. Mr. Billing thereupon did give it up to him, and attested the execution of it by Conte, which execution by Conte, as I have already stated, had taken place on April 19, in Mr. Billing's presence. The deft. had the bill of sale duly registered on the next day, the 25th, and thereupon, whether the fact was known to the plts. and Mr. Billing or not, became registered owner of the Cathcart, subject of course to the mortgage to the plts. Conte, according to the documents already mentioned, ceased to have any legal interest in the vessel, but it seems that there was between himself and the deft. some private understanding to the contrary. What that understanding exactly was the court cannot say; it is not very material to the purposes of this suit. So far as I can conjecture from the evidence of the deft. and Conte, it was that, as between them, their position should be substantially the same as before the transactions of April 19, viz., Conte should be the real owner, and the deft. should be mortgagee for 850*l.* Why, if this was to be so, Conte should have on the 19th April executed the bill of sale making the deft. registered owner, and depriving himself of all ostensible interest in the vessel, I cannot form any opinion. The only explanation that Conte and the deft. offer for this matter is, that it was verbally agreed between them that the deft. should transfer the vessel to Conte upon Conte paying to him an instalment (howsoever small is not specified) of the 850*l.*, and should have a mortgage for the residue of the 850*l.* remaining unpaid. Nothing can be more vague and unsatisfactory than this, and looking to the respective positions of the parties, how that Conte was not in the ship-owning trade, and that the deft. was an uncertificated bankrupt without any place of business, and experiencing great difficulty in getting persons to enter into a charter-party with him, and looking to their subsequent dealings as brought to light by his suit, I cannot resist the conclusion that the deft. found it convenient from time to time to put Conte forward as the owner of the vessel, he himself negotiating arrangements as Conte's agent, and of course allowing Conte for the use of his name some interest in the vessel and its earnings. Pending the negotiations of April 19th, between the plt. and deft. and Conte, this contemplated charter-party with Mr. Livingstone for Rangoon went off. In the month of May the deft. entered into a charter-party through Messrs. Gellatley for the vessel to go to Antwerp, and thence to Havannah. A copy of the charter-party is produced; it is made by deft. (and not Conte) as owner of the vessel. On May 9 the deft. called upon the plts.; they deposed that he only informed them generally of a charter-party provisionally entered into with Messrs. Gellatley; but he swears that he showed them a copy of the original, by which, of course, they would see that he had made the charter as owner of the vessel. However this may be, on the strength of this charter-party the deft. asked the plts. for the register. The plts. at first refused, but a day or two after, on the deft. lodging with them scrip for the Egyptian loan for 200*l.*, fully paid up, as a security for the payment of the 150*l.*, the plts. gave up to the deft. the register of the vessel. However, in the course of a few days, Messrs. Gellatley failed, and the proposed charter-party with them fell through. On the 6th June the plts., being dissatisfied with the vessel not being chartered, and generally with the conduct of the deft., whom they allege they thought to be Conte's agent, served upon Conte (not on the deft.) the following notice :

5, Vine-street, Regent-street, 6th June 1866.

Dear Sir,—We beg to hand you an account of moneys paid on your account, in respect of the ship Cathcart, up to this date, amounting to twenty-two pounds, fourteen shillings, and fourpence (say, 22l. 14s. 4d.), exclusive of other moneys due to us, and request that such sum be paid to us within twenty-four hours from this time, and in default we shall exercise the powers over the ship vested in us by the securities we hold.—We are, dear Sir, yours truly,

G. Conte, Esq.

WULFF and SMITH.

The account sent with this letter purported to be an account between the plts. and Conte, not between the plts. and deft. The items were disbursements made for the ship, and also an item of 9l. for the law costs of the arrangements of April 19. On the next day, according to the deft.'s account, the deft. called upon the plts. and tendered them 100l. note, out of which they were to pay themselves their account, less, however, the sum of 9l., the deft. insisting on the right of having the costs taxed before they were paid. This offer the plts. declined. The next day, the 7th June, the deft. called again, and, according to his own account, tendered the plts. the same 100l. note in payment of the whole account, law costs and all, without reservation, and the plts. thereupon said, "It is not money we want, but a charter for the vessel," and offered to procure him a charter and cargo of iron at Middlesborough, and proceed to Alexandria. This account is denied by the plts., but it is certainly true that on the same day the following agreement was made through the deft. between the plts. and Conte, which made special provision for the payment of disbursements :

Wulff and Smith, 4, Railway-place, Fenchurch-street, London, E.C., 8th June 1866.

G. Conte, Vine-street, Regent-street.

Sir,—It is this day agreed between us that the Cathcart shall be chartered to Alexandria under the following conditions:—We are to receive the whole freight as per charter, out of which we are to pay necessary disbursements, as well as 150l. and interest at 10 per cent. per annum and 2½ commission on same, and also 2½ per cent. on 3000l. to ourselves. Insurance on the ship for 3000l. from London to Middlesborough, and thence to Alexandria, and balance of freight to be paid on ship having sailed from Middlesborough. The ship is to be consigned to our agents at Middlesborough. You shall appoint the captain, but his references must be satisfactory to us.—Yours truly,

WULFF and SMITH.

I agree to the above.—G. CONTE.

It is worth observing that this letter as it was originally framed directed that the balance of freight should be paid to the deft., and the deft.'s receipt should be a sufficient acknowledgment, but Conte, in signing it, altered it to the form as I have stated it. On the same day, in pursuance of the agreement, the charter-party was completed. It was made between Conte as owner of the vessel, and Messrs. Oppenheim, Conte undertaking that the vessel should proceed to port of lading within three weeks, and be prepared to load in July; that the ship being tight, staunch, and in every way fitted for the voyage should, with all convenient speed, proceed to any usual and safe lading place at Middlesborough-on-Tees, and there load a full cargo for Alexandria; Messrs. Oppenheim undertaking to pay freight at 31s. 6d. per ton, which, assuming a full cargo to be about 650 tons, would amount to about 1100l., this freight was to be paid in cash less 7 per cent. upon presentation of bills of lading, and to be paid to the plts. A commission of 5 per cent. was to be due from the ship to the plts., and the vessel was to be entered and cleared at the custom-house at port of lading by their agents. The execution of this charter-party by Conte was attested by the deft. On June 11, the deft. appointed to be captain of the vessel a person, a stranger to himself, but who had been recommended to him by a clerk in the plts.' office, a Capt. Seaton, and the plts. examined and approved his references. The deft. gave to Capt. Seaton instructions as to loading at Middlesborough. On the 13th the vessel sailed from London. On the day after the plts. returned to deft. his Egyptian bonds, which had been deposited to secure the payment of the 150l., and commission that by the new agreement of June 8 was to be paid out of the freight which the plts. were to receive upon presentation of bills of lading. The vessel reached Middlesborough on Tuesday, June 19, and was there consigned to Messrs. Muller, the plts.' agent. It appears that before the vessel had arrived at Middlesborough the plts. had become dissatisfied with, and suspicious of, the deft.; they had instructed Muller, their agent at Middlesborough, to pay all the bills for the ship direct and not through the deft. They had also sent a letter to the captain to await his arrival at Middlesborough, warning him against the deft., and bidding him (the captain) to look to them for orders, and not the deft., and giving directions as to the repairs of the vessel. The master having omitted (in accordance with his instructions from the deft.) to announce to deft. by telegraph his arrival at Middlesborough, the deft. goes down, goes on board, and takes command as owner, or representing the owner. The captain keeps the plts. apprised of the conduct of the deft., and tells the deft. of his orders from the plts. Angry correspondence thereupon ensues between the plts. on the one hand and the deft. and Conte on the other, each party accusing the other of interference, the plts. evidently assuming that as mortgagees they are entitled to the control of the vessel. The captain sides with the plts., and demurs to an order of the deft. to take the vessel out of the dock to a wharf in the river, there to remove 100 tons of ballast and replace them by an equal weight of iron cargo; the deft. thereupon dismisses him on Thursday, the 21st, and appoints a Captain Tate in his stead. On the 22nd the plt. Smith comes down and goes on board with Capt. Seaton, the deft. orders them out of the vessel, and on their refusal summons them before the magistrate. The deft. there produced the necessary documents to show that he was the registered owner, to the great surprise of the plts., who depose that up to that time they had thought him only second mortgagee, and agent only for the owner. The magistrate decided in favour of the deft., ordered the plts. to leave the deft. in possession of the vessel, and bound them over to keep the peace. On Monday, the 25th, the plts.' solicitor drew up the following notice :

To Graziano Conte and Alexander Robinson.

We hereby give notice, and require you to pay to us forthwith the sum of 440l., which we have paid on account of you, or one of you, on account of the ship Cathcart. If the same be not paid, we shall proceed to sell the said ship, in pursuance of the said powers and authorities vested in us for such purpose. Dated this 25th day of June 1866.—Yours, &c.,

WULFF and SMITH,

Railway-place, Fenchurch-street.

And sent a copy to Mr. Conte, to his address in London, and to the deft. to what they erroneously thought to be his address, and forthwith, on the same day, instituted this suit by causing the vessel to be arrested. The notice was not actually served upon the deft. till the 5th July. The object of this suit is to invoke the jurisdiction conferred recently upon the court (by the 11th section of the Admiralty Court Act 1861), to assist the plts. in enforcing their claims as mortgagees. The affidavit to lead the warrant simply referred to the mortgage of Feb. 1, and stated the plts. were the registered transferrees of that mortgage, and that under that mortgage the sum of 1650l. and commission and interest was made payable on the 3rd May, and most incorrectly that they had no other security. The petition alleges that under the circumstances set forth the sum of 1650l., and also the sum of 440l., making up the sum of 2090l., together with commission and interest, are due to them, and prays the court to pronounce for the mortgage, and that the said sum of 2090*l.*, together with commission and interest thereon, is due to the plts. The first question then for the court is, whether any default has been made in payment of the moneys secured by mortgage at the time agreed upon between the parties. To take first the mortgage of Feb. 1, transferred to the plts. on April 19. This mortgage was to secure the payment of the debt's acceptance of May 3. In June that time had, of course, long passed, and the plts. contend that the money was then due to them as transferees of that mortgage, and that default had been made, fortifying them in invoking the jurisdiction of the court to enforce the mortgage. But I must consider the equities between the plts. and the debt., for here there are no third parties concerned. The statute (Merchant Shipping Act Amendment Act 1862, sect. 3) prescribes that without prejudice to the powers of disposition to third parties therein mentioned, concerning which no question arises in this case, "equities may be enforced against owners and mortgagees of ships in respect of their interest therein in the same manner as equities may be enforced in respect of any other personal property." In my opinion, the transfer of the mortgage of Feb. 1 cannot be considered separately from the indenture of April 19. The two were executed concurrently as parts of the same transaction. There was only one sum of 1650*l.* borrowed and to be repaid. This clearly appears from the whole tenor of the indenture of April 19, the recital that the plts. had consented to take an assignment of the mortgage of Feb. 1 upon having the said sum of 1650*l.* secured by a transfer of that mortgage, and also by the indenture of April 19, the recital that the transfer was made to secure to the plts. the said sum of 1650*l.* and interest thereon at 10 per cent., and other the moneys and commissions thereafter mentioned, the elaborate provisions for the repayment of the moneys by instalments, the final provisions that in default of payment the plts. were to take, not only the freights and policies (which alone were granted by the indenture), but also the ship (which had been granted not by that indenture, but by the mortgage of Feb. 1). Lastly, look to the significant fact that at the time of the transfer the debt's acceptance, the payment of which the mortgage of Feb. 1 had been given to secure, was returned to him. With these considerations before me, I am satisfied that the intention of the parties was that the two deeds, the mortgage of Feb. 1 transferred on April 19th, and the indenture of April 19, were to be read as one deed. The combined effect would be that on the one hand the plts. would have for their security not only the vessel but also freights and policies, and the money secured would have been not only 1650*l.*, but that sum, together with very high commissions and interest; but on the other hand the moneys were to be repaid not on the 3rd May as specified in the mortgage of Feb. 1, but at the times and in the manner prescribed by the indenture of April 19. Then, under the indenture of April 19, was any money due to the plts. at the date of the arrest of the vessel? There again a similar question arises to be dealt with in the same way. The indenture of April 19 must be read in connection with the new agreement of June 8, and be modified accordingly. Under the indenture of April 19 the plts. were authorised to receive only the balance of homeward freight. Conte being entitled to the advance freights, the first instalment of 750*l.* was not due to the plts. till the 19th Oct. 1866, on the return of the vessel; but 150*l.* with commission, &c., was payable before the vessel left London, and disbursements were made payable on presentation of notice. Into these particulars the new agreement of June 8 introduced changes; the plts. were thereby empowered to receive the whole of the freights, about 1100*l.*, and that freight was payable entirely in advance upon presentation of bills of lading; out of the freights the plts. were to repay themselves disbursements, and also 150*l.* and interest. It seems to me then quite clear that until the freights had been paid no default had been made by the mortgagor in respect of repaying disbursements, and consequently that the plts. as mortgagees were not entitled to arrest the vessel or otherwise to interfere with its management, and that their conduct at Middlesbrough was an unlawful intrusion. I have dealt with the only case which I considered is presented to the court by the pleadings. But at the hearing several collateral issues were raised by the plts. with a view to show that a decree should be made in their favour. I cannot pass by these issues altogether without consideration. It is said that the debt. fraudulently concealed from the plts. that he was registered owner of the vessel. I confess that a most unsatisfactory mystery rests upon this part of the case. Why the debt., if his purpose was that Conte should appear the owner of the vessel, had his own name put upon the register; whether Conte at the time of executing the bill of sale of April 19th to the debt. knew that it was a bill of sale; what are the existing relations between debt. and Conte, except that Conte does not complain of them; in what manner they carry on the business of shipowners without office, without papers, and as far as I can see, without capital—all this is left in mystery, and I may say in suspicion. Nevertheless, it seems impossible to impute to the debt. fraudulent concealment of the bill of sale. No fraudulent object is shown to be gained by such concealment from the plts. There was no apparent attempt to conceal the bill of sale when it was executed. The debt. caused Conte to execute it in the presence of the plts. and their solicitor Mr. Billing, and Mr. Billing himself attested its execution, and the debt. gave it to Mr. Billing to get it registered. Mr. Billing kept it in his possession for several days and might of course have examined it, and if he had registered it he would of course have ascertained its contents. After this, especially as the result of the transaction stood recorded in the public register, the debt. may not unfairly have presumed the plts. to be aware of his being the owner. This is the only excuse for the debt. being privy to the plt. negotiating with Messrs. Oppenheim a charter-party with Conte who was not the owner; but under the circumstances I cannot say that the plts. can charge this as fraud against themselves, and this is the only act of the debt. which appears incompatible with his being the owner; his other acts are equally compatible with his being the owner, or the agent of the owner. At the same time, it is not necessary to discredit the statement of the plts. and Mr. Billing, that they throughout believed Conte to be the owner. Again, I do not see how the plts. were damnified as mortgagees; they were not deceived in the matter of the mortgage. The transfer to them of the mortgage of Feb. 18 was made by the person (Conte) who was then really the registered owner. There is no ground for saying that the plts. stipulated as part of the contract that Conte should execute a re-mortgage to the debt., though they doubtless anticipated that such would be the case; all that interested them was, that the old mortgage of March 6 should be taken off the register—not that a new one should be put on. It is equally groundless to say that it was a breach of the contract for the debt. to take a bill of sale from Conte. The indenture of April 19, so far from prohibiting Conte from alienation, on the contrary contemplated it as possible, it being specified therein "that the word mortgagor (Conte) should be taken to apply also to the assigns of the mortgagor." Conte could have assigned to the deft. or any other person when he thought proper, and was under no obligation to give notice to the pta. of such alienation. In fact, the alienation could not affect the pta.' rights as mortgagees; their rights were secure, whoever was owner of the vessel—who stood on the register was the concern not of the pta. but of Conte and the deft. and any merchants to whom the vessel might be chartered. Further, neither the ignorance of the pta. as to who was the registered owner, nor the discovery of the truth, seems to me to have misled the pta. into bringing this action, for the case of the pta. was, that they thought the deft. represented the owner was his agent. In fact, they proceeded as mortgagees to realize their security, and, as alleged, in fear that the deft., as representing the owner, was going to send the vessel to sea in an unseaworthy state. Another point raised by the pta. is, that the deft., for fraudulent purposes of his own, was about to send the vessel to sea in an unseaworthy condition. This is a very grave charge; but, in my opinion, it is not proven. No adequate ground is shown for the commission of the crime. It may be that the amount of the insurance—£4000. (policies for 3000*l.* effected by the pta., and one for 1000*l.* by deft.)—was greater than the gross value of the vessel which, on the occasion of the transfer of the vessel from the deft. to Conte in March 1863, appears to have been taken at 2500*l.* But the deft. declares that he made his policy of 1000*l.* only because he distrusted the solvency of the company from whom the pta. had obtained their policies, and after remonstrating with pta. and calling upon them to cancel their policies; and he is borne out by the result, for the company with which the pta. effected their insurance for 3000*l.* has since failed. Still less proven is the evidence to show that the vessel was unseaworthy, or that the deft. wished to send her to sea in an unfit condition. The vessel had been re-classified in 1863 at Lloyd's as A 1, and had been no voyage since, had only lain in St. Katherine's Dock waiting for a charter; and, in my opinion, the evidence adduced by the deft., especially that of Capt. Carr, far outweighs that for the pta., and proves that the vessel was strong and substantially seaworthy, at least for a voyage to Alexandria, and that what deficiencies there were, deficiencies in resuming gear, boats, and caulking, might very well have been supplied at Middlesborough while the vessel was being loaded, and as well after as before the 100 tons of iron cargo had been substituted for the same weight of ballast. Nor do I see any reason to think that the deft. was disinclined to have had these necessary repairs made good, or that the wharf at which the deft. was about to load the cargo was otherwise than a proper one for a ship like the Cathcart; so that, if he had any design not fairly to carry out the charter, of course he had a motive which the pta., as mortgagees, had not, to keep down the expenses of the ship. But, in my opinion, the charge of fraud falls altogether to the ground. It is hardly worth while to mention the other minor charges made at the hearing against the deft., as, for instance, that he had misappropriated the money furnished by the pta. for the supplies of the vessel, or that, contrary to the agreement of June 8, he took the vessel out of the hands of the pta.' agent at Middlesborough. Of these I find no proof whatever. Then as to the charge that the deft., even if he had a right to dismisst Capt. Seaton from the command, had none to appoint Capt. Tate unless the pta. had first approved of the reference, and that, in so doing, he committed a breach of the agreement of June 8; even if this charge was proved, it would by no means follow that such a breach of the agreement would accelerate the time when the pta.' mortgage money was payable, or would justify the pta. in arresting the vessel. The sum of the case then seems to be this: the pta. arrested this vessel—to use their own words—partly because they "thought they had a right to the possession in the first instance under the transfer of the mortgage of Feb. 1, the payment of which was due on May 8, and also because they thought the deft. wanted to get the ship away in an unsatisfactory condition, and the pta. would not allow it, having given their word to the underwriters that the ship should be repaired." It turns out that in both these respects the pta. were mistaken in their opinion; neither had they right to possession under the transfer of the mortgage of Feb. 1, nor was there ground for supposing that the deft. did mean to send the ship away in an unseaworthy condition. In a word, the pta. arrested the vessel without cause. Under these circumstances, I have to consider what should be the decree of the court. I have paid full regard to the conduct of the deft., and I have also given due weight to the case of the Evangelismos (Swab. 378), in which the Judicial Committee declined to award damages to a deft. who had innocently suffered much from the arrest of his vessel by the plt. under a mistake. Their Lordships declined because the pta. had acted bona fide with probable cause and without crassa negligentia, having had reason to suspect that the deft.'s vessel was one which had run his own vessel down, and got away in the night. The present case is different: the pta. had full knowledge of the facts, and must be held to the legal effect of their own engagements. If they had regarded the terms of those engagements, they would have known they had no right to arrest the vessel. Add to this the arrest of the vessel by the pta. was made on the eve of commencing a profitable voyage, and after a decision of the magistrate adverse to their claim; and the pta. have attempted to support the proceeding by making charges of fraud against the deft. which they have quite failed to prove. I think this is a case for damages; I therefore order the release of this vessel, and condemn the pta. in costs and damages, the amount of the damages to be estimated in the usual way by the registrar and merchants.

Salvage—25 & 26 Vict. c. 63, s. 49—Objection to the jurisdiction.

*In a salvage suit where the defts. object to the jurisdiction under the 25 & 26 Vict. c. 63, the onus of proof that the value of the property saved is under 1000*l.* lies on them, and the statute, when prescribing the value which determines the jurisdiction, must be held to refer to the value of the property saved when first brought into a place of safety, and not at any subsequent period.*

This was a motion on the part of the defts. in a salvage suit for its dismissal, on the ground of a want of jurisdiction in the court. The facts will be found sufficiently detailed in the following arguments and judgment.

Dr. Deane, Q. C.—This is a question of the jurisdiction of the court over a salvage suit, where the value of the property is considerably under 1000*l.* (see Merchant Shipping Amendment Act 1863, 25 & 26 Vict. c. 63, s. 49). The case, however, of the other side is, that though the value is now less than 1000*l.*, yet that at the time the ship was saved, the ship, freight, and cargo were worth more. It is possible that two or three wooden ships the property was worth more than afterwards. The salvors, however, might, under the 50th section of the Merchant Shipping Amendment Act 1862, have ascertained the value at once, and before any deterioration, as alleged, by the improper beaching of the vessel had taken place. But though the vessel was in the salvors' hands, no such valuation took place. This, therefore, is such laches on their part that they cannot come here now to show the then value of the property. Again, the evidence of their affidavits is most unsatisfactory as to that point. On these grounds, therefore, I ask the court to dismiss the owners of the Stella from the suit, the court having no jurisdiction. I also ask for costs for the practice in such cases is now well understood.

Chickman contra.—This is a cause of salvage, over which this court has always had jurisdiction. On the other side, therefore, the defendants, bear the burden of showing that the court has none. This has not been done. Again, with reference to the valuation under sect. 50 of the Amendment Act 1862, that might have been set on foot by either of the parties; and it is easy to see why it was not—viz., because neither plaintiffs nor defendants had any doubt at the time of the institution of the cause that the property was worth more than 1000*l*. The vessel was only on the sand for half an hour, and her cargo consisted chiefly of deals, and was therefore imperishable, its value at the port of shipment was 500*l*., and the freight was over 200*l*., and the ship had been hailed for 1500*l*. The values in the petition were 1700*l*. Again, there is a total failure of evidence on the part of the other side to show the value to be under the requisite amount. The court, therefore, cannot say that it is satisfied it has no jurisdiction.

Dr. Deane replied.

The Court took time to consider.

April 16.—Dr. Lushington.—This is a motion by the defendants in a salvage cause for dismissal of suit on the ground that the value of the property saved is under 1000*l*., and therefore that under the 49th section of the Merchant Shipping Act Amendment Act the court has no jurisdiction. The sole question, therefore, is as to the value of the property saved. The Stella is a Norwegian vessel of 276 tons burthen, and was bound for the port of London laden with a cargo of timber. On the 21st Nov. she struck on the Sunk Sand and was assisted by the plaintiffs in the cause into Harwich harbour. On the same day, under the directions of Mr. Groom, the Norwegian vice-consul at Harwich, she was berthed on the beach. Possession was taken of the ship and cargo by Mr. Groom's firm, who acted as the ship's agents. Neither party availed themselves of the power given by the 50th section of the Merchant Shipping Act Amendment Act to have the property valued by the receiver of the wreck. On the 26th Nov. the defendants' proctor wrote to the attorney of the plaintiffs informing them that they had given bail for ship, cargo, and freight. In point of fact, the suit at that time had not been instituted. It was not instituted until two days afterwards, the 28th Nov. On the next day, the 29th Nov., an appearance—an absolute appearance—was entered on behalf of the defendants, the owners of the ship's cargo. The vessel still lying on the beach, the cargo was discharged into barges and brought round into London, and there sold on the 23rd Feb. The defendants insist that the value of the property saved is under 1000*l*., and would prove it in the following manner: The gross freight was 296*l*. 13*s*., but this was reduced to 134*l*. 9*s*. 8*d*. in consequence of the expenses of discharging the cargo and conveying it to London. The cargo when sold in London on the 23rd Feb. produced in the gross 508*l*. 6*s*. 2*d*., but the net proceeds amounted only to 277*l*. 15*s*. 4*d*., and lastly Mr. Vaux, a shipbuilder of Harwich, valued the vessel on the 24th Feb. at 150*l*. This would make the total of ship, freight, and cargo under 320*l*. On the other hand, the plaintiffs contend that the vessel, cargo, and freight upon the arrival of the vessel at Harwich were worth more than 1000*l*., and if now they are worth less this depreciation is due to the subsequent mismanagement and delay of the defendants. The plaintiffs call attention to the fact that the vessel was insured in the sum of 1200*l*., and they would make use of the preliminary offer of bail by the defendants as an admission by them that the case fell within the jurisdiction of the court, and therefore that the value of the property saved amounted to 1000*l*. Their principal witness was Mr. Wates, a shipowner of Harwich, who was the contractor for conveying the cargo to London. He deposes: "That there was great and unnecessary delay in getting the cargo out of the vessel. That the vessel was most improperly berthed, and I verily believe, sustained considerable damage while lying at Harwich. That at the time the vessel was brought into Harwich harbour, I have no hesitation in saying that with her cargo and stores she was worth at least 1000*l*., and that I would most readily have given that sum for her. That had the vessel been laid where she would have floated at spring tides she might have been taken alongside the quay, or near thereto, at Harwich and discharged the cargo, or have been towed to London for 50*l*. or less. That had the said cargo being discharged when first brought in and sold at Harwich it would have realised a considerable sum over and above 500*l*. 6*s*. 2*d*." This evidence is corroborated by John Vaux, the shipbuilder (who had surveyed the vessel on the beach at Harwich, on the 24th Feb., and estimated her to be worth 150*l*.), to the extent that the vessel must have received considerable damage by lying so long on the beach, and that a great saving might have been effected if she had been laid alongside the shipyard and repaired. It is also corroborated by Joseph Mealhen, who was employed with his vessel in conveying the cargo to London, and by Thomas Adams, a smack-owner, who deposes that he surveyed the vessel when she came into Harwich in November, and again in February, and found on the second occasion that she had suffered much injury in the interval. He also says that when she was first brought into Harwich she was worth at least 600*l*. The clerk to the plaintiffs' attorney also deposes that he was in November informed by the ship's agents in Harwich that the value of the cargo when shipped at Drammen was 500*l*. It may be difficult to balance this conflicting evidence; but, on the whole, I am of opinion, first, that the burden of proof is upon the defendants, who undertake to show that the court has not jurisdiction in this case; and, secondly, that, upon a review of their evidence, the defendants have failed to establish that the value of the property saved did not exceed the sum of 1000*l*. It is obvious that the statute, in appointing the value of the property saved to be the condition determining the court's jurisdiction, means the value of the property when first brought into safety by the salvors, and not at any subsequent period. In the present case that date was the 21st Nov., and, looking to that date and to what then took place, I think that both the parties treated the value of the property as clearly over 1000*l*. I should, therefore, be wrong in considering that the value was then less than that sum, especially as explanation was offered of subsequent depreciation. The motion must be dismissed with costs.

THE EDWARD OLIVER.

[ADM.]

THE EDWARD OLIVER.

Bottomry bond—Master's claim—Priority—Marshalling of assets.

A bottomry bond, in which the master binds himself, is entitled to priority of payment before the master's claim for wages and disbursements; but this rule is not to be pushed beyond the exigency of the case, and will not be acted on to the master's prejudice where the bondholder is secure.

Where a master gave bonds on ship, freight, and cargo, binding himself, and the bonds would exhaust ship and freight, thus defeating the master's claim:

Held, that the master's claim should have priority over those of the bondholders, in effect, marshalling the assets between them.

Against this vessel four causes had been instituted; one by the master, for wages and disbursements; two by bottomry bondholders, the bonds in each case being upon ship, freight, and cargo, and stating the master to be personally liable; and the fourth for towage. The owners of the ship had not appeared, the owners of the cargo had appeared, and given bail for the payment of the bottomry bonds. Freight had been paid into court, and the vessel had been sold. The court, reserving all questions of priorities, had pronounced in favour of the master's claim, and with respect to the bonds, had pronounced for their validity, and had condemned the proceeds of the vessel and freight in the amount, and in costs, and had condemned the owner of the cargo and their bail in the balance, if any, due, on the bonds, after the proceeds of ship and freight had been exhausted, and in costs, the amount of the claims was made up as follows:—

The master's claim.....	1,281	9	4
One bottomry bond	1,162	6	2
The other bottomry bond.....	3,486	18	6

There remained besides, the towage claim, exclusive of costs in each cause. To meet these charges there were the following funds:—

Vessel, gross proceeds	2,810	0	0
Freight paid into court.....	350	0	0
	2,660	0	0
Deduct Marshal's fees	207	13	4

Balance in registry £2,452 6 8

It thus appeared that the amount of proceeds of ship and freight was insufficient not only to pay both the master's claim and the bonds, but even the bonds alone. The bondholders, however, were secure, because they had the bail of the owners of cargo to fall back upon, but the master's lien for wages and disbursements extended only to ship and freight.

A motion was now made for the payment of the master's claim out of the proceeds in the registry in priority to the bottomry bonds.

Lushington in support of the motion.—The real question is, whether the owners of cargo can come here and insist that the bonds must be first of all paid out of ship and freight. The bondholders have no interest in insisting on the clause in the bond, that the master is not to seek relief. The master has a right in rem for his wages. The Merchant Shipping Act of 1854 gives him the same lien as a seaman. This court has since not only given him that, but also a right of priority with the seamen. No doubt, it is laid down in the Jonathan Goodhue, 8 W. 324, that the bondholder has priority in a case where the master binds himself; but that was a case in which there were not funds to satisfy both. In the Silatia, Lush. 545, the master had not personally bound himself, but had covenanted that the barque, cargo, and freight should be at all times liable after the voyage to the payment of the money. In that case the prior claim of the master before the bondholder was confirmed, and the tendency of that decision goes far to limit the Jonathan Goodhue. The claim for disbursements is on the same footing. In the Mary Anne, L. Rep., 1 Adm. 8, a claim for disbursements was given priority over a mortgage. In the case of the Union, Lush. 128, there was a bottomry bond, and a claim for seaman's wages. The owners of the cargo intervened to resist the mariner's claim, but the court eventually pronounced for its priority over that of the bondholder. In the case of the Priscilla, Lush. 1, which may be quoted to prove that the last bondholder is entitled to absolute priority, that point as appears by the reporter's note (p. 5) was not there decided; consequently, if the bondholder is secure, he is not necessarily to be first paid. It is not equitable for the owners of cargo to oust the master's claim, they have ratified his act, its purpose was for their benefit; the ship itself has perished, or rather been given away for the benefit of the owners of the cargo. Some of the expenses incurred at Mauritius are such as properly fall on the owners of the cargo. They ask to be put in the position of the bondholders, and to be enabled to exercise a privilege of the bondholders against the master, there is no privity between them. The owners of cargo are not the assignees of the holders of the bond; they try to insist on a legal right which belongs to the bondholders alone; no one has a right to insist on this but the bondholders themselves: (The Annapolis, Lush. 355.) I ask that the master's claim be paid in priority to those of the bondholders; but in reality it is a question which does not affect their interest at all.

Bruce for the owners of cargo.—The practical effect of this motion is to make cargo liable for wages. The rule on this point is clear. Where the master chooses to render himself liable on a bottomry bond, he does an act which makes it inequitable that he should seek payment of his own claim as long as that debt remains undischarged; assets will not be marshalled where the doing so can interfere with any rule laid down by this court, which is entitled to preferential regard. The question of hardship cannot be entertained by the court; if that argument were available the decisions in the Priscilla and Jonathan Goodhue could not be sustained.

Clarkson for the bondholders.—This is an attempt to marshal assets. The court will not marshal assets so as to prejudice the rights of third parties (Aldrich v. Cooper, 2 W. & T. L. Cas. Eq. 71.) If in this case the court marshal the assets it will throw the payment of the master's wages on parties not at all liable. The cargo cannot be resorted to till ship and freight is exhausted. It is a condition precedent to the master's acting as agent for the owner of the cargo, that it be only in case of necessity he should so act, and there is an implied contract that he will allow nothing prejudicial to the cargo till ship and freight has been exhausted.

Lushington in reply noticed the case of Benson v. Duncan, 3 Ex. 644.

June 20.—Dr. LUSHINGTON.—The motion to the court is to pronounce the master entitled to priority of payment out of the proceeds of ship and freight now in the registry. If this motion is refused the ship and freight will be exhausted in payment of the bonds (and, indeed, will have to be supplemented by the cargo), and the master, who has no claim against the cargo will lose his remedy in rem altogether. If, on the other hand, it is granted, the result will be that the master will first be paid out of ship and freight, then the remainder of the proceeds of ship and freight will be exhausted in part payment of the bonds, and the balance will be paid by the owners of cargo. This balance, as compared with the balance in the other alternative, will of course be greater by the exact sum paid out of the proceeds of ship and freight to the master. In either case the bonds would be paid in full. The contention is solely between the master and owners of cargo. The owners of the cargo contend that the rule of the court—established in the case of the Jonathan Goodhue, Sw. 520—that the holder of a bottomry bond, upon which the master has made himself personally liable, is paid out of the proceeds of ship and freight, before the master, is an absolute rule. In support of this contention reference was made to the case of the Priscilla, Lush. 1. In that case there were two bonds, one upon ship and freight only, and the other of posterior date on ship, freight, and cargo; and the rule that a posterior bond takes precedence over an earlier bond was enforced, although the enforcement of the rule was not necessary for the protection of the posterior bond, and resulted in the earlier bond being left unpaid. For the effect of precedence being given to the posterior bond, coupled with the rule that ship and freight must be exhausted before cargo is resorted to, in payment of bottomry bonds, was, that the whole of the proceeds of ship and freight were exhausted in payment of the posterior bond, and nothing was left to satisfy the earlier bond. Whereas if the earlier bond had been paid out of proceeds of ship and freight, the remainder, supplemented by the cargo, would have been enough to discharge the second bond in full. The point, however, as to whether the rule gave an absolute priority does not seem to have been raised in argument. Mr. Clarkson further directed the attention of the court to a well-known rule of equity that no marshalling is permitted to the prejudice of third parties. In the present instance it was alleged that marshalling of assets between the master, who has ship and freight as his only securities, and the bondholders, who have ship, freight, and cargo, would work to the injury of the owners of cargo, who would thus become charged with a larger sum than they would otherwise be liable to; and further, that this additional charge would be improperly saddled upon the cargo, because, though nominally due under a bond affecting cargo, it would really represent a burden to which cargo is not liable, viz., wages and disbursements of master. On the other hand, it is argued for the master that the master's lien on ship and freight for wages and disbursements in general, takes precedence of a bottomry bond, and though this lien is liable to be postponed to a bottomry bond, for which the master has made himself personally liable, there is no absolute rule to this effect; that it is a rule only made for the protection of the bondholder, and consequently does not obtain where the bottomry bondholder does not need such protection; that in this instance the bottomry bonds will certainly be paid in full out of cargo if not out of ship and freight; that the holders therefore have no interest in claiming to be paid out of ship and freight before the master, and that the owners of cargo have no equity to insist upon the holders of the bonds pressing their claim. This is the first time the point has been raised. The general principle is clear. If a master by the terms of the bottomry bond has bound himself as well as ship and freight for the payment of the bond, it would be manifestly wrong that in defeasance of his own contract he should not only not pay the bond himself, but obtain out of the proceeds of the ship and freight payment of his own claims against the owners, leaving the bottomry bondholders unpaid. Hence the rule by which the master's claim is liable under these circumstances to be postponed. But this rule frequently operates with great severity against the master, depriving him of his real remedy for recovering his wages and disbursements, and certainly ought not to be carried beyond the exigency of the case, that is, ought not to be extended to circumstances where the bottomry bondholder would not be prejudiced by the master being paid before him. I see no reason why the owners of the cargo should be benefited at the expense of the master. For the master, though he may have bound himself for the payment of the bond to the holders thereof, has made no such contract with the owners of cargo, and they are not entitled to invoke a rule made only for the protection of the bondholder. The Court will therefore pronounce the proceeds of the ship and freight to be first applied in payment of the master's claim for wages and disbursements.

THE LIVERPOOL MARINE CREDIT COMPANY (LIMITED) v. HUNTER.

Law of foreign state—Demurrer to bill to restrain proceedings—Law of Louisiana as to transfer of ships and other chattels.

A British ship was transferred by the registered owner in England to the plts. by mortgage duly registered. The ship sailed to New Orleans, in Louisiana. By the law of that state transfers of chattels without delivery of possession are not recognised. The defts. (who were British subjects with a branch firm at New Orleans, and were aware of the mortgage) commenced actions against the owner for moneys due, and obtained a writ of attachment under which the ship was seized. The mortgagees intervened, and gave bonds to the defts., who thereupon released the ship.

To a bill praying that the defts. might be restrained from taking proceedings on the bonds, a demurrer was allowed.

Simpson v. Fogo, 1 J. & H. 18; 8 L. T. Rep. N. S. 6, distinguished.

This was a demurrer.

The statements in the bill were as follows:—

In and previously to Nov. 1865, the defts. Messrs. Fernie carried on business as merchants at Liverpool under the style of "Ferne Brothers and Co." and the defts. F. Boulton, T. English, T. Brandon, and W. Hunter carried on business as merchants at Liverpool under the style of "Boulton, English, and Brandon," and all the said defts., together with the deft. C. Askew, also carried on business as merchants in New Orleans, in the state of Louisiana, in America, under the style of "Hunter, Askew, and Co." The firm of Hunter, Askew, and Co. acted as the agents at New Orleans of the firms of Fernie, Brothers, and Co., and Boulton, English, and Brandon, both of which firms acted as the Liverpool agents of Hunter, Askew, and Co. All the defts. were British subjects, and, except W. Hunter and C. Askew (who resided temporarily at New Orleans), were resident at Liverpool. In the spring of 1866 W. Hunter came to Liverpool, where he was residing when the suit commenced.

V. C. W.]

THE LIVERPOOL MARINE CREDIT COMPANY (LIMITED) v. HUNTER.

[V. C. W.]

Henry Lafone, a merchant of Liverpool, was the duly registered owner of the British screw steamship the Pacific.

By an indenture dated the 23rd Dec. 1865, and made between Lafone of the one part, and the plts. of the other, the Pacific was mortgaged by Lafone to the plts. for 1800*l.* and interest at 10 per cent. per annum. The mortgage was duly registered at Liverpool on the same day.

In Oct. 1866 Lafone employed the firm of Boulton, English, and Brandon, of Liverpool, as his brokers with respect to the steamship Pacific, and she was consigned by them, with the concurrence of Lafone, to the defts.' firm of Hunter, Askew, and Co., at New Orleans, upon the assurance and undertaking of the firm of Boulton, English, and Brandon, and the personal assurance and undertaking of the deft. W. Hunter, on behalf of the said firm of Hunter, Askew, and Co., that the said firm would not attempt to take any proceedings against the said ship abroad, but would remit the freight to her mortgagees as an independent transaction; and in pursuance of such assurance and undertaking the deft. W. Hunter wrote to Hunter, Askew, and Co., at New Orleans, and instructed them, if the Pacific came consigned to them, to leave the balance of her account on its own merits, and to account for the freight independently of all other transactions.

At that time Boulton, Brandon, and Co. were in monetary difficulties, and therefore the consignment was changed, whereupon the undertaking was withdrawn, and upon the arrival of the Pacific at New Orleans, Hunter, Askew, and Co. commenced actions at New Orleans for debts alleged to be due to them from Lafone on other accounts, and obtained writs of attachment under which the ship was seized.

Paragraph 18 of the bill was as follows:

By the law of Louisiana transfers of property in chattels, without delivery of possession, are not recognised, and the title of the plts. as first mortgagees of the said steamship would have been wholly disregarded by the courts at New Orleans, if the plts. had attempted to assert the same in the said courts, and the said ship would have been sold by order of the said courts as the property of the said Henry Lafone the deft. in the said actions, and the proceeds of such sale would have been applied in or towards payment of the debts for the recovery of which the said actions were brought, without any regard whatever to the rights of the plts. as mortgagees of the said ship. Under the circumstances aforesaid, the only means by which the plts. could prevent the sale in manner aforesaid of the said ship and recover possession of her, was by giving bonds to the plts. in the said actions as security for the payment of the amounts which might be recovered therein, and the costs thereof, and the plts. accordingly intervened in the said actions and by their agents Messrs. Graham and Co., of New Orleans, gave to the defts. two bonds both dated the day of 1866, for the sum of and as security for the payment by the plts. in this suit to them the defts. in this suit of the amounts to be recovered in the said actions against the said Henry Lafone and the costs thereof, and upon the execution and delivery of the said bonds the said steamship, the Pacific, was released on the 6th Dec. 1866 by the sheriff of New Orleans, and sailed three days afterwards for Liverpool, where she subsequently arrived.

The bill prayed that the defts. might be restrained from taking or continuing any proceedings at law or in equity at New Orleans or elsewhere against the plts. or their agents, Messrs. Graham and Co., for the purpose of enforcing the said bonds, or the payment of any money under them, or under any judgment recovered or to be recovered by the defts. in any action or suit founded on the bonds; that the bonds might be delivered up to be cancelled; and that if the defts. should proceed at New Orleans or elsewhere upon the bonds, and oblige the plts. to pay any money under the said bonds, then that the defts. might be declared personally liable to the plts. for the amounts of such money, together with interest; and for other consequential relief.

To this bill the defts. Boulton, English, and Brandon demurred.

G. M. Giffard, Q.C. and Robinson, for the demurrer, contended that there was no case for relief disclosed by the bill. Simpson v. Fogo (8 L. T. Rep. N. S. 61, 1 John. & H. 18) was altogether a different case from the present.

Wright v. Simpson, 6 Ves. 714.

The VICE-CHANCELLOR.—I do not think this case comes within Simpson v. Fogo (ubi sup.) The conclusion at which I arrived in that case was simply this, that although it is part of the law of nations to recognise the tribunals of all countries as administering justice between their subjects pursuant to natural equity and natural justice, and to give credit in that respect to their course of procedure, yet that there are exceptions to that rule. If, for example, in examining a judgment of a foreign court (which you are at liberty to do as to anything that appears on the face of it) you find that a course of proceeding has been adopted which is at variance with the principles of natural justice, then the court will not give weight to that decision and authority, and will not recognise the foreign court as having acted pursuant to these just principles, in pursuance of which it would of course be willing to believe it had acted in the absence of any demonstration to the contrary. In some foreign courts they proceed to judgment in the absence of the party against whom the proceedings may be brought by some course of procedure which, in particular cases—for example, in Buchanan v. Rucher, 1 Camp. 63—has appeared to the courts of this country to be unjust. In the case mentioned notice was given in an imperfect manner, and the judgment was against the party, as it were, by default, although, as it appeared to the courts of this country, he had not sufficient notice of the proceedings. In such a case this court would not enforce or recognise a judgment so obtained. It was on this principle that, in the case of Simpson v. Fogo, where a judgment had been given by a court of Louisiana, which dealt with a ship as being the property and assets of the debtor, against whom proceedings had been taken, and utterly disregarded a mortgage which was a perfectly good and valid charge at the time the court was taking it into consideration, though it had not been perfected in a manner which these courts chose to recognise, and by some proceedings peculiar to themselves and not sanctioned or recognised by the general law of nations, it appeared to me that if they chose so utterly to disregard the rights of the mortgagees, then, if the ship came here, this court was at liberty to say the law of this country prevailed as to that ship, and to disregard the decision of the court of Louisiana. In one case I remember to have seen at common law, since my decision in Simpson v. Fogo, I think I was misunderstood in one respect, because, in that subsequent case it was supposed that I had acted in Simpson v. Fogo on a sort of lex talionis, namely, that if they would not recognise our law we would not recognise theirs. It was nothing of the sort, but it was simply this: finding that the other court would not recognise the title of the mortgagee to the ship, which was property in this country, and with which

V.C. W.]

THE LIVERPOOL MARINE CREDIT COMPANY (LIMITED) v. HUNTER

[V.C. W.]

I had to deal, I said I could not hold that right to be displaced by a judgment which says, "We will not recognise the existence of this title, because it is not a title which exists according to our notions of what law ought to be." In that case I was particularly desirous of drawing the distinction between the municipal and statute law of the country. Every country has a right to make its own statutory laws, which would be binding on whoever may come to live in it, however harsh such laws may be. The state of Louisiana has not made any statutory law which declares that a person coming into the state with a ship is to be considered the owner of the ship. But the judges have said, "We think that such and such is the way in which a title ought to be manifested, and accordingly we held that such a title cannot be manifested in any other way. It is, therefore, a decision of the judicature contrary to the principles established by the courts of every other country in the world, as has been well remarked by one of their most able jurists, Mr. Justice Story. That being so, I should certainly, if the ship were here, disregard any title those courts might have recognised with regard to the ship, while totally ignoring the title of the mortgagees. But I am asked to go a step farther, and to say that, this being the state of the law of Louisiana, if British subjects trade there, and a debtor of theirs comes there with a ship which he has mortgaged to another, but which the courts of Louisiana choose to treat as his own chattel, it is contrary to equity and justice that a British subject should sue that man at all, and should take the ship in execution, knowing that if he so took it in execution the rights of the mortgagee would be disregarded. If I were to lay down that doctrine the consequences would be these. I ought then to restrain the British merchant living in this country from proceeding by his agent abroad to take proceedings against the ship according to the law of Louisiana. I should in effect be saying to every British subject to whom a debt is owing from another British subject, "You shall not have the same remedies against your debtor that everybody living in Louisiana has." Any American may proceed to sell the ship, disregarding the British law, but a British subject is not to have the right. He is to stand by and see the whole of his debtor's property taken and disposed of by the Louisiana creditors of his debtor, and he must stand by and not touch it, because this court would hold it inequitable that he should concur in any proceedings which should enable him to be paid pari passu with the creditors. I suppose it would go to this length, that if a dividend was declared, every dividend coming to the British subject must be stopped, and he must be held not entitled to it. Surely that would be pushing the doctrine to an extreme length, which I hope nothing that I decided in Simpson v. Fogo can be supposed to authorise. But if you could not restrain him from exercising his ordinary remedies against the debtor, the whole case falls to the ground. Because, if I could not have restrained them from suing, it is not inequitable to sue, and then it is not inequitable that they should take the bond. But this case is lower than the case of restraining the debtors suing, because the bond is given. What would be the consequence of my saying, on this further step being taken, that this species of equity exists? Why, the courts of Louisiana would take good care that no ship should ever be released on a bond given by any English subject. They would say: "The bond is worth nothing, because the moment you give the bond, the Court of Ch. in England will set it aside. For the ship of any other state in the world you may give a bond and deliver the ship; but we will take care not to let any Englishman give a bond to recover the ship." The case stands thus with reference to the point which I put about the injunction. The plt. is in this dilemma, either I could interfere to restrain, not the action against Lafone, but the taking out execution against the ship without giving credit to the mortgagee—either I could restrain that execution or I could not. I do not think I could. But suppose I could, then I apprehend the plts. should have come here before giving the bond, and not by giving the bond have voluntarily placed themselves in a worse situation. Tulleyrand's case, 3 Ves. 447, was a different one. What the court there decided was, that the creditor had no right to put in force remedies in this country which were not remedies that he could have enforced on the original contract. On the facts disclosed upon the bill there is simply this equity, and no other: "You can by law attach as the property of the debtor a ship which he is in possession of, disregarding a mortgage which you know to exist upon it, and you have exercised that right which every other creditor could exercise, foreigners as well as others. We have found ourselves obliged to give bonds to prevent your exercising that right, and now we come and ask this court to restrain you from enforcing this law of Louisiana against the ship, and upon the bond which we have given to obviate your inequitably enforcing that law." I put my decision on three grounds. In the first place, I think I should not have restrained the person from taking out execution, because I could not put him in the same position as all the other creditors were, and I should be giving an advantage to all the American creditors, which I have no reason to think is the course I ought to take. In the second place, if I could have restrained him from taking out execution, then the plts. should have come here before giving the bonds. And in the third place, if I was to set aside these bonds it would result in this, that with reference to all bonds of this description I should be placing subjects of this country in a position in which it would be impossible for them to release their ships. For these reasons I hold I have no jurisdiction to interfere upon the case alleged in the present bill. [His Honour then noticed the special ground on which the case had been put by Mr. Kay, namely the former agreement that the debts would not take proceedings in Louisiana against the ship, and after remarking that the mortgagees were no party to this arrangement, and that at the most it could only be considered as notice of the mortgage, he continued:] The case is reduced to the simple question whether it is so inequitable that creditors who are British merchants, and now domiciled here, should avail themselves of the remedies given them in common with the American subjects and everyone else in Louisiana, that I should restrain them from proceeding with their action. I think clearly not. I must therefore allow the demurrer.

June 27, 28, and July 2, 1867.

BERNSTEIN v. STRANG AND OTHERS.

Vendor and purchaser—Stoppage in transitu—Shipment of goods—Time when shipper loses dominion over such goods.

A contract was entered into by timber merchants in London for the purchase of a cargo of Swedish timber, the property of the plt. in Sweden. The contract was in the usual form. The vendor was to provide the ship on board which the timber was to be conveyed to the port of London; but this was subsequently varied, and the purchasers chartered a ship for that purpose. The timber was to be paid for by a bill of exchange at six months. The bill of lading was in the usual form. The vendor endorsed this bill of lading in blank, and it was handed over by the vendor's agent to the purchasers in exchange for the stipulated bill of exchange. Before the arrival of the timber in London, the purchasers had stopped payment, and the vendor gave notice to the captain, who was obliged to put into Copenhagen, not to deliver the timber to the purchasers in London:

Held, that the vendor still possessed his right of stoppage in transitu, the goods not having been completely delivered, and that the ship, although chartered by the purchasers, was only an instrument of conveyance, and the captain a common carrier.

This was a bill filed originally against Messrs. Churchill and Sim, timber brokers, of London, and also against the other defts., the consignees in London, of a shipment of timber under the following circumstances:—

The plt. Mr. Bernstein was a timber merchant at Gefle in Sweden, and a Mr. Von Kock was his agent in Paris. Previously to Feb. 1863 and thenceforward until they stopped payment, Messrs. Langton and Robinson were timber merchants in London. On the 12th Feb. 1863 Messrs. Langtons contracted with Von Kock, as plt.'s agent, for a cargo of timber. The contract was as follows:

Bought of Mr. Von Kock, 7, Rue de St. Lazare, Paris, as agent for Mr. F. B. Bernstein, of Gefle, about 4000 Peterborough standard mixed deals 3 x 9 Prices per 100:
 20 to 25 do. do. 4 x 9 standard at 12s.
 25 to 30 do. do. 4 x 11 do. at 14s.
 30 to 35 do. do. 2 1/2 x 9 at 10s.
 35 to 40 do. third quality 3 x 9
 40 to 45 do. do. 4 x 9 at 12s.
 45 to 50 do. do. 4 x 11
 50 to 55 do. do. 2 1/2 x 9 at 10s.

1800 to 1415 Peters standard red deals average length 12 feet, and the said pieces franco on board payable by buyers' acceptance of sellers' drafts at six months from date of bills of lading, shipment in London.

The goods are warranted of equal quality to the Karas Company's stock.

The mixed to be marked K I H or F M B.

The thirds K I H or F B.

Sellers to provide ships to a freight not exceeding 20s. in full per Peterborough standard, with two or three guineas of gratification per 100 Peterb. stand. in case of loss. If ships cannot be chartered within the limit the contract to be void. London, the 12th Feb. 1863. LANGTON and ROBINSON.

It was subsequently agreed that instead of Bernstein providing a ship for the conveyance of the timber, Messrs. Langton and Robinson should themselves charter a vessel to convey the timber from Gefle to London.

They accordingly chartered a ship called the Maastrom, which proceeded to Gefle for the timber.

In Oct. 1863 the plt. shipped the timber, the price according to the terms of the contract, being 1590l. 12s. 6d. He also advanced to the captain of said ship 153l. 8s. 2d. for the freight, which sums, with interest for three months, made a total of 1744l. 19s.

On the 22nd Oct. plt. drew a bill of exchange for this amount on Messrs. Langton and Robinson, payable at six months after date.

At the same time (as it was alleged) in order to preserve his control over the timber, the plt. caused a bill of lading thereof to be drawn in his name as the shipper, making it deliverable to his order or assignment.

The bill of lading was as follows:

Shipped in good order and well conditioned by F. M. Bernstein, in and upon the good ship called Maastrom, whereof is master for this present voyage Aising, and now riding at anchor in this port, and bound for London, 1179 1/2 dozen of deals, being marked and numbered as in the margin, and are to be delivered in the like good order and well conditioned at the aforesaid port of London (the act of God, the King's enemies, fire, and all and every other dangers and accidents of the sea, rivers, and navigation of whatever nature and kind soever excepted) unto order or assigns, he or they paying freight for said goods, and other conditions as per charter-party, primage and average accustomed. In witness whereof the master or purser of the said ship hath affirmed to three bills of lading, all of this tenor and date, the one of which three bills being accomplished the others to stand void.

Given in Gefle, 22nd Oct. 1863. The cargo delivered without delay, two deals in dispute, clear of all damage.

The plt. F. M. Bernstein, endorsed the above bill of lading in blank, and ordered it to be handed over, to Messrs. Langton and Robinson, in exchange for their acceptance of the bill of exchange for 1744l. 19s.

Langton and Robinson deposited the bill of lading and a policy of insurance with Churchill and Sim, the brokers, for advances made by them to a large amount. After the commencement of the suit, Messrs. Churchill and Sim were paid a proportionate sum in respect of their advance on the cargo of timber, and the bill was subsequently dismissed as against them.

The Maastrom sailed from Gefle with the timber in Oct. 1863, bound for London. She, however, put into Copenhagen in distress, and whilst there, the plt. having heard of the insolvency of Langton and Robinson, caused a notice, dated the 26th March 1864, to be served on the captain, stopping the cargo in transitu, on account of the insolvency of Langton and Robinson, and requiring the timber to be delivered to the plt. on his order.

On the arrival of the ship in the Thames, on the 26th April 1864, notices to the same effect were served on the captain, the brokers, and the superintendent of the Surrey Canal Company, where the timber was to be discharged.

By an indenture dated the 19th Sept. 1864, Messrs. Langton and Co. assigned to trustees all their assets for the benefit of their creditors.

The net proceeds of the timber (1570l.) had been paid into court.

The trustees of Langton and Co., the purchasers, claimed these proceeds, and had commenced an action at law against the brokers for the amount.

On the 25th April 1864, the bill of exchange for 1744l. 19s. was returned dishonoured.

The plt.'s bill, as amended, prayed that the then plt. (as representing the original plt. Bernstein) were entitled in equity to a valid and subsisting charge on the proceeds of the timber with interest and costs, and for an injunction to restrain the action at law.

The cause now came on for a hearing, and the question was whether Bernstein had a right to stop the cargo in transitu.

Gifford, Q. C. and E. F. Kay, Q. C. for the plt., contended that the dominion over the cargo of timber remained with Bernstein, and that inasmuch as the purchasers had stopped payment and the Druce, Q. C., and Freeling for the defts., contended that the question of property vesting did not depend on whether the ship was a general ship or not. There was a distinction between the cases where the ship was sent expressly by the buyer to receive the goods, and where there was a shipment by the vendor without any communication with the purchaser. That a ship chartered by the purchaser was equivalent to its being his own ship, but in either case the delivery was qualified by the terms of the bill of lading, which in both formed the contract between the parties. In the present case the ship was by agreement sent by the buyer to receive the goods, and the shipment was on account and at the risk of the buyer. The sale was one on credit for six months by a bill of exchange at that date. This was drawn and accepted by the buyer, and the moment it was delivered to the plaintiff or his agent, the bill of lading belonged to the buyer. The bill of exchange was accepted by the vendor as a payment. What had been stipulated by the buyer was completed by him, and from that time the property vested in him, and the right of stoppage had ceased. In support of their view of the case, they relied also on

The VICE-CHANCELLOR, before stating the facts of the case, referred to a case of Spalding v. Ruding, argued before Lord Langdale when M. R., and on appeal before Lord Lyndhurst when L. C., and affirmed, in which he, the V. C., was counsel, and he cited it from his manuscript notes. That case was, he believed, the first case in which the strict right of stopping in transitu was mitigated in favour of a mortgagee. The V. C. then entered fully into the facts of the present case, and commented upon the various authorities which had been cited in argument. As regarded the original contract there did not appear to him to have been any intention on the part of the plt. to abandon his right of stoppage in transitu until the goods were actually paid for. Nor did it so appear by anything in the terms of the bill of lading. Although that bill of lading was endorsed by the vendor in blank, and handed over to the purchaser in exchange for the accepted bill of exchange, that did not complete the delivery of the goods, or take out of the vendor his right of stoppage in transitu. There was no substantial difference between this and the cases of Botlingk v. Inglis, and Spalding v. Ruding. First, was there a transitus? and if so, was it terminated by a complete delivery of the goods? Had the goods been delivered on board the purchaser's own ship the transitus would have been at an end, the same as it would have been if the goods had been delivered to the purchaser's carter had the conveyance been a cart. But there an intermediate person (the captain of the ship) intervened, and the delivery to him was only as to a common carrier, the ship only the instrument of conveyance; and as if the captain had been the vendor's agent. Delivery of the goods to him was not a complete delivery to the purchaser. He should therefore adopt the case of Spalding v. Ruding, and declare that the vendor had a right to a stoppage in transitu. Minutes to be prepared and signed by counsel.

PROUDFOOT v. MONTEFIORE.

Marine Insurance—Concealment of material fact by agent of insurer—Means of communication by agent to principal.

Where an agent whose duty it is to communicate information to his principal as to the state of a ship, or cargo omits to discharge such duty, and the owner, in the absence of information as to any facts material to be communicated to the underwriter, effects an insurance, such insurance will be void. The insurer is entitled to assume as the basis of the contract between him and the assured that the latter will communicate to him every material fact of which the assured had, or in the ordinary course of business ought to have, knowledge, and that the latter will take the necessary measures, by the employment of a competent and honest agent, to obtain all due information.

Fitzherbert v. Mather, 1 T. R. 12, and Gladstone v. King, 1 Mau. & S. 35, approved.

Where, in addition to the ordinary postal service, the means exist of communicating such information by telegraph, it is the duty of the agent to employ the latter mode of communication.

This was a case stated for the opinion of the court in an action upon a policy of marine insurance, which had been twice tried, on the first occasion before Crompton, J., and on the second before Mellor, J.

The facts and arguments sufficiently appear in the judgment.

PROUDFOOT v. MONTEFIORE.

[Q. B.]

The judgment of the Court was now (June 15) delivered by COCKBURN, C. J.—This was an action against the deft. as chairman of the Alliance Marine Insurance Company, for the recovery of damages from the company in respect of the company not having delivered to the plt. a policy of insurance on certain goods shipped on board a vessel called the Ann Duncan, pursuant to an agreement alleged by the plt. to have been entered into between him and the company, and in respect of the company not having paid the sum of money which the plt. alleges would have become due on such policy if the same had been so delivered. The agreement was for insurance on a cargo of madder lost or not lost, shipped at Smyrna on a voyage from Smyrna to Liverpool, on board the ship Ann Duncan, for and on account of the plt., and consigned to him by one T. B. Rees, of Smyrna. The plt. dealing largely in madders in the Smyrna market. Rees, who resides at Smyrna, was employed by him at a salary of 800*l.* a year to make purchases of madder on his account, and to ship and consign the cargoes to him. The cargo in question was purchased by Rees in the course of his employment as such agent. The ship, with the cargo on board, sailed from Smyrna on the 21st Jan. 1861, but again brought up in the Gulf of Smyrna on the same day. She set sail again on the 23rd, but was stranded in the course of that day, and became a wreck. Intelligence of the stranding of the ship was communicated to Rees on the morning of the 24th. On the 26th, which was the first post day, he communicated by letter to the plt. the loss of the vessel, and the fact that though the cargo had been got out, yet as the vessel had had twelve feet of water in the hold, the greater part of the cargo would be seriously damaged. Having communicated this information, the letter proceeds thus: "I hope to goodness you are fully insured. On the 12th inst. I forwarded you invoice and weights of the shipment by her, which gave you plenty of time to effect insurance. Lloyd's agents have telegraphed the disaster, which will reach London before my letter of the 19th inst., inclosing bill of lading. I did not dare telegraph to you, for when once you had the intelligence in hand you were prevented from insuring." On the 31st Jan. the plt., after receipt of the letters from Rees of the 12th and 19th Jan., but prior to the receipt of that of the 26th, gave instructions to effect the policy, and the slip was signed on that day. There was therefore no fraud or undue concealment by the plt. of a material fact within his personal knowledge. On the other hand, it is clear that the loss of the vessel and damage to the cargo might have been communicated to him by Rees, by means of the telegraph, but was purposely kept back by the agent for the fraudulent purpose of enabling the plt. to insure. We think it clear, looking to the position of Rees as agent to purchase and ship this cargo for the plt., that it was his duty to communicate to his principal the disaster which had happened to the cargo; and, looking to the now general use of the electric telegraph in matters of mercantile interest between agents and their employers, we think it was the duty of the agent to communicate with his employer by this speedier means of communication. From the letter of the agent it appears that but from the fraudulent motive for his silence he would in the ordinary course of his duty have conveyed the intelligence of the loss to his employer, and would have availed himself of the telegraph for that purpose. Upon these facts, the question arises whether the plt., the assured, is so far affected by the knowledge of his agent of the loss of the vessel and damage to the cargo as that the fraud thus committed on the underwriter through the intentional concealment of the agent, though innocently committed so far as the plt. was concerned, will afford a defence to the underwriter on a claim to enforce the policy. Two cases decided in this court, one in the time of Lord Mansfield, the other in that of Lord Ellenborough, establish the affirmative of this proposition. In the case of Fitzherbert v. Mather, 1 T. R. 12, where an agent of the assured was employed to ship a cargo of oats, and to communicate the shipment to another agent who was employed to effect an insurance, an omission on the part of the former who had written to announce the sailing of the ship, on the ship having afterwards got on shore, to communicate that fact, which he might have done by the same post, was held fatal to the insurance. Ashurst, J. observes: "On general principles of policy, the act of the agent ought to bind the principal, because it must be taken for granted that the principal knows whatever the agent knows, and there is no hardship on the plt., for if the fact had been known the policy could not have been effected." Bullar, J. says: "Though the plt. be innocent, yet if he build his information on that of his agent, and his agent be guilty of a misrepresentation, the principal must suffer. It is the common question every day at Guildhall, when one of two innocent persons must suffer by the fraud or negligence of a third, which of the two gave credit. Here it appears that the plt. trusted Thomas, and he must therefore take the consequences." In the case of Gludstone v. King, 1 M. & S. 35, which was an action on a policy on a ship "lost or not lost," the master had omitted to communicate, when writing to his owners, the fact of the ship having been driven on a rock, a fact as to which on arriving at the port of discharge he made a protest detailing the accident, and stating that the ship's bottom must have been chafed, and the owners in ignorance of the accident had effected an insurance. On these facts it was held that the captain was bound to communicate the fact, and that, for the want of such communication, antecedent damage was an implied exception from the insurance, and the plts. could not, therefore, recover the loss arising from the repairs rendered necessary from the accident. "If," says Lord Ellenborough, "the captain might be permitted to wink at these circumstances without hazard to the owners, the latter would in all such cases instruct their captain to remain silent, by which means the underwriter at the time of subscribing the policy would insure a certainty of being liable for an antecedent loss. To prevent such a consequence, and considering that what is known to the agent is impliedly known to the principal, and that the captain knew and might have actually communicated to the plts. the cause of damage, so as to have apprised them of it before the time of effecting the policy, I think that no mischief will ensue from holding in this case that the antecedent damage was an implied exception out of the policy. If the principle be new, it is consistent with justice and convenience, and there being no fraud imputed to the captain in the concealment will not alter the case. An eminent authority, the late Mr. Justice Story, has, however, declined to be bound by these decisions. In a case tried before him on a policy of insurance effected after a total loss, where the master had omitted to give intelligence of the loss to his owner, with the fraudulent design of enabling him to make an insurance, and the insurance had been effected by the owner in ignorance of loss, that learned judge held that as the owner at the time of procuring the insurance had no knowledge of the loss, but acted with an entire good faith, he was not precluded from recovering, and that the policy was not rendered void by the omission of the master to communicate intelligence of the loss, although such omission was willful and fraudulent. On the case being taken to a court of error, the latter upheld the decision, not, indeed, on the grounds taken by Story, J., but on the very unsatisfactory, and as we think untenable ground, that by the total loss of the vessel the master had wholly ceased to be the agent of the owner, and had become the agent of the underwriters. From the language of the judgment it may be inferred that if the court had considered that the relation of the master to his owners had not been interrupted by the loss of the vessel, they would not have upheld the decision appealed from. The ruling of Story, J. has been discussed by Mr. Doer in his admirable work on insurance, and we think the reasoning of the learned writer fully establishes his conclusion as to the ruling having been erroneous. Notwithstanding the dissent of so eminent a jurist as Story, J., we are of opinion that the cases of Fitzherbert v. Mather, and Gladstone v. King, were well decided; and that if an agent, whose duty it is in the ordinary course of business to communicate information to his principal as to the state of a ship and cargo, omits to discharge such duty, and the owner, in the absence of information as to any facts material to be communicated to the underwriter, effects an insurance, such an insurance will be void on the ground of concealment or misrepresentation. The insurer is entitled to assume as the basis of the contract between him and the assured, that the latter will communicate to him every material fact of which the assured had, or in the ordinary course of business ought to have had, knowledge, and that the latter will take the necessary measures, by the employment of a competent and honest agent, to obtain, through the ordinary channels of intelligence in use in the mercantile world, all due information as to the subject matter of insurance. This condition is not complied with where, by the fraud or negligence of the agent, the party proposing the insurance is kept in ignorance of a material fact which ought to have been made known to the underwriter, and through such ignorance, fails to disclose it. It has been said, indeed, that a party desiring to insure is entitled, on paying a corresponding premium, to insure on the terms of receiving compensation in the event of the subject matter of the insurance being lost at the time of the insurance, and that he ought not to be deprived of the advantage which he has paid to secure by the misconduct of his agent. But to this there are two answers—first, that, as we have already pointed out, the implied condition on which the underwriter undertakes to insure, not only that every material fact which is, but also that every fact which ought to be in the knowledge of the assured, shall be made known to him, is not fulfilled. Secondly, as was said by the Court in Fitzherbert v. Mather, where a loss must fall on one of two innocent parties through the fraud or negligence of a third, that ought to be borne by the party by whom the person guilty of the fraud or negligence has been trusted or employed. By thus holding we shall prevent the tendency to fraudulent concealment on the part of masters of vessels and agents at a distance in matters on which they ought to communicate information to their principals; as also any tendency on the part of insurers to encourage their servants or agents so to act. For these reasons our judgment must be for the defendant.

COURT OF EXCHEQUER.

Reported by H. LEACH and E. LUTLEY, Esqrs. Barristers-at-Law

Wednesday, June 5, 1867.

REDWAY v. SWEETING.

Marine policy—Mutual Marine Insurance Association—Liability of individual member.

The plt. insured a ship and goods with an association for mutual marine insurance. By the policy of insurance with which the rules of the association were incorporated, but which in other respects was like an ordinary policy on ship and goods, it was expressed that the insurers did thereby promise and bind themselves each for his own part, their heirs, executors, and assigns, to the assured, his executors, administrators, and assigns, for the true performance of the terms of the policy. The 1st, 5th, and 6th rules, provided respectively, that the members of the association should severally and respectively, not jointly nor in partnership, nor the one for the other of them, but each only in his own name, insure each other's ships or shares of ships for certain specified terms; that in order more readily to provide for the payment of claims as they might become due, the managers of the association should be entitled to levy contributions of one-fourth part of the fixed annual premiums, which should be drawn for at two months' date from the 1st March, June, Sept. and Dec. in every year, such premiums to form a fund for that purpose, provided that if the gross amount of losses and expenses during the year should happen to exceed the amount of premiums so realized, the deficiency should be made good by an additional percentage, which the members during the year should be respectively bound to contribute and pay to the managers, and that the managers' draft on the members of the association for their proportion of the annual fixed premiums and for any additional percentage should be duly accepted and punctually paid.

The members of the association, of whom the deft. was one, subscribed the policy by their agents the managers. The plt.'s ship was lost, and he sued the deft. upon the policy for a proportionate part of the sum insured.

The deft. pleaded that the gross amount of the losses and expenses during the year exceeded the amount of all the premiums realized as mentioned in the fifth rule by the whole amount of the sum insured by the plt., in which the plt. before said had notice, and that therefore the managers called upon the deft. as a member of the association to contribute and pay to them such additional percentage as in the said rule mentioned, making good the deficiency, and that the deft. did in pursuance thereof contribute and pay the said additional percentage in accordance with the said rules.

It held, that the contract entered into by the deft. and the other members was not a contract that each should pay to the plt. his proportionate part of the sum insured, but that each should accept and pay the bills drawn by the managers in accordance with the fifth and sixth rules, and therefore that it appeared upon the pleadings that there had been no breach of contract on the part of the deft.

The declaration stated,

That the plt. on the 20th day of April 1863, caused to be made a certain policy of insurance purporting thereby and containing therein that the plt. as well in his own name as in the name and names of all and every other persons or persons to whom the same did, might, or should appertain in part or in all, did make assurance, and cause himself and them and every of them to be insured, lost or not lost, at and from the meridian of the day of sailing from Newport, in the county of Monmouth, to and with the meridian of the 20th day of Feb. 1864, upon any kind of goods and merchandise and also upon the body, tackle, apparel, ordnance, munition, artillery, boat, and other furniture of and in the good ship or vessel called the traveller, beginning the adventure upon the said goods and merchandise from the landing thereof on board the said ship, upon the said ship, &c., and on which certain and encure during their abode there upon the said ship, &c., and further until the said ship, with all her ordnance, tackle, apparel, &c., and goods and merchandise whatsoever, should be arrived as above upon the said ship, &c., until she had moored at anchor twenty-four hours in good safety, and upon the said goods and merchandise until the same be there discharged and safely landed; and it was by the said policy declared that the said ship, &c., goods and merchandise, &c. (for so much as concerned the assured), by agreement between the assured and the assurers in the said policy, were and should be valued at 1800*l.*; and that touching the adventures and perils which the said assurers were contented to bear and take upon them in the said voyage, they were of the seas, men-of-war, fire . . . and all other perils, losses, and misfortunes that had or should come to the detriment and damage of the said goods, merchandise, and ship, or any part thereof. . . . And so the assurers were contented, and did thereby promise and bind themselves, each for his own part, their heirs, executors, and goods, to the assured, his executors, administrators, and assigns, for the true performance of the premises. . . . And it was by the said policy also mutually agreed that certain rules, conditions, and regulations annexed thereto should form part of the said policy, and the said rules, conditions, and regulations were, so far as material to be set forth, as follows:

The Temperance and General Marine Insurance Association.
Rules, Conditions, and Regulations.

1. That the members of this association shall severally and respectively, not jointly nor in partnership, nor the one for the other of them, but each only in his own name, insure each other's ships or shares of ships from noon on the 20th Feb. 1865, or from the date of entry of each vessel respectively, until noon of the 20th Feb. then next, and from that time until noon of the 20th Feb. in the next succeeding year, and so on from year to year, unless notice to the contrary be given as hereinafter mentioned, against all losses, perils, and damages of whatsoever nature and kind soever which may be sustained or received by their respective ships, or caused or done by them to other ships or craft, except when on the voyages, in the trades, or under the circumstances hereinafter particularly mentioned.

5. That in order more readily to provide for the payment of claims as they may become due, the managers shall be entitled and are hereby empowered to levy contributions of one fourth part of the fixed annual premiums, which shall be drawn for at two months date from the 1st March, June, September, and December in each year, such premiums of insurance to form a fund for that purpose. Members entering their ships after the 20th Feb. shall only be charged premiums from the date of entry. Provided always, that if the gross amount of losses and expenses during the year shall happen to exceed the amount of premium so realised, the deficiency shall be made good by an additional percentage, which the members during the year shall respectively be bound to contribute and pay to the managers, but should the premium so realised exceed the losses and expenses incurred, that the surplus shall be returned in proportion to the amount of premiums respectively contributed by them.

6. That the managers' drafts on the members of the association for the proportion of the annual fixed premium, and for any additional percentage, shall be duly accepted and punctually paid when due, and if any member shall neglect or refuse to accept any such drafts, or to pay his contributions thereto, on receiving notice from the managers, his respective ship or ships shall immediately cease to be insured in or by this association, and he shall thenceforth forfeit all claim for or in respect of any loss or average under his policy or policies effected therein, but he shall remain liable to contribute to all losses and averages which may occur during the period for which any such policy was originally granted, and the amount due from any defaulting member shall be considered a debt due to the managers, and be recoverable by them at law.

And the several members of the said association had notice of the premises, and therefore in consideration of a premium at the rate aforesaid (one of the rules, which it is not necessary to set out at length, provided for the rate of premiums according to the class of ships insured), for such insurance then paid by the plt., the said members severally and respectively by H. and J. Gray, their agents, subscribed the said policy, and became and were insurers to the plt. of the sum of 500*l.* upon the premises in the said policy mentioned, every member of the association bearing his equal proportion according to the sums mutually insured therein; and the deft. before and at the time of the making of the said policy was and from thence continually has been and still is one of the members of the said club or association, and the said ship or vessel was, from the day of the date of the said policy, admitted into and entered in the said association; and the said A. and J. Gray subscribed the said policy as agents for the deft. among others, and the equal proportion of the said sum of 500*l.* so insured as aforesaid to be borne by the deft., according to the sums mutually insured in the said club or association, was a sum of 50*l.*; and the plt. was at the time of the commencement of the said risk and of the making of the said policy, and thence continually and until and at the time of the loss next hereinafter mentioned has been interested in the subject-matter of the said insurance to the value and amount of all the moneys ever insured therein, and the said insurance was made for the benefit and use, and on the account of the plt., and after the commencement of the said risk insured against and during the continuance thereof, and whilst the said policy was in force the said ship was by divers of the perils insured against in the said policy totally lost, of all which the deft. had before action brought due notice.

Averment of the performance of all conditions precedent to the right of the plt. to be paid by the deft. the sum of 50*l.*, being his equal proportion as aforesaid. Breach, nonpayment of the same.

First plea:

That the gross amount of the losses and expenses during the year in the declaration mentioned did exceed the amount of all premiums realised as mentioned in the rule No. 5, by the whole amount of the sum insured by the plt. in and by the policy therein mentioned, of which the plt. before suit had notice, and thereupon the managers called upon the deft., as and being such member as in rule 5 mentioned, to contribute and pay to them such additional percentage as in the said rule mentioned, making good the deficiency, and the deft. has, in pursuance thereof, contributed and paid the said additional percentage to the said manager, in accordance with the said rules.

Second plea repeated the averments of the first, except the averment that the deft. had contributed the said additional percentage, and instead thereof stated that

This action was commenced before the said drafts of the said managers mentioned in rule 6 had become due or payable in accordance with the said rule.

Demurrer to the declaration.

Cross-demurrers to the pleas.

Plt.'s points:—1. That deft. having by his authorised agent underwritten the policy on the plt.'s ship, is liable to pay to the plt. the amount due upon the policy. 2. That contribution and payment by the deft. to the managers of the percentage in the first plea mentioned is no bar to the plt.'s action. 3. That the plt. was entitled to commence his action before the manager's drafts had become due. 4. That the declaration discloses a good cause of action, the deft. being there shown to have become an insurer to the plt. in the terms of the policy, and that there is nothing in the rules set out to qualify the liability of the deft. to be sued in respect of that cause of action; but, on the contrary, deft.'s liability as an insurer is recognised and confirmed by the said rule: (see especially rule 1.)

Deft.'s points:—1. That it appears by the said rules that the plt. has no claim against the deft. personally, and that the payment of the loss can only be enforced in the manner prescribed in the rules. 2. That the payment by the deft. to the managers of the percentage called for by them, relieves the deft. from any liability to contribute personally or further towards the alleged loss of the plt. 3. That upon the true construction of the rules by which the plt. is bound equally with the deft., the plt.'s only remedy is against the managers, or that the action is brought too soon, because there is no liability to pay any part of the loss at a shorter date than the managers' drafts would have to run in pursuance of the rules.

Mellish, Q. C. (with him Beresford), for the deft., contended that upon the true construction of the policy and the rules of the association, the plt. had no right of action on the policy against the individual members of the association for the amount of the sums insured.

Brown, Q. C. (with him F. M. White) for the plt.—Each member is responsible to the amount of his own share for the default of the managers in paying the amount of the acceptances received over to the plt. If it be said that the only contract entered into by the deft. is to pay the lawful drafts of the managers, then if the managers become insolvent or embezzle the amount, the plt. must suffer the loss. That cannot surely be intended. The only legal contract to be found in the policy and the rules incorporated, is one between the plt. and the different members of the association. There is none between REDWAY v. SWEETING.

[Ex.]

the managers and the plt. [KELLY, C. B.—Is not the contract to pay the drafts of the managers in accordance with the rules?] The fifth rule is only ancillary to the contract: it merely provides a fund for the more readily paying the claims that may arise in respect of losses, and under it the managers may draw on account of premiums before any loss is sustained. The deft.'s engagement is, that the managers shall pay over the sum collected to the deft., not merely that he will pay the managers. [BRAMWELL, B.—If the deft. is to be liable to pay the managers' drafts, and to pay the plt., he may have to pay the amount of the loss twice over.] The only remedy against the managers would be in a court of equity, and it cannot be intended that the assured should be obliged to resort to that court in order to recover on the policy. The cases of Lees v. Smith, 7 T. R. 388;

Dowell v. Moon, 4 Camp. 167;
Dawson v. Wrench, 3 Ex. 359;
Reid v. Allan, 4 Ex. 326;
Hallett v. Dordall, 18 Q. B. 2, clearly show that the contract in such a case as this is between the assured and the other members to pay the amount assured. [BRAMWELL, B.—It does not appear that in those cases there was such a provision as that contained here by the rules.]

KELLY, C. B.—This case seems to me altogether plain and free from doubt. The plt. became a member of an association for mutual insurance by effecting the policy of insurance set forth in the declaration. The deft. was also a member, and so they have entered into a contract, the terms of which are contained in the policy, and the rules of the association incorporated therewith. To determine, therefore, whether this action is maintainable, we must look to what that contract is. We find set out in the policy certain rules, conditions, and regulations, of which the following is the first:—"The members of this association shall severally and respectively, not jointly or in partnership, nor the one for the other of them, but each only in his own name, insure each other's ships." The next question, therefore, is how, in what form, and to what extent, does the deft., as a party to this contract, insure the ship in question? This appears from the subsequent rules. He insures the ship in this way: he undertakes to accept bills to be drawn by the managers at certain periods on account of annual premiums, to provide for the aggregate amount of loss to be collected, and to pay such bills, and then if it turns out at the end of the year the whole of the premiums collected by acceptances are insufficient to meet the losses, the several members, the deft. among the rest, are to be liable to accept bills for their proportion of the aggregate amount of the losses remaining unmet, and to pay those acceptances. Those acceptances are to be paid to managers, who are to collect the necessary money for defraying those losses by means of them. Now, from the declaration alone it does not appear whether the amount of the loss in this case was collected, but it does appear that the deft. is liable to accept and pay bills drawn in respect of it by the managers, and if he has not done so he is liable for a breach of his contract; if, however, we look to the plea we find that the deft. has actually accepted and paid acceptances satisfying all his liability. There appears, therefore, to have been no breach of contract whatever. It is suggested on the part of the plt. that the contract is to make good the insurance, that is to say, to pay the money due on the policy to the plt., notwithstanding the payment of the bills drawn in respect thereof to the managers if they fail to pay over the money so paid to the party insured, as in the hypothetical cases put of embezzlement or insolvency. If such an event should take place or has taken place, the deft. has nevertheless made good his contract, having paid his acceptances, and the loss will probably be the general loss of all the association, just as if the banker of the association had failed with a large sum of money in his hands. It may be that in such a case the loss must be made good by general contribution, but no question of this sort arises here. This is the simple case of an action on a policy by which the deft. incurred a certain liability, but has satisfied that liability in the manner expressly provided by the rules of the association. He is bound to give his acceptance for the contributions to be levied by the managers on account of the annual premiums, and if it become necessary, to give a further acceptance in case of a deficiency. There is no allegation that he has failed to give or having given to pay either of those acceptances, and it therefore appears to me that no breach of the contract is shown.

MARTIN, B.—I am of the same opinion. It seems to me quite clear that the meaning of the rules incorporated in this contract was that each of the members of this association should not have a right of action in respect of any loss against the other individual members. The fifth rule shows the plainest intention that losses should be met by the formation of a general fund to be placed in the managers' hands, and it would be quite contrary to the spirit as well as to the words of the regulations, and productive of the most absurd multiplicity of actions, that each member should have a right of action against the others.

BRAMWELL, B.—I am also of opinion that upon these pleadings the deft. is entitled to judgment. Assuming that the statement in the declaration amounts to an allegation that the sum due on the policy of insurance was not paid according to the tenor of the policy, and that everything happened entitling the plt. to have the said sum so paid, in answer to this the deft. says, "With whomsoever I may have contracted I have performed my contract. I have accepted the bills drawn under the contract, and have paid them;" and that seems to me a perfectly good answer. Whether the managers could maintain an action against the members for not accepting their drafts, or whether in some event some form of action might be maintained by the plt. against the deft., such as, for example, an action for not contributing his quota to any deficiency arising through the default of the managers, I do not know, and it is unnecessary now to decide, but I think these pleading disclose no cause of action against the deft.

CHANNELL, B.—I agree with my learned brethren, and it is unnecessary for me to add anything to what they have said. I think the deft. is entitled to our judgment upon the demurrer to the declaration, and if I had any doubt of that, I should be clearly of opinion that he is entitled to judgment upon the demurrer to the first plea.

EX.] NIXON v. ALBION MARINE INSURANCE CO.—CASE v. WALLACHIAN PETROLEUM CO. [EX. CH.]

Wednesday, June 12, 1867.

NIXON AND OTHERS v. THE ALBION MARINE INSURANCE COMPANY.

Contract of Insurance—Special Case—Covering note—Want of stamp.

Where a special case had been stated without pleadings for the opinion of the court, raising the question whether the plts. were entitled to recover from the defts. a sum of money claimed upon a contract of insurance; and it appeared from the case that the defts. had given the plts. a "covering note," by which the defts. agreed to hold the plt. covered to the extent of a certain sum upon cotton to arrive by a certain ship, but that no policy had ever been executed, in pursuance of the covering note, and that the said note was not stamped:

Held that, although by the terms of the case it was to be taken as if the defts. had executed a valid policy to the plts., in accordance with the covering note, the court were bound to take notice of the fact that the stamp laws had not been complied with, and refuse to hear the case argued.

This was an action in which a case had been stated by order of Pigott, B., and pursuant to the C. L. P. A. 1852, without pleadings. The question for the opinion of the court was, whether the plts. were entitled to recover, under the circumstances detailed in the case, a certain sum of money upon a contract of insurance, alleged by the plts. to have been entered into by the defts. It appeared from the case that upon the 24th May 1865 the plts. offered part of the risk on certain cotton to arrive by a ship, named the Ellora, from Bombay to the Manchester agent of the defts. company, who, in a letter addressed by him to the plts., gave them the following covering note for 10,000*l.* on cotton, per the said ship:

Dear Sirs.—This company agrees to hold you covered to the extent of 10,000*l.* on cotton, with the usual average, per Ellora, from Bombay to Liverpool, at 50*s.* per cent., and waits your declaration of the amount to enable the company to substitute a stamp policy for the same.—Yours respectfully,

C. J. TOWLER, Agent.

Warranted free from capture, seizure, and detention, and the consequences of any attempt thereof, and the consequences of all hostilities.

It appeared from the case that no policy was ever executed, nor was the covering-note above mentioned ever stamped, but it was stated that for the purposes of the case it was to be taken as if the defts. had executed a valid policy to the plts. in a certain form accompanying the case, and in accordance with the covering-note of the defts. above-mentioned.

Cohen (with him Mellish, Q. C. and Nixon) appeared to argue for the plts.

Honyman, Q. C. (with him Littler) for the defts.—[MARTIN, B.—It appears from the case that no stamped policy was ever executed.] It is precisely the same as if the declaration was upon a policy, and the defts. had not pleaded non assumpsit. The parties might in any case agree not to raise the stamp objection by not denying the existence of the policy, but the revenue is sufficiently protected, because it is always in either party's power, in case of dispute, by pleading in denial of the making of the policy, to take advantage of the instrument's not being stamped, and then it will not be admissible in evidence. The court will not travel out of the case in order to take this objection. [MARTIN, B.—This is not a mere technical objection. It does not depend upon the form of the pleadings. If we can see that the provisions of the statutes relating to the stamping of policies and contracts of insurance have been violated, we are bound by our oaths as judges to protect the revenue by refusing to let that be made available which the Legislature has expressly said shall not be available.]

The COURT being of opinion that they ought not to hear the argument in this case, it was ordered to be struck out (a)

CARR AND ANOTHER v. THE WALLACHIAN PETROLEUM COMPANY (LIMITED).

Charter-party—Substituted contract—Freight—Guarantee.

The plts. chartered a ship to the defts. to proceed to L. and take in a cargo for London. On the arrival of the ship at L., the defts. were unable to provide a cargo, and the plts. agreed to cancel the charter on the defts. guaranteeing them "900*l.* gross freight home," the vessel to be placed on the most profitable trade procurable, and to carry 300 tons, a proportionate reduction of the guarantee to be made for any lesser quantity of cargo. The vessel shipped 300 tons, the freight for which would have been 556*l.* 14*s.*, and was totally lost on her voyage to London. In an action to recover the difference between 556*l.* 14*s.* and the 900*l.* guaranteed:

Held (affirming the judgment of the Court of C. P.) that the liability of the defts. arose at the port of loading, and was not affected by the subsequent loss of the vessel.

This was an appeal from a judgment of the Court of C. P., discharging a rule to reduce the damages by the sum of 343*l.* 6*s.*

The report of the case in the court below will be found in the 14 L. T. Rep. N. S. 554, where the facts are fully set out.

The action was brought to recover the sum of 686*l.* 12*s.* under the following circumstances:—The plts. chartered two vessels to the defts. to proceed to Ibraila and load a cargo of petroleum oil for London. On the arrival of the vessels at Ibraila, the defts. were unable to supply a cargo, and after some negotiations an agreement was come to of which the following minute was entered in the books of the company:

It was proposed by the directors that the company should guarantee the above-named vessels a sum of 900*l.* each gross freight home on the following understanding: that Messrs. Carr and Co. place the vessels named at once on the most profitable charter or trade procurable; the vessels will carry 300 tons each of whatever cargo they may take on board, or, should they not take 300 tons each, that a proportionate reduction of the guarantee should be made for any less quantity of cargo they may take; that the charter-parties dated

(a) The 35 Geo. 3, c. 83, s. 14, provides that no insurance in respect of which duty is made payable by the Act, nor any contract or agreement for any such insurance, shall be given in evidence in any court or be available in law or equity, unless the paper, &c., on which it is printed, &c., shall be duly stamped, and it absolutely prohibits the stamping, under any pretence whatsoever, of any such paper, &c., at any time after any such insurance as aforesaid, or contract for such insurance, shall be engrossed, printed, or written thereon. See also the 54 Geo. 3, c. 144. The enactment above-mentioned amounts to an absolute prohibition under any circumstances, except certain special circumstances since provided for by the 24 & 25 Vict. c. 106, to fix a stamp on a policy after it has been underwritten. This state of the law is not affected by the C. L. P. A. 1852. See Arnold on Marine Insurance, 3rd ed., vol. 1, p. 244.

the 9th and 10th Aug. last respectively for the vessels named be cancelled.

The plts., on receipt of a copy of this minute, cancelled the charter-parties, and the vessels loaded 300 tons of barley each, and proceeded on their voyage to London, in the course of which one of them was totally lost. Had both vessels arrived in London they would each have earned 556*l.* 14*s.* freight for the barley, and a verdict having been entered for the plt. for 686*l.* 12*s.*, the difference between the 556*l.* 14*s.* and the 900*l.* guaranteed to each, a rule was obtained to reduce the damages by 343*l.* 6*s.*, on the ground that the defts. were not liable to pay that sum in respect of the vessel that was lost.

The Court below discharged this rule on the ground that the defts.' liability arose at the port of lading, and was not affected by the subsequent loss of the ship. Against this the defts. now appealed.

E. James, Q. C. (W. Williams with him) for the defts.—The agreement is substituted for the charter-party, and the effect of it is that if there is any deficiency in the freight on arrival in London, the defts. will make it good. There can be no loss till the vessel arrives, as the owners would be entitled to insure their freight. The guarantee may be taken as a charter-party by which it is agreed to pay 900*l.* freight. The agreement is that the plts. should take a cargo from some one else, and the defts. would give a lump sum for freight. [MARTIN, B.—This contract means either what the Court of C. P. said it meant, or that the vessel should earn 900*l.* at the journey's end.] That is, if she arrives. [MARTIN, B.—No, it does not say that.] It is substituted for the original charter-party, and you must look at the charter-party to construe it. The case of Yeames v. Lindsay, 3 L. T. Rep. N. S. 865, was cited in the court below, but it is not in point, as there the contract was that if the plt. did not get his freight the deft. would meet his drafts, and the only question was whether the plt. was entitled to recover when his own agent had loaded the cargo. Here there is a likelihood of loss by the original charter, and all the defts. do is to provide against that loss.

Field, Q. C., for the plts., was not called upon.

MARTIN, B.—I am of opinion that the judgment of the court below is right. It seems to me that the true meaning of this agreement is, that at the port of lading there should be loaded a cargo which should produce 900*l.* freight, and if that is not the construction I think that it would be a guarantee that the ship should earn 900*l.*

BRAMWELL, B.—I am of the same opinion, and I will only add one word. They say, "or should they not take 300 tons each, that a proportionate reduction of the guarantee should be made for any less quantity of cargo they may take." That shows that the calculation was to be made at the time of taking the cargo on board.

MEYERSTEIN v. BARBER.

Bill of lading—Effect of delivery of after goods landed on sufferance wharf.

The consignor of goods in India deposited the bill of lading with the C. bank to secure advances. After the goods had been entered at the custom-house in London in the name of A. and Co., the consignee, and landed on a sufferance wharf with a stop upon them for freight, A. and Co. paid the bank and got the bill of lading. A. and Co. then obtained advances from the plt., who was not aware that the goods were landed and indorsed, and delivered to him two parts of the bill of lading. A. and Co. subsequently obtained advances from the deft. on the third part of the bill of lading, and the deft. obtained possession of the goods and sold them.

In an action by the plt. against the deft. in trover for the goods, and for money had and received, to recover the proceeds of the sale:

Held (affirming the judgment of the Court of C. P.), that the delivery of the bill of lading passed the property to the plt., and that he was entitled to recover.

This was an appeal from a judgment of the Court of C. P., discharging a rule to enter the verdict for the defts.

The facts, which are fully set out in the report of the case in the court below, 15 L. T. Rep. N. S. 355, were shortly as follows:

De Souza, Commiade and Co., of Madras, consigned to Azemar and Co., of London, 277 bales of cotton, and deposited the bill of lading, drawn in three parts, with the Chartered Mercantile Bank of India, to secure advances. The cotton, on arrival in London, was entered at the Custom-house in the name of Abraham and Co., who had taken the business of Azemar and Co., and was landed on a sufferance wharf, and a stop was put upon it by the master of the ship for his freight. After the landing of the goods Abraham and Co. gave a cheque for the advances made by the Chartered Mercantile Bank, and obtained the bill of lading from their London agents. On the same day that Abraham and Co. got the bill of lading they obtained from the plt. an advance of 2500*l.*, and deposited with him two parts of the bill of lading, and two days afterwards the deft., who knew nothing of the deposit of the two parts of the bill of lading with the plt., advanced 1500*l.* on the third part of the bill of lading, and on the following day, Abraham and Co. having in the mean time paid the freight and got the stop taken off, he advanced 300*l.* more. The deft. then lodged his part of the bill of lading at the wharf, and received warrants for the cotton, which he sold. The plt., who then for the first time learnt that the cotton had arrived in England, commenced this action in trover for the cotton, and for money had and received, to recover the proceeds of the sale.

A verdict having been entered for the plt. for 2019*l.* and interest, a rule was obtained calling on the plt. to show cause why the verdict should not be entered for the deft., or reduced, on the ground that as against the deft. the plt. was not entitled to the goods or their proceeds; that there was no valid prior indorsement of any bill of lading to the plt.; that the bills of lading ceased to have effect as negotiable bills of lading on the landing and warehousing of the goods in Abraham's name; that the property in the goods never was in the plt.; that neither the plt. nor any other person had any right to or lien on the goods as against the deft.; that it never was agreed between Abraham and the plt. that the property in the goods, or any lien on the goods, should pass to the plt.; that the property in the goods passed to the deft. on the transfer of the goods into his name by the wharfinger, the depository; that the deft. was a pledgee with possession and power of sale, and that the plt.'s rights, if any, were mere equities invalid against the deft., or were for breach of contract against Abraham.

The Court of C. P. discharged this rule on the ground that at the time the bill of lading was indorsed to the plt., there had been no complete delivery of the goods to any person claiming under it, and that a delivery of the bill of lading was therefore equivalent to an actual delivery of the goods. Against this judgment the deft now appealed.

Brown, Q. C. (Brett, Q. C. with him) for the deft.—When the goods were landed at the Sufferance-wharf, and entered in the name of Abraham and Co., the consignees, that was equivalent to delivery to the consignees. The object of the 11 Vict. c. 18, which regulates these sufferance wharves, was to make provision for the custody of the goods when the importer was not ready to receive them, and it is only when he refuses to receive them that they are, while in the hands of the wharfinger, to be considered in the custody of the master of the ship. Here they were entered by the importer. [BLACKBURN J.—You assume that Abraham was the importer; were not the goods always held subject to the bill of lading as if they had been at sea? MARTIN, B.—It is clear that the Legislature intended that, until the lien for freight was removed, the bill of lading should represent the goods, and after that the warrant. People cannot carry such goods about in their pockets, and the Legislature has provided that certain documents shall represent them—first the bill of lading, and then the warrant] In Galliffe v. Bourne, 4 Bing. N. C. 314, the question of what constituted a complete delivery by the master of a ship was considered, and on delivery of the goods the bill of lading is at an end. [LUSH, J.—It could not be a delivery to Abraham under the bill of lading when the goods were put on the wharf, as at that time the Chartered Mercantile Bank held the bill of lading.] As soon as Abraham got the bill of lading the master's duty was done, and the bill of lading was at an end. When the goods are in the warehouse of the consignee the bill of lading cannot pass the property:

Blackburn on the Contract of Sale, 297-298;

Lickbarrow v. Mason, 1 Sm. L. Cas. 699;

Story on Bailments, s. 297.

If Abraham had paid the freight, and the wharfinger had refused to deliver up the goods, Abraham could not have sued the master of the ship, and that can only be on the ground that the wharfinger was the wharfinger of Abraham. There having been, therefore, a delivery to Abraham, the bill of lading was at an end and could not pass the property to the plt.

E. James, Q. C. and Sir G. Honyman, Q. C., for the plt., were not called upon.

MARTIN, B.—I believe we are all of opinion that the judgment of the court below was right; and to my mind it is perfectly transparent. After stating the facts, his Lordship said, the 11 Vict. c. 18, s. 5, provides that till the lien for freight is disposed of the wharfinger shall not give up the goods. There are two symbols of the goods, the bill of lading and the wharfinger's certificate, and until the certificate is given the bill of lading gives the goods as far as they can be given, and anyone who had the bill of lading indorsed to him would be entitled to hold the goods against any person claiming under Abraham. I think that the judgment of the Court of C. P. was perfectly right.

APPEAL FROM THE EXCHEQUER.

Saturday, June 22, 1867.

BUCKLE v. KNOOP AND ANOTHER.

Charter-party—Construction—Calculation of freight—Measurement of cargo at port of shipment or discharge—Custom.

By the terms of a charter-party the plt's. ship was to load a full and complete cargo of cotton at Bombay, and proceed with and deliver the same at Liverpool "on being paid freight as follows, viz., 75s. per ton of 50 cubic feet delivered." The ship took on board at Bombay a full and complete cargo of bales of cotton which, in accordance with the usual custom, were immediately before shipment subjected to powerful hydraulic pressure, and thereby compressed into the smallest possible space. When unloaded at Liverpool the bales expanded, and the measurement of them after such expansion, exceeded by about 174 tons of 50 cubic feet, the entire capacity of the ship. The plt. claimed under the charter-party to be paid freight calculated upon the measurement of the cotton after delivery at the port of discharge:

Held (affirming the decision of the Court of Ex.), that the plt. was only entitled to freight upon a full and complete cargo as ascertained at the port of shipment, and that the freight must therefore be calculated upon the measurement of the cargo there.

Gibson v. Sturge, 10 Ex. 626, followed.

This was an appeal from the decision of the Court of Ex., reported supra, p. 231. The facts of the case are fully set forth in the report of that decision.

BOVILL, C. J.—We are all of opinion that the judgment of the court below must be affirmed. This charter-party must be construed with reference to the character of the trade to which it relates. Now cotton is by the custom of the trade shipped in bales, compressed as tightly as possible, and it would be doubtful whether the owner of a ship would be bound to take a cargo of cotton on board which had not been so dealt with. The question is, what would be a full and complete cargo of cotton? Clearly not a cargo of loose cotton. What was shipped here was a cargo of bales of cotton compressed in the usual manner, and a full and complete cargo was loaded. It follows, therefore, that freight can only be claimed upon the full and complete cargo so loaded. The plt. in reality claims to be entitled to recover for 174 tons more than the ship would hold. The proper rule of measurement is, I think, that laid down by Alderson, B. in the case of Gibson v. Sturge, 10 Ex. 626, and it is impossible to distinguish that case from the present. Our decision would be in favour of the defts. on the grounds both of principle and convenience, even without looking to the custom of the trade, which seems to have been fully proved.

BLACKBURN, J.—I am of the same opinion. The rule in Gibson v. Sturge, if applied to this case, shows that what constitutes a full and complete cargo must be ascertained at the time of shipment; it is what the ship can reasonably carry. Freight is only payable upon what was carried and delivered, and, according to the regular rule, if any part is not delivered it cannot be claimed for. If the plt. meant to make a contract contrary to the usual one, he should have employed more express terms.

(Before MILLER, J.)

Re AN ARRANGING TRADER. (a)

Ship's Registry Act—Incompleted contract—Interest in ship supplied with necessaries, for which an apparent owner of a part is sought to be made liable.

Where a party is in treaty for the purchase of a part in a ship, which ends in his becoming an apparent owner of a fourth in that ship, but never has any beneficial interest in it, such party will not be held liable for necessaries supplied to that ship before he became part owner. To make a contract complete there must be mutuality, and both parties must distinctly agree upon the terms which are to be the foundation of that contract.

This case came before the court upon charge and discharge. The chargeants were the Messrs. Spriggs, merchants in Liverpool, who supplied the ship Fanny with necessaries. The liability was disputed on the ground that at the time the goods were supplied the dischargeant had no beneficial interest in the vessel.

Kernan, Q. C. appeared in support of the charge.

Heron, C. C. and Daniel were in support of the discharge.

The facts appear in the judgment of Miller, J.

MILLER, J.—My desire in this case would be to go as far as the facts and law could possibly admit in enabling the chargeants to recover the full amount in value of the goods honestly supplied for the benefit of the vessel in question, as against the owners of it whoever they might be. While, if I looked alone to the case of either Stewart, who was an undoubted owner of a part (if not the whole) of the vessel, or the arranging trader, the alleged owner of a part of that vessel as spread upon the record before me, where I find, on the one hand, Stewart resorting to the expedient of antedating the bill of sale in the face of a correspondence which must have made the clumminess of it transparent to any person; and on the other hand, the arranging trader (with equal recklessness in the face of the same correspondence, fully placed before him upon the charge) alleging upon his oath that the bill for 237*l.* 14*s.* 3*d.* was given for the accommodation of Stewart, which he must have known to have been untrue, there is much that is calculated to throw suspicion upon the case presented by either Stewart or the arranging trader.

(a) From the Irish Law Times.

But, notwithstanding, I fortunately have in this case documentary evidence, including a written correspondence (although not, perhaps, the whole of it) which will afford to me some security that I shall not be much misled by the allegations of either as regards the rights of third parties. After the most careful consideration which I can give to it, the whole question in this case appears to me to be concluded, on the record before me, by the right understanding of the contract as evidenced upon the documents. Nothing is more important as regards all mercantile interests than that, before legal liabilities should be attached to contracts, such contracts should be unambiguous and complete. You may spell out a contract from many documents, or from many shreds of many documents; but from whatever evidence the contract may be collected, such contract, when taken as a whole, should comprise within it all the elements which go to form a valid contract, and for that purpose be complete in itself. The foundation of the claim of the chargeants rests mainly upon the fact whether there was such a contract between Stewart and the arranging trader as to vest a beneficial ownership in the vessel, for which the goods were supplied, in the arranging trader; and, if so, whether the arranging trader acquired any such beneficial ownership in that vessel prior to these goods being supplied by the chargeant, for which he claims a right to prove in this matter. The treaty between Stewart and the arranging trader about the vessel commenced upon the 8th Sept. 1863, when Stewart wrote to the arranging trader, stating: "If you wish I will go half with you in her purchase if the vessel can be obtained on reasonable terms." In a further portion of the same letter, after stating that she would be got for 900*l.*, he writes: "I believe that I can get the payment—part cash and part bill—so that about 250*l.* would be the cash each would want for the present." That letter was followed by another from Stewart, dated Sept. 15, in which he states: "I have bought the Fanny today for 950*l.*, the lowest that would be taken;" (and further) "I shall be glad to hear from you as soon as possible, as I shall require to know my arrangements for cash matters. I can manage about 200*l.* for you here, so if you do not care to provide more in money you could take a fourth share, and I can do this for you without asking any cash until the vessel earns it." Thus far there was nothing but a proposal on the part of Stewart that the arranging trader should take either a half share upon specified terms, namely, one half of the purchase-money to be paid in cash, and the other half by the acceptance of the arranging trader, or to take a fourth share, without the advance of any cash in the brig Fanny, which Stewart stated that he had already purchased. The next letter which appears upon the evidence is a letter from the arranging trader to Stewart, dated the 18th Sept. 1863, in which he says: "If you think well of it I will be able to take one half of the brig Fanny, same as the Royal William, and let both their earnings go together." In that letter nothing is said as to the requirements, on the part of Stewart, that in the event of the arranging trader taking one half share in the vessel he (the trader) must pay one half in cash, but contented himself with stating "that if Stewart thought well of it he would take one half share in the vessel." Stewart perceiving that omission of an important portion of his proposal, wrote a further letter on Sept. 29, stating: "I should have replied to your last letter sooner, until seeing what arrangement I should make in paying for the Fanny." In a further portion, "I shall be very happy for you to take one half in her, and as I shall require to pay for her here on Tuesday I will want you to send me 237*l.* in cash, and I inclose you my draft at three months for 287l. 14s. 8d., which please return accepted. This makes a fourth bill and a fourth cash for you, which is as much as I can possibly manage. I have your bill, 200l., to pay here on Monday, and when paid I shall be out of cash on your account between 300l. and 400l., and which the balance of freight and last voyage of Royal William and advance of freight will not square." Thus far Stewart, as sole purchaser of the vessel, would not accede to the arrangement of the arranging trader becoming a purchaser in it, except upon very specific terms as to the payment or provision for the purchase-money for that one half, and assigning reasons for these specific terms.

Q. B.]

HUDSON v. EDE.

MILLER, J. having gone minutely into all the facts of the case, said that there was evidence sufficient in the case to show that there had not been a completed contract, and that the arranging trader had not any beneficial or other interest in the brig Fanny at the date at which the goods were supplied, and consequently that Stewart could not have acted as ship's husband of that vessel by the authority or for the benefit of the arranging trader. I necessarily must disallow the claim of the Messrs. Spriggs, the chargeants; but inasmuch as the arranging trader has not made this case by his discharge, but has further, in order to get out of what he apprehended would have been held to have been his contract, alleged that his acceptance for 287l. 14s. 8d. was for the accommodation of Stewart, which he must have known to have been altogether untrue, upon which he naturally supposed much would depend, I shall not give him any costs in this matter. I have the satisfaction, however, of feeling that I am not doing much injury to the Messrs. Spriggs, as upon the evidence of one member of the firm they had never heard of the arranging trader in the transaction until the failure of Stewart in the month May 1866, and therefore could not have supplied the goods upon the personal security of the trader.

Charge disallowed without costs.

HUDSON v. EDE.

Ship—Charter-party—Laying days—Demurrage—Detention by ice.

By a charter-party it was stipulated that the vessel "should proceed to S., and there load a complete cargo of grain, &c. Thirty running days to be allowed the said merchant, if the ship be not sooner dispatched, for loading and unloading, and ten days on demurrage over and above the said laying days at 6l. per day. Detention by ice and quarantine not to be reckoned as laying days." There are no storehouses at S. for the deposit of grain which is stored at different places higher up the Danube, and brought thence in lighters down the river to ships waiting for cargo at S. The ship was delayed, not by ice at S., but by reason of the river above S. becoming frozen so as to prevent the transport of grain from the higher portion of the river to S.:

Held, that the clause as to "detention by ice," &c., was inserted for the protection of the merchant, and that it was immaterial whether the detention were caused by ice at or above S.

This was a special case stated without pleadings for the opinion of the court.

MARI. CAS.—VOL. II.]

The facts and arguments are embodied in the judgment.

Mellish, Q. C. (Archibald with him) argued for the plt.

Sir G. Honyman, Q. C. (Gibson with him) for the deft.

The following cases were cited:

Keaton v. Pearson, 7 H. & N. 386;

Barrett v. Dutton, 4 Camp. 333;

Pringle v. Mollett, 6 M. & W. 80.

June 29.—BLACKBURN, J.—In this case the deft. chartered the plt.'s vessel, the Tria, by a charter-party, of which the material parts are, that the vessel should proceed "to Sulina, or outside if not sufficient depth of water to load the ship, or so near thereto as she may safely get, and there load from the agents of the merchant a complete cargo of grain or seed, at shipper's option, sufficient grain or seed to ballast the vessel to be supplied, if required, before final discharge of outward cargo; time so occupied not to count as lay days; the cargo to be brought to and taken from alongside the ship at the port of loading and discharge at the charterer's expense and risk; thirty running days to be allowed the said merchants (if the ship be not sooner dispatched for loading and unloading), and ten days on demurrage, over and above the said laying days, at 6l. a-day, 'detention by ice and quarantine not to be reckoned as laying days.' " It is on the construction to be put on these latter words that the question depends; the other stipulations in the charter-party being material only so far as they explain the meaning of this provision. The ship was delayed, during the time as to which the dispute has arisen, not by ice in the port of Sulina rendering impossible the access to her of lighters from which cargo might, in the usual course of the Danube grain trade, have been transferred to her hold, but by the obstruction of the navigation between Sulina and ports higher up the Danube, by reason of the river becoming frozen over. It appears that at the port of Sulina itself there are no storehouses available to the merchants in which cargoes of grain may be kept for loading vessels; the grain is kept at ports higher up the river; and, according to the course of the grain trade of that river, cargoes are brought by steam-lighters down the river and over the bar at its mouth, to ships awaiting their loading at Sulina. Galatz one of those ports, is stated in the case to be situate about 105 miles from Sulina, the passage of the steam lighters between the two ports being a run of eighteen to twenty hours in fine weather, and of two to three days in bad weather. Ibrail, for the storehouse of which the captain of the Tria acting as agent for the deft., fixed on the 27th Nov. a cargo for that vessel, is higher up the river than Galatz. The Tria was at Sulina ready to receive her cargo on the 29th Nov., and the laying days commenced from that date. The cargo which it was intended to put on board, and which in fact was afterwards put on board, was at that time at Galatz. On the 5th Dec. (an unusually early date for the obstruction of the navigation by ice) the Danube became frozen over above Sulina, and so continued until the 8th Feb. of the ensuing year. It was well known to persons in the grain trade at London, Constantinople, and Sulina, before and at the time of effecting the charter-party, but not known to the plt. or his broker, that when there is ice in the Danube between Galatz or the other storing places at Sulina, the navigation becomes difficult for steam lighters, and when the river is frozen, impossible. Between the 29th Nov., when the Tria was ready to receive her cargo, and the 16th Dec., that is, for more than half the time allowed for loading and unloading, several vessels lying in the port of Sulina were loaded with grain, their cargoes having been brought down the river between the 19th Nov. and the 6th Dec. It may be inferred that in the usual course of shipment at Sulina the lighters were away there for some time for the convenience of the ships to be loaded from them. It was expressly agreed that sufficient grain used to ballast her should, if required, be supplied before the final discharge of her outward cargo. No cargo had been provided by the deft. even for this purpose, and the entire discharge of the outward cargo was thereby delayed until the 6th Dec., when other ballast was taken in by the captain. From the 16th to the 20th Dec. the port of Sulina was frozen, and all communication between the ships in it and the shore was cut off. Between the 24th and the 27th, the other vessels which have been referred to as having been loaded between the 29th Nov. and the 6th Dec., were unable to start on their respective voyages. It was not disputed that the days during which the port of Sulina was frozen over, so that all communication with the shore was cut off, were not to be reckoned as laying days; but the question is, whether the days during which the river above Sulina was frozen, though Sulina itself was free, are to be reckoned as lay days, in which case the pit. is entitled to recover; or are to be considered as "detention by ice," in which case the deft. has paid enough money into court, and is entitled to judgment. It was contended on behalf of the pit. that the words "detention by ice" not to be reckoned as lay days" must be construed with reference to the object for which, in the preceding clause, the lay days are stated to be allowed—namely, for loading and unloading; and that no obstruction by ice is within the meaning of those words except an obstruction by ice in contact with, or near or about the ship, and interposing such a barrier against the access of lighters alongside of her as practically to prevent or interrupt the actual work of loading. For the deft. it was contended that, regard being had to the circumstances under which shipments take place at the mouth of the Danube, and particularly to the fact that the storehouses which supply grain to ships lying at Sulina are at a distance of 100 miles from that port, the words "detention by ice" must be taken to include, not only the prevention and interruption by ice of the actual work of loading—that is, of bringing alongside the ship in lighters, and transferring from them to the ship's hold cargo brought down to Sulina in fulfilment of the charter—but the delay of the ship's loading by reason of the detention by ice of lighters during any part of the time allowed for loading and unloading, and at any distance from Sulina. The solution of the question depends upon the inference of fact to be drawn from the statement as to the nature of the port of Sulina which have already been set forth. The merchant, by the charter-party, engages to bring down the cargo at the port of loading, and to receive it at the port of discharge within the laying days, and he is answerable for any detention arising from his failure to do so from whatever causes, unless he protects himself by a stipulation, and the stipulation "detention by ice and quarantine not to be reckoned as laying days" was clearly meant to protect the merchant. But for this stipulation, although the ice or quarantine prevented the merchant from bringing cargo alongside the ship according to his contract, the shipowner would be entitled to recover for the detention of his ship every day beyond the laying days. Moreover, to use the words of Lord Ellenborough, in Beck v. Hudson, 4 M. & S. 267, "the merchant is the adventurer who chalks out the voyage which is to furnish the subject matter out of which the freight is to accrue." He is in most cases, as he certainly was in the present instance, the party best acquainted with the trade for which the ship is taken up, and with the difficulties which may impede the performance by him of his contract. Words, therefore, in a charter-party, relaxing in his favour a clause by which an allowance to him for time of a specific object, in the interest of the ship, precisely limited, must be read as inserted for his requirement, and construed at least with this degree of strictness against him that they should not have put upon them any addition to their obvious meaning. Nevertheless, where that meaning is ambiguous, as it is in the present case, we think that it must be gathered from the surrounding circumstances to which the charter-party was intended to apply. Now, the stipulation that "detention by ice" should not be regarded as laying days must be taken to mean that those days in which ice made it impossible to bring cargo alongside, and to go on with the loading, should be excluded. But inasmuch as from the nature of the case the cargo had to be brought down the river after the arrival of the ship, the loading would be equally interrupted and detention equally caused by reason of the navigation of the river becoming impeded by ice as it would be by the lighters being prevented from coming alongside of the vessel in the port. It was very properly admitted that those days in which the port was frozen so that there could be no communication with the shore were to be excluded, inasmuch as detention by ice would occur so soon as the lighters, by which the grain was to be conveyed to the ship, were prevented from getting access to her. But as we have seen, the cargo is to be brought to the ship, not from the port of Sulina, but from the storehouses at the ports up the river; and the lighters are as much prevented getting to the ship by reason of ice in the one case as in the other. It is true that though these facts were well known to persons in the grain trade at London, Constantinople, and Sulina, before and at the time of the effecting of the charter-party, they were not known to the pit. and his broker; but the ignorance of the pit. and his broker cannot effect the question as to what was the way in which in the port cargo could be brought alongside the vessel, or how detention in the loading of the vessel could arise. Now, I think, on the statement, the only way in which cargo could be brought was down the Danube, and, consequently, that the freezing up of the Danube immediately above Sulina, rendered it impracticable to bring any cargo alongside. If there had been the railway or any other practicable mode by which cargo might have been brought by land to Sulina, or if the lower part of the Danube had been left free, so that cargo might have been brought from some place in the Danube, though the ice blocked up the river below the place where the cargo was laying, we might have come to a different conclusion; but as it is we think the defendant is entitled to judgment. The fact that had the deft. used greater diligence he might have loaded the ship before the navigation was interrupted, does not much, therefore, affect the question. The deft. was entitled to the benefit of the whole of the laying days, and would have had full time to load his cargo but for the interruption to the navigation by ice. He is entitled to the advantage which the stipulation gives him, and the loss arising from the detention must fall on the shipowner who has agreed to these terms.

Hudson & Ros.

Judgment for the deft.

WHITSTABLE FREE FISHERS v. FOREMAN.

[C. P.]

COURT OF COMMON PLEAS.

Reported by W. GRAMER and M. W. McKELLAR, Esqrs.,
Barristers-at-Law.

Jun. 26, 29, and 30, and July 2, 1867.

WHITSTABLE FREE FISHERS v. FOREMAN.

Claim for anchorage dues—Immemorial payment—Ownership of the soil—Buoys, beacons, and lights—Evidence of existence of a port—Consideration to the public.

The pita, the owners in fee of the manor of Whitstable, which includes oyster fisheries and an anchorage ground, claimed a right to demand a toll from all ships anchoring upon their soil. In support of this claim evidence was adduced that the pita, and those under whom they enjoy possession had taken tolls from time immemorial; that the pita now keep buoys, beacons, and lights to mark the bounds between their oyster-beds and the anchorage ground; that these buoys, beacons, and lights had been kept up at various times and at intervals during a long period, but there was no proof of their continued existence from the commencement of the custom to take tolls; that before and since the time of legal memory Whitstable had been mentioned in official and private documents as a port; that in ancient times there was a place within the manor for the unloading of merchandise; and that the right to take tolls had been expressed to be conveyed to the pita with the possession of the ground:

Held, upon a special case in which this evidence was set out, that the maintenance of the buoys, beacons, and lights, and the advantages which the public derive therefrom, taken in connection with the ownership of the soil of the anchorage ground, are a sufficient consideration to support the legality of the pita's claim; that the payment having been made from time immemorial, it ought to be referred to a legal origin if there be anything to support it; that very slight evidence is necessary in order to support a right which has been uninterruptedly enjoyed from time immemorial, the legality of which the court is almost bound to presume; and that, therefore, the circumstances of this case were sufficient to make this claim good, according to the rule laid down by the H. of L. in Gunn v. The Free Fishers of Whitstable, 12 L. T. Rep. N. S. 150.

This was a special case, stated by consent for the opinion of the court. The following analysis will be sufficient to show the effect of the judgment:

Pita are the Company of Free Fishers and Dredgers of Whitstable, in the county of Kent, incorporated by Act of Parliament, 38 Geo. 3, c. 42 (1793); they are the owners in fee of the ground situate within the sea limits of the manor of Whitstable, which is described as the anchorage ground.

Daft. is the owner of a vessel called the Sunble Puma, a collier trading to Whitstable.

The action is to recover 3s., being the anchorage tolls of 1s. each, claimed by the pita as the tolls payable by the deft. for casting anchor within or near this anchorage ground upon three separate occasions, viz., Sept. 14, Oct. 31, and Nov. 27, 1860. The ground on which the vessel anchored on Sept. 14 and Oct. 31 was within the anchorage ground somewhat below ordinary low water mark. Where the vessel anchored on Nov. 27 was between high and low water mark, upon ground which had been conveyed to the South Eastern Railway Company in 1838, and upon which a harbour had been constructed, which is described as the railway company's harbour.

Paragraphs 4 & 5 describe the position and boundaries of the anchorage ground and the railway company's harbour.

The pita, and those under whom they claim, have from time immemorial, continually down to the present time, taken the sum of 1s. from every vessel casting anchor within the limits of the anchorage ground now in their possession, whether the anchorage were voluntary or from necessity. Since 1838 the pita have not demanded anchorage tolls from any vessels sailing into and anchoring within the railway harbour, unless such vessels have previously cast anchor on their anchorage ground.

Pita are owners of oyster beds, which lie to the north and east of the anchorage ground. There are no buoys or beacons to indicate the anchoring ground, except those maintained by the pita. In order to mark the bounds of their oyster beds.

Pita also keep two boats, which are called watch boats, and are moored on the boundary of the oyster bed and the anchorage ground. They are maintained for the protection of the pita's oysters from thieves, and also to warn vessels from attempting to come to the anchorage ground, when from the state of the tides they would be likely to ground upon and injure the oysters. Since the year 1858 these watch boats have been provided with lights; the light on the outer boat is put out when there is less than thirteen feet of water where the boat is moored, and the light on the inner boat when there is less than seven feet of water at her moorings. These boats are compelled to leave their moorings in very rough weather.

Vessels sailing into the anchorage ground at night derive some aid from the lights in the watch boats, but are chiefly guided by a light on shore from the railway company's harbour. The ordinary course of navigation for vessels intending to make the anchorage at Whitstable is to sail along the "Ridge" (one of the boundaries of the anchorage) until the light in the harbour bears south, then to steer straight on. There is another mode of entering the anchorage ground through a channel called the "Fiddly hole," which lies between the "Screw" (another boundary) and "Ridge." The buoys which indicate the limits of the pita's oyster beds also point out this channel. It is a safe channel for fishing boats and vessels of small draft of water, but it is unsafe and not ordinarily used for loading vessels.

The light exhibited on shore is maintained by the South Eastern Railway Company in the harbour constructed by them on the land purchased from the pita in 1838. This light is always shown, and affords most valuable aid to vessels endeavouring to make the anchorage ground; the members of the pita's company are forbidden by their bye-laws to dredge or work, and they do not, in fact, dredge or work, on their oyster beds after dark.

For some years before 1816, no light was exhibited from the shore at Whitstable, and in consequence the anchorage ground was frequently missed by vessels endeavouring to find it. In the year 1816, a man named Reeves, who filled the position of foreman to the pita's company, exhibited a light from a mast erected on his premises. The expense of the light was borne by a contribution from the pita and the shipowners of Whitstable. The company paid 10l. per annum, and the shipowners the sum of 5s. for each vessel. This contribution was made voluntarily, and was never demanded as a right by Reeves, or by the pita. The light was continued down to the year 1838, when, in consequence of the unsatisfactory manner in which the light was maintained by Reeves, the contribution ceased, and the light was for some time altogether discontinued.

In the year 1832, a man named Perkins, who was not in the employ of the pita, but was a sailmaker residing at Whitstable, exhibited a light from a window in his cell loft, and the company was borne as before by contributions of the same amount.

C. P.]

WHITSTABLE FREE FISHERY v. FOREMAN.

as those formerly paid by the pita. and the ship-owners.

In the year 1833, a man named Richards, who was not in the employ of the pita., succeeded Parkins in the management of the light; he removed it from its former position to a pole in front of his house; the expense continued to be borne as before by voluntary contribution, but the light ceased to be exhibited with regularity about the year 1845.

In the year 1846 a person named George Clay, who was then in the employment of the South-Eastern Railway Company as master of their harbour at Whitstable, proposed to pita. and to the shipowners at Whitstable, to exhibit a light from the railway company's harbour, upon being paid 6*l.* a year by the pita., and tonnage of 1*l.* 4*d.* a ton upon vessels using the said harbour; to this arrangement the pita. and the shipowners agreed. The pita. discontinued their payments after two years, but the tonnage dues had been regularly paid to the South-Eastern Railway Company, and the light has been constantly exhibited.

The only proof of any payment by the pita. company towards maintaining a light prior to the year 1816 are the following entries made in the books of the company by a former treasurer:

1777. June 29.—Paid Mr. Matthew Brown for one year's use of the light 25 8 0
1778. May 15.—Paid Matthew Brown for one year's use of the light 4 4 0

The buoys and beacons maintained by the pita. have been so maintained during living memory. The books kept by former treasurers of the pita. contain, among others certain entries of payments for the use and repairs of the buoys, and for advertisements. The dates of these entries are in the years 1773, 1774, 1775, and 1776.

The only advertisements relating to this matter inserted in the Kentish Gazette about the date of the above entries were two which appeared in the papers of Dec. 15 and Dec. 18, 1773, by which notice was given that the pita. company had lately put and placed down buoys to mark out and distinguish the boundaries of the manor and royalty of Whitstable, and that every person who should thereafter trespass upon the company's free fishery and royalty by dredging for or taking any of the oysters, or do any damage to the said buoys belonging to the free fishers and dredgers, would be prosecuted for the same with the utmost rigour of the law.

The manor of Whitstable, anciently known as Northwood, was a subinfeudation of the barony of Chilham, and in the survey of Domesday is found in the possession of Odo, Bishop of Bayeux. In the reign of Henry III., by an inquisition taken at their death, Richard and Rosina de Dover were found to have held of the King in chief the said barony of Chilham, and amongst other of its members, the manor of Northwood, worth in all issues of 21*l.* 1*s.*

Subsequently, the manor came into possession of Alexander de Balliol, by courtesy, upon the death of his wife, Isabel, a descendant of Richard de Dover; and at the circuit of the justices-in-chief for Kent, in the seventh Edw. I., assigned to hold the pleas of Quo Warranto, the said Alexander de Balliol, in right of his wife, claimed to have "without charter of old custom in his manor in the county certain liberties, to wit, at Whitstable, a free hundred court, &c., wreck of the sea, toll and warren; and that they and all the ancestors of the wife, from time whereof is not, &c., have fully used all these liberties." An inquisition being prayed, the knights chosen on the jury returned a verdict that the said Alexander, Isabel, and her ancestors, had immemorably and fully used the liberties, and had usurped nothing upon the Crown.

Upon an information of Quo Warranto in the 21st Edward I., the said Alexander de Balliol was summoned to answer why he claimed certain privileges and liberties at Whitstable, amongst which were free warren, toll of the sea, and toll with merchandise at Le Cranston, or Greystone (a landing place within the manor, the exact position of which is not now known); and the said Alexander also claimed that his wife's ancestors, from the time of which memory is not, have had the aforesaid liberties, and warren, wreck, and toll, without interruption.

The jurors said upon their oath, that the aforesaid Alexander and his wife's ancestors "had always, from time whereof memory is not, all the liberties aforesaid as they claimed to have the same, except Free-warren in certain newly-acquired lands; and that the said Alexander, as to the other liberties should go thereof without day saving the king's right, &c."

On the 3rd Jan. 19 Ed. 2, a commission was issued by the king, in which it was recited that certain treasonable letters had been landed from vessels along the coast of the Thames between Heculver, Greystone, and Whitstable. These places are alluded to throughout the commission as "the said ports and places."

In a proclamation, dated the 14th Aug., 30 Ed. 2, these places are also called "ports."

During the tenure of the manor by a religious house called the College of Placy, in Essex, in the year 4 Hen. 7, an award was made, by arbitrators appointed by the king, concerning a dispute as to the dredging of oysters at Whitstable. They found amongst other things that the oyster-ground was "parcel of the manor of Whitstable."

In a survey of the manor in 22 Hen. 8, among the holdings enumerated are diverse fisheries called wits, the localities of which are described as "the Stent, the Rigge, and the Beken." The two former are the banks which lie on the east and north of the anchorage ground.

In the 7th Elizabeth a special commission was directed out of the Court of Ex. to survey the port of Sandwich, and the number and condition of its creeks or members, and to certify which of them were the most frequented by merchants, and were fit to be continued for the receipt of customs. The certificate of the commissioners thereupon returned enumerates among the members and creeks of Sandwich, Whitstable, "ten miles distant from the said port towards the north." It proceeds to state the condition of the various members among which Dover and Faversham are declared to be in decay and "all the residues to be in good estate." The commissioners thus conclude: "All the creeks above-named, other than such as have officers attendant, do sometimes receive in and deliver out wares and merchandises, but [there are] none met to have continuance, but only the said court of Sandwich, and the creeks of Dover, Faversham, Milton, and Rochester. Nevertheless, for the use of the county, it is thought meet that the creeks aforesaid, as well within the Isle of Thanet as elsewhere, be maintained and used for the transporting of corn, wood, and other commodities, out of one part of the realm into another part, making their entries and certificates to the next port or court adjoining, where the said officers are resident; and that the said several creeks, as to this transporting of merchandise to or from beyond the sea, be utterly damned."

Dover, mentioned in the said inquisition, is now, and from time immemorial has been, one of the Cinque ports; Faversham is, and from time immemorial has been, a port, and a town of Dover.

WHITSTABLE FREE FISHERS v. FOREMAN.

[C. P.]

Lord Bolingbroke being then seised of the manor, did, on the 13th Nov. 1775, by deed of deputation, direct his water-bailiff to collect anchorage, &c., from vessels arriving and anchoring on the manor of Whitstable.

The special case also included the local Act of Parliament by which the plts. were incorporated (33 Geo. 3, c. 42), and also the various conveyances by which the plts. became possessed of their oyster fisheries and the manor of Whitstable. This Act and these conveyances formed the evidence upon which a previous case of Gann v. The Free Fishers of Whitstable was decided: (See 9 L. T. Rep. N. S. 263.)

The question for the opinion of the court was, whether the plts. were entitled to recover the said anchorage tolls, or any or which of them from the deft.

The plt.'s points for argument were: 1. That the plts. are entitled to the sums claimed by them for anchorage. 2. That the immemorial payment being found, no intendment that it was illegal can be made, and the facts stated in the case, coupled with its immemorial existence, are sufficient to support it, or, at all events, sufficient to throw upon the deft. the onus of proving that the payment was originally illegal, or without consideration, and ought no longer to be made. 3. That the case shows that the anchorage ground was the soil of the plts., and was within the precinct of a port, or harbour, or haven. 4. That the case shows that some service or aid in navigation was rendered to the public. 5. That the case shows that the payment for anchorage was due by right as a compensation for the injury to the brood of oysters by anchoring within the limits of the oyster fishery. 6. That the fact of the payment having been made from time immemorial, coupled with the contemporaneous existence of the oyster beds within the anchoring ground, is sufficient to support the inference that the payment was made as compensation for keeping up buoys and beacons to denote the position and limits of the oyster beds, and thus the better to enable persons coming to anchor within the limits of the oyster beds to avoid injuring the oysters. 7. That the payment may have been originally made for the maintenance of a light to assist persons seeking the harbour or anchorage ground, a supposition supported by the maintenance by the plaintiffs of a light within the time of memory. 8. That the facts stated in the case, coupled with the immemorial payment, are sufficient to negative the illegality of the claim, and that it was not founded on sufficient consideration. 9. That the onus of proving that this payment, made from time immemorial, is illegal, or without consideration, lies upon the defendant, and the facts found in the case do not prove its illegality, or that it was without consideration. 10. That no title founded on immemorial enjoyment would be secure if the onus of proving that it had a valid origin could be thrown upon its possessor by any one choosing to challenge it. 11. That it is more consistent with the facts found in the case that the claim is lawful than unlawful, because if unlawful it could and would have been successfully resisted when first set up, and its continued existence down to the present time proves either that it was never disputed, or disputed unsuccessfully.

The deft.'s points for argument were:—1. That the soil of the sea where the app.'s vessel was anchored on the 14th Sept. and 31st Oct. 1860 being below low water-mark was vested by law in the Crown, and the claim for anchorage was invalid. 2. That the Crown holds such soil of the sea as trustee for the public, and could only grant such soil to a subject subservient to the public rights. 3. That if any charter was ever granted by the Crown affecting to grant of take toll for anchoring on the high seas, such charter would be void, and a grant of such charter cannot be presumed. 4. That the public have the right to navigate the high seas without any exaction or tolls being made or imposed upon them, and the Crown had no power to impose any toll on the public for passing or anchoring on the high seas without the authority of Parliament, unless the public have a quid pro quo. 5. That there is no consideration shown for the tolls claimed. 6. That the soil of the sea where the deft.'s vessel was anchored on the 27th Nov. 1860 was not the property of the plts., and was not within the limits of the anchorage-ground upon or in respect of which the plts. claim a right of toll. 7. That, for the like preceding reasons objected to the tolls claimed on the 14th Sept. and 31st Oct., the plts. are not entitled to claim the toll on the 27th Nov. 8. That the plts. have no right to any payment for anchorage as stated in the case, and the deft. or his vessel was not liable to the payment of any of the said tolls for the said anchorage. 9. That the plts. have failed to show any sufficient right or title at law to any claim for such anchorage as stated. 10. That the deft. is entitled to the judgment of the court upon the case as stated.

Mellish, Q. C. (with him Dennan, Q. C. and Raymond) for the plts. This question of the plts.' right to anchorage dues in the harbour of Whitstable has before been raised in the case of Gann v. The Free Fishers of Whitstable, which was decided against the plts. by the H. of L., 11 H. L. Cas. 192; 20 C. B., N. S., 1; and 12 L. T. Rep. N. S. 150. See the case in Ex. Ch. reported 9 L. T. Rep. N. S. 262. The difference between that case and the present is that we then claimed the dues on the ground of our possession of the soil, which was held to be insufficient; we now base our claims upon immemorial usage, and in consideration for the benefits we have done to navigation. The points for the Court to decide are whether the consideration alleged is sufficient for our claim of tolls, and whether the evidence produced is sufficient to show this consideration. My argument is that before the time of legal memory the soil of the oyster ground, and also of the anchorage ground, was granted to the lord of the manor; that from time immemorial there was a port at Whitstable, and that the lord of the manor kept up buoys and lights between the oyster ground and anchorage ground; perhaps chiefly to protect the oysters, but also to assist the public in steering to the anchorage ground. The special case as it is now drawn up contains all that was said in the judgments of the H. of L. would be sufficient to substantiate the claims of the plts.

Prentice, Q. C. (with him F. M. White) for the deft.—It must be taken for granted since the decision of the H. of L., that the Crown has power to grant the soil of a port, subject to the rights of the people; but there is no case in which anchorage dues have been granted by the Crown. An anchorage cannot be claimed by prescription, because it is a public right; this was held in the case of The Mayor and Burgesses of The Town of Nottingham v. Lambert, Willes Reps. 111. As a matter of law, the considerations alleged on the other side are not sufficient to establish the plts.' right to these anchorage dues. The Crown holds the soil of the sea as trustee for the nation, and cannot grant tolls except in consideration for some public benefit:

Cur. adv. vult.

July 8.—The judgment of the court (composed of the Lord Chief Justice, Willes, Keating, and M. Smith, JJ.) was read by BOVILL, C. J.—The right claimed by the plts. in this case is similar to that which was in question in the case of The Free Fishers of Whitstable v. Gann, namely, the right to have anchorage dues from all vessels casting anchor on land covered by the sea, called the Anchorage Ground, near to Whitstable. In the former case, the right was sought to be maintained by reason of the ownership of the plts. in the soil upon which the anchors were cast; it was supported upon that ground by this court, and again in error by the Ex. Ch. The H. of L. decided that the anchorage ground, not being shown to be within or belonging to a port, but being a part of the sea where all persons would have a right to navigate, and as incidental to such right to cast their anchors there, the right claimed by the plts. could not be supported in respect of the mere ownership of the soil, and they decided that such a right required some consideration or advantage by the public to support it. The plts.' case being on that occasion based upon their ownership of the soil, their evidence was directed to that point only, and no facts appeared from which their claim could be supported on any other ground; and the ultimate decision, upon the statement of that case, was adverse to the plts. The present case is brought before us in a different form, the claim not being now based upon the mere ownership of the soil; and we are called upon to decide whether, under the circumstances set forth in the special case, the plts. have established a right to this payment. No claim is made in respect of that part of the ground sold to the South-Eastern Railway Company, nor has any distinction been made between the part above and that below the ordinary low-water mark, and, indeed, no such distinction could properly be made. On the present statement of facts it appears that the payment of the anchorage due has been made and received from time immemorial, in respect of all vessels casting anchor within the limits of the anchorage-ground. That ground appears to have been parcel of the ancient manor of Whitstable, and there are oyster grounds on the outside of the anchorage ground belonging to the lord as part of the manor; and from the statement in the case, and the recital in the Act of Parliament in 1793, both are taken to have existed from time immemorial. There was also in ancient times, a place within the manor for the unloading of merchandise, and from a quo warranto in 21 Edw. 1, it appears that the lord of the manor of Whitstable was entitled to take toll at a place called Le Craston within the manor, and although the precise locality of that place is not known, yet from the commission and proclamation in 2 Edw. 1, referred to in the special case it seems to have been somewhere between Reculver and Whitstable. There is also a reference in the Act of 1793, to "customary payments usual and of right made to the lord of the manor for or on account of any ship or vessel in the landing of goods and merchandise within the said manor." From the commission in 7 Eliz. it further appears that at that time Whitstable was a port in the sense of being a creek of the port of Sandwich; it had not any officers of customs, but was a place for landing and delivering wares and merchandise, and the Royal commissioners returned that it should be discontinued or utterly damaged as a place for transporting wares and merchandise beyond the seas, although they thought it meet that it should be maintained and used for transporting wares and merchandise from one part of the realm to another, making certificates to the next port or creek adjoining where the customs' officers were resident. There can be little doubt, therefore, that in very early times there was a port of Whitstable for loading and unloading of ships on the present anchorage ground; and it being protected from storms, would no doubt be frequented by vessels coming to the port as a safe and convenient place of anchorage. There is no evidence, however, to show that this anchorage ground was within or connected with the port, or that the franchise of the port was ever granted to any one by the Crown. The evidence seems satisfactorily to show that the lord was the owner of this landing-place, and took toll on merchandise thereto, and also the owner of the anchorage ground, and took dues as lord of the soil. The old anchorage, before the sale to the railway company, was protected on the north and east by banks partly grass, partly shingle and stone; those banks were known by the name of the Ridge and the Strett, and extended on either side to the sea beach and the main land, and the part thus protected afforded a comparatively safe anchorage for ships. There appear to have been fisheries belonging to the manor as far back as the 22 Hen. 8., and the oyster beds belonged to the plts. The plts. also maintained poles, buoys, and beacons, to mark the boundaries of the oyster fishery, and to prevent vessels anchoring and grounding upon the oyster beds; and the buoys and beacons also marked the position of the banks and the limits of the anchorage ground. They indicate the channel for entering at a place called the Eddy-hole, and enabled vessels to avoid the shoal banks by which the anchorage ground is protected, and point out the channel for vessels of a light draught of water. Some stress was laid by the deft. upon the fact of the free fishers having maintained the buoys before they became entitled to the fishery and the anchorage ground. But little weight is attached to that, because, according to the Act of Parliament, they carried on the fishery as tenants under the lord long before they became purchasers of the fee. The public, navigating the sea and coming to Whitstable, had, therefore, the use of the soil belonging to the plts. for the purpose of casting anchor, and of grounding upon it as the tide falls; and the channel to the anchoring ground through the place mentioned above, as pointed out by the buoys and beacons, is maintained at the plts.' own expense; and vessels can remain there protected by the bank from the storms of the sea in comparative safety and in a convenient place. There was, also, the statement that rights had been maintained at various periods, but that was not much pressed in the course of the arguments, and does not, in our opinion, materially assist the case of the plts. There is no evidence to show when or how these banks which protect the anchorage ground first came into existence; nor does it appear whether they were artificially made or mere natural banks thrown up by the sea. If they were originally made and partly formed by the former owner of the ground so as to create a protection to ships, they have been ever since, and still are maintained by the natural action of the sea; there is no reason why the original construction of these banks should not be a sufficient consideration for the payment of the anchorage due by all vessels anchoring at this place and enjoying the advantages of this protection; and where such payment has been made from time immemorial it is not unreasonable to presume that it had its origin in that way. It is not necessary to rest the case upon any such presumption, because, in our judgment, the maintenance of the buoys and beacons, and the advantages which the public derive therefrom, taken in connection with the ownership of the soil of the anchorage ground, are quite a sufficient consideration to support the legality of the present claim. The payment having been made from time immemorial, it ought to be referred to a legal origin, if there be anything to support it; and it may, in our opinion, well be referred to those services which have been performed, and the advantages which the public have enjoyed, which we have already adverted to, and which have existed throughout legal memory. And we think that this case is entirely in accordance with the decision of the H. of L.; because, after basing his judgment upon the ground that the claim could not be supported alone upon the ownership of the soil, Lord Westbury, L. C. says:—"If it may be claimed as an ancient anchorage due, some facts must be shown which either prove, or from which it can be inferred, that the toll claimed by the resps. was originally within the precincts of the port or harbour, or that some service to navigation was rendered to the public, in respect of which the alleged toll was paid. But nothing of the kind appears, and no such case can be presumed from the mere fact of an immemorial payment. No such case is made by the resps., and the payment is demanded merely upon the ground of its having been immemorially paid to the lords of the manor of Whitstable in respect of the ownership of the site of an ancient oyster fishery now vested in the resps." Lord Wensleydale was likewise of opinion that a consideration must be shown by some advantage having been conferred upon the public, or by the payment being a compensation for injury to the fishery; and Lord Chelmsford considered that the creation and erection of a port, would be in itself a sufficient consideration for such a payment. It was laid down in that case, in accordance with previous decisions on similar rights depending on long enjoyment, that every intendment ought to be made in favour of a payment which has been uninterruptedly received time out of mind, and that it is the duty of the court when a case admits of it, to find a legal origin for a right so long enjoyed. In the previous case no consideration was attempted to be shown for the payment, and no facts proved from which it could be inferred. There were no facts or circumstances to warrant a presumption that any corresponding benefit was given to the public for the imposition of the dues, and the case failed upon that ground; Lord Wensleydale, feeling probably there were other circumstances that could be proved, was desirous that the case should be sent down for a new trial, and said his own notion was, that it was consistent with the statement in the case, as it appeared, that some legal ground might be found for the establishing of a right to the anchorage due. Upon the statement of the case now before the court, it seems to us that the defect which existed in the former case has been supplied. The buoys and beacons have been maintained from living memory, and we think we ought to presume that they have existed from time immemorial; and when we find that anchorage dues have been received during the same period, and therefore ought to be referred to a legal origin, we consider that the maintenance of these buoys and beacons may be treated as a consideration for the payment that has been so immemorially made, and so would be a benefit to navigation by pointing out the anchorage-ground and the safe entrance to it. We think that would in point of law be a sufficient consideration to support the claim. Even if they were maintained wholly and solely for the purpose of preventing vessels grounding upon the oyster-beds, it is not certain that they might not be a sufficient consideration, upon the principle stated by Lord Wensleydale, where he says: "It might also be due by right as a compensation for injury, by anchoring within the limits of the oyster fishery, to the breed of oysters. The grant of an oyster fishery beyond the time of legal memory, which would require expense and trouble to establish and keep up, would, I am strongly inclined to think, justify the imposition of such a toll within the limits where oysters were placed to breed. And Coleridge, J., a very able judge, in the case of The Mayor of Colchester v. Brooke, thought that the parties might be liable by ancient custom to pay to the lord of the manor a reasonable payment, as the owner of the soil, for grounding on the soil." In the present case, it being proved that Whitstable was a creek of the port of Sandwich, and although in the reign of Elizabeth it was discontinued as a place for foreign dues, it was continued as a place for the coasting trade, and as the anchorage ground was close to it, it is possible that the right might be supported on another ground suggested by Lord Wensleydale when he says, "It may be that the company of dredgers may have had the anchorage assigned to them beyond the time of memory by the owner of the port, who may have had the right of anchorage by virtue of his right to the port." Our judgment, however, is founded on the grounds already stated, the maintenance of the buoys and beacons in connection with the plaintiffs' ownership of the soil and their uninterrupted enjoyment of the anchorage due from time immemorial. There is no reason shewn why the payment should not have had a legal origin. Very slight evidence is, according to our notion, necessary in order to support a right which has been uninterruptedly enjoyed from time immemorial, the legality of which we are almost bound to presume. We consider the circumstances altogether to be sufficient in our judgment to support the claim, and that the plts. are entitled to our judgment.

Mortgagees—Material-men—Priority.

Mortgagees are entitled to priority over material-men, whose claims arise after the registration of the mortgages, unless the material-men have acquired a possessory lien.

THE MARIA.

[ADM.]

Dr. LUSHINGTON gave judgment as follows:—In the month of June 1865 8-64ths of the Scio, a British vessel, were mortgaged to J. Donthwaite, to secure 62*l.*, and in July 40-64ths were mortgaged to J. Young to secure 300*l.* In Jan. following (1866) the Scio put into Lowestoft Harbour in a disabled condition, and from that time to June following she remained there undergoing repairs; the persons who performed the repairs and supplied the necessary materials were Mr. Hutchinson, ship-builder, and Mr. Rounce, whose firm were the authorised shipping agents for the club at Scarborough in which the vessel was insured. The owner of the vessel was insolvent, and early in June Mr. Donthwaite, as one of the mortgagees, came down to Lowestoft to take possession of the vessel, and proposed to remove her without paying the debts which had been incurred on the repairs of the vessel. A dispute thereupon arose between him and the master, Mr. Leadley. On the 16th June the master instituted a suit, No. 3341, to recover his wages and disbursements, and arrested the vessel and also cargo for freight. On the 18th Mr. Hutchinson and Mr. Rounce instituted another suit, No. 3343, to recover their debts under the 4th section of the Admiralty Court Act 1861, which gives to the court jurisdiction on any claim for the building, equipping, or repairing of any ship, if at the time of the institution of the cause the ship or the proceeds thereof are under arrest of the court. The owner of the vessel has not appeared, but both suits are defended by the mortgagees, Messrs. Donthwaite and Young. The vessel has been sold under order of the court; the net proceeds of vessel and freight amounted to 455*l.*, whilst the total of the claims against them exceed 1000*l.*, as follows:—Marten, 174*l.* 1*s.* 10*d.*; Hutchinson, for repairs, 289*l.* 5*s.* 3*d.*; Rounce and others, 267*l.*; J. Young, mortgage, exclusive of interest, 300*l.*; Donthwaite, ditto, 62*l.*; total, 1092*l.* 7*s.* 1*d.* Under these circumstances the mortgagees, Messrs. Young and Donthwaite, in November last, made motions in the suit 3341 to have their mortgage debts, &c., paid out of the proceeds in priority to any payment to Messrs. Hutchinson and Rounce, who had supplied the repairs and materials to the vessel, and who were the plts in the suit 3343. The court directed the motions to stand over until a statement of the facts relative to the question in dispute should have been filed. The parties failed to carry out this order, having, I presume, been unable to agree upon a statement, and accordingly, instead of a statement, a number of conflicting affidavits have been filed. It might have been satisfactory to have had an Act on petition in this case, but considering the small value of the property at stake, and the expenses already incurred in litigation concerning it, I am to decide the case upon these affidavits if they furnish the necessary materials for a judgment. As between the mortgagees and the master there is no dispute as to priority. The question is as between the mortgagees and those who repaired and refitted the vessel. If these men had simply supplied materials to the vessel, then (as established in the Pacific, 3 New Rep. 709) their right in rem to the proceeds of this vessel and freight commenced only upon the institution of their suit in June last, and consequently would be posterior to the right of the mortgagees, whose mortgages were registered in the months of June and Sept. 1865. If, on the contrary, the vessel at the date of her arrest was in the actual possession of the ship-builder, Mr. Hutchinson, then by the common law he would have a possessory lien upon her which could not be displaced by the mortgagees: (Williams v. Allsopp, 4 L. T. Rep. N. S. 550. Now Mr. Rounce was never in possession of the vessel. He was, as I have stated, the agent of the underwriter, and he and those persons whom he represents seem to have done no more than advance money and supply rope, ironwork, provisions, &c., for the repairing and equipping of the vessel. The case of Mr. Hutchinson, the shipbuilder, is somewhat different. When he commenced the repairs on the Scio she was lying in the graving-dock on the north side of Lowestoft Harbour. She was then removed to the south side of the harbour for the purpose of again taking in part of her cargo, which had been previously discharged there, and Mr. Hutchinson continued to repair her whilst lying there. Subsequently she was taken to deeper water on the north side, where she was still lying when she was arrested. On behalf of Mr. Hutchinson, it is deposed that at the time of the arrest his graving flat lay between the quay and the vessel, and was attached to the vessel by chain and rope painters, and floated close to her to enable the workmen to execute the external repairs about the hull. Also, that there were on board of the vessel chisels, chains, and other implements and materials belonging to Hutchinson. These statements are disputed; but, supposing them to be true, I think them quite inadequate to establish that the vessel was in possession of Mr. Hutchinson so as to give him a possessory lien over her. He therefore, as well as Mr. Rounce, must submit to have his claim postponed to those of the mortgagees.

THE MARIA.

The Hull Pilot Act—2 & 3 Will. 4, c. 105, ss. 22 and 29
—Compulsory pilotage.

Where a vessel which was being towed from one dock to another, within the port of Hull, came into collision with another vessel, the former having at the time on board a duly licensed pilot, to whose conduct the collision was solely owing, it was Held, that the vessel was neither "passing into or out of" the port under the 22nd section of the above Act, nor "bound to or from" the port within the 29th section; the pilotage, therefore, not compulsory.

On May 9th a cross cause of damage between the Richard and the Maria was heard by Dr. Lushington, assisted by Trinity Masters. It appeared that on the 5th Jan. last, the Maria, having on board a duly licensed Humber pilot, while being towed from the Victoria Dock at Hull through the Hull River, and through the old harbour into Humphrey's dry dock, came into collision, at the Victoria Jetty, which is at the entrance of the Hull river into the Humber, with the Richard, which was at anchor. There was a heavy gale at the time, by the force of which the Maria was driven against the Richard. There was also another collision next morning, and some damage was done to the Richard, on account of which her owners instituted this cause. The owners of the Maria also brought a cross cause against the Richard. At the time of the collision the Maria had finished her voyage, her cargo had been delivered, and her crew discharged.

At the hearing, the Court held that the pilot of the Maria was solely to blame for the collision, and took time to consider whether the pilotage was compulsory. On June 18th judgment was given.

Dr. LUSHINGTON (having first recapitulated the facts) said:—The section chiefly to be considered is the one which gives authority to appoint pilots, viz. the 22nd. That section closes with these words: "All ships and vessels sailing, navigating, and passing as aforesaid, except as hereinafter provided, shall be conducted and piloted within the limits aforesaid by pilots so licensed, and by no other pilot" or persons." The exceptions made in a subsequent part of the statute, are of vessels not drawing more than six feet of water, vessels putting in for shelter, &c.; they clearly do not apply to the Maria, and therefore need not be considered here. The question is, what is the meaning of the words "vessels sailing, navigating, and passing as aforesaid." The section commences by reciting that the corporation of the Trinity-house in Kingston-upon-Hull had been previously empowered to appoint pilots to conduct ships and vessels sailing or navigating into and out of the port of Kingston-upon-Hull, and in the limits and liberties thereof, and into and out of, and upon the river Humber, and from the said river out to sea, and between Flamborough Head northward, and Winterton Nets southward, and into and out of the several ports, creeks, harbours, and places situate between those two last-mentioned headlands or places; and then enacts by giving power to the same guild to license pilots "for conducting ships or vessels 'into and out of the port of Kingston-upon-Hull, and of the port of Great Grimsby, and upon any part of the river Humber below the said port of Kingston-upon-Hull, and so far out at sea as' . . . and also so far along the coast as" . . . It is argued on behalf of the owners of the Richard that the taking a pilot under the circumstances is not compulsory; that the words in the enacting part into or out of "the port of Hull," cannot mean within the limits of the port, and must refer only to inward or outward bound vessels; to vessels coming from outside the limits, or going to a place outside the limits of the port. That the Maria was neither inward nor outward bound, but passing from one part of the port to another. They further insist that this construction of the section is corroborated by the elaborate provisions made in the 40th and 41st sections for the distance to which outward bound ships, and the places to which inward bound ships are to be piloted, and also by the careful definitions in the 89th section of the term inward and outward bound vessels. On the other hand the owners of the Maria contend that the Act contains no words expressly limiting its application to inward or outward bound vessels, and that the words of the 22nd section are large enough to apply to vessels navigating within the port of Hull. It was also suggested that, even on the supposition that the Act was confined to inward or outward bound vessels, the Maria would come within the definition of these vessels contained in the 89th section, namely, "vessels bound to or from the said port of Kingston-upon-Hull, or to or from some other port or place situate on the said river Humber, or some or one of the several rivers and streams flowing into the same, or to or from some one of the several roadsteads in the said river Humber," because the Maria was going from one place on the Hull (which flows into the Humber) to another place on the Hull. But as both the Victoria Dock from which the Maria was going, and Humphrey's Dry Dock to which she was going, and the whole of the intervening course lie within the limits of the port of Kingston-upon-Hull, it is clear that if the 89th section bears upon the case of the Maria at all, it is by virtue of the words "to or from the said port of Kingston-upon-Hull." The owners of the Maria further contended that the case falls within the scope of the Act, because the same considerations apply as to vessels outward or inward bound: the Maria passing from the Victoria dock to Humphrey's Dry Dock would have to pass down, in part at least, the same intricate channel as an outward or inward bound vessel, and would equally require pilotage in order to navigate safely herself, and not to do injury to other shipping in the river. I do not, however, consider that the Court can give much weight to these considerations of expediency. On this point the case is of Rodriguez v. Melhuish, 10 Ex. 110, appears to be an applicable authority. That was a case under the Mersey Pilot Act which made pilotage compulsory "in the case of the master of a vessel outward bound when he shall proceed to sea." The facts were, that the vessel being under contract with the Post Office to go to sea on the 4th Dec., was, on the 2nd, taken under charge of a pilot out of the Prince's-dock at Liverpool, and towed by a steamer up the river, and there anchored; that on the 3rd, whilst she was anchored, the pilot being on board, and also riggers to complete the rigging, but the master being on shore, the boat of the pilot was in some way swamped by the vessel and by the vessel's fault. The Court of Ex. were unanimous in holding that the pilotage was not compulsory, because the vessel was not at the time proceeding to sea; and in delivering judgment the Chief Baron is reported to have said: "It might have been better, and the provisions of the Act would have been more symmetrical (if I may be allowed the expression), if the duties of the pilot and of the owner in the case of a vessel going outwards had been correlative with those of a vessel inward bound. It is likely to be a more difficult undertaking to take a vessel out of the dock and into the river than taking her out to sea. But we do not sit to make law, but to declare it as we find it." Moreover, it seems to me that the navigation of inward or outward-bound vessels into or out of a port and the navigation of vessels within the limits of a port are not necessarily upon the same footing with regard to compulsory pilotage, for by the 362nd section of the Merchant Shipping Act it is provided that "an unqualified pilot may within any pilotage district, without subjecting himself or his employers to any penalty, take charge of a ship as pilot for the purpose of changing the moorings of any ship in port, or of taking her into or out of any dock, in cases where such an act can be done by an unqualified pilot without infringing the regulations of the port or any orders which the harbour master is legally empowered to give." I am unable to hold that the Maria, being towed from one dock to another in the port of Hull was either a vessel passing "into or out of" the port within the terms of the 22nd section, or a vessel "bound to or from" the port within the terms of the 89th section. I am, therefore, of opinion that under the circumstances pilotage was not compulsory upon the Maria, and that she is liable for the damage she has occasioned to the Richard.

THE ARGENTINA.

24 Vict. c. 6—Bill of lading—Agent—Assignee for value.

G., a merchant of New York, shipped to Bristol in the vessel Argentina three parcels of oilcake, two parcels for G. senior, his correspondent there, and the third for S. The bills of lading for all three parcels in triplicate he sent to G. senior, with strict injunctions not to part with the bill of lading of S.'s parcel to him without first receiving payment. G. drew a bill of exchange for the whole value of the parcels on G. senior, which was discounted. S. subsequently induced G. senior to deliver to him his bill of lading on giving a bill of exchange drawn on one Stiles, and a promise of immediate payment of the cash. S. having endorsed the bill of lading to R. for value, became bankrupt, as also did Stiles. On the arrival of the vessel, R. had notice served on the master not to deliver the goods but to his order. G. senior presented one of the copies of the bill of lading which he had retained, and demanded the delivery of the third parcel shipped for Stone, as well as the other two, to which his title was undisputed. The master refused to deliver the third parcel, and retained thirty-two barrels out of the other parcels for the alleged non-payment of freight. He also refused to deliver the third parcel to R. G. senior becoming bankrupt, two actions were brought in this court against the vessel, one by the assignees of G. senior's creditors for the non-delivery of the third parcel and the thirty-two barrels retained for freight, and the other by Russell for the non-delivery of the third parcel to his order. The master made an application to the Court of Ch. to compel the plts. to interplead, which was refused. The two suits having been heard together, the Court dismissed the claim in respect of the thirty-two barrels, and in reference to the third parcel, being of opinion (1) that R. was a bonâ fide assignee for value without notice of fraud; (2), that G. senior had authority to deliver the bill to Stone under the circumstances especially as the words in the instructions from G. senior were ambiguous:

Held, following Gurney v. Behrend, that R. was entitled to the goods, and granted (but with hesitation) the costs of his suit against the owners of the vessel, the suit of the assignees of G. senior's creditors to be dismissed with costs:

Semble, this Court had the power had it been applied to, to have relieved the vessel from the cost of resisting at the same time two conflicting demands.

All the facts of this case are sufficiently detailed in the following judgment.

The Solicitor-General, (Sir John Karslake, Q. C.), and Pritchard appeared for the plt. Russell.

Dr. Deane, Q. C. and Dr. Tristram represented the assignees of Gilbert the elder, and Brett, Q. C. and Clarkson were for the owners of the Argentina.

June 18.—Dr. LUSHINGTON.—There are two actions, each brought under the 6th section of the Admiralty Court Act 1861 by the assignees of bills of lading against the Austrian vessel the Argentina, for breach of contract or duty by the master, in not delivering the goods comprised in the bills of lading. The two actions relate mainly, but not altogether, to the same goods. The circumstances are as follows: On the 16th Jan. 1866, John Gilbert, jun., merchant, of New York, shipped on board the Argentina, then lying at New York, and bound for Bristol, three parcels of oilcake, consisting respectively of 600, 410, and 270 barrels, the invoice price of the whole being 1039*l.* 1*s.*, and of the last-named parcel, the 270 barrels, 231*l.* 17*s.* 4*d.* For each of the three parcels the master signed separate bills of lading, and in each case in triplicate; the tenor of each bill of lading was to make the goods deliverable unto order or assigns on payment of freight. John Gilbert, jun., drew upon his father, John Gilbert, sen., his correspondent at Bristol, for the total invoice price of the three parcels—namely, 1039*l.* 1*s.*, in two bills of exchange—and took the bills of exchange to Messrs. Dennistown and Co. to get them discounted. Messrs. Dennistown and Co. accordingly discounted them upon receiving as a security for the acceptance of John Gilbert, sen., the bills of lading for the two larger parcels, namely, those consisting respectively of 600 and 410 barrels, duly indorsed in blank by John Gilbert, jun. Then, in accordance with their usual practice, they forwarded the two bills of lading and two bills of exchange to their firm in this country who obtained from John Gilbert, sen., his acceptance of the bills of exchange and transferred to him the bills of lading. It is not disputed that John Gilbert, sen., thereby became entitled to receive the cake comprised in the bills of lading for the two parcels upon payment of the freight. He has duly met the acceptance of the bills of exchange. The third parcel of oilcake, containing 270 barrels, John Gilbert, jun., disposed of differently. He intended them for a Mr. Stone, a merchant in Bristol; but for greater security he effected the sale through his father in the following manner, and sent to his father on the 23rd Jan. 1866, first the bills of lading triplicate for the 270 barrels, indorsed by himself, John Gilbert, jun., in blank; secondly, an invoice for the same goods, showing the price to be 231*l.* 17*s.* 4*d.*; thirdly, a bill of exchange for the invoice price, 231*l.* 17*s.* 4*d.*, drawn by himself, John Gilbert, jun., in his own favour, upon Frederic Stone; fourthly, a copy of a letter of the same date (23rd Jan.), which he was sending to Stone by the same mail, informing Stone that the shipment had been made, and that the drafts and bills of lading were to be sent by the same post. These four documents sent by John Gilbert, jun., to his father were inclosed in a letter, of which the following is an extract:—"I had a letter from Messrs. Stone, per City of New York, ordering 5000 or 6000 barrels of oilcake. I have thought it well to invoice the 270 barrels of oilcake to him at present market price, and draw against same at fifty days. I inclose you herein bills of lading and drafts on him for the amount of same, say, 231*l.* 17*s.* 4*d.* I have drawn them to myself, and indorsed the bill with merely my name, so that you can fill up as may be in consonance to your wishes. You will observe the 270 barrels are not injured. Please see that this is done. Though I sent Stone's bill it is understood, of course, you do not part with bills of lading without first receiving payment." It appears that Stone was formerly clerk to John Gilbert, sen., and had set up business for himself, and occasionally had dealings with his former master, and received consignment from John Gilbert, jun., from America. But neither of the Gilberts put much faith in him. On the 24th Oct. 1865 John Gilbert, jun., had written to his father. "With regard to Stone you ought to know him best, and though I should not like to prejudge anyone, I must say I do not think he is very reliable. I shall always, therefore, take the precaution of sending you bills of lading and drafts, and as we have had experience and pretty freely exchanged our opinions respecting him, I pray you be careful with the documents, and not suffer yourself to be fooled to part with them without the cash; let none of his professions or promises influence you. These are my strict wishes and orders." Again, later in Dec. 1865, in making a consignment for Stone by the Glacier, John Gilbert, jun., wrote to his father. "The bill lading, per Glacier, I shall indorse blank for Stone, and whatever shipments I might make him shall, as heretofore, remit to you the bills of lading, which you will not let him have without payment first being made you. I cannot make him out." And it would seem that on Jan. 31, 1866, Stone having sold this consignment by the Glacier to the plt., Russell, applied on behalf of the purchaser to Gilbert, sen., for the bills of lading, assuring him that he need not be afraid of the balance, as he (Stone) would give him the same the moment the bill of lading was forthcoming. To return to the transaction, the subject of the present proceedings: these letters of the 23rd Jan. from John Gilbert, jun., to his father and to Stone, reached Bristol about the 7th or 8th Feb., and shortly afterwards Stone applied to John Gilbert, sen., for the bills of lading of the 270 barrels. What passed at the interview is disputed, but the result was that Gilbert, sen., did not at that time transfer the bill of lading to Stone, nor did Stone accept the bill of exchange drawn upon him by John Gilbert, jun. Subsequently, on Feb. 16, John

Gilbert, sen., handed to Stone the bill of lading, on receiving from Stone a cheque for 100*l.*, and a bill of exchange for 280*l.*, to fall due on April 19, drawn by Stone and accepted by one Stiles. This is admitted, but particulars are disputed. Stone declares that the cheque for 100*l.* on general account between himself and John Gilbert, sen. (for Stone was in his debt), and the bill for 280*l.* were the consideration for the unconditional delivery of the bill of lading; while Gilbert, sen., swears that the cheque for 100*l.* was on an account altogether different from that of the 270 barrels, and that Stone promised to bring him on the same day, Feb. 16, cash for the invoice price of the barrels, and that the bill of exchange for 280*l.* was offered and taken only as a security for the cash, and that it was understood that the bill of lading was not to be used till the cash had been brought; and, therefore, that he, Gilbert, sen., simply delivered the bill of lading without making any indorsement upon it, that delivery should be made to Stone or order. On the same day, Feb. 16, Stone met Russell, who is the plt. in one of these causes, and sold him the 270 barrels simply for the invoice price plus the insurance. This amount was really 240*l.* 18*s.* 6*d.*, but at the time Stone only knew it was something a little short of 250*l.*, as he had not the invoice with him, and, therefore, it was agreed that Russell should accept a bill drawn by Stone for 250*l.*, to fall due on April 19 (the same day as that on which the bill for 280*l.* fell due), and that Stone should subsequently return to Russell the difference. This was done, and Stone thereupon gave Russell possession of the bill of lading, having first indorsed it with "delivered to the order of Mr. W. Russell, Frederick Stone." On this bill Stone raised money, and the bill has been duly met by Russell. Stone never paid to Russell the difference, 9*l.* 1*s.* 6*d.* Three days afterwards, on Feb. 19, John Gilbert, sen., paid into his banking account the bill of exchange for 280*l.* drawn by Stone and accepted by Stiles, to be discounted, but the bank declined to discount it, and within a very few days, first Stiles and then Stone became bankrupts. Thereupon John Gilbert, sen., having in his possession two duplicates of the bill of lading for the 270 barrels delivered, one of them to Messrs. Turner, Nott, and Strong, with instructions to present it to the master of the Argentina as soon as ever the vessel arrived in port, and indorsed it "deliver to the order of John Gilbert, Bristol." He also intrusted to the same firm the bills of lading for the other two parcels (of the 600 and 410 barrels respectively) concerning the ownership of which there was no dispute. The vessel arrived at Bristol on the 24th March, whilst she was still at the mouth of the Avon, Russell caused the master to be served with notice that he was indorsee and holder of the bill of lading for the 270 barrels, and warned him not to deliver except to him (Russell) or to his order. But the first actually to present the bill of lading was Gilbert, sen., through Read, who received the bill from Messrs. Turner and Co., and who acted as broker for the ship. The master refused to deliver to Read the 270 barrels, but marked the bill of lading with his initials. Shortly afterwards Russell presented his bill of lading, and was referred by the master to Read. Messrs. Turner and Co. finding a dispute was inevitable, handed back to Gilbert, sen., his bill of lading, and Gilbert entered the goods at the custom-house at Bristol, and paid the dues. I do not think it necessary to consider the evidence as to whether freight was actually tendered by either party for these 270 barrels. It is clear that the master waived tender, and refused to deliver because of the dispute as to the ownership. Nor is it necessary to examine how it came about that part of the 270 barrels was delivered, some to each claimant. As a fact, in some way or other nine barrels were delivered to Russell, and in some way or other forty barrels were delivered to Gilbert sen., and by him placed in the warehouses of Messrs. Turner and Co., but apparently without their consent. Two circumstances relative to this part of the delivery are disputed, but I am satisfied that the master never recognised the title of either party. He has never received any freight from either party in respect of any of the 270 barrels. The 270 barrels have been thus disposed of. Nine are in the possession of Russell; forty are in the warehouses of Messrs. Turner and Co., and are held by them subject to the order of the court; and 221 are in Read's possession, subject to the order of the court. The other two parcels containing respectively the 600 and 410 barrels, have also been delivered to Gilbert, sen., with the exception of thirty-two barrels, which are detained by the master on the alleged ground of non-payment of freight. On the 4th April Gilbert, sen., arrested the vessel and commenced this action under the 6th section of Admiralty Court Act 1861, for breach of contract, and duty on the part of the master in not delivering to him the 270 barrels, and also the 32 barrels, the remainder of the 1010. Russell instituted a similar action in respect of the 270 barrels. The master thereupon filed a bill in Chancery to compel Gilbert, sen., and Russell to interplead, but the V. C. dismissed the bill with costs, on the ground that the case was not one for interpleader, and accordingly the two actions have proceeded in this court, and have been carried on separately. Early in May Gilbert, sen., became bankrupt, and his suit was conducted by his creditors' assignee, Mr. Barrett, of the house of Dennistown and Co. With regard to the thirty-two barrels which were part of the 1010, and which have not been delivered, the only question is whether the entire freight has been tendered. That some freight is still due is not denied, but Gilbert, sen., alleges that when he paid to Read a sum on account, he (Gilbert, sen.), promised to pay the balance as soon as Read would give him the freight note, and that Read, though repeatedly asked, has never done so. Gilbert, sen., also alleges, and in this he is to a certain extent corroborated by his clerk, that he tendered further cash to the master and mate. This is denied by Read, who is the broker of the vessel. There is thus a conflict of evidence. Upon the whole, considering that the master never disputed the title of Gilbert, sen., subject to payment of freight, and that there was no dispute as to the amount of freight due, and that some freight is still due, I consider that the probabilities are in favour of the master's contention that freight was not tendered. I think therefore, that the claim of Gilbert, sen., in respect of these thirty-two barrels falls to the ground. I now proceed to discuss the title to the 270 barrels. The law is, in my opinion, settled by the case of Gurney v. Behrend, 3 El. & Bl. 622, and Pease v. Gloaher (the Maria Joseph), 13 W. R. 112, Russell, as assignee of the bill of lading, would be entitled to the goods, if, first, he were bonâ fide assignee for value, without notice of fraud or insolvency on Stone's part; and, secondly, if Gilbert, sen., had authority to transfer the bill of lading to Stone. If these conditions were observed it would be immaterial whether the bill of lading was obtained by Stone on false representations or promises (that he would bring cash), which were never fulfilled. The first question, therefore, for the court is whether Russell is a bonâ fide assignee for value without notice. As to this I have no doubt, Russell certainly is an assignee for value, for he paid 250*l.* for the goods; Gilbert, sen., declares that Russell must have known of Stone's insolvency, for that Russell and Stone were partners, but the existence of any partnership is denied by both of them, and I see no evidence of the fact. The purchase by Russell from Stone of a previous consignment from Gilbert, jun., proves nothing at all. Then the circumstances that the transfer of the 270 barrels was made at the invoice price without profit to Stone, and that Russell, without waiting to ascertain what was the exact price, gave to Stone a bill of exchange for 250*l.* are unusual indeed, but quite insufficient to establish a charge of collusion, or to show that Russell was aware of Stone's impending insolvency. Both Russell and Stone depose that their meeting which led to the bargain was an accidental meeting on Change. I shall, therefore, hold that Russell is a bona fide assignee for value without notice. The second question is, whether Gilbert, sen., had authority to part with the bills of lading to Stone. It is asserted that Gilbert, sen., was not a partner with his son, in which case of course he could have authority to deal with the bill of lading, but only an agent, and that as such agent he had received strict injunctions not to part with the bill of lading without payment. Now, in the first place, "without payment" is an ambiguous term. Payment may be in cash or may be in bills; and I quite concur in the opinion expressed in Gurney v. Behrend, that "if the language is equivocal, the construction to be put upon it ought to be rather against the party who places an indorsed bill of lading in the hands of third persons, and enables them to deal with others as if they had complete control over it." In the third place it seems very doubtful that Gilbert, jun. had any power to impose such restrictions upon his father. Not only according to his own account had his father an equal interest in the consignment—a position which it is difficult to distinguish from that of partner—but the son in New York had already received payment for these goods, and that by means of discounting bills drawn by himself on his father; so in fact the son had no further interest in this transaction, except a contingent liability upon the bill, in the event, which did not take place, of the father's acceptance being dishonoured, and on the other hand the father was immediately liable to the whole of the invoice price of the goods. Under these circumstances it seems impossible to question that Gilbert, sen., had power to deliver the bill of lading to Stone. In my opinion, therefore, Russell had established his claim to the 270 barrels upon payment of freight, and Gilbert, sen., has failed. With regard to costs, Gilbert, sen., having failed in his suit, must pay the costs of it. With regard to the costs of Russell's suit against the ship, the court has had some difficulty in coming to a satisfactory conclusion. Russell has succeeded in his suit against the ship, and having succeeded would, according to the ordinary rule, be entitled to his costs. But the difficulty in which the master was placed between the two conflicting claims, renders the court reluctant to enforce the rule against the owners of the vessel. Admitting this, however, and giving full consideration to the fact that the master endeavoured, by application to the Court of Chancery, to compel the plts. in the two suits to interplead, I think no sufficient cause is made out to exempt the vessel from bearing the costs of a suit which has been unsuccessfully defended on its behalf. I shall, therefore, pronounce Russell entitled to recover his costs. The court has reason to lament that it did not receive information of these concurrent suits at the time when they were first instituted. For I feel assured that it was competent to the court, in the exercise of its jurisdiction, to have relieved the vessel from the costs of resisting, at the same time, two conflicting demands.

JUDICIAL COMMITTEE OF THE PRIVY COUNCIL.

Reported by JAMES PATERNON, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Saturday, July 20, 1867.

(Present—The Right Hon. Lord CAIRNS, Sir W. ERLER, Sir J. W. COLVILLE, Sir E. V. WILLIAMS, and Sir R. T. KINDERSLEY.)

THE AGRA.

Ship—Collision—Two vessels nearing and about to cross—18th and 19th rules—Evidence before receiver of wrecks.

Two vessels being bound down Channel, as they were nearing and about to cross, it being the duty of ship A. to keep out of the way of ship E., ship A. gave way, and ship E. did not keep her course, and a collision occurred:

Held, that if a ship bound to keep her course under the 18th rule justifies her departure from that rule under the words of the 19th rule, she takes upon herself the obligation of showing both that her departure was at the time it took place necessary in order to avoid immediate danger, and also that the course adopted by her was reasonably calculated to avoid that danger.

The practice of taking seamen of one ship before the receiver of wrecks to be examined in presence of the master of the other ship involved in a collision, is highly censurable; yet this circumstance ought not to exclude, though it properly affects, the weight of such evidence.

This was an appeal from a decree of the High Court of Admiralty. The cause arose out of a collision, which occurred between the ship Agra of 925 tons register, and the late barque Elizabeth Jenkins, of 667 tons register.

The collision occurred at about eight p.m. of the 10th Nov. 1866, in the English Channel, off the Ower's Light Vessel.

The weather at the time was cloudy, and the wind was a fresh breeze from about S. S. W. The Elizabeth Jenkins was bound down Channel with a cargo for Boston, in the United States of America, and the Agra was also bound down Channel, and was prosecuting a voyage to New York, with a general cargo.

The Elizabeth Jenkins had her proper sailing lights, viz., a green light on her starboard side and a red light on her port side, duly exhibited and burning brightly, and was proceeding under all plain sail, close-hauled by the wind on the starboard tack, and heading south-east, and making about six knots an hour.

The Agra was sailing by the wind on the port tack, steering about west, and her green or starboard light was seen from the Elizabeth Jenkins at the distance of about a mile to a mile and a half, and bearing about two points on the lee (port bow) of the Elizabeth Jenkins.

Under these circumstances it was alleged that it was the duty of the Agra to get out of the way of the Elizabeth Jenkins, and that the latter vessel was therefore kept on her course; that the Agra, however, neglected to take in due time proper measures for keeping clear of the Elizabeth Jenkins, but approached the Elizabeth Jenkins, and caused immediate danger of a collision, and thereupon the helm of the Elizabeth Jenkins was put hard a-starboard, and the head of her spanker was hauled in; but a collision occurred almost immediately afterwards, and the Elizabeth Jenkins was so much damaged that she foundered, and her master and nine other persons on board her were drowned.

The evidence on both sides was taken orally in open court before the learned judge of the court below, assisted by two of the elder brethren of the Trinity Corporation; and the learned judge and the Trinity Masters came to the conclusion that the Agra was solely to blame for the collision; and the learned judge made the usual decree in favour of the owners of the Elizabeth Jenkins. His direction was as follows:

[PRIV. CO.]

Dr. LUSHINGTON.—Gentlemen, without intending to intimate any opinion as to the ultimate result, I wish to call your attention to the fact that there were fifteen persons on board the Elizabeth Jenkins, and the calamitous result of the collision was that nine lives were lost. I do so, not for the purpose of in any degree prejudicing either party, but to show you what are the rational and inevitable consequences of this calamity. Now, under those circumstances, I advise you to take this view of the case, not to raise up as against those who are now supporting the cause of the Elizabeth Jenkins any supposition on account of any omission which is almost inevitable under such a calamity, and, on the other hand, not to prejudice the case of the other party by supposing that anything might have been proved which has not been established. Having disposed of that point, I proceed at once to make an observation or two upon the question which has been much discussed by the counsel who addressed you on the part of the defts. I allude to the circumstance of the second mate and some of the seamen who were survivors being taken before the receiver of wrecks, and, in the presence of the captain of the Agra, called upon to give their evidence, which is taken down and sworn to; and, in addition to that, certain suggestions are adopted by the mate which formed part of his evidence. Now, I cannot but view such a proceeding with severe censure, for it goes to destroy the fidelity of all testimony. The mate may be a man of some resolution and determination, and of more knowledge than an ordinary seaman; but take the case of an ignorant seaman in the hands of the master of the opposite ship, which is going to sue his owners, or going to be sued by them, taken before the receiver without any person to counsel him or assist him, or keep him straight in his testimony. That is a practice most severely to be censured, and so severely to be censured that I have thought in this case it was necessary that some communication should be made to the Board of Trade, that their receivers should, for the future, allow no such thing as the master of the one vessel to be present when one of the crew of the other is examined. Now I advise you, in the further consideration of this case, to throw entirely out of your minds everything that took place before the receiver of wrecks. There is not a single word of the statements that were taken there that is, properly speaking, trustworthy; and it would be contrary, in my opinion, to all justice to avail ourselves of what was taken under the circumstances to which I have adverted, for the purpose of proving any one fact in this cause. I come now to the consideration of one of the most important facts in this case. I am not going to trouble you with unnecessary detail. The law is perfectly clear as applying to this case. One vessel is on the starboard tack, close-hauled, proceeding in a southeasterly direction, and the other is upon the port tack, close-hauled, and sailing west; and we know that, under such circumstances, it is the duty of the vessel on the port tack, though close-hauled, to keep out of the way. The words of the 12th rule are clear, and no comment upon them is necessary. Now, these two vessels being in danger of meeting, let us see how the case stands. The Agra says that she descried the loom of a vessel at a distance; and, as a reason for not having seen the vessel herself, or the light, at an earlier period, she alleges that the light was not visible. She does not go the whole length of saying that there was no light at all, and for this obvious reason, that her own witnesses state that very soon after having seen the loom of the vessel about a mile off they saw a red light. Then it has been argued that though there might have been a light, yet it was so dim and of such an inferior description that it did not afford them the assistance which they had a right to expect from a vessel in that position, in fact that it gave a light which was not visible at a distance at all; and the first point relied upon for establishing that proposition is that on the 1st or 2nd Nov., when the Elizabeth Jenkins left London, her lights entirely failed. Now, I request you carefully to consider this argument, and to deliberate what degree of weight ought properly to be ascribed to it. The evidence is substantially this—that the lights in the first instance became very dim, or went out in about fifteen minutes; that they were afterwards trimmed, and that they lasted from two hours to two hours and a half; and that the pilot (it being a dark night, and it being impossible with the wind west-south-west, as he states it was, to have prosecuted his voyage further at the utmost than seven or eight miles) deemed it more advisable under those circumstances to anchor. Now, whatever may have been the state of the lamps at that moment, was that same state of things continued to the 10th Nov., when the collision occurred? That is the question. It signifies nothing at all what was the state of the lamps on the 1st or 2nd Nov., unless there was some continuing cause which would produce the same deleterious effect at the time of the collision. Now, with respect to the oil, the pilot could not say what the oil was. With respect to the lamp itself, he said the lamps were common lamps, and he used this expression, which I took down: "They were very well constructed." The vessel goes on, and we have no intimation of anything having occurred with regard to the lamps up to the very hour of the collision. Now, if there were inferior oil on board, and nothing but inferior oil, that might, perhaps, account for the lamps being dim; but we have no evidence whatever of the quality of the oil, and one witness, when he is asked the question, says they burn all sorts of oil—colza, paraffin, petroleum, &c. I think, therefore, you must be cautious in importing into the consideration of the question whether the lights were burning or not anything that occurred in the river Thames, but you will pay the strictest attention to everything that occurred antecedent to the collision. You will pay attention to the fact that several of the witnesses on board the Agra certainly did not discover the light of this vessel at the distance of a mile, and that they did afterwards discover what they represent to have been a dim red light. Then, on the other hand, you must consider that those who were on board the Elizabeth Jenkins herself state that the lamps were burning well; not uncommonly well, they said, but fairly well. Now, it is upon a consideration of those combined circumstances that you must form your opinion, in the first instance, whether the state of the lamps contributed in any degree whatever to this collision. It is only important with regard to time; it is not at all important further, because those on board the Agra saw the Elizabeth Jenkins at the distance of a mile, according to their own statement; and it is only important in considering the question whether they were justified, in the absence of light, in delaying to take any measures in order to avoid a collision. Now, with respect to the Elizabeth Jenkins, her statement is this—that she saw (I think I am correct in stating) a green light upon her starboard bow, and that green light was that of a vessel going to the westward. She watched that green light, and seeing that it was still further approaching her, as a measure of safety she starboarded her helm to get out of the way. Now, this is the consideration. Did she delay starboarding her helm until there was a reasonable risk of immediate danger, and did she then take the wisest and the properest measure in starboarding her helm upon that occasion? It is quite true, as was observed by Mr. Clarkson, it is not in the case of unavoidable danger that you put your helm one side or the other, but it is with the prospect, the hope, the chance, of avoiding immediate danger, or mitigating the consequences thereof. I think this case turns upon that, because, if you are of opinion that there was improper delay in getting out of the way on the part of the Agra which occasioned danger to the Elizabeth Jenkins, and she, in order to save herself and property and crew from the chance of immediate danger, starboarded her helm, and that that was a proper measure to take under the circumstances, then she is not to blame, but the other vessel. These are the considerations which are involved in this case. I shall not trouble you with the details of the evidence.

THE AGRA.

[PRIV. Co.]

After consultation.—We are of opinion that the Agra is solely to blame for this collision.

The Agra now appealed.

Aspinall, Q. C. and Butt for the Agra.

Brett, Q. C. and Clarkson for the Elizabeth Jenkins.

Sir W. ERLE.—The collision between the barque Elizabeth Jenkins and the ship Agra took place about eight o'clock p.m. on the 10th Nov. 1866, off the Ower's light-ship, in the English Channel. The night was cloudy, but not thick. The Elizabeth Jenkins was heading south-east, under plain sail, close-hauled on the starboard tack, making six knots an hour. The Agra was steering west, close-hauled on the port tack, making about six and a half knots an hour. The wind was south-south-west. Under the 12th and 18th of the Regulations of 1863, it was, in these circumstances, the duty of the Agra, having the wind on the port side, to keep out of the way of the Elizabeth Jenkins; the Elizabeth Jenkins, on the other hand, ought to have kept her course, unless a departure from her course was warranted under the 19th rule, by the necessity of avoiding immediate danger. As the ships were nearing, and about to cross, the Agra gave way, porting her helm, squaring her after-yards, and letting go her spanker. The Elizabeth Jenkins did not keep her course, but starboarded her helm and hauled in her spanker; and the result was a collision, the starboard bow of the Agra near the stem, striking, or being struck, by the stem of the Elizabeth Jenkins; the Elizabeth Jenkins foundering, and the master and several seamen being drowned. It is contended for the owners of the Elizabeth Jenkins that the Agra so long delayed porting her helm and giving way that those on board the Elizabeth Jenkins were led to think she was trying, and intended, to cross the bows of the Elizabeth Jenkins, and that a collision must, if the Elizabeth Jenkins kept her course, take place; and that the change in the course of the Elizabeth Jenkins was thus necessary in order to avoid immediate danger. For the Agra, on the other hand, it is said that she ported and gave way as soon as she saw the red light (the only light that she admits she did see of the Elizabeth Jenkins). That she observed the loom of the Elizabeth Jenkins when about a mile or three-quarters of a mile distant. That at that time the Elizabeth Jenkins had no lights visible; for the master and pilot of the Agra seeing the loom of the Elizabeth Jenkins before them, endeavoured to make out her lights, first with the naked eye, and then with glasses, and could not do so, and therefore concluded she was on the same tack, with her stern towards the Agra. That they continued watching, and after some little time saw the red light of the Elizabeth Jenkins, and immediately ported their helm; and that it was thus the want of proper lights on board the Elizabeth Jenkins which made the Agra delay porting so long, and that the Agra is free of all blame. It is further said for the Agra, that when the Elizabeth Jenkins did depart from her course, she ought to have put down her helm and luffed up to the wind, in order to deaden her way, in place of starboarding, and thereby accelerating her speed, and increasing the violence of a collision. Their Lordships do not see any reason to disbelieve the very precise and consistent evidence of the master of the Agra, and of Albert the pilot, corroborated as it is by that of Jones the mate, and rendered probable by the statements of Tracey the Trinity pilot, as to the dimness of the lights of the Elizabeth Jenkins, on the 2nd Nov. previous; and they are disposed to think that when the loom of the Elizabeth Jenkins was first seen by the master of the Agra, and examined through the night glasses, her lights could not, for some reason or other, be made out. They think, however, that between that time and the moment when the red light of the Elizabeth Jenkins was actually seen, an interval longer than these witnesses represent must have elapsed, and that during this interval a more careful and continuous look-out on board the Agra would have enabled them to discover the red light sooner, and would have shown, even irrespective of the light, that the Elizabeth Jenkins was nearing them, and the course she was pursuing. Their Lordships, therefore, cannot acquit the Agra of blame. They think she might and ought to have ported sooner. Was, then, the Elizabeth Jenkins free from blame, or is blame to be attributed to her as well as to the Agra? That she departed from the 18th rule is clear, for she did not keep her course; and that this departure had not the effect of avoiding danger is also clear, for a collision of a most disastrous character occurred. Now, their Lordships are clearly of opinion that if a ship, bound to keep her course under the 18th rule, justifies her departure from that rule under the words of the 19th rule, she takes upon herself the obligation of showing both that her departure was at the time it took place necessary, in order to avoid immediate danger, and also that the course adopted by her was reasonably calculated to avoid that danger. Their Lordships find that this has been the construction put upon the 19th rule in the cases of the George Dean v. The Constitution, Admiralty Court, Feb. 1, 1865; Holt, Rule of Road, 101; the Planet v. The Aura, Admiralty Court, Dec. 7, 1865, Ibid. 257; and inferentially, in the case of the Great Eastern before this board, 3 Moore P. C., N. S. 31. This obligation the owners of the Elizabeth Jenkins have not, as their Lordships think, discharged. It is remarkable that no one of the witnesses for the Elizabeth Jenkins ventures to say that had she continued her course, the Agra porting when she did, the collision would not have been avoided. Robins, the mate of the Elizabeth Jenkins, in his examination in chief, states that he thinks the collision would have taken place had his ship continued her course; but he evidently speaks on the hypothesis of the Agra having continued her course also; and it is clear that when the order to starboard was given by the master of the Elizabeth Jenkins to Robins, the latter thought it an erroneous order, and remonstrated against it. Looking to all the evidence in the case, their Lordships think—and it is also the opinion of the nautical gentlemen by whom they are assisted—that the Agra would have passed free of the Eliza- both Jenkins had the latter maintained her course; and that even if the Elizabeth Jenkins had, from apprehension of danger, altered or interrupted her course, she should have done so by luffing up to the wind, thereby stopping her way, and mitigating, as far as possible, the effect of a collision, if a collision should take place. Their Lordships, therefore, have come to the conclusion that both vessels were to blame, and that the collision is attributable to both; the Agre for not sooner observing and getting out of the way of the Elizabeth Jenkins; and the Elizabeth Jenkins for departing from her course without sufficient necessity, and for departing from it in a manner calculated to increase, and not to diminish or avoid danger. Their Lordships have referred to the testimony of Robins, the mate of the Elizabeth Jenkins, and to the opinion which he appears to have expressed at the time to the master as to the course the latter was taking. They see no reason for looking at this evidence as otherwise than trustworthy, and they cannot but consider it, if trustworthy, as having an important bearing on the facts of the case. They agree with the very learned and experienced judges from whose decision this appeal is brought, and who has so long, and with such advantage to the public, presided over the Admiralty Court, as to the jealousy with which any attempt to warp the evidence of a witness by communications between him and either of the litigating parties should be watched and reprobated; but they cannot think that the evidence should, merely on the ground of such communications, be entirely thrown aside. The evidence of Robins appears to them to have been given fairly, and with no desire or design to bear against the Elizabeth Jenkins; and they cannot but think that less weight than that to which it was fairly entitled was attributed to it in the observations of the learned judge, and that in this way an element in the case, materially bearing on the questions proposed to the nautical assessors, was to a great extent withdrawn from their consideration. Their Lordships have for this reason, and also because the effect of the 19th rule was not presented to the nautical assessors with the distinct explanation that was desirable, and which it appears to have received from the same learned judge himself in the case of the Planet and the Agre, the less difficulty in departing, to the extent already stated, from the decision of the court below. Their Lordships will humbly advise Her Majesty that the judgment of the court below be altered by finding that both ships were to blame. The consequence will be, that the damages must be equally divided, and each party will bear his own costs, both here and in the court below.

SOUTHERN DISTRICT OF NEW YORK.

THE BRIG BLOHM.

Sailors' wages—Priorities—Lien—Hamburg code—Extra pay on sale of vessel abroad—Mortgagor—Gold or greenbacks.

Sailors shipped in Hamburg for a voyage to New York and back. In New York the vessel was sold by a decree of the Court of Admiralty for advances, whereupon the seamen petitioned to have their wages, with two months' extra pay, paid first out of the fund:

Held by the Court, that a sailor who was made second mate was entitled to second mate's wages from that time:

That a sailor, shipped in New York, who rendered services on board in port only, was entitled to a lien:

That by the Hamburg code, when a vessel is prevented by higher power from completing the voyage, and the crew are discharged, they are entitled to a free passage home, or two months' extra pay:

That the sale of this vessel by decree of court was a proceeding by higher power, and two months' pay was a lien on the vessel:

That a mate who had loaned money to the master, and taken from him an agreement in place of interest to divide all profit and loss, as if he were part owner, was only mortgagor, and was entitled to recover his wages as mate:

That an increase of wages by the master in the foreign port did not give the sailors a lien for such increase prior to that of creditors for advances to the vessel:

That the amount decreed to the seamen must be the amount of their wages in Hamburg money, reduced into coined dollars of the United States, without adding anything by reason of the premium on gold.

The brig Blohm, a Hamburg vessel, shipped a crew in Hamburg for a voyage to New York and back, at various rates of wages, payable in marks courant.

After the vessel had arrived in New York, the second mate left her, and one of the crew, named Struck, was appointed second mate in his place, and another sailor named Terman was shipped to supply Struck's place.

While the vessel lay in New York, the master, as it appeared, agreed to raise the wages of the rest of the crew above the rate specified in the articles.

After this agreement was made the vessel was libelled in the Court of Admiralty for advances made to her, and was sold under a decree of the court; whereupon the crew applied by petition to the court for their wages, and for two months' extra wages under the Hamburg code. The proceeds of the vessel not being sufficient to pay the sailors' claim, and also the decree for the advances, the amount of the sailors' claim was contested by the libellants in whose favour that decree was made.

The libellants contested the claim of the sailors on the following grounds:

1. They claimed that, even if the master did advance the men's wages, their own claim should be paid in preference to such advance.

2. They claimed that Terman having only rendered services in port, had no lien.

3. They claimed that the two months' extra pay was not a lien on the vessel.

4. They claimed that the mate Vogelgesang was really a part owner of the vessel, and therefore could not claim wages of her. This claim was based on the fact that in Aug. 1865 the mate loaned Tiedemann, who was master and owner of the bark in Hamburg, 7000 thalers, and on the 14th Aug. 1865, they entered into a written agreement, which recited that Vogelgesang had loaned Tiedemann that amount, for the purchase of the brig Blohm, and provided that "for increased security of this capital Tiedemann mortgages to Vogelgesang the vessel, and gives him the first mortgage for this money," and that, instead of paying interest the parties agree that they shall divide all profit and loss, the same as if he was part owner."

It was also agreed that in case Vogelgesang should die, his share of the profit or loss should be for the benefit of another party. And by a subsequent article dated in September, the parties agreed that in case of Vogelgesang's death the money should be paid to this third party, with 5 per cent. interest, and the vessel should be mortgaged to him till it was paid.

5. The libellants also claimed that the amounts to be paid the seamen should be calculated by reducing the marks courant to dollars of the coin of the United States, and giving them a decree for that amount, while the seamen claimed that the amount of the present premium on gold should be added in calculating the amounts decreed to them.

BLATCHFORD, J.—The contract of Aug. 14, 1865, with the supplemental contract of Sept. 11, 1865, between Vogelgesang, the mate, and Tiedemann, the master of the vessel, was merely a mortgage of the vessel to Vogelgesang as a creditor of Tiedemann, and did not constitute Vogelgesang a part owner of the vessel. He is therefore entitled to his wages as mate, of 84 marks courant per month. As to Ternan, the man shipped at New York, he was shipped to supply the place of Struck, who was promoted to be second mate, in place of a second mate whom the master had discharged. No objection is made to the promotion of Struck, and the employment of Ternan under the circumstances was proper. He is therefore entitled to his wages of 60 marks courant per month. Struck is entitled to his wages as seaman at 42 marks courant per month to Feb. 5, 1867, and from that time to wages as second mate at 60 marks courant per month. The alleged increase of the wages of Adams, Ahrent, and Struve, made Feb. 5, 1867, cannot be admitted. They shipped for the round voyage back to Hamburg, and it does not sufficiently appear that the agreement made by the master to raise their wages from the 5th Feb. 1867 was a voluntary act on his part by which the vessel ought to be bound, especially as against creditors advancing money on the strength of a lien on the vessel. Accordingly Adams, Ahrent, and Struve are entitled to wages for the whole time, since they shipped at the rates named in the shipping articles, and no more, namely: Adams, 27 marks courant per month; Ahrent, 21 marks courant per month; and Struve, 12 marks courant per month. The Hamburg law formed part of the contract with these seamen, and according to that, I think that each of the crew is entitled to either a free passage to Hamburg from New York, or to two months' extra wages. It is urged that this cannot be enforced as wages, and is not a lien, but is merely a penalty enforceable against the master and owners personally. It is true that in article 24 of the Hamburg code this two months' wages is called forfeiture money, but in article 25 it is expressly provided that if a vessel is entirely prevented by higher power from the continuation of her voyage, the crew have to look for their passage home or money in lieu, according to article 24, entirely to the vessel or the proceeds of the same, and not to the master or owners. In this case the vessel is a Hamburg vessel, and has been prevented by the vis major of a sale, under a decree of this court, from continuing her voyage, and the crew have been discharged from her by the purchaser under the sale. The choice as to whether the crew shall have a free passage home or this "distance money," as it is called in article 25, is given by that article to the master. As he appears to have been derelict to all his proper duties, and no free passage home has been provided for the seamen, each of them is entitled to two months' extra wages, at the rate of his ordinary wages, to be paid out of the proceeds in court. The only remaining question is as to how the computation is to be made of the amounts due to the seamen. It is shown by the evidence that 125 marks courant are equal to 100 marks banco of Hamburg. The Act of March 8, 1843, sect. 1 (5 U. S. Stat. at Large, 625), fixes the value of the marc banco of Hamburg at 85 cents. in all computations of its value at the Custom-houses of the United States. This Act does not apply to its value for commercial purposes; and by the Act of Feb. 21, 1857 (11 Id. 163) all former Acts declaring foreign gold or silver coins a tender in payment of debts are repealed. The question, therefore, is one of evidence, to be taken before a commissioner, as to the commercial value of the mark courant of Hamburg, in the coined money of the United States. When that value is ascertained a further question arises. The claimants contend that the amount due to the seamen, in dollars, computed at that value, must be paid in United States currency or legal tender notes; while the petitioners claim that they are entitled to be paid the amount in gold, or if paid in United States currency, or legal tender notes, to be paid so much as will purchase an amount in gold equal to the amount in dollars found to be due to them. The ground of this claim of the petitioners is, that the contract of the seamen was made in Hamburg for service on board of a Hamburg vessel, and that their wages are made payable in Hamburg currency. It is difficult, perhaps, to reconcile some of the decisions which have been made on this subject. The case of Councer v. The Steam-tug Griffin, 5 Am. Law Reg. N. S. 45, decided by Hall, J. in the District Court for the Northern District of New York, and affirmed by the Circuit Court on appeal; and the case of the ship Rochambeau, 26 Boston Law Rep. 564, would seem to sustain the views of the petitioners. But the practice of this court has been to the contrary, even in cases of foreign seamen shipped abroad on foreign vessels under contracts in which the rate of wages was expressed in a foreign currency: (The Isis, before Betts, J., Nov. 1864; The Ticeed, before Benedict, J., Feb. 1866.) And I am satisfied that the weight of authority, both on principle and by precedent, is in favour of the view which has prevailed in this court: (Metropolitan Bank v. Van Dyck, 27 N. Y. Rep. 400; Wilson v. Morgan, 30 Howard's Pr. Rep. 386; Swanson v. Cooke, 45 Barb. S. C. R. 574; Kempson v. Bronson, Id. 618.) When the amounts due to the petitioners in coined money of the United States are ascertained, according to the evidence which shall be given as to the commercial value of the mark courant of Hamburg in the coined money of the United States, they will be entitled to a decree for the payment of those amounts in United States currency or legal tender notes, dollar for dollar, without any allowance for any premium on such coined money or any depreciation in the value of such currency or notes. If the parties do not agree on the amounts due to the petitioners on the principles thus declared, there must be a reference to a commissioner.

XENOS v. WICKHAM.

Ship—Policy of insurance—Execution and delivery—Cancellation—Broker's duty.

B., an insurance broker, agent for X., gave instructions to W., an insurance company, to prepare policy on ship for 3000*l.* and delivered a slip. Before policy was ready, X. ordered a policy for 1000*l.* only, on different terms, and a second slip was delivered. W. acted on the second slip, and debited B. accordingly. The policy was duly filled up, executed, and sealed by W., and retained as usual by W. till called for. On the premium becoming due B. was asked for payment, but he said it was a mistake, and on being assured it was not, and on the policy being shown to him executed, he sent to W. and asked that the policy might be cancelled. W. thereon indorsed a memorandum cancelling the policy. The ship was afterwards lost, and X. sued W. on the policy:

Held (reversing the judgment of the Ex. Ch.), that the policy took complete effect from the time it was sealed and executed, though still remaining in the hands of W.; that B. had no implied authority to cancel it, and therefore that X. was entitled to recover.

It is no part of the ordinary duty of an insurance broker to cancel a policy once validly and completely entered into.

This was an appeal from a judgment of the Ex. Ch., affirming a judgment of the C. P. on a special case.

An action was brought on a valued time policy of insurance for 1000*l.* on the ship Leonidas, by the appa. against the respa. The pta., who traded as the Greek and Oriental Steam Navigation Company, had employed a broker named Lascaridi, on the 25th April 1861, to effect an insurance on the ship Leonidas from England to the Baltic. Lascaridi applied to the defts. who are an insurance company, and they agreed to become insurers to the extent of 3000*l.* for the season, at eight guineas per cent., and a slip was accordingly prepared by Lascaridi and initialed by the defts.' clerk.

Before any policy was actually prepared, the pta. became desirous to be off that insurance, and in lieu of it, to obtain an insurance for all seas for a year, from 30th April at ten guineas, and accordingly on the 29th April 1861 they wrote to Lascaridi as follows:

Please cancel Leonidas insurance, and insure the same for all the year, and for all seas; 4000*l.* valued 12,000*l.*, with other policies at 1*l.* 10*s.*

Lascaridi thereupon applied to the defts., who agreed, at his request, "to be off" that insurance, and the slip for 3000*l.* was destroyed accordingly, and another slip prepared by Lascaridi in conformity with his instructions from the pta., and initialed by defts.' clerk for 1000*l.* A separate slip was made out by Lascaridi for 1000*l.* and left with defts.' company at their office, in order that a policy might in the usual course be made out by them from it.

In the case of insurance companies, the slip is always prepared by the broker, and the policy is afterwards prepared and filled up from the slip by the officers of the company, and the policy, when executed, is kept by the company "until sent for by the assured or his broker."

The custom between insurance companies and insurance brokers is for the company to give credit to the broker for the premium, and where an insurance is effected for cash, or on a cash account, a month's credit is given, that is, all premiums for insurances effected during each month are payable on the 6th of the succeeding month; and the course is to make out prior to the expiration of the credit, and send to the broker at the end of the month, a debit note for the amount of the premiums due, less a discount and brokerage of 1*l.* per cent.

Lascaridi was accordingly debited in the books of the defts.' company on the 1st May with 106*l.*, and 2*l.* stamp.

On the 1st May, the pta. paid to Lascaridi the premium and stamp duty on the entire insurance. In the course of a few days afterwards a policy dated the 1st May 1861, in the form usually adopted by the defts.' company, was filled up from the said last-mentioned slip, and was signed, sealed, and delivered, by two directors of the defts.' company, but was according to the usual course of business retained by the company in their own custody until sent for by the assured or his broker. On the 8th June a debit note for the premium and stamp duty upon the policy, less the discount, was sent to Lascaridi's office, with a request for payment. On presenting the debit note to one of Lascaridi's clerks, the messenger was informed that no premium was due, and upon a second request, accompanied by a statement of the name of the vessel, and the rate of premium being sent to Lascaridi's office, the messenger of the defts. was told by the clerk that it ought not to have gone forward, and subsequently a clerk of Lascaridi's called at defts.' office and said that the policy had gone forward under mistake, and requested that it might be cancelled.

A memorandum of cancellation was thereupon indorsed upon the policy, and signed by two directors and the secretary of the defts.' company. It was agreed that Lascaridi should be debited with the expenses of the stamp, and the policy so indorsed was handed to Lascaridi's clerk in order that Lascaridi might obtain a remission of the stamp duty.

The ship was afterwards lost, and the pta., who were entirely ignorant of the arrangement for cancellation of the policy made by Lascaridi, and who never authorised it, or received back any part of the premium which they had paid for the insurance of the Leonidas, brought their action against the defts. on the policy for the amount insured with them. On the trial of the cause, a verdict was found for the defts., the question being reserved whether the policy, which purported to be under the seals of two directors of the company, had ever been executed, or, if executed, had been cancelled. The Court of C.P. were of opinion with the defts., holding that the policy in question never was perfectly delivered, so as to vest a right of action in the pta., and that the original executory contract for the last insurance had been rescinded before breach.

The Ex. Ch. affirmed the judgment of the Court of C.P., the majority being Pollock, C. B. and Martin, Bramwell, and Channell, BB.; the minority being Blackburn and Mellor, JJ.

The pta. now appealed, and the following learned judges attended the argument—viz., Willes, Blackburn, Mellor, JJ., Pigott, B., and Smith, J.

Sir G. Honyman, Q. C. and Watkin Williams for the appa.

Bruce, Q. C. and Archibald for the respa.

At the conclusion of the arguments the House put to the learned judges the following question:

Whether, on the facts stated in the special case, the Victoria Fire and Marine Insurance Company were, when the ship Leonidas was lost, liable as insurers to the pta. on the policy, or alleged policy, in the pleadings mentioned? Is it to be answered?

H. OF L.]

XENOS v. WICKHAM.

[H. OF L.]

that the ship Leonidas was totally lost on the 1st Sept. 1861.

The learned Judges having asked time to consider, afterwards returned the following opinions:—

M. SMITH, J.—I answer the question of your Lordships in the negative, on the ground that there never was, as it seems to me, a complete and available contract of insurance. I assume it to be clear that the slip does not create a valid contract of insurance, and that it is only of avail as a proposal, or an order for a complete contract or policy of insurance. I apprehend it to be equally clear that the contract is not complete until the policy is executed, and delivered to and accepted by the assured, or some agent for him. This policy, although executed, was not in fact delivered out of the office of the resps., either to the assured or to his broker, Lascaridi, who had ordered it, and whilst it lay in the office, the intended insurance was by the broker put an end to, on the ground that it had been put forward in mistake. I assume, in favour of the apps., that if the contract of insurance had been complete Lascaridi had no authority to rescind the contract; but I assume also in favour of the resps. that whilst it was incomplete Lascaridi had authority to intercept its completion. The whole case, therefore, is reduced to the question, which is mainly one of fact, whether, after the policy was executed, and before it came to the hands of the assured or his broker, the contract was perfected. The apps.' case on this cardinal point wholly rests on the assumption that Lascaridi had made the officers of the company his agents to accept the delivery of the policy on his behalf. I think this is an assumption which is not warranted by the facts of the case. It arises from the very nature of the transaction that the person intending to insure, or his broker (when he acts through a broker), has a right to see the terms of the policy, and to object to them if he thinks fit. This right may, of course, be delegated by the person intending to insure, and I will assume by his broker also; but it seems to me that clear evidence of such delegation is necessary, and the person intending to insure cannot, I think, with reason, be presumed to have delegated it to the insurers, from the fact that the policy was left in the office of the company, and not sent for; and yet such a presumption must be made if the argument for the apps. is to prevail. The right to object to the terms of the instrument, which may obviously be of the utmost importance, would, if this presumption is made, be gone as soon as the directors have executed the policy and handed it to their own clerks. In the result I think that the assumption on which the apps.' case rests is not warranted by the evidence, and I confess it seems to me that consequences full of real danger to the interests of persons intending to insure would follow from a rule founded on such an assumption. I agree with my learned brothers who think that it is better to adhere to plain inferences of fact, than to attempt to remedy the inconveniences of a negligent mode of doing business by making the facts bend to the exigencies of the negligence.

PIGOTT, B.—My Lords, in answer to your Lordships' question—viz., "whether on the facts stated in the special case, the Victoria Fire and Marine Insurance Company were, when the ship Leonidas was lost, on Sept. 1, 1861, liable as insurers to the plts. on the alleged policy in the pleadings mentioned"—I answer that in my opinion they were so liable. The facts are very fully and accurately set forth in the judgment delivered by Blackburn, J., and reported at page 41 of the paper books, in which judgment I entirely agree. It is unnecessary for me to do more than refer to the more prominent ones in stating the grounds of my opinion. That opinion is based upon two considerations. First, I think there was a perfect and binding contract of insurance between the parties, dated on May 1; and, secondly, that it was never cancelled or made void as between the plts. and the defts. The whole difference between the parties has obviously arisen from the fraudulent conduct of Lascaridi, the plts.' broker; but it is equally clear, I think, that the plts. are not to be held responsible for, nor ought their rights to be affected by it. The authority with which Lascaridi was invested by the plts. was that of a broker employed to effect an insurance in the ordinary manner, with this additional circumstance only, that after he had bespoken the policy, and before it was filled up from the slip, he had express authority to procure an alteration in the terms of insurance. To that alteration the defts. acceded, and thereupon a second slip was initialed by them for the insurance in question (the former slip being destroyed). The case states in paragraph 12 what is the course of proceeding where, as in this case, an insurance company are the insurers. It is that "a separate slip is prepared by the broker of the assured, and the policy is afterwards prepared from it by the company, and is kept by them until sent for by the assured or his broker." A separate slip was in fact so prepared for this policy, and was left by Lascaridi at the defts.' office in order that a policy might be made out in the usual course by the defts. Then with regard to the premiums it is the custom for insurance companies to give credit to the brokers for them, and to debit them in account. This was done in the books of defts. on the 1st May, the day of signing the slip for this policy. On the same day Lascaridi sent to the plts. (his principals) an account in which he debited them with the premium and duty, and he also drew upon them at the same time for the amount. This draft was accepted by plts., and was paid at maturity. When they accepted this bill they were told by Lascaridi that the policy would be ready in a day or two. In a few days afterwards a policy in the form usually adopted by the defts.' company was filled up from the last slip, and was duly executed by two directors of the company. It bears date on the 1st May; it purports to have been signed, sealed, and delivered in the presence of a witness; it was, therefore, in form complete. In that state it continued in the custody of the defts. until the 8th June, when the defts. sent a debit note for the premium and stamp to Lascaridi's office. At the instance of Lascaridi they were then induced to cancel the policy, on the representation that it had been "put forward in error." This was a false statement on the part of Lascaridi (as we now know). It is on the circumstance of the policy remaining in the hands of the defts., as above stated, that the question depends, whether the transaction constituted a complete contract in law and fact or not. I am of opinion that it was complete. What inference might have been drawn from the fact of its so remaining if there were no explanation about it, it is unnecessary to consider; for we have in paragraph 12 the reason given; and that reason is, not that it awaited anything to be done upon it by the defts., or to be assented to by the plts., but that it was there only till sent for by the assured or his broker, or, in other words, that it remained there according to the trade usage or by a tacit understanding. This reason necessarily implies that in all other respects it was a completed transaction. But further, it is plain that the formal assent of the plts. was not wanting to any of the terms of the policy, for that was evidently intended to be and accordingly was made out in the defts.' usual form, filled up with the particulars from the slip. But further, the defts. acted upon the policy

XENOS v. WICKHAM.

[H. OF L.]

as a perfected transaction, when on the 8th June they demanded payment of the premium for which they had given credit to the broker. In the face of this demand I confess it seems startling that they can be heard to say that there was no complete contract subsisting at that period. It was in form complete, and was shown by the conduct of all the parties to it to be believed and intended by them all (apart from Lascaridi's fraud) to be completely in operation also. It seems, therefore, to be reduced to this, viz., was it essential that the deed should be given out of the defts.' possession in order to its perfect delivery as an operative instrument? I know of no such necessity in law or good sense. Sheppard, in his Touchstone, writing of the requisites of a good deed, treats, fifthly, of delivery as a matter of fact to be tried by jurors (vol. 1, p. 54, 7th edit.), and by the whole context shows that it is a question of intention. He says, at p. 57, that "Delivery is either actual, i.e., by doing something and saying nothing, or else verbal, i.e., by saying something and doing nothing, or it may be by both; and either of these may make a good delivery and perfect deed." Doe dem. Garnons v. Knight is an authority most satisfactory on this subject, and it is only necessary to quote one passage from Bayley, J.'s judgment. He says, "When an instrument is formally sealed and delivered, and there is nothing to qualify the delivery but the keeping the deed in the hands of the executing party, nothing to show that he did not intend it to operate immediately, it is a valid and effectual deed, and the delivery to the party who is to take by it, or to any person for his use, is not essential." This passage seems to be exactly applicable to the facts of the present case, with this addition, that there is here not only nothing to qualify the delivery, but, as above suggested, much to show that the defts. did intend it to be unqualified, and a deed in full operation. The only remaining question which could arise, viz., whether the plts. were bound by the fraudulent conduct of Lascaridi in procuring the cancellation of the policy, was not much urged at your Lordships' bar, although it had been relied upon at Nisi Prius and in the Court of C. P. It is a proposition clearly not sustainable. The act was without authority, express or implied; and it is enough to say upon it that Lascaridi was the broker employed to procure a policy, and from that employment it is impossible to imply an authority to cancel it. Then he certainly had no express authority, as is admitted by paragraph 31 of the special case. I therefore answer your Lordships' question in favour of the plts., and in the affirmative.

MELLOR, J.—My Lords, I answer the question put by your Lordships to the Judges in the affirmative. I carefully attended to the arguments urged by the learned counsel who appeared for the parties in this case at the bar of your Lordships' House, but I confess that the observations then addressed to your Lordships did not affect the conclusion at which I arrived when the case was heard by the judges in the Court of Ex. Ch. I do not venture to repeat the observations which I then made, but I humbly refer your Lordships to the judgment which was then read for me by my brother Blackburn, and which is set forth in the printed case. My judgment depends upon the facts which I consider to be admitted by the case, viz., that the policy in question was prepared by the defts. in conformity with the instructions of the plts., given through their broker Lascaridi; that by the mode of dealing between the plts.' broker and the defts., the amount of the premium and the stamp must, as against the defts., be treated as paid; that the policy was duly executed and delivered as a deed by the defts., who did everything that they intended to do to complete such execution and delivery, and that it was merely kept in their custody until called for by the assured or their broker. The plts., as I think, were bound by it because it was prepared in conformity with their instructions. The defts. were bound by it, because they had accepted the terms and mode of payment of the premium and stamp, and acted upon the instructions of the plts., and done everything which they intended to do by way of execution and delivery of the policy as a deed, and retained it only for safe custody until sent for by the assured in the ordinary course of business.

BLACKBURN, J.—I answer your Lordships' question in the affirmative. Two questions are involved in your Lordships' question. First, whether the policy before the 8th June was so executed as to bind the defts.' company to the plts.; second, whether the transaction between the defts.' company and Lascaridi (the plts.' broker) operated so as to release the company from the obligation they had contracted to the plts., supposing them to have done so. I have already, in the judgment I delivered in the court below, expressed the reasons for my opinion at length. That judgment is to be found in the report, 13 C. B., N. S., 451 (where it is more accurately printed than in the appendix to the present case). And as I have not been induced by anything I have heard at your Lordships' bar to alter the opinion I then expressed, I think it better to refer your Lordships to that printed opinion than to repeat again the reasons I there gave. I have had an opportunity of perusing the opinions of my brothers Willes and Smith, and, if I understand them rightly, they agree with me in thinking that if the policy was binding before the 8th June, what occurred subsequently would not discharge the company. I shall therefore say nothing more on that branch of the question. As to the other branch, I would wish to call your Lordships' attention to what I think are the real points in controversy. They are, I think, two; one of fact, the other of law. The question of fact is, I think, this: Was the policy really in fact intended by both sides to be finally executed and binding from the time when the directors of the defts.' company affixed their seals to it, and left it in their office; or was it, in fact, intended that the assured or their brokers should exercise a subsequent discretion as to whether they would accept it or not? If I thought that the parties did not in fact intend it to be then finally binding, I do not think there would be any magic in the law to make it binding, contrary to their intention; but I submit to your Lordships that the statements in the 12th paragraph of the case as to what is stated to be "always" the practice, and the statements in the 15th and 18th paragraphs as to what was done in this particular case, show that the intention of both parties was, that the policy, when drawn up by the company in conformity with the instructions in the advice slip sent in by the broker, should be finally binding as soon as executed by the officers of the company. It was not intended by either side that anything more should be done, but that they meant that the policy from that time should be binding, and should lie in the company's office as the property of the assured till sent for by them, and then be handed over to their messenger. It seems that some of the judges take a different view of the fact, and think it really was intended that the policy should not be finally binding till something more was done by the assured. Your Lordships will decide which is the true view of the facts. Then, assuming that the intention really was that the policy should be binding as soon as executed, and should be kept by the company as a bailee for the assured, the question of law arises, whether the policy could in law be operative until the company parted with the physical possession of the deed. I can on this part of the case do little more than state to your Lordships my opinion, that no particular technical form of words or acts is necessary to render an instrument the deed of the party sealing it. The mere affixing seal does not render it a deed; but as soon as there are acts or words sufficient to show that it is intended by the party to be executed as his deed presently binding on him, it is sufficient. The most apt and expressive mode of indicating such an intention is to hand it over, saying, "I deliver this as my deed;" but any other words or acts that sufficiently show that it was intended to be finally executed will do as well. And it is clear on the authorities, as well as the reason of the thing, that the deed is binding on the obligor before it comes into the custody of the obligee, nay, before he even knows of it; though, of course, if he has not previously assented to the making of the deed, the obligee may refuse it. In Butler and Baker's case, 8 Rep. 266, it is said: "If A. make an obligation to B., and deliver it to C. to the use of B., this is the deed of A. presently; but if C. offer to B., there B. may refuse it in pais, and thereby the obligation will lose its force." I cannot perceive how it can be said that the delivery of the policy to the clerks of the debt's company, to keep till the assured sent for it, and then to hand to it to their messenger, was not a delivery to them to the use of the assured. There is neither authority nor principle for qualifying the statement in Butler and Baker's case, by saying that C. must not be a servant of A., though of course that is very material in determining the question whether it was "delivered to C. to B.'s use," which I consider to be, in other words, whether it was shown that it was intended to be finally executed as binding the obligor at once, and to be thenceforth the property of B. In the present case the assured could not have refused the deed in pais, for it was drawn up in strict pursuance of the authority given by them in the slip set out in par. 15; and I think a prior authority is at least as good as a subsequent assent. That question, however, does not arise, as they did not refuse it in pais. No authority, I think, has been cited which supports the position that there is a technical necessity for some one who is agent of the assured taking corporal possession of a policy under seal before it can be binding, though intended by both parties to be so. I think it would be very inconvenient, and would work great injustice, if such were the law. I must leave it to your Lordships to determine whether it is so or not.

WILLES, J.—My Lords, I answer the question in the negative, that upon the facts stated in the special case the Victoria Fire and Marine Insurance Company were not, when the ship Leonidas was lost, liable as insurers to the plts. on the policy or the alleged policy in the pleadings mentioned. Assuming, as upon the statement it must be assumed, that the broker had no authority to revoke this policy if once completed so as to be the contract of and binding upon both parties, the question is, whether it ever was so completed? In dealing with this question as a practical one, it must be borne in mind that albeit consent not corporal possession makes the contract, yet the plain duty of the broker is not merely to bespeak but to procure the policy, and to procure it upon his own credit. A loose way of business upon trust cannot abrogate any part of that duty, or make up for the consequence of neglecting it; and, indeed, taking the practice alleged to prevail as a whole, it is for the most part, viz., the insurances affected at Lloyd's, consistent with the duty of the broker to effect the policy in such a manner that his employer, or he on behalf of his employer, should have the policy. In case of insurance at Lloyd's no difficulty can arise, for the broker sends round the policy, and procures the signatures. When the policy is effected with a company, therefore, if analogy is to prevail, the broker ought to call for the policy. A careless practice, not stated to have grown into a known usage of trade, may exist of not asking for the policy, but if this be so it is pure negligence. Nor can it be doubted that the employer in such case, equally as in that of insurance at Lloyd's, is entitled to have the policy in his broker's hands. Nor could the broker, in case of any damage arising for want of a policy, or of a proper policy, through his default in not asking for it, or looking to see that it was in order, resist an action such as was brought by the employers in Turpin v. Bilton, 5 M. & G. 455. The statutes requiring contracts of marine insurance to be in writing and stamped (35 Geo. 3, c. 64, s. 11; 55 Geo. 3, c. 144, ss. 4, 5) annul contracts not so framed, consequently a marine policy or contract for a marine policy to be valid must be in writing, which, by the assent of both parties, shall represent the contract between them. But for the decided cases, it might have been supposed that upon the slip being completed there was a contract on the part of the assurers to prepare and hand over a policy according to the slip, and that, although, because of the statutes, no action could be maintained as upon a policy of insurance, yet an action might be maintained for not preparing a policy. And causes have even been tried without objection upon the notion that the insurance is complete from the date of the slip. But the law as settled by the decisions upon the construction of the statutes referred to is, that as there can be no valid insurance or contract for an insurance unless by writing with the statutory requisites, the slip by itself has no binding force. Thus it has been held, that, notwithstanding the slip, the proposed assurer, upon the one hand, can insist upon being off, and can retract his order, and refuse to accept the policy (Warwick v. Slade, 8 Camp. 127, where the employer retracted the broker's authority after the slip was signed, though before the policy was completed), and, on the other hand, that the slip imposes no liability upon the proposed insurer, and there is no remedy against him until the policy is complete (Parry v. The Great Ship Company, 4 B. & S. 556). It follows that the slip, though complete, is no contract nor even part of a contract of insurance, but a mere proposal that a policy of insurance shall be entered into in futuro, and in case of insurance with a company, a request that the policy shall be prepared at the office. Does it follow that when a policy is prepared in alleged compliance with the request it shall be, without more, the contract of both the parties? That cannot be the rule, because it must be open to the customer, or to his broker, when the negotiation takes place through a broker to object, and especially in the case of company policies, which do not always follow Lloyd's form, that the policy is wrong. In case of war or a dangerous voyage, or indeed any case with a special provision, disputes may easily arise. In this very case a question might have been raised upon the omission of the running down clause, which has been so commonly added in the margin since Devaux v. Salvador, 4 A. & E. 520: see Taylor v. Dewar, 5 B. & S. 58. It is thus obvious that there must be power to object or refuse assent to the policy when prepared by the company; and inasmuch as such objection or refusal touches the question, policy, or no policy, it lies within the scope of the broker's authority. He may give a bad reason for his refusal, as the broker in the principal case is said to have done; but the badness of the reason assigned cannot take away from the effect of the act done, which, according to the maxim, must

XENOS v. WICKHAM.

[H. OF L.]

depend upon the power he had to do it, not upon the soundness of the reason he gave for doing it. By way of removing this difficulty, various suggestions have been made in argument. One was that the case is analogous to a conveyance of property where assent is presumed until disclaimer. I am not aware, however, that this doctrine of assumed assent has ever been applied to the case of a mercantile contract, with something to be done on both sides, such as to insure upon terms which may or may not be correctly expressed, in consideration of being paid or allowed to debit in amount a premium which may or may not be commensurate to the risk. In the case of a simple benefit conferred, to be taken as it is or not at all, like a bond or a release, there might be room for such a presumption, though it is difficult even there to recognise a complete contract before assent. But the presumption is out of place as applied to a contract with mutual obligations, which must be matter of bargain, and must be incomplete so long as either mind may dissent. Indeed, the suggested analogy to conveyances of visible property, if it held good, would not help the plt., but rather tend to illustrate the necessity of subsequent assent. Thus, if B. order of a watchmaker a watch of the same make and materials as that of A., with B.'s name upon it, and the watchmaker makes it accordingly, intending it for B., and puts B.'s name upon it, so that it is as much as it can be the very watch bargained for, yet without a new assent on B.'s part it does not vest in him; the watchmaker cannot make B. take to it, nor B. compel its delivery. See the argument in Atkinson v. Bell, 8 B. & C. 277. And in like manner as to a contract to be prepared in futuro, if goods are bought, to be paid for by the buyer's promissory note or cheque payable to the seller or order, and the goods are delivered and accepted, and the buyer makes the note or cheque, and leaves it with his servant, to be handed to the seller when he calls for it, that transaction is not enough to vest the note or cheque in the seller, and the buyer may, without more, retake the note or cheque from his servant, and put it into the fire. It is clear, therefore, that the doctrine of presumed assent to a conveyance will not help, and that the mere previous request (even though binding as part of a contract), that a contract, which to be valid must be in writing, shall be prepared by one of the parties proposing to contract for the other, has not the effect of vesting a right in any contract in writing if and when so prepared, and much less can a previous colloquy not binding as part of a contract have that effect. As another way of getting out of the difficulty, it was suggested to assume that the insurance company or servants of the company were made agents of the employer of the broker, for the purpose of assenting to the policy on his part. That would, however, be simply assuming the thing that is not, for the sake of shutting out an unpleasant consequence of the thing that is. To hold an auctioneer, or common broker, or other independent go-between, to be authorised to complete the contract for both buyer and seller, is but a necessary conclusion of fact from his being their common agent. To reason thus as to a clerk or servant of one of the parties employed by him for attending to his business in a dependent capacity involves a contradiction, and has no foundation of fact. These sources of light thus failing, let the transaction itself be examined with attention. It has been observed that the slip amounts only to a proposal that a policy shall be prepared upon certain terms. Those terms, so far as they are to bind the insurer, commonly includes some known uniform ones, as to which there can be no question, but also others applying to the particular transaction, sometimes obscurely worded, sometimes imperfectly understood, and as to which disputes may arise. This consideration alone keeps the policy in fieri until objection is waived. On the other hand, the terms, so far as they are to bind the insured, include, besides the implied warranties, payment of premium either in cash or by being credited in account. If then the plt. had ordered the policy without the intervention of a broker, or obtaining credit for himself, he could not have insisted upon obtaining it without paying the company in cash. Had they offered him the policy, and he refused to pay for it, they might have treated the negotiation as at an end, and cancelled the proposed policy. Had the loss happened before he called for the policy and paid the premium, the same result would follow, though the office might not choose to take advantage of a short delay. So much for a cash transaction. If the office agreed to insure against the plt.'s promissory note at a month, like considerations would arise. Had the company in such case prepared the policy, and left it with their clerk, and the plt. had drawn the note, and left it with his clerk, it is difficult to see why, without more, the policy should vest in the plt., and not the note in the company, which, without more, it clearly would not. In the principal case the company were content to take the broker's credit instead of cash; that is to say, instead of stipulating for cash down they stipulated for the broker's allowing them to charge him in account with the premium; and this the broker, refusing to take to the policy, refused to allow them effectually to do, and so put the office in the same position as if they had stipulated for cash, and cash had not been paid. Some confusion has arisen from an attempt to deal with this case as if it were that of an agent of a named principal, undoing, without authority, a contract which he had completely effected in pursuance of his authority. The case ought not to be so regarded. The broker was an agent to procure a policy in consideration of a payment to be made to him by his employer, with whom directly the office had nothing to do, he taking care that the policy was effected upon the given terms and upon his credit, the office looking to him for payment, and having no claim against his employer. Inasmuch, then, as the broker had to exercise a judgment upon the sufficiency of the policy, it was necessarily within the scope of his authority to reject that prepared as not being one or the one ordered. When he does so properly his employer gets the benefit; when he does so improperly his employer has his remedy by action against the broker. But the office which dealt with the broker only, and stipulated for his taking to and being debited for such a policy, must, upon his rejecting it, and refusing to be debited in account with the premium thereupon, have an equal right to consider the negotiation at an end, and to cancel the proposed policy, as if cash had been stipulated for and refused. The transaction cannot properly be split up into parts. It stands upon the same footing as if, upon one and the same occasion, the broker had ordered the policy at the office, and whilst he waited for it the seals had been affixed to a form of policy in another room, and before he received or assented to the policy he had said, "Stay! I made a mistake. I decline to take up the policy, and you must not charge me in account with the premium." Whereupon the form was cancelled. No subsequent protest by the principal that his agent ought to have acted otherwise can avail him. His payment of the premium was not made to the office, but to his own ill-conducted broker, and his remedy must be against him. The office has not received and has been refused the premium; and it was in no default, because it acted upon the refusal of the broker, to whom the whole business of effecting the policy was left. The fallacy of the argument for the plts. consists in separating the preparation of the policy from the rejection of it by the broker, and thus splitting up into several contracts one of which is alleged to be authorised and the other not, what in reality, though distinct events in point of time, constituted together but one negotiation, which by reason of the misconduct of the plts.' agent was abortive. The question is thus answered in the negative.

XENOS v. WICKHAM.

[H. OF L.]

Cur. adv. vult.

The LORD CHANCELLOR.—My Lords, the difference of opinion which has prevailed among the learned judges in this case must necessarily diminish the confidence which I feel in the judgment I have formed upon it, more especially as that judgment is not in accordance with the views of the majority of the judges. The question is one more of fact than of law, and therefore in considering it it will be necessary to refer to the facts contained in the special case. The action was brought on a time policy of insurance which the plts. alleged had been effected with the Victoria Fire and Marine Insurance Company, represented upon the record by the deft., the chairman of the company, for 1000*l.* for twelve months, on the ship Leonidas, valued at 13,000*l.* In April 1861 the plts. employed an insurance broker of the name of Lascaridi for six months to the amount of 5000*l.* Lascaridi accordingly prepared a slip in the usual form, which was initialed in the customary manner by various underwriters and by a clerk of the deft.'s company on their behalf. In the case of private underwriters at Lloyd's it is customary to have only one slip, which is signed by different underwriters for the amounts for which they are willing to undertake the insurance. In the case of insurance companies a separate slip is always prepared for each company by the brokers of the assured, and the policy is afterwards prepared and filled up from the slip by the officers of the company, and is kept by the company until sent for by the assured or his broker. Before any policy was made out upon the slip left at the office of the deft.'s company, Lascaridi received a direction from the plts., dated the 29th April 1861, to "cancel Leonidas' insurance, and insure the same for all the year and for all seas, 4000*l.*, valued 13,000*l.*" Lascaridi after receipt of this order called at the office of the company, and told them he wished the insurance to be off, as he was going to re-insure the vessel for twelve months and for all seas. Accordingly, the slip left at the office was destroyed, and another slip was prepared by Lascaridi, which was signed by different underwriters and initialed by the same clerk of the company who had placed his initials upon the cancel slip. A separate slip was prepared by Lascaridi, and left with the company, in order that in the usual course the policy might be made out from it. Lascaridi on the signature of the new slip was debited in the books of the deft.'s company under date of the 1st May 1861 with 105*l.*, the amount of the premium, and 2*l.* the amount of stamp duty. The usage with respect to premiums upon insurances effected by brokers is clearly explained by Lord Ellenborough in Jenkins v. Power, 6 M. & S. 287, and by Bayley, J. in Power v. Butcher, 10 B. & Cr. 339. The late learned judge says: "According to the ordinary course of trade between the assured, the broker, and the underwriter, the assured do not in the first instance pay the premium to the broker, nor does the latter pay it to the underwriters. But as between the assured and the underwriters, the premiums are considered as paid. The underwriter, to whom in most instances the assured are unknown, looks to the broker for payment, and he to the assured. The latter pay the premiums to the broker only, as he is a middle man between the assured and the underwriters. On the 1st May Lascaridi sent to the plts. an account debiting them with the amount of premium and stamp duty, payable as on the insurance of the Leonidas, and drew upon the plts. a bill for four months, which was accepted and paid at maturity. A policy in the form usually adopted by the deft.'s company was filled up from the slip, and dated 1st May 1861. A fac simile of it forms part of the special case, and it appears to be in entire accordance with the slip. About the 8th June 1861 a debit note for the premiums was sent to Lascaridi's office, with a request for payment. On presenting this note at the office, a clerk there said that no premium was due, and upon a second application, the clerk said that the policy had not gone forward. This same day the clerk of Lascaridi called at the office of the deft.'s company and said that the policy had been put forward in error, and requested that it should be cancelled. A memorandum of cancellation was accordingly indorsed upon the policy, and signed by two of the directors of the company and by the secretary, and the policy so cancelled was handed to Lascaridi, in order to enable him to obtain a return of the stamp duty. The Leonidas was lost on the 1st Sept. 1861. On the following day a clerk of Lascaridi's called at the office of deft.'s company and said the policy was cancelled by mistake, and wished it to be reinstated. The company, however, having heard of the loss of the vessel, declined to comply with the request, and the present action was therefore commenced. It was admitted by the defts. that the plts. never at any time in fact authorised the cancellation of the policy, or were aware of it, nor did they ever receive back from Lascaridi any part of the premium nor any credit for the same. The questions which arise out of these facts are, first, whether there was a complete contract of insurance between the parties; and, secondly, if there were, whether it was afterwards cancelled by the plts.' authority. Upon the first question we have no evidence of the fact of execution of the policy except that which arises upon the face of the instrument itself, and upon the fact stated in the special case that the policy (which must be taken to mean the executed policy) is kept by the company until sent for by the assured or his broker. The policy purports to be signed, sealed, and delivered by two of the directors of the company, in the presence of Registrar Scaife, resident secretary. This statement on the face of the policy, that all acts were done to render the execution complete, which is acknowledged by the directors who executed it, must, I think, be taken to be conclusive against the company, that it was not only signed and sealed, but also delivered. We all know the formal mode of executing a deed by the words, "I deliver this as my act and deed," a form which, no doubt, or something equivalent to it, was observed on this occasion. The policy, most probably, was afterwards given to the secretary to be kept till called for. Now, although the policy was thus retained by the company when formal execution of it took place, they held it for the plts., whose property it became from that moment. It is a mistake to suppose, as some of the learned judges have done, that the policy wanted its complete binding effect till it was delivered to and accepted by Lascaridi. The usage of insurance companies to keep the policy until sent for by the assured or his broker, is not for the purpose of completing the instrument by a delivery personally to the party or his agent, but merely as a matter of convenience. And as to Lascaridi's acquiescence and acceptance being necessary to complete the contract, I apprehend that there is no ground for such an opinion. He was the broker and agent to the plts. to effect an insurance upon their vessel upon certain terms dictated by them.

H. OF L.]

XENOS v. WICKHAM.

[H. OF L.]

He prepared the slip according to his directions. When the policy was executed in exact conformity to his instructions his duty was so far discharged, and without the authority of the plts. he could not refuse to accept it. They had effected, through their agent, a complete binding contract, which they alone could have a right to abandon. It is hardly necessary, after the preceding observations, to say anything upon the second question as to the supposed cancellation of the policy. All the judges seem to have thought that, if the contract was binding, Lascaridi had no authority to cancel it. The company could not have been led, from anything in the previous transaction respecting the same vessel, to suppose that Lascaridi was authorised to act beyond the ordinary scope of the authority of a broker. It is one thing to cancel a slip which is merely the inception of a contract, and to change the terms of the proposal for an insurance, and an entirely different one to release the underwriters from their liability upon a policy. It is quite clear that Lascaridi had no authority from the plts. to relinquish on their behalf the benefit of a contract to which they were entitled, and that the company had no reason to suppose that he possessed any such authority. I think that the judgment of the Ex. Ch. was wrong, and ought to be reversed, and that judgment should be entered for the plt.

LORD CRANWORTH.—My Lords, my noble and learned friend has gone so fully into the facts of this case that I shall not further advert to them; but I shall assume that they are present to the minds of your Lordships. There is one part of this case which seems to me to admit of no doubt. If the policy was so executed as to have become a complete instrument binding on the resps., and giving a good right of action to the apps. in the event of a loss, I think it is clear that they could not cancel it at the instance of Lascaridi. They had a right to consider him as having authority to do all which a broker can do in discharge of his duty in effecting a policy, and they might safely settle with him in case of a loss, if that be the ordinary mercantile usage; but there is no suggestion that it is part of the ordinary duty or power of a broker to cancel an agreement once validly and completely entered into. The only semblance of plausibility in support of such an argument was the fact that he had on a previous occasion had an authority expressly delegated to him by the apps. not to cancel a policy, but to cancel a slip. They had originally proposed through Lascaridi to effect a policy on the Leonidas with the resps. on terms materially differing from that ultimately acted on, and a slip had been signed and handed to the resps. for that purpose five days before the signing of the slip on the 30th April; but on that latter day, and before anything had been done, Lascaridi called on the resps. at the instance of the apps., expressing their desire to substitute the terms of insurance ultimately acted on for those originally proposed. To this the resps. agreed, and the slip dated the 30th April 1861 was accordingly prepared, and left with the company as the groundwork of the policy to be prepared by them. It was suggested that the apps. had thus authorised Lascaridi to make this important change in the nature of the contract to be entered into, and the company might reasonably suppose he had authority to sanction the cancellation of a policy already validly binding on the assurers. To this I cannot accede, as it is admitted that Lascaridi had not in fact any authority to cancel the policy of the 1st May. If it was a binding instrument his act cannot affect the apps. unless it was done according to some ordinary course of business which would warrant it. I can see nothing whatever to warrant such an assumption; and, indeed, the point was not much insisted on. The point really argued was, that the circumstances are not such as to show that any absolute liability ever attached on the resps. The policy it is said did not become a binding contract on the resps. until it had been taken from the office by the apps. or their broker, and been accepted by them as the terms by which they were to be bound. There is no direct evidence as to what actually took place when the policy was, according to the practice as stated in the language of the special case, filled up from the slip by the officers of the company, but as the policy purports to have been signed, sealed, and delivered by two directors of the company in the presence of the registrar, in pursuance of the powers and directions contained in the deed of settlement of the company, the fair inference is that that was the course prescribed by the deed, and that that course had been duly followed; but as to the effect of what was so done the parties differ. The app. contends that by thus signing, sealing, and delivering the policy the directors made it an instrument thenceforth binding on the company. On the other hand, the company (now resps.) contend that until the policy was taken away by the assurer or his broker it did not become binding on them. This latter view is that which has been taken by the great majority of the learned judges, and it is therefore not without some hesitation that I have arrived at a different conclusion, and that I concur with the opinions of the small majority of the judges who heard the case when it was argued at your Lordships' bar. I am of opinion that, from the moment when the directors, acting, as I infer they did, in pursuance of the powers and duties conferred and imposed on them by the deed of settlement, executed the policy, it became absolutely binding on the company, and that it was not necessary to give it binding efficacy that it should be taken away by the app. or his broker. I come to this conclusion on the following grounds:—In the first place the efficacy of a deed depends on its being sealed and delivered by the maker of it, not on his ceasing to retain possession of it. This as a general proposition of law cannot be controverted. It is not affected by the circumstance that the maker may so deliver it as to suspend or qualify its binding effect. He may declare that it shall have no effect until a certain time has arrived, or till some condition has been performed, but when the time has arrived, or the condition has been performed, the delivery becomes absolute, and the maker of the deed becomes absolutely bound by it, whether he has parted with the possession or not. Until the specified time has arrived, or the condition has been performed, the instrument is not a deed: it is a mere escrow. If, therefore, the directors who executed this policy delivered it only conditionally, that is, to take effect only when taken away by the app. or his broker, then, as it was not so taken away, it never became operative. But I can discover nothing leading to the inference that there was any such condition attached to the delivery. The expression in the case that the policy is kept by the company until sent for by the assured or his broker, can only mean that this is the ordinary course of practice. But such a practice cannot, without more, have the effect of converting that which would otherwise be an absolute, into a conditional delivery—of converting delivery as a deed into delivery as an escrow. The practice referred to is at least inconsistent with the hypothesis of delivery as an escrow. A policy of this company can only be executed (as I presume) when a certain number of the directors and officers of the company are assembled, and this explains why it is executed in the absence of the party assured. The practice assumes previous assent on the part of the assured to the policy to be executed. It is not executed. It is not the practice that the assured should call for or examine the policy before he takes it away, but that he should send for it, evidently treating it as an instrument complete when it is taken away from the office. If, when it has been sent to him, he should discover that it is not conformable with the slip, his only remedy would be a remedy in equity to get it corrected according to the real meaning of the parties. I know of nothing intermediate between a deed and an escrow. If the policy, when signed, sealed, and delivered by the directors, does not thereby immediately become the deed of the company, I do not see when and how it afterwards acquires that character. The practice is, that it should be kept by the company till sent for by the assured or his broker, not till the assured has had an opportunity of examining it, so as to ascertain that it conforms with the slip. It can hardly be argued that, after the assured has sent for and obtained possession of it, the company is not bound by it, even if it is not in conformity with the slip. Suppose the liability of the company according to the slip was to endure for a year, but that by the policy it is restricted to six months. The assured, on receiving the policy and discovering the error, might well object, and insist on having a different policy; but yet, if a loss should happen within the six months, it surely cannot be doubted that the company would be liable on the policy actually executed. So if a loss should occur while the policy remains in the office, in consequence of the assured having carelessly forgotten to send for it. This can only be because it had been completely executed, though never seen and approved, by the assured, and, if executed, I am of opinion that it became complete when signed, sealed, and delivered. If the usage had been that it should, after being signed, sealed, and delivered, remain in the hands of the secretary till the assured or his broker had done some act signifying his approbation of it, that might have raised a question whether until that approbation had been expressed it was more than an escrow. But no such usage is stated, on the contrary, the thing sent for by the assured or his broker is, as I have already stated, clearly looked to as something complete before it is taken from the office, not as a document to be made perfect afterwards by some act of the assured. On these grounds I have come to the conclusion, after much consideration, that the three learned Judges who were the majority giving their opinion to your Lordships were right, and so that judgment ought to be for the appa.

JUDICIAL COMMITTEE OF THE PRIVY COUNCIL.

THE VELASQUEZ.

Ship—Collision—Negligence of pilot—Contributory negligence of crew—Onus of proof.

Where there are acts of negligence on the part of the master and crew which may have contributed to a collision as well as fault on the part of the pilot, it is the duty of the owners to show that the master and crew did not contribute in part to the accident, as for example by not keeping a sufficient look-out, so as to give the pilot the earliest possible information of an approaching vessel.

This was an appeal from an interlocutory sentence or decree of the High Court of Admiralty.

The cause arose out of a collision which occurred between the barque Star of Ceylon, of which the respa. are the owners, and the screw steamship Velasquez, of which the appa. are the owners.

The collision took place about 7.30 p.m. on the 11th Oct. 1866, off the coast of Kent, between St. Margaret's Bay and Kingsdown.

The Star of Ceylon, which was a barque of 380 tons measurement, was on a voyage from London to Point de Galle, with a general cargo, and the Velasquez, which is a screw steamer of 811 tons register, was on a voyage from Malaga, in Spain, to the port of London, with a general cargo.

At the time when the vessels sighted one another the course of the Velasquez, as given by herself, was N.E. by N., and the course of the Star of Ceylon, as given by herself, was S.W. by S.

The wind was blowing a fresh breeze from E. by S., and the weather was clear but dark. The Star of Ceylon was under all plain sail except her mainsail, and (as was stated in her pleadings) was going through the water at the rate of between six and seven knots an hour. The Velasquez was under steam alone, and was going through the water at the rate of about six knots an hour.

Under these circumstances it was the duty of the Velasquez to keep out of the way of the Star of Ceylon, and it was the duty of the Star of Ceylon to keep her course.

The Velasquez was in charge of a duly licensed pilot, who had been taken on board her by compulsion of law.

The Star of Ceylon, when first seen, was about three-quarters of a mile off, and was on the star-board bow of the Velasquez. The helm of the Velasquez was starboarded by order of her pilot, and upon the red light of the Star of Ceylon coming into view, the helm of the Velasquez was by order of her pilot put hard a-starboard, and her engines were stopped, but a collision, nevertheless, ensued.

The owners of the Velasquez, the appa., set up two main grounds of defence: first, that the collision was occasioned by the Star of Ceylon having improperly ported her helm instead of having kept her course; and secondly, that if the Velasquez was in any degree in fault, the fault was solely that of her pilot, and that as she had been taken on board by compulsion of law, the appa. were not liable for the damage occasioned by the collision.

It was admitted on the part of the respa., the owners of the Star of Ceylon, that the helm of the Star of Ceylon was ported and put hard a-port, but it was alleged on her behalf that her helm was not ported until the Velasquez had approached so near to her on her port bow as to involve risk of collision, and that such porting was effected with a view to lessening the effect of the blow.

The evidence was taken orally in open court, and the learned judge of the court below was assisted by two of the elder brethren of the Trinity Corporation.

The cause was heard on the 14th Nov. 1866, when the learned judge of the court below pronounced the Velasquez to have been solely to blame, and that the fault was not solely that of the pilot, inasmuch as the crew of the Velasquez were to blame for not having kept a sufficient look-out, he therefore made the usual decree condemning the appa. and their hull in the damages proceeded for. His judgment was as follows:—

Dr. LUSHINGTON.—There is no doubt whatever as to the law in this case, and as to what were the respective duties of the two vessels at the time when they were approaching each other. But I have very great doubt as to what were the actual facts to which I must request your particular consideration. This is a collision between a vessel going down Channel and a Spanish steamer coming up. The state of the weather, according to all representations, is, that it is was a fine evening. The collision occurred about half-past seven. There is nothing in the state of the weather which requires particular observation, nor does it appear that there was any circumstance at all of any importance before the collision itself. I will now direct your attention to the conduct of the Star of Ceylon, the vessel that was going down the Channel. She was going down the Channel, as you have heard, at the rate of about six knots an hour, her course was westward, she had the wind from the eastward, and had the tide with her at the time. She had therefore every advantage; and, according to her own statement, which I must presume for the moment is true, she descried the steamer, the Velasquez, at a very considerable distance. We are so accustomed to hear distance variously described by witnesses on board ship, that I say nothing about the amount of the distance at which the steamer was seen, but she was seen from a very ample distance to enable the Star of Ceylon to do what she thought fit to do. Now these two vessels approach each other, and the first question in dispute is, did the steamer approach the Star of Ceylon on her starboard side or on her port side? I will assume for a moment that she approached her, according to the statement of the Star of Ceylon, on the port side. It appears, according to the evidence of her master, that the vessels approached each other in nearly opposite directions; then he says, observing the steamer's light to be a little on the port bow, from a point and a half to two points, he directed the person at the helm to keep the light on the port side. Now what did the master mean to say, or mean to be understood, by that direction? If it was, as has been contended, an instruction to alter his helm and to change his course, then undoubtedly the master of the vessel was to blame; but I have very great doubt whether that was the meaning of the master's orders to the man at the helm. I am inclined very much to think that the order to the man at the helm was to this effect—"We are now meeting each other in such and such a direction. I presume the course of the steamer will continue unaltered. I mean our course to be unaltered. The present course of the steamer is on the port side, you keep that course"—and that, in point of fact, that order was in no way directing the course of the vessel to be altered. Then the facts really appear to be that these two vessels advanced, coming nearer one to the other, and that at a later period, when the master says he apprehended danger (and whether he properly apprehended danger or not is entirely for your decision), he first ported the helm, and then, at a short interval, finding the two vessels were approaching each other, and that there was danger of collision, he ordered the helm hard a-port, but that in consequence of the Velasquez having starboarded her helm, according to his statement, and altered her course by passing from the port side to the starboard side, in consequence of that alteration, the collision took place. If you believe that to be the state of the case, I think we can have no difficulty in finding the steamer to blame. Whether it was or was not the fault of the pilot is to be considered presently. I come now to the course of the steamer. She was under the care of a regular pilot, proceeding up Channel, the wind against her, the tide against her, under steam only, proceeding to the port of London, and she descried the Star of Ceylon at a comparatively short distance compared with the distance at which it appears the Star of Ceylon had seen her, the Velasquez. Now, the first question is, Was there an adequate look-out on board the Velasquez? There was a person on the look-out, no doubt, but I must say I have very great difficulty in understanding the evidence, as it is given, with regard to the efficiency of the look-out. The next question is, Was the Velasquez on the port side or on the starboard side? According to the rules, as you well know, she had a perfect right to go either on the port side or on the starboard side, but to keep out of the way of the sailing vessel. Are you of opinion that she was proceeding, we will say, nearly ahead, and that she did, at too late a period, starboard her helm; and that, in order to avoid the collision which subsequently occurred, the helm of the Star of Ceylon was ported? Then, with regard to the last question. If the steamer is to blame, did that blame attach on the pilot or on the ship? I can see no reason at the present moment to say (with the exception whether there was a good look-out or not) that any blame attached to the ship. I should be inclined to think, if the helm was put improperly to one side or the other by the order of the pilot, the blame would be exclusively that of the pilot. I ought to say one word about what you will find in the preliminary act with respect to the helm. It will be for you to consider whether there is any peculiarity in this helm (looking at the whole of the evidence) so great that the pilot was misled and mistaken when he gave the order, and that the effect of it was exactly the contrary to what he intended.

After consultation.—In this case we are of opinion that no blame attaches to the Star of Ceylon. We think that the whole blame attaches to the steamer, that blame attaches to the pilot, and that blame attaches to the crew who navigated, from the want of a good look-out.

The Velasquez now appealed.

Brett, Q. C. and Clarkson, for the app., contended that the collision was caused by the neglect of the Star of Ceylon to keep her course as she ought to have done; and if any one on board the Velasquez was to blame it was the pilot, for whose negligence the apps. were not liable.

Deane, Q. C. and Murphy, for the resps., contended that the Velasquez did not keep a proper look-out, and neglected to alter her course as she ought to have done, and so contributed to the accident, even though the pilot also was negligent.

Cur. adv. vult.

Sir W. ERLE.—This is an appeal on the part of the owners of the Spanish steamer, the Velasquez, against the sentence or decree of the High Court of Admiralty, which has pronounced that that vessel was in fault in running down the late barque, called the Star of Ceylon, and has condemned the apps. and their bail in the damages proceeded for, and costs of suit. The conflict of evidence is far less than generally occurs in cases of collision. The undisputed facts of the case are: that about half-past seven on the evening of the 11th Oct. last, the steamer, being in charge of a licensed pilot, was proceeding up Channel, steering north-east by north; whilst the barque was going down channel, heading south-west by south, and therefore on a course parallel to that of the steamer. The wind was east by south; each vessel was making about six knots an hour through the water; and the tide, which was against the steamer, was of course in favour of the barque. It is further admitted that at some time before the collision, the steamer starboarded her helm, or at least executed a manoeuvre which had the effect which starboarding a helm of the ordinary construction produces; and that the barque ported her helm. The result was a collision in which the barque being struck on the port bow by the stem of the steamer was sunk, her crew happily escaping on board the steamer. The case of the barque is thus stated:—The mast-head light of the steamer was first seen, at the distance of between three and four miles nearly a head, but a little on the port bow of the barque; her red or port light was subsequently made out in the same direction: she continued to approach the barque on her port bow, and in such a direction as to involve danger of a collision unless one of the vessels ported; and as no alteration was made in her course when the two vessels were so near that it was dangerous for the barque to keep on her course, the helm of the latter was ported. Very shortly after this had been done, and the vessels would otherwise have passed clear of each other, the steamship was noticed to be making towards the barque, and as the only means of avoiding a collision, or lessening the effect thereof, the helm of the barque was put hard a-port; but almost immediately afterwards the steamer having shut in her red and opened her green light, ran stem on into the barque," &c. And the contention of the plts., the owners of the barque, was, that the collision was attributable solely to the carelessness, negligence, and want of skill of those on board and in charge of the said steamship, more especially in their having omitted, either from want of a good look-out or otherwise, to take within sufficient time the proper measures to keep clear of the barque. The defence on the part of the steamer raised the following case:—"The barque was first seen at the distance of about three quarters of a mile from, and being from two to three points on the starboard bow of, the steamer, and with no light then visible on board the latter. The steamer starboarded by order of the pilot, and her head went off to port, and she kept out of the way of the barque; but the latter improperly deviated from her course, under a port-helm, and exhibited a red light to those on board the steamer, and caused danger of collision; whereupon, by order of the pilot, the steamer hard a-starboarded and stopped her engines; but the barque nevertheless ran into, and with her port bow before the fore rigging struck the steamer on her stem and starboard bow." And the contention of the defts. was that the collision was caused by the negligent and improper navigation of the barque. Another and distinct ground of defence was, that if the collision was in any way occasioned by anybody on board the steamer, it was occasioned solely by the licensed pilot, whose orders in respect of her navigation were promptly and implicitly obeyed by her master and crew. In the circumstances stated it was the duty of the steamer to keep out of the way of the sailing vessel; and provided she did so effectually, she was at liberty to do it either by starboarding or by porting her helm. On the other hand, it was the duty of the barque to keep her course, and she could be excused for deviating from it only by showing that it was necessary to do so in order to avoid immediate danger. The learned Judge of the High Court of Admiralty, after considering the evidence, with the aid of the Trinity Masters, came to the conclusion that no blame attached to the barque; that the whole blame attached to the steamer; that blame attached to the pilot; but that blame also attached to the crew, by reason of the want of a good look-out. At the close of the argument for the apps. their Lordships intimated their opinion that no ground had been made for disturbing this judgment in so far as it found that as between the colliding vessels the steamer was solely in fault. The conclusions which they drew from the evidence were: that the vessels were meeting port side to port side; that the steamer took no steps to avoid the barque until the vessels were very near each other; and that in these circumstances the barque was justified in porting her helm when she did port it; whilst, on the other hand, the starboarding of the helm of the steamer when it took place was a dangerous and improper manœuvre, and the immediate cause of the collision. Upon the question whether the court below was justified in holding that blame attached to the crew as well as to the pilot, their Lordships having heard both sides, reserved their judgment; and it is that question alone which we have now to determine. It has been established by a long course of decisions, both in the High Court of Admiralty and at this board, "that to entitle the owners of a ship which is under the charge of a licensed pilot to the benefit of the provision in the Act which exempts them from liability where the collision has been occasioned by the fault of the pilot, it lies upon them to prove that it was caused solely by his fault." To show to what extent this general burden lies upon the owners, it is sufficient to cite the case of the Schwalbe, 14 Moore, 241. There the cause of collision was an improper starboarding of the helm; an act of navigation presumably attributable to an order from the pilot. Yet the owners were held liable because they had failed to prove expressly that the order to starboard was given by the pilot. Lord Chelmsford, in delivering the judgment of this committee, said: "The owners therefore fail in the evidence necessary to transfer the responsibility from themselves; and without considering whether there was any negligent act or omission on the part of the crew of the Schwalbe, their Lordships think it sufficient to say that the owners have not succeeded in establishing that the collision is to be attributed solely (if at all) to the fault of the pilot." Again, the cases have clearly established that if, for any act or omission which contributed to the accident, the master or crew is too blame, then, although the pilot is also to blame, the owners are not exempted from liability. One of the strongest cases of this kind is that of the Christiana, 7 Moore, 160, for there every act of omission (and there were several of them) which contributed to the accident was an act for which the pilot was to blame; yet, inasmuch as for one of them, viz., the omission to strike and haul down certain yards and masts, the master was held to be also in fault, the owners were not exonerated from liability. On the other hand, such cases as the George, 4 Notes of Cases, 161, and the Atlas, 5 Notes of Cases, 50, seem to show, that if it be proved on the part of the owners that the pilot was in fault, and there is no sufficient proof that the master or crew were also in fault in any particular which contributed, or may have contributed, to the accident, the owners will have relieved themselves of the burden of proof which the law casts upon them. If, however, the evidence shows that there were acts of negligence on the part of the master and crew which may have contributed to the accident, as well as fault on the part of the pilot, the duty of showing that the former did not contribute in part to the accident seems to be involved in the obligation of the owners to prove that the causa causans of the collision was exclusively the fault of the pilot. The Iona, 4 Moo. N. S. 336, one of the most recent cases decided by this committee, seems to go the full length of this proposition. We have now to apply these principles to the present case. What are the facts deposed to by the pilot and crew of the Velasquez, who alone can speak to what passed on board that vessel? The pilot (p. 20) says that he was on the forepart of the bridge; that he first saw a sail on his starboard bow when the barque was about three-quarters of a mile off; that he saw no light; that he ordered the helm to be starboarded; that the Velasquez obeyed her helm, and that shortly after he had given this order he saw the red light of the barque open. The look-out man (a Spaniard) says (p. 23), that he first saw the barque on the starboard bow, and distant about a mile, more or less; that he too saw no light; and that he reported the sale to the mate (also a Spaniard). And the mate who was on the bridge with the pilot says (at p. 23), that when the look-out man sang out in Spanish "A vessel on starboard" he looked towards the pilot, who was then looking to starboard with his glasses; that he (the witness) looking in the same direction, saw the barque about three-quarters of a mile off; that, thereupon, the pilot gave the signal for going to port; and after that was done he (the witness) saw the red light of the barque, having previously seen no light. Upon this evidence it is no doubt proved that the helm was starboarded by the order of the pilot given on his own observation of the barque, and not upon any communication to him of its position. On the other hand, it is to be observed that this evidence, if strictly true and correct, would raise some inference of a negligent look-out. For nothing is seen of the barque until she is within a mile of the steamer, and nothing even then is seen of her lights, although there is evidence in the cause, believed by the court below, that her lights were burning well; and the pilot admits that on that particular night (p. 24) a good light might have been seen three miles off. The evidence, however, cannot be taken to be wholly true or correct. For all these witnesses concur in representing the barque as on the starboard bow of the steamer; whereas their Lordships have found, upon the other evidence in the cause, that the vessels were approaching each other port side to port side. If the crew and the pilot have combined consciously to put forward a false case, all that can be said is that the owners have failed to show by trustworthy evidence that the fault was exclusively the fault of the pilot. But if it be assumed, as their Lordships would willingly assume, that the witnesses honestly mistook the position of the barque, the natural inference from that is, that if there had been a proper look-out, not only would the barque have been descried at a greater distance, but her true position would have been known. That it is the duty of the crew, by means of a sufficient look-out, to give to the pilot the earliest possible information of an approaching vessel, and accurately to describe her position, was the principle enforced in the case of the Ion; and in the present case it may reasonably be inferred that if the pilot had received earlier information of the barque, or had been told that she was on the port side of his own vessel, he would not have given the order to starboard at all, or would have given it at a time when on a starboard helm he could have gone clear of the barque. Their Lordships are therefore unable to say that there is error in the finding of the very learned judge of the Court of Admiralty, that blame attached to the crew as well as to the pilot of the Velasquez, and they will humbly recommend to Her Majesty that this appeal be dismissed with costs.

[Priv. Co.]

THE VELASQUEZ.

[Priv. Co.]

BURTON v. PINKERTON.

[Ex.]

BURTON v. PINKERTON.

Ship and shipping—Contract of services as seamen on board—Ordinary voyage—Breach of contract by change of character of vessel—Illegal voyage—Action for breach—Remission of damages.

The plt. shipped as a seaman, at a certain rate of wages per month, on board the def't.'s vessel at London, under articles for a commercial voyage not to exceed twelve calendar months to Rio de Janeiro, and different ports in the Atlantic and Pacific, and to terminate by the plt.'s being brought back to some port in the United Kingdom or continent of Europe between the Elbe and Brest. On arriving at Rio, the def't. proposed to employ his vessel as a ship of war in the service of the Peruvian Government in the hostilities then being carried on between Peru and Spain. The plt. thereupon refused to proceed any farther with the voyage, on the ground that it was illegal, and exposed him to risks and dangers not contemplated by his agreement with the def't., and he accordingly left the ship, without leave, and went on shore at Rio, where he was arrested by the Peruvian authorities as a deserter from a Peruvian vessel of war, and committed to prison, where he remained some eight or ten days. Upon coming out of prison he found that the vessel had sailed away, and that his clothes and other articles belonging to him, which he had left on board, were gone. In an action to recover damages from the def't. for the breach of contract, the jury, by the direction of the learned Lord Chief Baron, found a verdict for the plt., and assessed the damages resulting from such breach under three heads, namely, first, 12*l.* 10*s.* for the loss of wages which the plt. would have earned under the contract had it been continued; and secondly, 30*l.* for the loss of the clothes, &c.; and thirdly, 30*l.* for general damages for the imprisonment and otherwise by reason of the def't.'s breach of contract:

Held, by Martin, Bramwell, and Channell, B.B. (dis-senting Kelly, C.B.), that the damages given under the second and third heads, viz., for the clothes and the imprisonment, were too remote to be made the subject of an action.

(See Burton v. Pinkerton, ante, p. 464; L. Rep., 2 Ex. 543; 36 L. J. 137, Ex.)

This was an action brought by the plt., a mariner in the merchant service, against the def't., the captain or master of a steam-vessel called the Thames, for a breach of contract. The declaration contained several counts. The first count set out the agreement between the parties, whereby the def't. agreed to employ the plt., and the latter agreed to serve on board the Thames as one of the crew, for the voyage from London to Rio de Janeiro or any port or ports in North and South America, and other countries and places specified in the agreement and set forth in the declaration, backwards and forwards if required, for a period not to exceed twelve months, and back to a final port of discharge in the United Kingdom or continent of Europe between the Elbe and Brest, at certain wages per calendar month. Alleging as breach that the def't. did not employ the plt. to serve on board, &c., according to the said agreement, whereby the plt. lost the opportunity of earning wages, and was left at Rio and was arrested and imprisoned there, and deprived of his clothes, &c., and was impeded in obtaining employment. The second count was similar, but alleged as breach that def't. did not employ plt. according to the said agreement, but prevented him serving on board the said ship during a part of the voyage, by sailing and departing with her from Rio without the plt. The third count, for inducing the plt. to enter into the said agreement by a false representation of the intended voyage. Fourth and fifth counts in trespass and trover for taking away and conversion of the plt.'s clothes and tools.

The deft. pleaded 1 and 3 to the first count denying the promise and the breach. 2. To the second count denying the promise. 4. To the second count deft. was always ready and willing to employ the plt., but the latter absented himself from the said ship, and did not at any time offer to perform his duties, &c., but wholly refused so to do or to be employed as agreed. 5. To the second count, misconduct of the plt. before breach by remaining absent from the ship and going on shore without leave and neglecting his duties, whereupon deft. discharged him from his service, &c., which was the alleged breach. 6. To the second count, desertion by plt. before breach and rescission of the agreement and discharge of the plt. by the deft. thereupon. 7, 8, and 11. To the third, fourth, and fifth counts respectively, not guilty. 9. To the fourth count, leave and licence. 10 and 12. To the fourth and fifth counts, not possessed. Upon all which pleas issue was joined.

At the trial before Kelly, C.B., at Guildhall, on the 20th and 21st Feb., it appeared that the owners of the Thames by charter-party, dated 20th Jan. 1866, agreed to let her to Thomson, Bonar, and Co. for all lawful services and employment as per margin, such service not to exceed twelve calendar months, and the charter provided (inter alia) that the ship was to proceed to such ports as might be directed by the charterers or their agent on board; and also that the said steamer being intended for the service of the Peruvian Government, if she should be burnt, captured, sunk, damaged, or driven on shore by any enemy of that Government, the charterers should pay her value (agreed at 45,000*l.*) to the owners, or make good such damages. The plt. engaged himself to deft. as one of the crew on the 26th Jan. 1866, and signed articles, the terms of which are set out in the declaration. He went on board in the Victoria Dock, and sailed in her to Rio, where he discovered that the deft. was about to employ the Thames as a vessel of war in the service of the Peruvian Government, in the hostilities which were being then carried on between Peru and Spain. Thereupon plt. declined to proceed farther with the vessel, on the ground that the voyage had become illegal, and would expose him to risks not contemplated by his agreement, and he accordingly left her and went on shore at Rio as a deserter from a Peruvian ship of war, and was committed to prison, where he remained some eight or ten days. Upon coming out of prison he found that the deft. had sailed with the Thames to Callao, and that all his clothes and other articles which he had left on board were gone. On at length reaching England he brought this action against the deft.

The facts and evidence relating to the character of the voyage, and of the conduct of the plt. and deft., and the arrest and imprisonment of the plt., and the loss of his clothes, &c., are fully set out in the judgment of Kelly, C.B., in the case of Barton v. Pickerton, ante, p. 494, and also in the judgments in the present case, so that it is unnecessary to recapitulate them here. The learned judge at the trial ruled that there was no defence to the action by reason of the voyage on which the deft. sought to employ the plt. having, through the breaking out of war, become, if not illegal, at all events of a different character from that contemplated by the agreement, and so that the deft. had committed a breach of contract, and his Lordship therefore directed the jury to find for the plt. The damages claimed by the plt. by reason of the deft.'s breach of contract included a sum for the clothes and other things belonging to him, and left behind by him in the ship when he went on shore at Rio, and of which the fourth and fifth counts alleged a taking and conversion, and also consequential damages in respect of plt. having been arrested and imprisoned when ashore by the Peruvian authorities at Rio as a deserter from a Peruvian vessel of war; and the jury, by direction of the learned Chief Baron, assessed the damages resulting from the breach of contract under separate heads, namely, 12*l.* 10*s.* in respect of the loss of wages which he would have earned under the contract had it been continued; 20*l.* for the loss of the clothes, &c.; and 30*l.* for general damages for the imprisonment, and otherwise by reason of the breach of contract.

Leave was reserved to the deft. to move to enter a nonsuit or a verdict for himself, on the ground that the facts did not show any breach of contract on his part, or to reduce the damages by one or both of the said sums of 20*l.* and 30*l.*, on the ground that the damages in respect of which these two sums were respectively given were too remote. A rule to that effect, and also for a new trial on the ground of misdirection, was accordingly moved for in Easter term, on the part of the deft., when the Court (Kelly, C.B., and Martin and Pigott, B.B., adstantes Bramwell, B.), after taking time to consider, refused the rule on all the points moved except to reduce the damages (see report, Barton v. Pickerton, ante, p. 494; L. Rep., 2 Ex.; 36 L. J. 137, Ex.) A rule not to reduce the damages by the above sums, or for a new trial on affidavits having been granted.

May 30.—E. James Q. C. (with him Watkin Williams), for plt., now showed cause against it, and contended that all the damages given by the jury under the above-mentioned three separate heads were the direct and immediate effect and consequence of the improper conduct of the deft. in endeavouring to retain the plt. in an illegal service, not within the terms or contemplation of the agreement entered into between them, and that plt. was justified in giving notice as he had done. The case came clearly within the rule in Hadley v. Baxendale, 9 Ex. 841.

The Solicitor-General (Sir J. B. Kinslake, Q. C.), C. Pollock, Q. C., and Bompas, for the deft., contra, supported their rule, and maintained that the damages for the imprisonment and the loss of the clothes were too remote to be the subject of an action. They were not the natural result of the breach of contract. They cited Vigne v. Wilcock, 8 East, 1, and notes thereon, in 2 Sm. L. Cas. 467, 8th ed.

Cur. adv. vult.

June 4.—Their Lordships differing in opinion, the following judgments were now delivered:—

BRAMWELL, B.—In this case I am of opinion that there must be a new trial, and I am enabled to say that my brothers Martin and Channell are of the same opinion. It is not necessary to go over the whole facts of the case, but, in order to make what I am about to say intelligible, I may notice that the plt. was a sailor who had shipped on board the deft.'s vessel, under articles to the deft., for a voyage to different ports in the Atlantic and Pacific, but which voyage was not to exceed a year, and which was to terminate by the plt. being brought back to some port in the United Kingdom or continent of Europe between the Elbe and Brest. The Court has determined (see Barton v. Pickerton, ante, p. 494) that the deft. broke that contract; but that, instead of carrying on the commercial voyage, for which the plt. had shipped, he proposed to carry on a voyage of a different character to that which the plt. had undertaken. This occurred at Rio, and the Court held that the plt. was justified in leaving the ship and going ashore. He did so, and, according to his own case, when he got on shore he was put in prison by the Brazilians as a Peruvian deserter, and continued there many days. When he came out the deft.'s ship had sailed, and the plt. lost his clothes which he said were on board. Whether they went away in the ship, or whether they were stolen on shore by some person, he did not undertake to say, but he said he had lost them. Under these circumstances, the action being tried before my Lord Chief Baron, the plt. recovered, and recovered properly, damages for the loss of wages that he would have earned had the voyage been continued. He also recovered under the head of general damages for the inconvenience that he had sustained in consequence of having to land at Rio and being obliged to discharge himself there. But one of those inconveniences, with respect to which he claimed damages, was being put in prison as a Peruvian deserter for the space of ten days. Now, of course, to recover in respect of that, he must show that it was a damage resulting, not from the conduct of the deft. merely, but from the breach of contract which was the subject-matter of the action, and which gave him the right of action. The jury were told that it was such a damage, and that they might give damages in respect of it. Therefore we must suppose that they did, or at all events they may have given a portion of the 80*l.* in respect of the imprisonment. I am of opinion, and my brothers Martin and Channell concur with me in that opinion, that he was entitled to recover something in respect of those general damages, but that he was not entitled to make this imprisonment an item of claim, and our opinion proceeds on this ground. It is true that, had the deft. completed his contract, had he not broken it, had he continued on such a voyage that the plt. would have been bound to go, and would not have been justified in leaving the ship, then, no doubt, the imprisonment would not have happened to the plt., because he would have continued in the ship, and been taken away in it by the deft. Therefore, in one sense, the deft. may be said to have caused the imprisonment. It may be said truly that, but for the conduct of the deft., this imprisonment would not have happened; but surely that is not enough to entitle the plt. to recover in respect of it; because, supposing, instead of meeting with the Brazilian police, who were wrong-doers, and who put him in prison, he had met with a gang of robbers on shore, who had knocked him down and robbed him of 100*l.*, it is equally true that damages would have accrued to him, in one sense, owing to the conduct of the deft.; that is to say, that without such conduct it would not have happened—therefore it might have been said that the deft. had caused it; but according to the ordinary well-known rule, exemplified in many cases which have been contested, but the principle of which has never been contested at all, the damage for which a man is liable at law must be caused by him as a causa causans, and must be such as flows naturally and inevitably from his tortious act. To my mind, to hold that this plt. could recover in respect of this present damage would be equivalent to saying that if he had had a limb taken off owing to some disturbance or wrongful act on shore, he would have a right of action against the deft. in respect of it. Similar considerations apply to the clothes. It is true, if the plt. had continued on board the ship, which he would have done but for the breach of contract, he would not have lost his clothes. Therefore the same reasoning applies to show that the deft.'s conduct has caused a loss of the clothes; but the same reasoning applies also to show that that consequence is not a natural or necessary consequence of the breach of contract on the part of the deft. It seems to me, therefore, with great submission to my brothers Martin and Channell, that the plt. was not entitled to recover in respect of those two items of claim. Nor can we say how much of the 80*l.* general damages is given in respect of the imprisonment; so that, unless the parties come to some agreement as to the sum to which the verdict shall be reduced, I think there must be a new trial. For my own part (and I believe that in this matter I am also speaking the opinion of my brothers Martin and Channell), I think the affidavit which has been produced on the part of the deft. would necessitate a new trial, because, without saying that that affidavit is true, and that the plt.'s testimony is false, it certainly introduces a different state of facts to that which the plt. swore to at the trial. He then swore to an imprisonment for ten days, whereas if that affidavit is true, the imprisonment which the plt. suffered was only two days; and the deft. is entitled to have that matter put in train for further investigation. Therefore it seems to me that, for these reasons, the deft. is entitled to have a new trial.

MARTIN, B.—I am substantially of the same opinion, and think there should be a new trial unless the plt. consents to the verdict being reduced to 12*l.* 10*s.* I think the plt. is not entitled to damages in respect of the imprisonment and the clothes. The breach of the contract was, that he was supposed to be compelled by the man who had hired him for a mercantile voyage, to become a seaman on board a ship of war; and I think he had a right to leave the ship on that occurring; and after some difficulty, I arrived at the conclusion that it was a breach of contract for which he was entitled to maintain an action; but I think he was only entitled to recover the ordinary damages for breach of contract, that is, in respect of loss of employment which the deft. had contracted to give him as a seaman on board a mercantile ship. I am also of opinion that he would be entitled to recover further damages in respect of the expense and inconvenience of having, as I think rightfully, gone on shore at Rio; but I think he was not entitled to recover anything in respect of the imprisonment, for there is no evidence whatever that the contract the captain made with him had anything to do with, nor do I see that he is responsible for that, and therefore I cannot give the plt. any damages as against the deft. in respect of that branch of his claim, and if any portion of the 80*l.* is for that there should be a new trial, because we have no means of distinguishing between what are the damages to which he is entitled and those to which he is not entitled. I think, also, that he is not entitled to any damages on account of the clothes. He went away leaving the clothes on board. The deft. would probably have been liable if he himself had meddled with those clothes, or had done anything wrong in regard to them; but in point of fact, as far as the evidence goes, nothing of the sort was proved, but some person came on board, who was believed to be a friend of the plt.'s, and was permitted to carry away the clothes with him, and there is no evidence that the deft. was, either directly or indirectly, concerned in that. The clothes do not seem to have been delivered to the plt., but to the person who took them away; but I do not think that this damage arises from a breach of the deft.'s contract for which, as a matter of law, the plt. can recover. I agree with my brother Bramwell that the damage should be the direct and natural consequence of the breach of contract, and that a man cannot recover damages in respect of two matters so remote as the loss of the clothes and the imprisonment. In my judgment, the deft. is entitled to a new trial unless the plt. consents to confine the verdict to 12*l.* 10*s.*, the amount given by the jury on account of the wages.

BURTON v. PINKERTON.

[Ex.]

CHANNELL, B.—After the pains taken by the Lord Chief Baron at the trial to have the damages separately assessed with respect to the imprisonment and the clothes, it is not without great regret that I come to the conclusion that, unless the parties consent to reduce the verdict below 30*l.*, there should be a new trial. I am of opinion that the plt. is not entitled to recover in respect of the imprisonment, and I am equally of opinion that he is not entitled to recover in respect of the clothes. I think it unnecessary to repeat the observations that have been made by my brothers Bramwell and Martin upon that subject. I am not to be understood to say that, in my opinion, the damages might not, and properly so, exceed the amount of the wages that the plt. would have earned had the voyage been performed, but he is not entitled, in my judgment, to recover in respect of the imprisonment or of the clothes. It is possible that the 30*l.* may include some claim in respect of the imprisonment which ought not to be an item introduced into that calculation. Therefore I think the verdict for that amount cannot stand, and that there should be a new trial.

KELLY, C.B.—I must express my regret that I have to differ with my learned brethren on both the points on which they have given judgment. With respect to the general damage, I thought at the trial, and I still think, that as by reason of the breach of contract by the deft. in placing the vessel under the orders of the Peruvian ships of war, he had left the plt. no alternative between serving on board the vessel and so putting his life and liberty in peril, and landing at Rio, and there remaining till he could find a ship in which he could return to England, the jury might reasonably give damages in respect of such expenses, inconveniences, and hardships as the plt. might have incurred during his compulsory residence there, and as the danger would have been greater if he had been obliged to land on a desolate island, without food or clothing, and among savages, than if he had been left in a town where, at a small expense he could be well provided for, so I thought the jury might consider the difference between his being left in a place of security against all but ordinary risks and inconveniences, and his finding himself in this town of Rio, exposed to the consequences of his having belonged to a vessel engaged in the hostilities then being carried on between Peru and Spain, and, therefore, that if they thought the imprisonment of the plt. had resulted from the state of things at Rio, thus created by the deft. himself, they might fairly take it into account in estimating the damages. I am confirmed in this view of the case by what appeared to me at the trial as not improbable from the letter of the police officer to the consul, and which is now made certain by the affidavit filed on behalf of the deft., namely, that the apprehension and imprisonment of the plt. was upon the information of some one belonging to these very Peruvian vessels, perhaps Borrás himself, charging that he and the other sailors who landed were Peruvian deserters. The consul, in his letter which is now before us, which was, I believe, read at the trial, but not perhaps very much adverted to, says, "It appeared to me that the crew were committing no breach of neutrality by fulfilling the terms of their contract, and that there could be no penalty attached to them even if the ship should be again employed in carrying stores for the Peruvian vessels of war." The police officer says, "These seamen," including the plt., "were apprehended on the 28th April from information given by Charles Pector, that they were deserters from a Peruvian vessel of war, and were all found concealed in the house of Ildefonso Vasques, a Spaniard, situated in the Rua Diario Louis de Gonzaga, No. 67B, Santa Cristiana." This man, after being questioned, stated that the thirteen prisoners left the Peruvian vessel, and "on going before me," that is, the consul, "they were ordered to return on board that vessel." This they refused, and they waited on the Spanish minister soliciting his assistance, as they did not wish to fight against the Spanish squadron, returning afterwards to the house of Ildefonso; and Thompson, in the affidavit now before us, and on which this rule has been obtained, says to the same effect, "I understood that we were arrested as being deserters from one of the Peruvian rams." So that it seems to me that there was no doubt at all that the state of things created on the part of the deft. and his crew, by what, in my opinion, and indeed in the opinion of the majority of the court, constituted a breach of contract (see Burton v. Pinkerton, ante, p. 494; 36 L. J. 137, Ex.; L. Rep., 2 Ex. 343), this very state of things, and this only, led, amongst other mischiefs and injuries, to the imprisonment of the plt. under the circumstances that now appear. I thought under those circumstances the jury might well take the whole state of things into consideration, but my learned brethren are of a contrary opinion. With respect to the contradictions arising upon the affidavit as to the men having been lodged for a few days by the Spanish consul, and the difference between an imprisonment of four days and of eight days in such a case as this, where the damages are but 30*l.*, I think such small matters are of no weight whatever. Then as to the loss of the clothes—it was directly caused by their having been left on board when the plt. landed to consult the consul, and the ship having sailed when he came out of prison, and when, if he could have ventured to go on board, he might no doubt have managed to have come back again. It appears, however, that my learned brethren are of a different opinion, with respect not only to the imprisonment but also to the clothes. Adverting, then, to the terms of the rule, which is not in any shape or form directed towards a new trial, the result will be that, unless the parties can agree upon the sum to which, in addition to the 12*l.* 10*s.* for wages (about which there is now no question), the verdict shall be reduced—and 10*l.* has been suggested by one of my learned brethren as a proper sum—the rule must be made absolute to reduce the verdict by the 30*l.* and the 20*l.*, so as to leave it standing for the 12*l.* 10*s.* for the wages, which we are all agreed the plt. is entitled to recover. The rule for a new trial was refused, and the rule as now drawn up is for the plt. to show cause why the damages found for him upon the trial should not be reduced as the court shall direct. I do not know that we have authority to enter the verdict for the 10*l.* which the jury have not found, unless it be by consent; and there will be no alternative in the absence of such consent, but a new trial, or that the verdict should be reduced by both the sums in respect to which alone leave was reserved.

Rule absolute for a new trial.

JOHN v. HOLM.

[Ex.]

June 17 and 22, 1867.

JOHN v. HOLM.

Charter-party—Full and complete cargo—Part of cargo destroyed by fire—Obligation to complete loading.

By a charter-party containing the usual exceptions of fire, &c., the deft. agreed to load and the plt. to carry a full and complete cargo. Part of the cargo was on board and part of the remainder was alongside in lighters, when the vessel accidentally took fire and had to be scuttled. The cargo on board was so much damaged that it was necessary to sell it. The captain accordingly did so, and forwarded the portion then lying alongside by another vessel. After a delay of two months, necessarily occupied in repairs, the ship was tendered to deft.'s agents, who refused to load any more cargo:

Held, that nothing had occurred to discharge the deft. from the obligation to complete the loading.

This was a case stated without pleadings for the opinion of the court.

On the 29th Jan. 1866, the following charter-party was entered into between the plt. as owner of the barque Edith Marion, and the deft. as charterer.

London, 29th Jan. 1866.

It is this day mutually agreed between G. W. Jones, Esq., owner of the good ship or vessel called the Edith Marion, A. 1 nine years, and equipped, of the measurement of 545 tons or thereabouts, now at Liverpool, with leave to take an outward cargo direct, and J. H. H. Holm, Esq., of London, merchant, that the said ship, being tight, staunch, and strong, and every way fitted for the voyage, shall, with all convenient speed, sail and proceed to Pernambuco, or so near thereto as she can safely get, and there load from the factors of the said shippers a full and complete cargo of cotton in pressed bales, with sufficient sugar in bags as ballast, the cargo to be brought to and taken from alongside at merchant's risk and expense, not exceeding what she can reasonably stow and carry over and above her tackle, apparel, provisions, and furniture, and being so loaded, shall therewith proceed to Liverpool direct, or so near thereto as she may safely get, and deliver the same on being paid freight as follows, viz., eleven shillings of a penny sterling per lb. not delivered for cotton, and 30s. sterling per ton of 20 cwt. net weight delivered for sugar in bags, all with 5 per cent. primeage thereon in full of all port charges and pilotage (restraint of primes and ruber, not of God, Queen's custom, &c., and all and every other dangers and necessities of the sea, rivers, and navigation, of whatever nature and kind occur, during the said voyage always excepted), the freight to be paid on unloading and right delivery of cargo in cash, as customary. Thirty running days are to be allowed the said merchants (if the said ship is not sooner dispatched) for loading the ship, and to be discharged with all dispatch as customary, and ten days on demurrage over and above the laying days at 2l. per day. Penalty for non-performance of this agreement, estimated amount of freight. The captain to sign bills of lading if required, at any rate of freight, without prejudice to this charter. The ship is to be addressed to charterer's agents at Pernambuco paying 2l. per cent. commission on this charter. Nothing is to be allowed the captain at the port of loading for ship's ordinary disbursements.

(Signed)

G. W. Jones.
J. H. H. Holm.

The vessel arrived at Pernambuco on the 21st March 1866, and was ready to take her homeward cargo on the 24th May 1866. On the 1st June 1866 the charterer had loaded a part of the cargo, viz., 2380 bags of sugar and 700 bales of cotton, and 116 bales were alongside in lighters for loading. On the 1st June a fire broke out in the ship, and the vessel with the cargo on board was taken across the harbour and scuttled, by or under the order of the master. The master had at that time signed and delivered to the charterers bills of lading for the whole of the above-mentioned cargo, both that aboard and alongside. The cargo aboard and that alongside was not a full cargo. The said cargo on board, viz., 2380 bags of sugar and 700 bales of cotton, was so far damaged that it was necessarily sold by auction by the master of the ship under the advice of surveyors, and realised 2566l. 14s. 6d., which was received by the master of the vessel. The 116 bales of cotton so alongside as aforesaid were forwarded by the master to Liverpool by steamer at the following rate of freight, viz., 3d. per lb., being one-sixteenth of a penny more than the chartered freight, and was received, and the freight of 3d. per lb. (being the freight mentioned in the bills of lading) paid by the consignees. The ship having been repaired with all dispatch, was on the 30th July 1866, and as soon as it could be, tendered to the charterer's agents at Pernambuco to take the remainder of the cargo, but they refused to supply any more cargo. Having endeavoured to obtain a cargo at Pernambuco and failed, she sailed to Macao, a neighbouring port, and there obtained a cargo of 2629 bags of sugar and 1839 bales of cotton for England, at a freight less than that which would have been earned had the ship been loaded with a full and complete cargo under the original charter-party.

The question for the opinion of the court was, whether, upon the facts stated the deft. was bound to complete the loading of the ship.

Mellish, Q. C. (with him Day) for the plt.—The deft. was bound to complete the loading of the ship, and was not discharged from the obligation by any of the circumstances which occurred. Nothing being stated as to the cause of the fire, it must be taken to have been a mere accident, and not the result of any negligence on the plt.'s part. The exception of fire contained in the charter-party protects the plt. from any liability in respect of such a fire, and, that being so, the deft. had no right to rescind the contract. Suppose the ship had been blown out to sea while the cargo was in the course of loading, and a necessary delay had been caused while damage as occasioned was being repaired, the deft. could not have rescinded the contract on the ground of such delay. Or, suppose after a complete cargo had been loaded, part had been burnt, neither party would have been entitled to rescind. The plt. would have been bound to carry the remainder of the cargo if the deft. had required him to do so, and if one party still remained liable under the contract the other must also be liable. He cited Brace v. Niamgala, 11 Ex. 129; 34 L. J. 821, Ex.; McAndrew v. Chapple, L. Rep., 1 C. P. 618.

Watkins Williams for the deft.—The mere delay might not have excused the deft., but the result of the fire in this case was more than a mere delay. The deft. was bound under the contract to load, and the plt. to carry a full and complete cargo. The deft. had already loaded a large part of the cargo, which was so damaged by the fire that the plt. could not carry it. The plt., therefore, became unable to carry a full and complete cargo, for the deft. clearly was not bound to load this portion over again, and the deft. could not then, under the contract to load a complete cargo, be bound to load part of a cargo. Under these circumstances, the original voyage was frustrated, and the voyage became a different voyage from that contemplated by the charter-party. Even if this were otherwise, the plt. elected to rescind the contract by the course which he pursued as to the 116 bales forwarded.

Cur. adv. vult.

JUNE 22.—BRANWELL, B. now delivered the judgment of the court.—In this case, which was argued before my brothers Martin and Channell and myself, we are all of opinion that the plt. is entitled to our judgment. The action was on a charter-party, and the vessel had taken part of the cargo which the deft. was bound to ship on board, and then accidentally a fire broke out, and the cargo which was then on board was so damaged that it was necessary to sell it; the captain sold it, and then the charterer's agents were called upon by him to give him what would be equivalent to the remainder of the cargo, that which would have filled the ship up if she had not caught fire. Now, the first objection was, that the vessel having met with this accident, and a delay of two months having been caused while she was under repair, the voyage became a different voyage, and that the case therefore came within the rule whereby the original voyage being frustrated and the voyage having become a different voyage, the charterer is exonerated from loading the cargo. I do not think that the facts here stated bring the case within the rule. There is no warranty here, no condition precedent that she shall be ready by any particular time; there is only a provision that she shall with all convenient speed sail and proceed to Pernambuco, getting as near as she can, and then load a cargo after having discharged the outward cargo. Then, if without any voluntary neglect or wrongful act on the part of the shipper she were delayed by an accident of this sort, and no cargo could be put on board at all, it appears to me that the charterer would not be excused, and he would be bound, when she was ready, to furnish a cargo. Then it was said that, inasmuch as the vessel could not take the whole of the cargo to England, as the captain had sold a portion of the cargo, and had sent another portion of the cargo by another means to Liverpool, the deft. was under no obligation to do what in one sense had become impossible, that is, load a full and complete cargo, because all that he could do now would be to put a half cargo on board, leaving the rest of the vessel to be wasted or not filled up, which was not in the original contemplation of the parties. This objection struck me at first as having considerable weight in it, but upon consideration I have come to the conclusion that it cannot be supported. The charterer's relations to his consignees in England, or his own objects and views in entering into this charter-party, are things which ought not to affect its construction; and the true construction I think of the expression, "to load a full and complete cargo," means "to bring as much merchandise as will be a full and complete cargo;" and if instead of the expression "a full and complete cargo," the parties had said what I think is clearly its equivalent, viz., "so many bales of cotton and so many bags of sugar," it would have been manifest that the deft. had not performed the contract, and that nothing had occurred to exonerate the deft. from the liability to complete the loading, although a certain number of the bales or bags had been destroyed after being loaded. For these reasons I think the plt. is entitled to our judgment.

THE CARGO EX CAPELLA.

Collision—Both vessels to blame—Claim for salvage by one of the crews.

Where a collision occurred between two vessels, and both were held to blame, the crew of one of the vessels having instituted a cause of salvage against the owners of the cargo of the other, it was Held, that the claimants were not entitled to receive salvage for property which had been put in jeopardy by their own wrong-doing.

A collision had taken place in March 1845 between the English ship Southern Empire, then on a voyage from Callao to Liverpool, and the Dutch vessel Capella, which was bound from Amsterdam to Batavia with a cargo of silver specie. After the collision the crew of the Southern Empire succeeded in saving the specie and bringing it into Liverpool; for this service they instituted the present suit against the cargo.

A collision case, by the owners of the Capella, which had been wrecked by the collision, was previously brought against the owners of the Southern Empire when the Court, assisted by Trinity Master, held that both vessels were to blame.

Dr. Deane, Q. C. and Butt, for the plt., referred to The Sappho, Swab 242.

Brett, Q. C. and Lushington, contra, contended that there could be no contribution between wrong-doers. By the 33rd section of the Merchant Shipping Act Amendment Act (25 & 26 Vict. c. 63) it was the duty of the plt.'s ship to assist the deft. The plt. could not profit by their own wrong-doing, especially as against the owners of the cargo, who were innocent parties, and referred to The Milan, Lush. 500.

Dr. Deane, Q. C. in reply.—The Merchant Shipping Act does not apply. The duty to render assistance does not take away the right to ship reward.

Cur. adv. sol.

May 7.—Dr. LUSHINGTON.—The question now to determine is whether, when a collision is taken place between two vessels and both are held to blame, one of them can sue for salvage, for having saved the cargo of the other from the perils consequent on the collision. I do not seek for authorities, but I look to the principle which ought to govern the case. In my mind the principle is this, that no man can profit by his own wrong. This is a rule founded in justice and equity, and carried out in various ways by the tribunals of this country, and never, so far as I am aware, departed from by an English court. The application of this rule to the present case is obvious. The asserted salvors were the original wrong-doers: it was by their fault that the property was placed in jeopardy. The rule would bar any claim by them for services rendered to the other ship which was co-delinquent in the collision; but the present claim is to be observed, is a demand for salvage against the cargo, the owners of which were perfectly innocent. There has been no decision as to this particular question, at least to my knowledge, but my practice in this court, but I am not surprised at it, because I think that the claim is so opposed to common justice as to render it unlikely that any person would make the experiment. I present against the claim, with costs.

the p'ts. had no claim against the vessel to assign, as they had not commenced proceedings against her (from which date such claim would commence), and could not commence proceedings by reason of the vessel not being under arrest; that the claim against the vessel did not accrue until after the p'ts. had executed the deed in favour of their creditors, and consequently that the claim passed to the trustees for the creditors. It seems to me, however, that the assignment by the p'ts. to the bank of the causes of action would carry with it all right of action to recover the debt, including any right for that purpose to proceed against the vessel which might be as it were inchoate, but which might subsequently become complete. If so, and if the assignment to the bank was substantially an absolute assignment of the entire debt divesting the p'ts. of all beneficial interest in the debt, then it is clear from the cases cited, especially Mont v.
Sharp, 2 H. & N. 540, and Dangerfield v. Thomas, 9 Ad. & El. 292, that the p'ts. might sue as trustees for the bank, notwithstanding that they subsequently executed the composition-deed in favour of their creditors. Whether the assignment was absolute and of the entire interest of the p'ts., I have no particulars before me to enable me to judge, the reply alleging simply in general terms that the causes of action were assigned. But from the book of Common Law P'cedents (Bullen & Leake,
p. 445) to which I was referred, it seems that an allegation in general terms is the form usually adopted in the common law procedure. I shall therefore refuse to strike out the first or eighth to counterplead that the assignment was not such as to divest the p'ts. of all beneficial interest.

THE GREAT EASTERN.

Seamen's wages—Compensation for wrongful discharge—Jurisdiction.

This court has, as part of its ancient jurisdiction, power, in a cause of wages, to entertain a claim for compensation for wrongful discharge of a seaman, before the termination of his engagement.

The p'ts. in this case were a large number of seamen, lately part of the crew of the Great Eastern, whose actions had been consolidated.

The petition alleged that the master of the Great Eastern in March 1867, the vessel at that time being in the port of Liverpool, hired the p'ts. for a voyage, to expire on the 30th June 1867. That the p'ts. entered upon their service on board, and were always ready and willing to perform their contract; but the defts. wrongfully discharged them on the 1st May 1867, before the term of their engagement had expired. Part of the p'ts.' claim was for "damages for wages from the 1st May to the 30th June." The action was brought under the 24 Vict. c. 10, s. 10, which is as follows:

The High Court of Admiralty shall have jurisdiction over any claim by a seaman of any ship for wages earned by him on board the ship, whether the same be due under a special contract or otherwise, and also over any claim by the master of any ship for wages earned by him on board the ship, and for disbursements made by him on account of the ship, provided always that if in any such cause the pit do not recover 50*l* he shall not be entitled to any costs, charges, or expenses incurred by him therein, unless the judge shall certify that the cause was a fit one to be tried in the said court.

The case came before the court on a motion by the defts., the owners of the Great Eastern, to reject the plts.' petition.

Butt in support of the motion.—The question is, whether a seaman who is suing the ship in this court for wages has a lien on the ship for damages occasioned to him by the owner wrongfully discharging him before the termination of the stipulated voyage. It is submitted that there is no such lien, and that the only remedy for the seaman is to sue in a court of common law. If there is no authority for such a lien, the defts. are entitled to the judgment of the court, for the right of lien cannot be extended except by the Legislature. The seaman's remedy is now a matter governed by statute; the Admiralty Court Act, sect 10, which is the last enactment on the subject, limits his right to recover to "wages earned on board ship." There is no precedent showing that a lien for damages for breach of contract has ever been distinctly affirmed in this court, yet the opportunities for claiming such a lien must have been numberless. The truth is, that for wages and towage and salvage, the lien arises out of the service done. The court has no jurisdiction over a breach of contract, unless a statute specially gives it: (The Robert Pow, Brow. & Lush. 99.) Nor does it exercise the machinery of a jury to whom such claims are submitted. The older cases, when carefully examined, show that there is really no authority for a lien for the damages, but the contrary. In the case of Wells v. Osman, Ld. Raym. 1044; 6 Mod. 238, the seamen who had been engaged for a voyage were discharged, after having done several months' work while lying in the Thames; and it is quite clear that all that the Court of Q. B. decided was, that the Court of Admiralty had jurisdiction to decree the wages for the work done. How is this case consistent with a lien for damages? In The Exeter, 2 C. Rob. 261, where the mate had been wrongfully discharged without wages abroad during the voyage, it is true that he claimed 127*l.* as the balance of wages and expenses incurred in returning to Europe, and true also that the court pronounced for the demand of wages, but there is nothing to show that it pronounced for wages beyond the date of the discharge. In The Beaver, 3 C. Rob. 92, a similar case, the court did, indeed, pronounce for the seamen's wages till the return of the ship to Liverpool, but the real contest in the case was, whether the man had deserted or not, and the measure of wages passed without argument. The City of London, 1 Wm. Rob. 88, was a case upon demurrer. The mariner had been discharged two days after the articles had been signed for a voyage to the East Indies and back, and before the commencement of the voyage. The ship pursued her voyage, the mariner took other employment and claimed for the balance between his actual earning and the amount of wages he would have been entitled to if he had proceeded in the original ship. The case is somewhat difficult to understand, but this is certain, that the court did no more than admit the petition, and in its observations distinctly held that it would not adjudicate on questions of unliquidated damages, which were for juries only. What is also important is, that such cases as that of The City of London, Wm. Rob. 88, are now specifically provided for by the 167th section of the Merchant Shipping Act 1854 (17 & 18 Vict. c. 104) limiting the mariner's right in such cases to one month's wages. The City of London, therefore, may be said to be overruled by statute. The cases in which this court has entertained claims for damages for personal injuries, were apparently personal actions against the master, not proceedings in rem; such, for instance, as The Ruckers, 4 C. Rob. 73, and have therefore no application in this case.

Lushington and R. G. Williams contra.—It is submitted that the seamen wrongfully discharged have a lien on the ship not only for wages earned, but for wages or damages ultra, and that they have this right by the ancient jurisdiction of the court. The purpose and effect of the entire Admiralty Court Act, and of the 10th section in particular was to extend the jurisdiction of the court. If, therefore such a right as is now claimed by these seamen existed before that statute it exists still. The jurisdiction of the Admiralty Court over claims for wages has always been affirmed, and even in days of prohibition common law judges have upheld it on the ground of convenience: (Wells v. Osman, 2 Ld. Raym. 1044.) Here every reason of convenience points to the seamen taking their remedy in this court for their unlawful discharge. They are already lawfully suing here for their wages earned, and the actions are consolidated; are they now to be sent into another court to bring 300 actions? The Legislature has shown its desire to have all the seamen's claims settled in one simple proceeding for wages (see sects. 188, 189, 190, 205, 213, 223, and 229 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1854.) Nor can it be said that the court cannot measure claims of an unliquidated kind. It does so in all cases of salvage and collision, in claims upon bills of lading under the Admiralty Court Act, and it has a special tribunal for the very purpose of settling matters of account—the registrar and merchants, who are at least as competent as a jury. In Parsons on Maritime Law, vol. 1, p. 463, is a note citing many authorities to the effect that the Admiralty Court has the power to assess damages in these cases of seamen suing for their wages. The theory of the ancient jurisdiction of the court is, that the contract of wages was regarded as one and entire; that freight was the mother of wages; that accordingly if freight was earned, that the entire wages were due. This is evidently the law laid down in the leading case of Cutter v. Powell, 2 Sm. L. Cas. 1. The Legislature, in the Merchant Shipping Act, has now abolished the rule that freight is the mother of wages, and introduced various provisions, and in the case of wreck, &c. (sects. 181–186 of the Merchant Shipping Act), but leaving the law of the Admiralty Court unabridged in cases of wrongful discharge. The authorities cited on behalf of the defts., such as The Exeter, 2 C. Rob. 261, and The Beaver, 3 C. Rob. 92, and such cases as The Madonna D'Ibra, 1 Dods. 37, The Margaret, 3 Hagg. Adm. 238, as also the invariable practice of allowing foreign seamen a viaticum home, show what the jurisdiction and the practice of the Admiralty Court were. But even were it otherwise, they are totally irreconcilable with the notion that the seamen wrongfully discharged cannot recover in the Admiralty Court either damages for the breach of contract, or wages beyond the date of the discharge. Perhaps the truth is that the early theory of the contract for wages being entire was found to be inconvenient and unjust in its operation in many cases, and that even the mariner himself, as in The City of London and The Camilla, Swab. 312, did not put forward his full legal rights. But the case of Chandler v. Grier, 2 H. Bl. 606 n., is conclusive as to what the law of the Admiralty Court was. That was an action of assumpsit for seamen's wages. The facts of the case were, that the plt. was a seaman on board a ship which was articulated for, and sailed upon a voyage from London to Honduras, from thence to Philadelphia in North America, and from thence back again to England. The articles were drawn in the usual form. While the ship was in the bay of Honduras, the plt. received so violent a blow from a piece of timber accidentally falling upon him while he was on board, that he was entirely disabled from doing any duty whatever. On the arrival of the ship at Philadelphia he was put on shore and there left, and his wages paid up to that time; but the action was brought for the whole wages, including the remainder of the voyage, viz., from Philadelphia to England. The court said that clearly the law Marine ought to be followed in the construction of the contract, and they directed an inquiry to be made in the Courts of Admiralty, whether, according to the usage there adopted, a disabled seaman in similar circumstances would be entitled to wages for the whole voyage or only up to the time he was so disabled? An inquiry was made, and in every instance there was to be found, a seaman disabled in the course of his duty was holden to be entitled to wages for the whole voyage, though he had not performed the whole.

Butt replied.

Cur. adv. vult.

June 29th.—Dr. LUSHINGTON (being unable through illness to appear in court) communicated through the registrar his decision, the solicitors on both sides having consented to receive it as the judgment of the court. It was as follows:—I have come to the conclusion that the Court of Admiralty has, in a cause of wages, jurisdiction to entertain a claim for compensation for wrongful discharge of a seaman during the term of his engagement, the amount of compensation to be assessed upon consideration of all the circumstances of the case, and therefore reject the defts.' motion to strike out so much of the petition and schedules thereto as relate to the claim of the plts. for damage by reason of the alleged breach of contract by the defts. If the case proceeds to a hearing, and the allegation in the petition be proved, the amount of compensation must be referred to the registrar and merchants.

Proctors' lien—Garnishee order—Priority—23 & 24 Vict. c. 127, s. 28.

Where proceeds are in court, this court is competent to take notice of a previous lien after a garnishee order has been obtained:

Semble. This power is within the ordinary jurisdiction of the court independently of the operation of the 23 & 24 Vict. c. 127, s. 28.

The Jeff Davis had been sold, and the proceeds were in the registry. In a master's suit a decree had been obtained for 105*l.* 6*s.* 11*d.*, but without costs. Subsequently a garnishee order was obtained from the Court of Ex. attaching this sum.

Pritchard having moved for an order of payment thereof,

Clarkson, for Messrs. Toller and Co., proctors, contended that this order should issue subject to the proctors' lien for costs, according to ordinary practice, and to the Solicitors Act (the 23 & 24 Vict. c. 127), a proctor has an absolute lien on the property recovered through his instrumentality:

The Philippine, 16 L. T. Rep. N. S. 34; L. Rep., 1 Adm. 309;

The Soblomstein, 15 L. T. Rep. N. S. 393; L. Rep., 1 Adm. 293;

The Araminia, 4 W. Rob. 396, Swa. 81: 24 L. T. Rep. 43, 26;

Pritchard, contra.—The question resolves itself into one of priority between a garnishee order and a proctor's claim. The proctor has not taken action in proper time; he had notice of the intention of applying for the garnishee order, and ought to have appeared and asserted his claim. This court cannot review a garnishee order:

The Olive, Swa. 423; 30 L. T. Rep. 220;

Clarkson in reply.—In the case of the Olive the garnishee order had actually been paid, the mortgagee in whose hands the funds in question were, had paid them over to the judgment-creditors: the proctor had full notice of all the proceedings, and subsequently tried to obtain repayment of his costs at the hands of the mortgagee. That case is perfectly distinguishable from the present; in this case it is true that the proctor also had notice to defend his lien, but here there was no necessity, for the funds were in the hands of the court, whose officer he is.

Sir R. PHILLIMORE.—It has been contended that this court has no power to take notice of a previous lien after the obtaining of a garnishee order. Now the Solicitors Act gives an absolute lien to a proctor on the property recovered through him, and by this Act I am bound to decide in favour of his lien, notwithstanding the garnishee order. However, independently of that statute, I think it is clearly within the competence of this court to give directions that the proctor's lien be discharged before payment out of court of funds in its hands; the garnishee cannot be in a better position than the person he represents, who could not have got the money out without payment of the proctor's fees. I therefore order payment to the garnishee of the balance after the satisfaction of the proctor's lien. The costs of the present motion to come out of the funds.

Salvage—25 & 26 Vict. c. 63, s. 33.

This section does not debar the innocent sufferer in a collision from salvage reward for services subsequently rendered to the other party to the collision.

The case of a towing ship is not a casus omissus from the statute, and where

The tug of the vessel declared not to blame in a collision, rendered salvage services to the wrongdoer, it was Held, that this section did not affect the right of the tug to salvage reward.

This was a cause of salvage brought by the steam-tug Retriever against the steamer Queen, under the following circumstances:—

It appeared that the Retriever had, on the 14th Dec. last, been towing a vessel called the Hannibal, when a collision took place between the Hannibal and the Queen. After the Hannibal was towed clear the Retriever went to the assistance of the Queen, and towed her into Liverpool, a distance of about eleven miles from the place of the collision. A cause of damage had been brought by the Queen against the Hannibal in this court, and heard immediately before the present suit, when the Queen was held solely to blame.

THE HALLEY.

[ADM.]

Nov. 12.—Sir R. PHILLIMORE.—The Retriever now appears in court as a salvor, and claims salvage remuneration for the services to the Queen. I put the question to the Trinity masters as to whether the Queen, her cargo, or her crew, were in danger, and they replied that there was danger, but not great danger, to the Queen. It occurred to me, however, that previously to determining whether any and what salvage was due to the Retriever, there arose a question whether, under the particular provisions contained in 25 & 26 Vict. c. 63, s. 33, the rendering of salvage in this instance had not been taken out of the category of a voluntary service, and become the mere discharge of a positive duty cast by the statute upon the salvor, for the neglect of which he would have been punishable. As the interpretation of this clause had not been the subject of any judicial decision, I deferred my judgment on it until this morning. This clause was, as is well known, introduced into the statute by Lord Kingsdown, a name never to be mentioned by me without a feeling of the deepest respect for one of the wisest, most able, and most upright who ever administered justice in this or in any other country. He introduced it in consequence of some case which came within his cognisance while sitting in the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council. It was a case in which, after a collision, one ship had sailed away and left the other to perish. The clear object of the clause is to visit with deserved penalty and punishment such a transgressor. It could not have been the intention of the framer of the clause to prevent a vessel which had been an innocent sufferer from obtaining a salvage reward in this court to which, in the ordinary principles of law, it would have been entitled, because this vessel had been injured in the collision which preceded and rendered necessary salvage services. In this case the tug itself did not come into collision, but the ship which it towed, and it has been argued that the case of a towing ship is a casus omisus from the statute; but I am not of that opinion. I think the Retriever is entitled to salvage remuneration, but having regard to all the circumstances, to one of very moderate amount. I award 40% with the usual costs.

THE HALLEY.

The lex fori—The lex loci—Pilotage compulsory by foreign law.

Where a tort has been committed abroad, and redress is sought in this country, the lex fori will regulate the procedure and the form of the remedy alone, the lex loci delicti commissi will govern the case and the nature of remedy itself, unless it be prevented by its repugnance to natural justice or public policy.

And where a collision took place in foreign waters between an English and a foreign ship, and it appeared from the pleadings that pilotage was compulsory by Belgian or Dutch law, but that the owner was not relieved from his responsibility by having given the sole charge of the vessel to a duly licensed pilot, it was Held that the case was governed by the lex loci, and that the deft. (the English ship) was liable for the damage.

The Milford and the Jonathan Goodhue dissented from.

The Amalia distinguished.

Brett, Q. C. and Cohen, in support of the motion.

Manisty, Q. C. and Clarkson, contra.

This case arose out of a collision which had taken place in January last in Flushing Roads in the Scheldt between the British steamer Halley and the Norwegian barque Napoleon. The 11th article of the defts.' answer to the charge contained in the petition alleged that they had on board a pilot by compulsion of law, who was in charge of the vessel, and whom they had no power of selecting. The plts.' reply alleged that by the laws in force at the time and place, the owners of the vessel doing damage are liable for it, though the statement in the 11th article of the defts.' answer be true.

The case was now argued on a motion to reject the 3rd article of the reply.

Brett, Q. C.—This is an objection to the 3rd article of the plts.' reply in the nature of a demurrer, that is to say, we contend that even if the facts be true they are no answer to the plea. This is a petition in a case of collision between an English and foreign ship; the answer is that there was a compulsory pilot on board, and the reply is that the owners are liable even though a compulsory pilot was on board, and the damage caused solely by the pilot. The point raised is a very important one. The question is, whether the lex fori must govern the case or not. No English court administers foreign law. Part of the general maritime law of other countries has been adopted into the English law, but our courts do not administer the statute law of any other country. This collision occurred in waters where it was either governed by Belgian or Dutch law. The English law in this case is clear, its principles are clear and well established, damage has been done to the plts. by the negligence of an individual, namely, the pilot; according to English law he is responsible, but another is also or may be liable; that is the person who stands in the position of his master. It is not a case of principal and agent, but of master and servant and where the master is liable for the tortious act of his servant. It is sufficient for me now to say that a pilot who has a right to take command of a ship is not a servant of the owner of the ship. The owner may prevent the pilot coming on board, but if he does, he is subject to a penalty. He must take one for whom he has not sent, and he is not liable for his negligence. According to common law principles the deft. is not liable when the pilotage is compulsory, and there is no remedy for negligence unless it can be proved that the person whose negligence caused the damage was the servant of the owners of the vessel. The question comes to this, what remedy does the English law give? That remedy is the very essence of the lex fori. The English law does not take notice of foreign laws. If there be a contract brought forward it is construed according to the law where made: but that construction is not a remedy. You have no question of remedy till you construe the contract. The remedy is the remedy of the lex fori. This is the offspring of another principle of English law, the principle of construing a contract according to the intention of the parties. In the case of a custom you take the custom into account, because of the intention of the parties to be governed by the custom. That a contract then is construed according to the lex loci is out of no deference to the laws of the foreign country, but to carry out the intention of the parties according to an established principle of English law. [The Court.—In the case of domicile we are obliged to take into consideration foreign law.] Domicile also becomes a question of intention. We look at the circumstances under which the parties acted. The English law adopts the foreign law as evidence of the intention of the parties, the moment that purpose is fulfilled, English law takes no further notice of the foreign law. [The Court.—

[ADM.]

THE HALLEY.

[ADM.]

In cases of intestacy abroad, the English courts admit the foreign law in the distribution of the property.] In case of intestacy abroad you may suppose that it was the intention of the party that his property should be distributed according to the law of the country where he died. If he made a will abroad it would be with the intention it should be carried out according to the law of the country he resided in at the time of his death. The English law gives a remedy only if it is shown that the negligence was that of the defts.' servant. If that is not shown English law gives no redress. I add the question whether the pilot is compulsory or not, is entirely a question of fact. That fact is decided by another fact, namely, under what law he came on board. All you can look at the foreign law for, is to see whether the pilotage was compulsory or not. That fact ascertained, you can make no further use of the foreign law. In this case of compulsory pilotage the want of remedy does not depend on the English statute, it depends on this: that the pilot fails in showing that the pilot was the servant of the party aggrieved:

Obser.—Where the relation of master and servant does not exist, there is no responsibility: (Readie v. London and North-Western Railway Company, 4 Ex. 250; Story on Agency, ss. 458 b and 456 a.) This liability cannot apply to a case like the present, so one is liable for the act of another in his service when he has not had the power of selecting himself. It is the general maritime law which this court has here to administer. According to its principles it is clear that the defts. are not liable. The defts. have violated no Belgian law. It was only when this suit was instituted, and that here, and not there, that Belgian law was violated. Again, there has always been a great distinction drawn by jurists between contracts and torts. In cases of tort, you must always look to the lex loci. According to the best authorities when an action is brought for a tort you must administer the lex loci. There never has been a case in which it has been held that where a tort has been committed abroad, which is so by foreign law, and is not so by English law, that an action can be maintained here. The learned counsel, in the course of his argument, referred to Manisty, Q. C. contra.—This is a case of a foreign ship seeking compensation against a British. Prima facie the injured vessel has a right to recover anywhere; but in this country and others there are certain laws by which a shipowner is compelled in certain districts to place his ship under the care of a pilot. The common law is no doubt this: if I am prevented from selecting my servant or agent, my responsibility is taken away; but here the law which imposes the duty does not take away the obligation, but expressly enacts that that obligation shall continue. At common law there is no obligation to take on board a pilot. If this collision had taken place in British waters, no difficulty could have arisen at all. It has been contended that there was no violation of Belgian law. Can my learned friends contend that if one vessel ran down another in this very river that that would not be, apart from the question of pilotage, a violation of Belgian law?

Assuredly it would be so. The relation here between the owner and pilot, by statute, is the ordinary relation of master and servant. The maxim, then, qui facit per alium facit per se applies. If we take into consideration the whole Belgian law, the defts. are liable; are we to take only part and leave the rest? My learned friends seek to confound the right and the remedy; the lex loci governs the right, the lex fori governs the procedure by which that right is vindicated. In a sense that is the remedy; for the term remedy as used does not mean the compensation, but rather the procedure. Let us look at Campbell v. Small (5 H. & N. 726, Ex. Ch., and in the court below, 3 H. & N. 617). It is most important to see the true principles on which this case was decided. The captain of a vessel having taken on himself to sell goods to a purchaser in Norway, who would have a good title to them according to Norwegian law, he was allowed to retain them by our law, according to which he had no title to them. The principle is exactly the same, whether it be a question of tort or of contract. Transitory actions that arise abroad, in the adjudicating upon them will be governed by the law of the country in which they arose. [By the Court.—Suppose a Belgian brought an action against an Englishman in this country for driving his carriage against him there, if that was wrong there and not here, would the Belgian get damages?] He would. [By the Court.—Must the same redress be given there as here?] Yes, that would be the proper course. If a good cause of action of a transitory nature arises abroad, the aggrieved party ought to recover here, and the Court in which the action is brought ought to administer the law in the same way as where the cause of action arises.

Clarke.—The first point to be considered is, in transitory actions, what are the rights of a foreign nation when ships of another country are within its jurisdiction? It is competent for such foreign country to declare that such ships shall be in charge of a pilot, but under certain terms and conditions, e.g. that there shall be constituted between the owner and pilot the relation of master and servant. There is, however, another way of viewing this case. This is a question of lien. The lien is a qualified property vested in the plt., which he comes to this court to enforce. Before the Act of 1861 this court had not the power in cases like the present to enforce the lien. The foundation of the action is rem. Is the lien, and that lien accrued the moment that the collision happened. The plts. having acquired a lien there at the time of the collision, by the lex loci are entitled to enforce that lien here.

Brett, Q. C. in reply.—The whole argument depends on the proposition of Mr. Manisty that, where in a foreign country there is a wrong and a remedy, and the action is transitory, that cause of action can be enforced in any other country. By what law is this so? It is not so by the law of England. Is it by the law of nations? No authority has been cited to show the truth of this proposition according to either. If it is so according to the law of nations, municipal law cannot get rid of it. In the Analis, if that proposition were true, the foreign ship having suffered wrong her own country's law would have given a remedy, and hence a vested right in a cause of action that ought to have been enforced by the law of nations, and this country had no right to pass an Act of Parliament limiting the remedy in particular cases. Again, you may have that which would give rise to a cause of action abroad, and would not do so here. For example, in the case of adultery in Holland, an English court could only administer English law. In cases of tort, the right and remedy are the same thing. The whole question comes to this, is the remedy part of the procedure? The cause of action must be looked at with regard to the law of both countries, for there may be Acts which could support a cause of action in one country and which in another could not. In cases of contract, the cause of action is the breach; in tort, it is the injury. What right does this give you? A right to a remedy. What is that remedy? The judgment of a court of law. What is the judgment that court gives? It is part of the procedure of the court.

Cur. adv. vult.

Dec. 7.—Sir R. PHILLIMORE.—In this case the owner of a Norwegian vessel has brought an action against the owner of an English vessel for damage done to the Norwegian ship in the territory of Belgium. One of the functions, and not the least important, of the High Court of Admiralty is to administer international justice in maritime suits between foreigners who resort to its jurisdiction, or, as in the present instance, between the foreigner and the British subject. The prize jurisdiction of this court administers the jus inter gentes, or public international law, and what is called the instance jurisdiction administers the jus gentium, or private international law. In order to attain this end the rules of pleading, and the general mode of investigating and trying the merits of such cases when they come before it, are simple, free from technicality, and calculated to do substantial justice. In this court, as Sir J. Nicholl observes in the Girolamo, 3 Hagg. Rep. 177, “the law maritime according to the law of nations is to be administered;” and again he says (p. 189) it “is governed by the rules” (he is not speaking of the prize court) “of international law.” To the same effect in the Zollverein, 1 Swab. p. 99, Dr Lushington, in the case of a collision between a British and foreign vessel, says, “The case must be decided by the law maritime, by those rules of navigation which usually prevail among nations navigating the seas where the collision takes place.” And in the Golubchick, 1 W. Rob. p. 147, he says, “Upon general principles I apprehend that this court, administering, as it does, a part of the maritime law of the world, would have a right to interpose in cases of the present description.” If, therefore, this collision had taken place upon the high seas it must upon general principles, have been adjudicated according to the lex maris. The petition of the plt. in this cause sets forth that the Norwegian barque Napoleon, of the burthen of 740 tons, while riding at anchor in Flushing Roads, in the month of January of this year, was run into by the British steamship Halley, and thereby suffered considerable damage. In their answer to this charge contained in the petition, the defts., the owners of the Halley state that by “the Belgian or Dutch laws, which prevail in and over the river Scheldt, and to which the said river is subject, from the place where the said river pilot came on board the Halley, and thence upto and beyond the place of the aforesaid collision, it was compulsory on the said steamer to take on board and to be navigated under the directions and in charge of a pilot, duly appointed or licensed according to the said laws, and it was by virtue of such laws” (the words are not unimportant) “that the Halley was compelled to take on board and to be given in charge, and until the time of the said collision as aforesaid to remain in charge of, and did take on board, and was given in charge, and up to the time of the said collision remained in charge of the said river pilot, who was duly appointed or licensed according to the said laws, and whom the defts. or their agents did not select, and had no power of selecting.” To this defence the owners of the Napoleon reply as follows: “That by the Belgian or Dutch laws in force at the time and place of the said collision, the owners of a ship which has done damage to another ship by collision are liable to pay and make good to the owners of such lastly-mentioned ship all losses occasioned to them by reason of such collision, notwithstanding that the ship which has done such damage was, at the time of the doing thereof, being navigated under the direction and in charge of a pilot duly appointed or licensed according to the said laws, and notwithstanding that such damage was solely occasioned by the negligence, default, or want of skill of such pilot, without any contributory negligence on the part of the master or crew of such lastly-mentioned ship, and notwithstanding that it was, at the time and place of the collision, by the said laws compulsory on such lastly-mentioned ship to be navigated under the direction and in charge of such pilot; and the defts., the owners of the Halley, are by virtue of the said laws liable to pay and make good to the plts. all losses occasioned to them by the said collision, even if the statements contained in the 11th article of the said answer be true.” The admission of this plea is objected to by the owners of the Halley upon the ground that the law of England alone governs this case. On this subject elaborate arguments have been addressed to the court by the counsel for both parties. The point, it is said, has never before been raised, and I have now to give judgment upon it. The claim of the petitioner in this case is founded, according to the Norman language of our common law, upon a tort committed by the deft.; according to the language of jurisprudence, familiar to this court, upon an obligatio ex maleficio, or as it is more generally, though perhaps less accurately, termed, an obligatio ex delicto, incurred by the deft. “Res sic habet,” Donellus says, “ut omne delictum est maleficium, ita non ex quovis delicto nascatur obligatio sed solum ex maleficio” (Donellus l. xv. c. 23). In the case before me this tort was committed, or this obligatio was incurred, in the territory of a foreign state. I think it expedient therefore to dwell for a moment on the peculiar character of this obligatio, with the reasoning upon which my judgment is in some measure connected. According to the Roman law, which on this subject has been generally adopted by continental Europe, the facts which give rise to a legal obligation are said to be four—contractus, quasi contractus, maleficium, quasi maleficium. The two former create an obligation with the consent of the obliged person (obligatus); the two latter without his consent. It is with the third alone with which we are at present concerned; namely, obligatio ex maleficio, or delicto, for it is not necessary to consider the distinction between this and the obligatio ex quasi delicto. Delictum (Donellus says, with his usual accuracy and perspicuity), “Id est factum id, quo nocetur alteri, jure ita coercetur, ut sarciat alteri quod abstulit (l. xii. c. 5). Ex tali culpa” (that is maleficio). Grotius says, “obligatio naturaliter oritur, si damnum datum est, nempe ut id resarciatur” (De Jure Belli et Pacis, l. ii. c. xvii. s. 1). This is in truth the language of natural justice. The form of remedy under the Roman law was supplied by the “Lex Aquilia.” The passage in the Digest upon this very subject of collision at sea contains (as so many other passages in that repertory of jurisprudence do) the written equity which the reason of the thing requires. “Si navis

ADM.]

THE HALLEY.

[ADM.]

tua impacta in meam scapham, damnum mihi dedit, quæsitum est, quæ actio mihi competerit? Et ait Proculus, si in potestate nautarum fuit, ne id acciderit et culpâ eorum factum sit, lege Aquiliâ cum nautis agendum: quia parvi refert navem immittendo, aut serraculum ad navem ducendo, an tuâ manu damnum dederis; quia omnibus his modis per te damno adficio; sed si fune rupto, aut, cum a nullo regeretur navis incurrisset, cum domino agendum non esse." (Dig. L. ix. Tit. ii. 29, 2.) According to the principles of natural justice, the wrong-doer to this Norwegian vessel is bound to replace her owner in the position in which he was before the wrong was done; the owner is entitled to what civilians call a restitutio in integrum. I gladly avail myself of Dr. Lushington's language in this matter, in a case in which he distinguishes (speaking of the duty of the registrar and merchants, as referees of the High Court of Admiralty) between cases of collision and cases of insurance. "One," he says (the Gazelle, 2 W. Rob. Adm. Rep. 280), "of the principal and most important objections to the report under consideration is this, that the registrar and merchants, in fixing the amount to be paid for repairs, and the supply of new articles in lieu of those which have been damaged or destroyed, have deducted one-third from the full amount which such repairs and new articles would cost. This deduction, it is said, has been made in consideration of new materials being substituted for old, and is justified upon the principle of a rule which is alleged to be invariably adopted in cases of insurance. The first question then which I have to consider is the applicability of the rule in question to a case of the present description; and this question, it is obvious, involves a principle of considerable importance, not only as regards the decision in this particular case, but as establishing a rule for assessing the damages in all other similar cases. Now in my apprehension a material distinction exists between cases of insurance and cases of damage by collision, and for the following reasons." And then the learned judge explains the nature of an insurance contract, and he continues, "With regard to cases of collision, it is to be observed that they stand upon a totally different footing. The claim of the suffering party who has sustained the damage arises not ex contractu, but ex delicto of the party by whom the damage has been done; and the measure of the indemnification is not limited by the terms of any contract, but is co-extensive with the amount of the damage. The right against the wrong-doer is for a restitutio in integrum, and this restitution he is bound to make without calling upon the party injured to assist him in any way whatever. If the settlement of the indemnification be attended with any difficulty (and in those cases difficulties must and will frequently occur), the party in fault must bear the inconvenience. He has no right to fix this inconvenience upon the injured party, and if that party derives incidentally a greater benefit than mere indemnification, it arises only from the impossibility of otherwise effecting such indemnification, without exposing him to some loss or burthen which the law will not place upon him." Again in the case of the Amalia (1 Brow. & Lush, 152) the same learned judge says, "The principle of limited liability" (and in this case it is contended that the liability of the British owner is taken away altogether) "is that full indemnity, the natural rights of justice, shall be abridged for political reasons." This is a subject to which I must again advert in another part of my judgment. At present it is enough to say that the dictates of natural justice appear to be in favour of the petition of the Norwegian vessel in this case, which prays this court to cause the British vessel, the wrong-doer, to make that reparation for wrong done by her which the lex loci commissi delicti, had the suit been brought in a Belgian court, would have enforced. It is, however, contended on behalf of the British vessel that this court cannot apply this law to this case; that it must, partially at least (the importance of this qualification will be presently seen), disregard the law of the place in which the wrong was done, and apply that of the place in which the action for redress is brought; that, in other words, the lex fori, and not the lex loci commissi delicti, governs this case. If this be so, the foreign owner will obtain, practically speaking, no compensation for the wrong done to his vessel by the British ship, the owner of which will practically escape altogether unscathed. It is not, therefore, too much to say that the arguments and the precedents which are brought forward in favour of such a result must be narrowly examined and carefully scanned. It certainly may be that the hands of the court are tied by municipal law, and prevented from administering the relief which, upon general grounds, it must desire to administer to the petitioner in this case. I now proceed to examine the reasoning and authorities which have been advanced in support of this proposition. The contention on the part of the British owner is that the lex fori must govern this case not because that law is made binding on the court, as in the case of the Amalia, by a British statute, but because it is made binding on the court by an established principle of law, which is to be collected from judicial decisions and the dicta of accredited writers. It is contended then that this question belongs to the domain of the lex fori, inasmuch as it is a question relating to the remedy, and not to the right, of the party suing. It becomes important to see what authority, in principle or precedent, there is for this proposition. It is well settled by decisions of the tribunals of this country that all which relates to the form of the remedy, and the mode of enforcing it, all that relates to the conduct of the suit in court, the rules of evidence and to procedure, shall be governed by the lex fori. Indeed, it is a well-established rule of international comity, as old, certainly, as the time of Bartolus, that "de his quæ pertinent ad litis ordinationem inspicitur locus judicii." But to the further proposition, namely, that the nature and character of the remedy itself—for instance, the measure of civil damages for a breach of contract, or for the non-fulfilment of any legal obligation—is to be regulated by that law, I cannot assent. I am not aware of any direct authority for it; certainly it cannot, in my opinion, be maintained upon principle; and so far as the analogy of the obligation arising from contract applies to this case of obligatio ex delicto, the judicial precedents which I have been able to find are adverse to this proposition. Mr. Justice Washington, in a judgment delivered in the District Court of Pennsylvania, observes (Peter's Circuit Court Reports, p. 230), "The rate of damages to be recovered for a breach of contract is a part of the right to which the injured party is entitled, and it is totally distinct from the remedy provided for enforcing it. In the former case the lex loci, where the contract was made or broken, is to prevail; in the latter, the lex loci of the forum, where the remedy is provided." The same learned judge, in an earlier and very singular case (Courtois v. Carpentier, 1 Washington's Am. Rep. p. 377), laid down the same principle. It was an action in the Pennsylvanian Court, on a note payable in sugar, and given in Guadaloupe, where a particular custom prevails in relation to the payment of such notes in sugar. Mr. Justice Washington said, "The laws of the country where this contract was made must govern. These notes were payable in Guadaloupe, in sugar, at a valuation. The debt, having sued here, cannot complain, if his situation is not made worse than

ADM.]

THE HALLEY.

[ADM.]

it would have been in Guadeloupe. But as according to our forms of proceeding (and as to them the laws of the country must govern) a judgment cannot be rendered for sugar, the value in money must be given, which, in effect, is the precise sum stated in the note." Mr. Justice Story refers to these and to other American, as well as some English, cases in the following paragraph (Story's Conflict of Laws, c. 8, s. 307):—"Analogous to the rule respecting interest would seem to be the rule of damages in cases of contract, where damages are to be recovered for a breach thereof ex mora, or where the right to damages arises ex delicto, from some wrong or injury done to personal property. Thus, if a ship should be illegally or tortiously converted in the East Indies by a party, the interest there will be allowed by way of damages in a suit against him. So the rate of damages on a dishonoured bill of exchange will be according to the lex loci contractus of the particular party. So, if a bill of exchange be made in one state and indorsed in another state, and again endorsed by a second endorser in a third state, the rate of damages upon the dishonour of the bill will be against each party according to the law of the place where his own contract had its origin, either by making or by endorsing the bill. So, if a note made in a foreign country is for the payment of a certain sum in sugar, and by the custom of that place the like notes are payable in sugar at a valuation, the law of the place is to govern in assessing the damages for a breach thereof." In the case of the Zollverein (Swa. 98), Dr. Lushington observed, "The principle which governs all these questions of jurisdiction and remedies is admirably stated by Story, J. (Conflict of Laws, c. 14), 'In regard to the rights and merits involved in actions, the law of the place where they originated is to be followed; but the forms of remedies' (it is important to observe these words), "and the order of judicial proceedings are to be according to the law of the place where the action is instituted, without any regard to the domicile of the parties, the origin of the right, or the country of the act.'" And in another part of his judgment he says, "Generally, when a collision takes place between a British and foreign vessel on the high seas, what law shall a Court of Admiralty follow? As regards the foreign ship, for her owner cannot be supposed to know or to be bound by the municipal law of the country, the case must be decided by the law maritime, by those rules of navigation which usually prevail among nations navigating the seas where the collision takes place; if the foreigner comes before the tribunals of this country, the remedy and form of proceeding must be according to the lex fori." It is to be observed here that the learned judge is reported as having used the expressions "the remedy and form of proceeding must be according to the lex fori," but I think that if these words be correctly reported there must be an unintentional error in the language of the learned judge, who must have meant to say "the form of remedy and of proceeding," an alteration which brings these words and the judgment in harmony with the previous citation from Story, on which indeed it was mainly founded. I must not, however, pass by two judgments of my immediate predecessor in this chair, to which I drew the attention of counsel, because they may be fairly cited by the defts. as favourable to the position for which they contend. They are, in fact, the converse of the present case. In them the judge decided that the lex fori, where more favourable to the foreign suitor than the lex loci contractus, should be administered. In the case of the Milford the question as to the application of sect. 191 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1854, to the suit of a foreign master against the freight for wages arose, and the court observed as follows (Swa. 367):—"There are no negative words which tend to show that the court should not apply sect. 191 to foreign masters and seamen. As there are no such words, is it consistent with justice that the court should hold its hand in all these matters, and say that as to foreign masters it will impose a restriction not found in the statute? I think I am bound to apply the remedy given by the statute. In the case of the Jonathan Goodhue (Swa. 526) Dr. Lushington remarked, "When this case was first brought before the court, it was said that the American law would exclude the master from the benefit of the statute,—that it was a legal incident of the contract that the master should have no lien on either ship or freight for wages or advances. But pending that question, the court decided in the case of the Milford, that the remedy must follow the lex fori, and that a foreign master was entitled to the same remedy against ship and freight as a British master. I adhere to that judgment, though I repeat what I then said, that it was a case of great doubt and difficulty." I must say that the reasoning of the learned judge which led to the decisions in these cases was never satisfactory to my mind, and I am glad to learn that in a more recent case mentioned to me by Mr. Clarkson (The Sylphide), the learned judge expressed himself willing to reconsider the principle of these decisions. It is to be observed also that they rested in great measure upon the construction of a British statute, and in the present case we have no statute to consider. With respect to the application of the lex fori to this case, an observation of some importance arises out of the special character of the law itself. The lex fori in this instance is founded, as Lord Stowell observed in the Carl Johann (1 Hagg. Adm. 113), upon considerations of domestic policy. The English Legislature has thought it expedient that only certain persons under certain restrictions shall be allowed to act as pilots in certain British waters, and that it shall be compulsory upon all masters of ships to place the navigation of their vessel while passing through these waters under the control of one of these licensed pilots. And the common law of England has ruled that in such cases the natural responsibility of the owner of the vessel for injuries done to the property or persons of others by the unskilful navigation of that vessel shall cease and be transferred to the pilot. This law holds that the responsibility of the owner for the acts of his servant is founded upon the presumption that the owner chooses his servant, and gives him orders which he is bound to obey, and that the acts of the servant so far as the interests of third parties are concerned, must always be considered as the acts of the owner. No such presumptions, it is said, exist in the case of compulsory pilotage, in which the State forces its own servant upon the owner, and indeed to some extent reverses the usual order of things on board ship by rendering it incumbent on the master to obey the orders of the pilot. But the considerations of domestic policy which have created this peculiar law are not founded on principles of universal law or natural justice. They are considerations of British policy, which apply to British waters and territory, but not to the Flushing Roads in which this collision took place. In the earlier part of this judgment I said that natural justice appeared to favour the admission of the plt.'s reply in this case. I must here observe that it has not been argued before me that the Belgian law is contrary to natural justice, and therefore one which falls under a well-known category of exception to the general rule of international private law, according to which one state accepts in cases of contract the law of another state. It has not been so argued, and in my opinion such an argument could not be successfully maintained. To say to the innocent owner of a ship which the unskilful navigation has damaged, perhaps destroyed, "you cannot recover any damages from me, because I had a pilot on board, and I obeyed his orders. You may bring your action against the pilot, from whom you cannot obtain any substantial redress,"—to say this is surely not to speak the language of natural justice. Should the innocent sufferer reply, "that if the State chooses to compel you to employ an officer of its own, it is no reason why a third person, no party to this arrangement, should suffer a grievous wrong without redress. It may be a reason why you should have an action against the pilot, or why the State should combine with the measure for your exemption from a natural liability, some measure for the reparation of the innocent sufferer; but this is a matter with which he is not concerned. He has a right to compensation,"—this would be a reply entitled to a hearing surely in any court desirous to adjudicate upon the case according to the ordinary principles of justice. Lord Stowell's mind, furnished as it was with the principles of jurisprudence, naturally rejected the argument for the immunity of the wrong-doing vessel. In the case of the Neptune the Second (1 Dod. 467), he said, "It is acknowledged in this case that the damage was done by the ship proceeded against; but it has been set up, in the way of excuse, that she was at the time under the care of a regular pilot, and was acting in obedience to his directions; and it has been contended in the argument that the pilot alone is answerable for any damage that may have been sustained in consequence of the mismanagement of the vessel. If the position could be maintained, that the mere fact of having a pilot on board, and acting in obedience to his directions, would discharge the owners from responsibility, I am of opinion that they would stand excused in the present case; for I think it is sufficiently established in proof that the master acted throughout in conformity to the directions of the pilot. But this, I conceive" (says this great master of jurisprudence), "is not the true rule of law. The parties who suffer are entitled to have their remedy against the vessel that occasioned the damage, and are not under the necessity of looking to the pilot, from whom redress is not always to be had, for compensation. The owners are responsible to the injured party for the acts of the pilot, and they must be left to recover the amount as well as they can against him. It cannot be maintained that the circumstances of having a pilot on board, and acting in conformity to his directions, can operate as a discharge of the responsibility of the owners." I will frankly say that it appears to me difficult to reconcile the claims of natural justice with the law which exempts the owner, who has a licensed pilot on board, from all liability for the injuries done, by the bad navigation of his ship to the property of an innocent owner. Obligatio is (according to the admirable definition in the Institutes) "vinculum juris quo necessitate astringimur alicujus rei solvendæ;" it is lieu de droit, as the French say. No one acquainted with the working of this law, which exempts the wrong-doing vessel from liability in this court, can be ignorant that it is fruitful in injustice. On the one hand the master is tempted to abstain from all control over his vessel, lest he should afford grounds for the argument that by interference with the pilot he has deprived himself of the legal immunity which he would otherwise enjoy. On the other hand it is obvious that great inducements may be offered to the pilot to shield the incapacity or mismanagement of the master and his officers by taking all the blame upon himself. It is true that by so doing he may subject himself to censure and punishment from the Trinity House. Certainly in cases where the evidence clearly established very gross negligence or want of skill on his part, such would be the result; but the greater number of cases are not of this extreme description. It is impossible to doubt that an owner who, as in a recent case before me, would, but for the fact of having a licensed pilot on board, have been compelled to pay perhaps 25,000*l.* to the ship which he had sunk, lies under a very strong temptation to take whatever measures may be necessary to obtain the two necessary statements of the pilot; namely, first, that he alone had the management of the vessel; and, secondly, that his orders were obeyed; the two stereotyped questions necessarily and invariably put to the pilot by those who conduct the defence of the wrong-doing vessel. Again, I cannot help thinking that the doctrine, so clearly explained by Lord Cranworth, in Reedie v. London and North-Western Railway 4 Ex. Rep. 255, of the owner being responsible only for the acts of his own servant, has been somewhat strained in its application to the case of the licensed pilot. I do not quite understand why, because the State insists, on the one hand, upon all persons who exercise the office of pilot within certain districts being duly educated for the purpose and having a certificate of their fitness, and insists, on the other hand, that the master shall within these districts take one of these persons on board to superintend the steering of his vessel, the usual relation of owner and servant is to be entirely at an end; and still less do I see why the sufferer is to be deprived of all practical redress for injuries inflicted upon him by the ship which such a pilot navigates. If compulsory pilotage be at all expedient, a question open to very considerable doubt, it seems to me more just that the master of the wrong-doing ship should be left to his action against the pilot who has badly navigated her, than that the owner of the injured ship should be placed in that predicament. I incline to the opinion that the Belgian law, as it appears in these pleadings, is more consonant with natural justice than our own on this subject. Be this, however as it may, it has not, I repeat, been argued that the Belgian law is inadmissible here, because it is at variance with natural justice, and if such an argument had been advanced, I should have expressed my dissent from it. Having regard then to the fact that the lex fori is founded upon special considerations of public policy applicable only to British territory, and that the admission of the foreign law, the lex loci delicti commissi, to govern this case is not prevented by reason of its repugnance to natural justice or to public policy—if the question before me were as to the law which ought to govern the fulfilment of the obligation arising out of an ordinary contract made in Belgian territories, it could not, I think, be successfully contended that I ought to apply the English law to such case. To such a contract I might apply the principle of Lord Stowell's judgment in Dalrymple v. Dalrymple (2 Consist. Rep. 38), and adopting with a slight alteration his very words, say, "This contract being established in an English court must be adjudicated according to the principle of English law." But the only principle applicable to such a case by the law of England is, that the character of this obligation (the validity of Miss Gordon's marriage rights) Lord Stowell says must be tried according to the law of the country in which it had its origin. Having furnished this principle, the law of England withdraws altogether, and leaves the legal question to the exclusive judgment of the law of Belgium.

A question, however, arises as to whether because in this case the obligation to pay damages arises, not, as in a case of contract, out of the free will of the obligor, but out of the order of the law consequent upon the wrongful act of the obligor, the application of the principle ought to be different. Does it affect the principle upon which justice ought to be administered that the obligation arises out of a delictum and not out of a contractus? The authority of Savigny, which it was truly said would have great weight with me, is cited in favour of the application of the lex fori in such a case (Savigny, System des R. R. 8, 208, 278). The opinion of this most learned and admirable writer is that the law which prevails in the place in which a contract was intended to be fulfilled ought to be administered by the forum before which the fulfilment is sought to be enforced. He places the exceptions to this rule under two categories; it is only with the first that we are now concerned. Under this category of exceptions he ranges all cases in which the lex loci or the lex loci solutionis comes into conflict with what he calls a positive stringent law of the forum. Having laid down this principle he proceeds to place the obligatio ex delicto under it. The passages in which he does so are perhaps the least satisfactory in his work, and this particular branch of his subject is but cursorily treated. I think, however, that under this category of a positive stringent law, he did not intend to include such a law as the English law with respect to pilots and the irresponsibility of masters. He is not to be understood as saying that a lex fori which is founded exclusively on local considerations, should be applied to the transactions of a foreigner happening in a place to which these local considerations do not apply. But if he is to be so understood, if his proposition be unqualified and universal, it is opposed to the opinion of a great, I believe the greater, number of German jurists. Dr. Bar, the assessor to the Royal Court of Hanover, a jurist of eminence, expressing his dissent from the opinion of Savigny, lays down the contrary doctrine, and refers in a note to the opinion of many of his brother jurists, who are of the same opinion (Bar, Das Internationale Privat und Strafrecht, Hanover, 1862, pp. 66, 317, 437, 477). To these may be added John Voet, who says, "Ita quoque delinquens videtur tacite per delictum, velut contractum involuntarium sese obligasse ad talem pænæ modum qualis præstitutus est per legem loci in quo delictum perpetravit." (L. 48, t. 19, xi.) It is well remarked by Savigny that in applying the principles with respect to the enforcement of the obligations which arise ex contractu to the obligations which arise ex delicto, some difficulty is caused by the peculiar character of the latter obligation, inasmuch as the enforcement of it borders very closely upon the administration of criminal law. Now it is a maxim of private international law, not indeed universally recognised, but I think firmly incorporated into the jurisprudence of this country, that the court of one state cannot be required to administer the criminal law of another. It is with the view of getting rid of any embarrassments created by this difficulty between the civil obligation and the punishment of the criminal offence, that eminent jurists have generally adopted the following distinction, which appears to me just and sound. The obligatio ex delicto may be followed by two distinct consequences—to make compensation in civil damages for the injury inflicted, and the liability to undergo a punishment, such as a penal fine or imprisonment, whether at the instance of the person injured, or by the intervention of a public officer of the State. "Eodem delicto et civilis persecutio ad pœnam privatam et iudicium publicum esse possit," J. Voet (L. 47, t. 1. 1.) says; and Donellus distinguishes between the civil action "de privato damno et pecuniâ quam inde debitam actor prosequatur," and "quatenus de his agitur criminaliter ad pœnam et vindictam criminis" (L. xvii. c. 16, Comment. de jure civili). To the same effect is the passage in the Institutes, L. 4, t. 4. It is with the former consequence alone of the delictum that the forum of a foreign state can be properly concerned. I must now advert to the case of the Amalia decided in this court, and afterwards adjudicated upon by the Privy Council, which it is said renders it incumbent upon me to apply the lex fori to the present case. The Amalia was a cause in which the owners of a British steamship, the Amalia, petitioned this court for the purpose of obtaining a declaration of the limitation of their liability under sect. 54 of 25 & 26 Vict. c. 63, in respect of a collision which had taken place between that vessel and a Belgian steam vessel, the Marie de Brabant, in consequence of which the Marie de Brabant, with her cargo, was sunk and lost, and several of the crew drowned. The collision in question happened on the 15th May 1863 in the Mediterranean sea. When this case was before this court, Dr. Lushington observed (Brow. & Lush. 152), "the principle of limited liability is, that full indemnity, the natural right of justice, shall be abridged for political reasons." And further on he observes, "I have always recognised the full force of this objection, that the British Parliament has no proper authority to legislate for foreigners out of its jurisdiction. . . . Now fully recognising the force of this objection, I do not think it is removed by the ingenious suggestion that limited liability is a part of the lex fori." And here I may ask if the limitation of liability be not part of the lex fori, why should the exemption from all liability belong to that category? And Dr. Lushington then decided that the construction of the 54th section of the Merchant Shipping Act 1862 (25 & 25 Vict. c. 63), which contained the words "the owners of any ship, whether British or foreign, shall not, &c," related equally to British and foreign vessels, and that to the latter, in a British court, as well as the former must be applied the doctrine of limited liability. The Judicial Committee of the Privy Council upheld, not without doubt apparently, this decision. Lord Chelmsford, who delivered the judgment of their Lordships, observed (1 Moore, N. S., 484), "The apps. say that the moment a collision occurs there is a lien upon the vessel which is in fault, and supposing the vessel injured to be a foreign one, that the foreigner immediately acquires this lien to the extent of the damage, and cannot be deprived of it by the municipal law of this country. But suppose the foreigner, instead of proceeding in rem against the vessel, chooses to bring an action for damages in a court of law against the owners of the vessel occasioning the injury, the argument arising out of the acquired lien would be at once swept away, and the rights and liabilities of the parties be determined by the law which the court would be bound to administer. And it may be asked what breach of international law or interference with the natural rights of foreigners is produced by the Legislature saying that all suitors having recourse to our courts to obtain damages for an injury from a person not himself actually in fault, but being responsible for the acts of his servant, shall recover only to the value of the thing by which the loss or damage was occasioned, estimated in a particular manner. It is to be observed that under this view of the 54th section the foreigner will be entitled to the benefit of the Act, as well as the British owner of a ship occasioning damage, and he will, therefore, not be exposed to a more extensive liability than the British subject." It is not necessary for me to make any remark upon the reasoning by which their Lordships arrived at this conclusion. I may be permitted to observe, however, that the limitation of the owner's liability to the whole value of the vessel which did the damage, stands upon a very different footing with respect to the claims of natural justice, from the total exemption of the owner from all liability whatever for the act of his vessel. However this may be, the judgment in the Amalia does not appear to me to govern this case. The res decisa in the Amalia was that the 54th section of the Merchant Shipping Act must be holden by a British court of justice to apply to a foreigner as well as a British vessel, although the collision had taken place between them upon the high seas. It was a decision upon the words of that statute, and so far it is binding upon this court. In no other way am I able to reconcile their Lordships' judgment in this case with the principles of their previous decision in the case of the Bold Buccleugh: (Harmer v. Bell, 7 Moo. 284.) Hear what Jervis, C. J., delivering the opinion of their Lordships, says as to the character of the lien which binds the wrong-doing vessel from the moment that the collision has taken place. "Having its origin in this rule of the civil law, a maritime lien is well defined by Lord Tenterden to mean a claim or privilege upon a thing to be carried into effect by legal process; and Mr. Justice Story (1 Sumner, 78) explains that process to be a proceeding in rem, and adds that wherever a lien or claim is given upon the thing, then the Admiralty enforces it by a proceeding in rem, and indeed is the only court competent to enforce it. A maritime lien is the foundation of the proceeding in rem, a process to make perfect a right inchoate from the moment the lien attaches; and whilst it must be admitted that where such a lien exists a proceeding in rem may be had, it will be found to be equally true that in all cases where a proceeding in rem is the proper course, there a maritime lien exists, which gives a privilege or claim upon the thing to be carried into effect by legal process. This claim or privilege travels with the thing, into whosoever possession it may come. It is inchoate from the moment the claim or privilege attaches, and when carried into effect by legal process, by a proceeding in rem, relates back to the period when it first attached. This simple rule, which in our opinion must govern this case, and which is deduced from the civil law, cannot be better illustrated than by reference to the circumstances of the Almi, referred to in the argument, and decided in conformity with this rule, though apparently upon other grounds. In that case there was a bottomry bond before and after the collision, and the court held that the claim for damage in a proceeding in rem must be preferred to the first bondholder, but was not entitled against the second bondholder to the increased value of the vessel by reason of repairs effected at his cost. The interest of the first bondholder taking effect from the period when his lien attached, he was, so to speak, a part owner in interest at the date of the collision, and the ship in which he and others were interested was liable to its value at that date for the injury done, without reference to his claim. So by the collision the interest of the claimant attached, and dating from that event, the ship in which he was interested having been repaired, was put in bottomry by the master acting for all parties and he could be bound by that transaction. This rule, which is simple and intelligible, is, in our opinion, applicable to all cases." The decision in the Amalia therefore does not, in my opinion, govern the case now before me. Now let me mention a judgment delivered in the Supreme Court of the United States of North America, and certainly entitled to the highest respect in this court. In the case of Smith and others v. Condry (1 Howard U. S. Rep. 28, and 14 Curtis, 48), to which I was referred by Mr. Clarkson, two ships belonging to subjects of the United States in North America came into collision in the port of Liverpool. The action was brought in the Circuit Court for the district of Columbia, and came up by writ of error to the Supreme Court. Mr. Chief Justice Taney, in delivering the opinion of the Court, observed (p. 32) as follows:—"Upon the evidence above stated, the deft. asked the court to instruct the jury that under the statutes of Great Britain of the 37 Geo. 3, c. 78, 52 Geo. 3, c. 39, and 6 Geo. 4, c. 125, the deft. was not responsible for any damage occasioned by the default, negligence, or unskilfulness of the pilot. The Court gave this instruction, and that is the subject of the first exception. The collision having taken place in the port of Liverpool, the rights of the parties depend upon the provisions of the British statutes then in force, and if doubts exist as to their true construction we must of course adopt that which is sanctioned by their own courts." This decision of the Supreme Court of the United States of North America seems to go the whole length of the way which the Norwegian plt. desires me to travel, for it is in fact a decision that the court before which a plt. sues for the enforcement of the damages growing out of an obligatio ex delicto ought to measure those damages by the law which bound the obligor and the obligee at the time when the factum obligans (as civilians speak) took place, or, in other words, when the delictum was committed. Lastly, I must observe upon not the least remarkable feature in the present proceeding, namely, that the deft. is the first to invoke in his own favour the law of Belgium. He pleads that by that law, applicable to this case, the taking of a pilot on board was compulsory, and there his citation from the Belgian law ceases. The plt., not unnaturally, pleads in his turn the other part of the Belgian law, which is to the effect that the compulsory taking on board of a pilot does not release the master from his liability under the general law for all damages occasioned by the unskilful navigation of his vessel. The deft. contends that the plt. has no right to finish the citation, so to speak, which he the deft. has begun, from the Belgian law; that I must only look at that portion of it which he has selected as being in his favour and which, as such, he is pleased to lay before me; that it is my duty not to apply either the general lex maris, mentioned at the beginning of this judgment, or the whole Belgian law, which combines the obligation to take a pilot, with the continuing responsibility of the owner; but to take the former part of that law which relates to the obligation to take a pilot, and add to it the English law which exempts the owner from responsibility. This is the tessellated piece of jurisprudence which I am told the law requires to be applied to the case before me. I hope there is no law or legal rule in this country which would compel me to do an act of, what seems to me, such manifest injustice; as at present advised I know of none. Upon the whole, after an anxious and, I trust, careful consideration of the principles of law applicable to this case, and of the authorities and arguments which have been laid before me, I am of opinion that the plt. is entitled to plead that the law of Belgium, within whose territorial waters his vessel received damage from the vessel of the deft., renders the owner of the latter vessel, although compelled to take a pilot on board, liable to make reparation for the wrong which she has done. The question is one of grave importance, and submitted in this country for the first time unhappily to my decision. I am glad to remember that, if I have erred, my error will be corrected by the Court of Appeal, and I will readily accord to the deft., if he desire it, the permission to appeal, which the statute requires, from this decision upon the admissibility of the plt.'s plea.

THE HALLEY.

[ADM.]

GREEN v. BRITTEN.

Administration—Earnings of ships—Expenses of sitting out—Tenant for life.

A testator, a shipowner, gave to his sister for life the interest of an investment to be made of certain parts of his residuary personal estate, and which should arise under the following direction in his will:

He directed that his executors should not sell any of his ships, or private shares in ships, for a period of seven years from the time of his death, unless the keeping of them should cause loss to or diminution of his estate, and in such case he gave his said executors a discretionary power to sell same; but, subject as aforesaid, he directed them to retain his said ships and shares of ships for the period of seven years at the least, upon trust to superintend and manage the same.

At the time of the testator's death many of his ships were employed in various voyages, all of which turned out profitably. Some of the other ships in which he had shares incurred losses:

Held, that the whole must be considered as one general mercantile adventure, and that the amount of the necessary outfit, repairs, alterations, permanent improvements, and general expenses incurred before and subsequently to his death, should be deducted from the profits made and received after his death. The tenant for life entitled to the interest of the balances invested.

This cause came on for further consideration on the chief clerk's certificate, and a statement of facts upon which the parties interested had agreed, and the questions now raised were as to the interests which a tenant for life took, and the parties interested at her death, under the following circumstances:—

The suit was originally filed by the executors of the testator, for the purpose of administering the estate of Mr. Richard Green, the large shipowner of Blackwall. By his will, dated the 3rd April 1849, he directed (inter alia) that his executors thereby appointed should not sell any of his ships, or the shares to which he was entitled in private ships, for a period of seven years from the time of his death, unless the keeping of them should cause loss to or diminution of his estate, and in such case he gave them a discretionary power to sell the same; but, subject as aforesaid, he directed his said executors and trustees to retain his said ships and shares in ships for the period of seven years at the least, upon trust to superintend and manage the same, indicating certain voyages in which they were and would be engaged.

By a codicil to his said will he directed the residue of his estate and effects to be invested as therein mentioned, for the sole use and benefit of his sister Mrs. Mary Britten during her life, and at her death to be equally divided between her surviving children.

By a decree made in the cause, pronounced in Aug. 1863, it had been declared that the property of the testator in his ships and shares of ships ought to be retained by the executors and trustees in specie and worked by them for a period of seven years from the time of the testator's death, which took place on the 17th Jan. 1863, unless in the meantime (according to the terms of the testator's will) the keeping of them should cause loss to or diminution of his estate. And it was further declared that Mrs. Britten was entitled during her life for her sole and separate use to the whole net earnings of such of the said ships and his shares in other ships forming part of the said testator's residuary estate as might from time to time remain unsold until the end of such period of seven years.

The case on the hearing is reported in 1 De G. J. & S. 649. By the chief clerk's certificate it was found that several of the ships belonging to the testator were performing voyages at the time of his death, and it set out at length the names of the ships, the voyages on which they were engaged, and various other particulars. All the ships belonging to the testator had made profitable voyages; some of those in which he held shares had not, but sustained losses. A statement of facts accompanied the certificate, and the cause now came on for further consideration thereon.

Sir Roundell Palmer and A. G. Martin, for Mrs. Britten, the tenant for life, stated that the questions which arose for the consideration and direction of the court, all which related principally to the first year subsequent to the testator's decease, were: 1. Whether the voyages of all the several ships were to be taken as one mercantile adventure, or whether the expenses of such ships were to be set off against the profits made by such ships, and the tenant for life entitled to the gains of those which had been profitable, without deducting the expenses of outfit, &c., of those which had been unprofitable. 2. Whether against the gains made were to be set off all the expenses of the repairs which had been necessary to several of those ships (including permanent repairs) before as well as after the death of the testator; or only the expenses of repairs, &c., incurred since his death, exclusive of profit and special alterations, &c., on the voyages; and 3, whether the profits were to be apportioned over the whole voyage between the testator's estate and the residuary legatees in proportion to the periods of the voyage occurring before and after the testator's decease. They contended that the Apportionment Act did not apply to the circumstances of this case, and that the tenant for life was entitled to the most favourable interpretation of the testator's directions in the result of the whole of the voyages made by the ships. They cited

Shirley v. William, 24 Beav. 275;
Mutton v. Edmund, L. Rep., 1 Eq. 188;
Stark v. Carron Company, 3 De G. F. & J. 214;
Green v. Higgs, 6 Har. 236;
Johnson v. Mordaunt, 7 L. J., N. S., 468;
Brown v. Gellatly, W. Notes, 94 (under appeal).

Rendell, for the executors, took no part in the argument.

J. H. Taylor for parties in same interest.

Giffard, Q. C. and Fischer, for the children entitled in remainder after death of tenant for life, contended that the whole of the voyages were to be considered as one mercantile adventure, and that the losses incurred, and the necessary expenses incurred at any time either before or after the testator's death, should be deducted from the amount of the profits made.

The VICE-CHANCELLOR considered, and so held, that all the voyages must be considered as one adventure, that all the expenses as well of outfit as of all special alterations in the ships and permanent improvements therein—those of necessary repairs in the course of the several voyages as well before as after the death of the testator—should be deducted from the amount of profits made by the several ships. He also held that the Apportionment Act did not apply, and declared accordingly that Mrs. Britten was entitled to the net profits which had been received on account of the testator's estate since his decease in respect of the voyages on which the ships were engaged at the time of his death, after deducting the amount of all the expenses incurred, whether before or after his decease, in respect of such voyages; and deducting the amount of the losses on those ships which had incurred losses from the profit and gains made by the others.

SOUTHERN DISTRICT OF NEW YORK.

JAMES KENNEDY AND ANOTHER v. WILLIAM E. DODGE AND ANOTHER.

Bill of lading—Damage to cargo—Negligence in discharging cargo—Delivery—Recoupment—Freight.

A vessel brought goods to New York under an ordinary bill of lading, and coming to a dock which was sufficient if the cargo had been properly discharged upon it, proceeded to discharge, giving notice to the consignees of the landing of the goods. After the goods were discharged, the ship employed a watchman to watch them on the dock, but at the expense of the consignees. While a part of these goods remained on the dock, the ship so overloaded it with other goods, that it gave way, and these goods were thrown into the water, and damaged to an amount exceeding the freight. The shipowners sued for the freight, and the consignees sought to recoup the damages:

Held, that landing goods at a proper time and upon a proper dock with notice to the owners is equivalent to a delivery, after which the owners take all risks except those which proceed from the ship herself.

That the master of this ship is, however, liable for this damage, as it was caused by his negligent act, and that, as it was in the ordinary discharge of his duty as master, the ship is liable for the damage.

That the damages can be recouped to the amount of the freight, but the excess cannot be recovered against the libelants in this suit.

This was a libel in personam, brought by the owners of the ship Jeremiah Thompson, to recover the freight money on a considerable quantity of tin plate and iron rods shipped on board the Thompson at Liverpool, by Phelps, James, and Co., and consigned to the resps. in New York. The bill of lading was in the ordinary form, and the libel alleged performance of the contract, including the delivery of the goods at New York.

The answer admitted that the goods were shipped as stated, and their arrival at New York. But it averred that they were not delivered in good order; that, on the contrary, the cargo of the ship was discharged in such an unskilful and negligent manner that the dock on which it was placed broke down, and 313 boxes of the tin plate were precipitated into the river and greatly damaged; that the resps. were at great expense in recovering them, which, with the injury to the plates in being immersed in the water, amounted to more than the freight money sued for. The resps. asked to recoup and set off this damage and expense, to the extent of the libelants' claim for freight, and recover the balance.

The following were the facts proved, as found by the court:—

1. That the ship arrived at this port about the 11th Aug. 1866, with a general cargo, including the tinplate and iron rods mentioned in the bill of lading, and also a considerable quantity of pig-iron and other freight for other parties.

2. That on the application of the ship the harbour master assigned her a berth at pier No. 45, East River, which she took and proceeded to unload her cargo, which she continued to do for several days.

3. That the pier was a good one, with sufficient strength to have supported the cargo had it been properly placed thereon.

4. That as the cargo was discharged from time to time, the resps. had notice of the landing of that part of it which belonged to them, and took portions of it from time to time to their warehouses as was convenient.

5. That before they had removed it all, the ship had so overloaded the bridge of the dock with other cargo, and especially with the iron, that it gave way, and precipitated a portion of the resps.' goods into the river.

6. That the goods were thereby damaged, and the resps. incurred expense in recovering them from the water.

7. That by a standing agreement between the ship or her owners and the resp., when the latter had goods on the dock, landed from ships owned by the libelants, and such goods remained on the dock over night, the master or agent of the ship was to employ a night watchman to watch the goods, at the expense of the resps., and that they did so in this case.

SHIPMAN, J.—It is insisted by the libelants that these goods were delivered to the resps. when they were placed on the dock with notice to them, and were, consequently, at their risk thereafter. With regard to cargoes arriving at this port under ordinary bills of lading from foreign countries, landing them at a proper time and upon a proper dock, with notice to the owners, is equivalent to a delivery. After such landing and notice the owner takes all the risks arising from every other cause except that which proceeds from the ship itself. The parties to this suit evidently recognised this rule of law, when the watchman was employed at the expense of the resps. to watch this tin during the night-time. Had this tin been stolen, or removed by other parties without the intervention of the officers or agents of the ship, or damaged by the elements, the ship could not have been made responsible. But this does not meet the question before the court. The clear proof is that the pier was broken down by the weight of the iron placed upon it by direction of the master. He, and not the resps., selected the dock, and he broke it down. The fact that the resps. did not instantly remove their goods on being landed is no answer. The notice to them was not a notice against the wrongful and destructive acts of the ship in discharging the rest of her cargo, nor against a defective pier. The master had no more right to break the dock down and precipitate this tin into the water, than he would have had to pile his iron on crates of crockery and crush them. I attribute to him no intention to injure the pier or the resps.' goods. I am speaking of the legal, not the moral quality of his acts. He doubtless thought the dock would support the load he was placing upon it, but the result proved that he was mistaken. The consequences of that mistake are not to fall on the owners of the cargo, when they had no agency in causing it. The only doubt I have felt in the case is in relation to the responsibility of the ship for the damages. The master is clearly liable, for it was by his act that the goods were injured. There was a constructive delivery, and the question has arisen in my mind whether, after such constructive delivery, the wrongful act of the master in damaging the goods can be visited on the ship. But this wrongful act was not malicious or intentional on his part, but was one committed in the ordinary discharge of his duties as master, and within the scope of his powers as the agent of the owners. For this I think the ship is liable. Much stress was, during the hearing, laid on the fact that the master had no notice, nor any reason to suspect that the pier was not perfectly safe, and sufficiently strong to support the load he was placing upon it. There is, however, some evidence that he had doubts on this point. But whether he did or not is not material here. A ship is bound to deliver her cargo in a proper place—that, is, a place proper for the amount that is to be landed, and which it is to support at any one time. (The Majestic, Legal Obs., N. Y., p. 100; Judge Ingersoll's remarks, p. 105.) This dock or place is selected by the ship, and it is for her, and not the owners of the cargo, to see that it is sufficient to support the load that she places upon it, and that the weight of the cargo is properly distributed over the pier so as to secure its safety. The only remaining question is, whether the damages of the resp. arising out of this accident can be recouped from the claim for freight, and if there is a balance in their favour, whether it can be recovered in this suit. That the damages suffered by the resps. can be recouped from the freight money, which the libelants would otherwise recover, appears to be settled upon authority: (Bearse v. Ropes, Sprague's Decis. 331; Snow v. Carruth, Ibid. 324; Thatcher v. McCulloch, Olcott Adm. 365; Bradstreet v. Herron, Abbott Adm. 209; Zerega v. Poppe, Ibid. 397.) By way of recoupment, the resp. can, as the damages arise out of the same transaction, extinguish a portion or all the claim of the libelants. But they can go no further. The court cannot pronounce in their favour for any sum in which their damages may exceed the amount of the libelants' demand. In Nicholls v. Tremlett, Sprague's Decis. 367, the court says: "The Admiralty does not take cognisance of pleas in set-off, no statute having given it that authority, and it has been thought by some that a distinct claim by the resp., founded upon the violation of the contract by the libelant is in the nature of a set-off, and so not cognisable by this court. But I am of opinion that where the counter claim is founded upon the same charter-party, the resp. may set it up in his answer, so that the damages that he has sustained may be recouped from the amount which the libelant might recover. But in this case, if the damages sustained by the resp. should exceed the just claim of the libelant, the court can give no decree for the excess, the utmost effect being to diminish or extinguish the claim of the libelant; nor could the resp. afterward maintain a suit for such excess. He cannot be permitted to split up his demand and litigate the same question twice. Having once voluntarily submitted his claim for damages to the court, he must be content with such relief as the tribunal may afford him." I understand this to be a correct statement of the law both in the Admiralty and common law courts: (Sickles v. Patterson, 14, Wend. 257.) And it follows that this court can render no judgment for the resps. to recover any excess beyond the libelants' just claim. Had the resps. filed a cross or independent libel they would have recovered their whole damages. But it is too late now. They must content themselves with a diminution or extinguishment of the libelants' just claim. Let an order be entered referring the case to a commissioner to take the proofs, and report to this court the amount of freight which might be due to the libelants under the bill of lading, and the amount of damage which the resps. have suffered by the injury to their goods from the cause mentioned in the answer, together with the expense which they incurred in recovering it from the water. On the coming in of the report a final decree will be entered in conformity to the rules laid down in this opinion.

For libelants, Beebe, Dean, and Donohue.

For resps., Phelps and Fuller.

THE PATRICK HENRY.

Bill of lading—Foreign coin carried as cargo and lost—Damages—Freight.

Where a ship at Melbourne bound for New York received on freight a quantity of sovereigns and gave a usual bill of lading therefor, but failed on her arrival to deliver them to the indorsee of the bill of lading:

Held, that in fixing the amount of damages, the bill of lading was to be treated, not as a contract to pay money, but to carry and deliver goods.

That the value of the sovereigns was not to be fixed by a statute which fixed its computation for ordinary transactions, but by their actual value in the currency of the country:

That the clause in the bill of lading fixing the freight at so many pounds sterling was a promise to pay money, and in calculating the freight the pound sterling must be taken at its legal value.

This was a libel filed against the ship Patrick Henry, by Reuben Ross, jun., who was indorsee of the following bill of lading:

Shipped, in good order and well-conditioned, by James Patrick, in and upon the good ship or vessel called the Patrick Henry, whereof is master for the present voyage Wm. Page, and now riding at anchor in Hudson Bay, and bound for New York, one bag containing ninety sovereigns British sterling, being marked and numbered as in the margin, and are to be delivered in the like good order and condition at the aforesaid port of New York (the act of God, the Queen's enemies, fire, and all and every other dangers and accidents of the seas, rivers, and navigation, of whatever nature or kind soever, excepted), unto order or its assigns, he or they paying freight for the said goods, 2*l*. sterling in full, with prime and average accustomed. In witness whereof, the master or purser of said ship or vessel hath affirmed to four bills of lading, all of this tenor and date, the one of which bills being accomplished, the others to stand void.

(Signed)

WM. C. PAGE

Dated in Melbourne, Sept. 19, 1865.

The ship having received the goods, and given the bill of lading, proceeded to New York, where she arrived in Dec. 1865, but failed to deliver the sovereigns. Her owners contended that they were only liable for the value of the sovereigns, as fixed by a statute passed years before, fixing their value for commercial transactions, instead of the actual value in the currency, which had depreciated, though made a legal tender by statute for the payment of debts.

SHIPMAN, J.—The only question in this case is as to the true rule of damages, the breach being admitted. The libellant claims that he is entitled to recover the market value of the coin at this port at the time it should have been delivered. The claimant, on the other hand, insists that in estimating the damages the value of the sovereigns should be taken at the rate fixed by law for computation in ordinary commercial transactions, the same as if this were a suit to recover the amount of a bill of exchange or other promise to pay. I do not accede to this view. The agreement in this bill of lading is not a promise to pay money, but to transport certain articles on freight. Whether these articles were gold coins, gold bars, gold dust, or gold in any other form of use or ornament, can make no difference. Like every other article placed on freight, and covered by a bill of lading, unless delivered according to the terms of the contract of affreightment, their value may be recovered by the holder of the bill. That value is to be estimated in the currency of the country in which the port of delivery is situated, and where the suit is brought, unless otherwise provided for in the contract itself. The proof is that these sovereigns were worth in this market at the time they should have been delivered 7 dols. 5c. a-piece in our money. Our recent Legal Tender Act and the decisions under it cited at bar have no application to this part of the case. There is another question of trifling importance so far as the amount depending upon it is concerned, which requires to be disposed of, and that is whether any deduction should be made on account of freight. No freight was strictly earned, as the contract was not fulfilled. But admiralty courts have power to do substantial justice between parties, and substantial justice in this case is to make the libellant good for the loss sustained. He is, under this breach of the contract, entitled to the value of ninety sovereigns at the market rate, less two pounds sterling freight money. As the stipulation to pay these two pounds was a promise to pay money at this port, they should be reckoned in the currency of this country, according to our laws. The legal value of the pound sterling in commercial transactions in this country is fixed by Act of Congress at 4 dols. 44 c. The value of ninety sovereigns at the time of the breach was 604 dols. 50 c. From this deduct two pounds sterling, computed in our money (8 dols. 98 c.), will leave 625 dols. 62 c.—the principal sum the libellant is entitled to recover. To this should be added interest at the rate of 7 per cent. from Dec. 28, 1865 to the date of the decree. The clerk of this court is hereby directed to compute the interest, and add to it the principal sum. Then let a decree be entered for the amount of principal and interest in favour of the libellant, with costs.

GENERAL AND PARTICULAR AVERAGE.

DIGEST OF CASES IN GENERAL AND PARTICULAR AVERAGE.

FROM 1860 TO 1867 (a).

1. Goods "unwarranted free from particular average."—Warehouse rent and other charges in case of shipwreck—Shipping and labouring clause.—Underwriters on goods insured "free from particular average," held not liable under the shipping and labouring clause in the policy to pay warehouse rent, transshipping charges, &c., where the goods were not considered to be in immediate peril of a total loss: (The Great Indian Promiscuous Shipping Company v. Amundson, Q. B., April 23 and 24, 1860, 1 Mar. Law Rep. 65; 1 B. & S. 41; 30 L. J. 218, 7 Jur. N. S. 830; 4 L. T. Rep. N. S. 249. Ex. Ch. Feb. 8 and 9, 1862, 1 Mar. Law Rep. 211, 2 B. & S. 266, in error; 31 L. J. 206; 9 Jur. N. S. 198; 6 L. T. Rep. N. S. 297. Smith v. Cair, C. B., Nov. 7 and 12, 1863, 1 Mar. Law Rep. 699; 18 C. B. N. S., 291; 33 L. J. 99; 9 Jur. N. S. 1234; 9 L. T. Rep. N. S. 596.)

[NOTE.—These decisions were in conflict with the practice of average, as briefly described in the treatise under the title "Total Loss," in the Digest of Maritime Law Cases, 1857 to 1860, No. 2267b. But it has been finally determined in the case of Kidson v. Empire Marine Insurance Company, L. Rep., 1 C. P. 545; and L. Rep., 1 C. P. Ex. Ch. 357, that the distinction between "particular average," signifying damage by one water or partial loss, and "particular charges" forms by long settled usage a part of the ordinary contract of Marine Insurance. See sect. 7 hereof.]

2. Barges used in creating river—Action of detinue—Question as to lien on cargo for expenses of raising it by order of underwriters—Salvage or general average.—

(a) The great importance and interest attaching to the difficult subject of average, will doubtless give special value to this Digest of the cases decided since 1860. We intend to follow it with similar Digests of some other important branches of Maritime Law.

A barge employed to convey copper ore from a ship having sunk, an order from the underwriter was obtained for raising it: Held, that the owners of the goods had a right of action for damages on account of the copper ore having been detained in security for expenses of raising it and that as against them there was no lien at common law for salvage or general average. The underwriter was the person liable under the express contract Hellie v. Clavidge, 4 Taunt. 907; and Stoddan v. Hockley, 13 M. & W. 653, referred to. (Castellon and others v. Thomson and another, C. B., Nov. 21, 1862; 13 C. B. N. S., 105; 32 L. J. 79, C. P.; 7 L. T. Rep. N. S. 424; 1 Mar. Law Rep. 359.)

3. Insurance on steamship—Clause "particular average recoverable on hull and machinery separately."—Expense of extinguishing fire.—Under a policy of insurance on a steamship, wherein the hull and machinery were, as usual, separately valued, and particular average amounting to 3 per cent. stipulated to be recoverable on each, as if separately insured: Held, that the expense of extinguishing a fire in the hull of the ship was properly apportioned as a general charge, or general average, on hull and machinery, and could not be added as an expense incurred upon the hull only to the particular average on the hull, in order to make up 3 per cent. on its insured value (Oppenheim v. P. & O. B. May, 4, 1863, 1 Mar. Law Rep. 559; 3 B. & S. 379; 32 L. J. 10, 1864, 2 Mar. Law Rep. 17; 3 B. & S. 348; 33 L. J. 267.)

4. Average—Jettison.—Construction of clause in a policy of insurance on goods: "Free from average or claim arising from jettison or leakage, unless consequent upon stranding, sinking, or fire:" the absence of punctuation renders the meaning uncertain (Carr and another v. The Royal Exchange Assurance Company, Q. B. Nov. 20, 1863, 2 Mar. Law Rep. 4; 33 L. J. 63; 10 Jur. N. S. 814.)

5. Lien for freight and general average—Bottomry—Transshipment—Arrest of cargo—Right to forward it for earning freight—Suits as trustees for underwriters when claim satisfied by them.—Lien on cargo for freight on transshipping and forwarding it to its destination, and for general average in preference to bottomry bond. A ship called the Galun, bound from Hayti to Europe, calling at Falmouth for orders, put into the port of Aegre, in Terceira, under average, and was there condemned. The cargo was transhipped into a vessel called the Mary Jane, and the expenses incurred by a bottomry or respondent's bond on the cargo payable at Falmouth. The Mary Jane was wrecked at Bally, and the owners settled with their underwriters for a total loss of that ship and her freight. The cargo was ordered to Hamburg, but was arrested in the Admiralty Court by the bottomry bondholder, and brought to London, where it was sold. The underwriters on freight per Mary Jane, did not abandon their right to forward the cargo to its destination: Held, reversing the judgment of the Admiralty Court, that there was a lien for freight, and for general average per Mary Jane, upon the proceeds of the cargo in preference to the bottomry bond. The Constance, 2 W. Rob. 207, and the North Star, 1 Lush. 45, as to the Admiralty Court not having jurisdiction in questions of general average, or in claims for loss on cargo sold to pay expenses, considered not applicable to the present case. The expense of transshipping and forwarding the cargo of the Galun was in the nature of a salvage charge whereby the cargo was rendered available for the bottomry bondholder or any one else. Suits in the Admiralty Court or at common law, are made in name of the master (or owner) as trustee for the underwriters where his claim has been satisfied by them: (Cherry v. Macmillan, Cargo on Galun, J. C. P. C. Dec. 9, 1864, 1 Mar. Law Rep. 509; 3 L. T. Rep. N. S. 550; 10 Jur. N. S. 477, 33 L. J. 97) (3 Law Digest, 236, case incorrectly described.)

6. Jettison of cargo adrift.—Loss of goods stowed on deck, jettisoned after having been washed adrift, and obstructing the pumps, held to be recoverable by general contribution. Where a charter-party stipulates that a deck cargo shall be carried, its jettison becomes a subject of general contribution. Practice of average adjusters, not allowing wreck cut away as general average approved of. (The Shipping Bar, Johnson v. Chapman, C. P. 1864, May 8, and July 10, 36 L. J. 32.)

[NOTE.—The effect likely to be given to this judgment.

seems to be not altogether satisfactory. The jettison of deck cargo adrift is often, indeed, perhaps in most instances, a matter not of choice, but of inevitable necessity.]

7. General average--Advance of freight.—Held, that freight paid in advance, not being at the risk of the shipowner, the charterer, by whom the cargo was shipped, is liable to contribute on the advance of freight to general average after the ship's arrival at her port of destination, which advance is virtually increased value of the cargo. According to Hicks v. Shishl (7 E. & B. 633) the advance of cash, being by the terms of the charter-party made subject to insurance by the charterers, was an absolute advance of freight not recoverable back from the shipowner in the event of the loss of the ship, and therefore at the charterer's risk: (Trayes v. Worms, C. P. June 8, 1865, 2 Mar. Law Rep. 209; 34 L. J. 274 12 L. T. Rep. N. S. 547.)

[NOTE.—This case clearly points out the impropriety of deducting any wages or port charges from the contributory value of freight advanced in adjustments of general average.]

8. "Particular average" does not include "particular charges"—Transshipping and extra forwarding expenses on cargo in case of shipwreck, recoverable on a policy on freight, "warranted free from particular average."—This was an action under a policy of insurance on freight, "warranted free from particular average unless the ship be stranded," for a voyage, with a cargo of guano, from the Chinha Islands to the United Kingdom. The ship was not stranded. In the course of the voyage she was seriously damaged by perils of the sea, put into Rio, and was there condemned as irreparable. The cargo was transhipped into another vessel, and forwarded to its destination at an expense which amounted to less than the original freight insured: The Court held, that the underwriters were liable for the charges of transshipping and forwarding the cargo to the United Kingdom, as an expense within the suing and labouring clauses incurred to avert a total loss of the freight. In delivering the judgment of the Court of C. P., Willes, J. observed that, without incurring the expense in question, the freight insured would never have had any complete existence; it would have been totally lost. That the only right of the shipowner in respect of freight was to detain the cargo for a reasonable time at Rio, in order to send it on in another vessel to its destination, and so earn the freight. As the cargo lay at Rio, no part of the freight had become due; no freight, even pro rata itineris could be claimed by the shipowner. The expense was incurred in consequence of a peril insured against, to prevent the destruction of the subject-matter, for which in the event of its loss, the underwriters must be answerable. The terms of the suing and laboring clause in the policy of insurance are that "in case of any loss or misfortune it shall be lawful for the assured to sue, labour, and travel in and about the defence, safeguard and recovery of the subject-matter of the insurance, or any part thereof, to the charges whereof the underwriters will contribute in proportion to the amount insured." And the court held that the true construction of this clause is, that it extends not only to every case in which the thing insured becomes, or may become, by abandonment, the property of the underwriters; but to every case where labour is expended in warding off loss, damage, or detriment, for the consequences of which the underwriters would be answerable, to every case where they might incur liability, and might, therefore, derive a benefit by the extraordinary exertions, that they ought to contribute to the expense of avoiding detriment, in proportion to what they would have to pay if the detriment had come to a head for want of timely care. In the course of their reasoning on the subject the court took occasion to express their opinion that the evidence given before the jury established an understood meaning of "particular average" as applicable only to a partial loss of or damage to, the thing insured, and not including "particular charges;" and also to mark their approval of the existing rules of average adjustment on goods by the following examples; For instance, in a case where goods are, by the memorandum at the foot of the policy, warranted free from particular average under 5 per cent., and the goods are wetted by sea water in a storm which drives the ship into a port of refuge, by drying the goods at an expense of less than 5 per cent., the damage may be prevented from amounting to 5 per cent., whilst if not dried they would decay and become damaged over 5 per cent. It is obviously then the duty of the master to use all reasonable means to preserve the goods, and obviously for the interest of the underwriters to encourage the performance of that duty by contributing to the expense incurred. Accordingly the rule has been to pay for damage to memorandum articles only when it exceeds the specified percentage, and not to allow the percentage to be eked out by expenses falling within the meaning of the suing and labouring clause. The amount of expense reasonably incurred in preserving the goods is, according to practice, contributed to by the underwriters, however small in result the actual damage to the goods may be, and the partial loss or damage is paid only if it amounts to the stipulated percentage. Thus, if in the case put, the expense was 2 or 3 per cent., and the damage only 2 or 1 per cent., according to the present practice the underwriters would pay the expense, but not the damage. Were the practice otherwise, the underwriters, though saved from loss, would be altogether exempt from contribution, and they would be exposed to the very inconvenience which the memorandum has been supposed to obviate by the protection it affords them from frivolous demands in respect of small losses: (Kidston v. Empire Marine Insurance Company, C. P. May 8, 1866, 1 L. Rep., 1 C. P. 535; Ex. Ch. Feb. 4, 1867, 1 L. Rep., 2 C. P. 357, Ex. Ch.)

9. General average.—Extra expenditure of coals bringing auxiliary screw steamer home from Rio instead of discharging cargo and repairing ship there: Held not to be general average, and not recoverable as a charge substituted in lieu of other expenses. Question as to unshipping and warehousing gold: (Wilson v. Bank of Victoria, Q. B. Feb. 12, 1867, 16 L. T. Rep. N. S. 9; L. Rep., 2 Q. B. 208.

[NOTE.—Considering the practice of average in regard to substituted expenses, and the equity of the case, this judgment seems open to objection.]

We select the following decision from a "Digest of the United States Reports."

CARRIER.

1. Where goods are shipped which must pass through the hands of several intermediate carriers before arriving at the place of their destination, an intermediate carrier does not relieve himself from liability as common carrier by simply unloading the goods at the end of his route, and storing them in his warehouse, without delivery, or notice to, or any attempt to deliver to, the next carrier: (McDonald v. The Western R. R. Corp. 84 N. Y. 497.)
